29. Athanaſius eaſily ſatisfied the Emperour, both that Arius who had been forbidden by the Council to return to Alexandria, and was the Arch-Hæretick, ought not to be received into Communion, and concerning thoſe Accuſations, having as it fortunately happened, ſent two of his Presbyters to the Court to excuſe his not waiting on the Emperour by reaſon of his more than Ordinary Employments at his firſt coming to the See, and to reſel any objections that might be made againſt him. They ſo dexterouſly diſcharged what they had in Commiſſion, as obtaining Audience they cleared all Doubts and Surmiſes, both as to the Biſhops Legal Election, and his Perſonal Carriage and Deportment. This device of Euſebius not taking, he grew inraged at the ſucceſs, and reſolved if he could not ruin Athanaſius at a diſtance from Court, he would make yet his Seat too hot for him, by kindling a Flame within his own Province. Meletius the Schiſmatick being favourably handled by the Nicene Council returned to his See at Lycopolis in Ægypt, and there not only Ordained Arſenius contrary to the Canons thereof, Biſhop of the Arſenitans (which place he himſelf had formerly held) but being urged to Name his Succeſſor, made choice of one John his familiar Friend, to Succeed him: This begetting a Contention, for ſo much as the Juriſdiction of the Metropolitan was thereby much infringed, the Arians obſerving their opportunity, ſtrike in with the Meletians, and under their Name and Pretences, reſolve to try the utmoſt with Athanaſius.

And make Diſturbances in the Province of Alexandria.

Soz. Lib. 2. c. 21.

Athan. Apol. 2. Soz. lib. 2. c. 20. Soc. l. 1. c. 3.

30. The Meletians therefore ſeeking Patronage of their Schiſm from the Emperour, as Epiphanius Writes, ſent to him John Calinicus and Iſchyras formerly mentioned (the one a Meletian Biſhop, and the other made again as good as a Prieſt) to obtain a Toleration, and being barred of Acceſs, betook themſelves to Euſebius of Nicomedia; He making advantage hereof, undertook their Patronage under condition of their receiving Arius into their Communion; and not only procured them Audience but a Licence for their Separation, which Baronius denies, affirming that Epiphanius had this ſtory from ſome Writer that favoured the Meletians, alledging that Conſtantine is cleared of this Calumny, by his Letters to Athanaſius, and the Teſtimony of Euſebius (a Writer in the Cardinals judgment prone enough to the Arian Hereſie) who witneſſeth that he after the Council, did his endeavour to preſerve the Authority of the Canons, and laboured to Compoſe thoſe Diſſentions in the Churches of Ægypt. To be ſure this is agreed on all hands, Athanaſius went about to bring the Meletians to the obſervation of the Nicene Canons, which they again reſiſting, Euſebius and the reſt of the Arians ſtruck in with the Schiſmaticks and Levelled all their Engines againſt Athanaſius.

31. Euſebius and Thæognis laying their heads together, aſſume as Aſſociates and Councellors in the attempt, their old Companions Maris Biſhop of Chalcedon and Valens and Urſatius Biſhops in Pannonia, formerly condemned by the Council. Thoſe five preſent the Articles of the Schiſmaticks againſt Athanaſius, "wherein is objected that he is the great Cauſe and Fomenter of the troubles "in the Ægyptian Church. That like a falſe Traitor he endeavoured a Collection "in Ægypt, Levying Money, and therewith ſupplying Philumenius, who attempted the imbroyling of that Country in Sedition and Tumults; and that he "oppreſſed the People of Ægypt, exacting of them Linnen Cloaths or "Veſtments for the Church of Alexandria. His two Presbyters then lying at Conſtantinople eaſily refelled the objection concerning this Tribute of Linnen, ſuppoſed to be exacted by him, ſhewing that this was no new thing (as indeed there are many Examples) to require Linnen for the Ornament of Churches. But judging it moſt ſafe Perſonally to appear and make his Defence himſelf, he haſted to Court, and preſenting himſelf to the Emperour, ſo plainly and clearly evinced thoſe Articles of Forgery, that he was diſmiſſed with great Countenance and Reſpect, and with Letters Teſtimonial and Commendatory to the Alexandrian Church; all the Members whereof, are ſeveerly injoyned to receive and own him as their True, Loyal, and Pious Metropolitan. Some ſay the Emperour was ſo inraged at the double dealing of Euſebius and Theognis his Aſſociate, that remembring how upon refuſal to Subſcribe they had been Sentenced and

Several Articles againſt Athanaſius preſented to the Emperour by the Schiſmaticks

Which being cleared.

Euſebius and the reſt are baniſhed.

afterward Singing a Palinody at his Interceſſion, were freed from the danger of Exile, now in deteſtation both of their Relaps and Malice he cauſed to be Executed on them the former dieræ of Baniſhment, and Amphion and Chiroſtus were Subſtituted in their Places.

Theod. l. 1. c. 20. Athan. Apol. 2.. Socr. l. 1. c. 27.

32. However their Baniſhment was not long, being within a Year or two recalled, by the interceſſion of Conſtantia as (a) Baronius thinks, though other Chronologers place her Death Four Years before, (A. D. 327.) which Lady at her laſt Funeral earneſtly Commended her Arian Chaplain to her Brother, who by this means had notable opportunities to ſerve both the Perſon and Cauſe of Euſebius. Being recalled a little after the Dedication of the New City of Conſtantinople, they found new Matter wherewith to Charge Athanaſius. Iſchyras the pretended Prieſt whom Coluthus the pretended Biſhop had Ordained, being found lurking about Meotis, where he acted the part of a true Miniſter; Athanaſius had ſent Macarius, one of his Presbyters who defended his Cauſe ſtoutly at Conſtantinople, to bring him to his preſence, who finding Iſchyras ſick in Bed, left only word with the Father that he had been there, whom he adviſed to Council his Son not to intermeddle any more with the Miniſterial Function till he had ſpoken with the Metropolitan. Iſchyras finding he could not continue there, betook himſelf to Euſebius to whom he complained, that being a Prieſt he had been outragiouſly abuſed and wronged by Athanaſius, his Church by him “being Villified and Prophaned, his Alter overthrown, his Chalice broken in pieces, “ his Bible burnt, and himſelf threatned with Cenſures and Perſecution. Euſebius “ having this advantage, as he thought againſt the Biſhop, yet thought good to add greater Calumnies both that ſomthing might be ſure to ſtick according to the * Proverb, and that they might not utterly loſe the Emperour upon whom they had ſeveral times impoſed with their deviſed Fables.

(a) Ad An. 331.

(b) Jacobus Capellus hiſt. Eccles. cent. quinq; ad A.D. 327.

Being recall'd they charge him with new matter.

Socr. lib. 1. c. 20. Sozom. l. 2. c. 22.

* Fortiter calumniari ut aliquid hæreat.

And add thereto Murder.

33. To the other therefore about Iſchyras, they joyn the moſt impudent Calumny of all others, accuſing him of having Murdered Arſenius a Biſhop of the Meletian Faction: Whom that the device might take, they hid in a ſecret place, and produced a Mans Hand, which as barbarouſly cut from the dead Body of Arſenius, they ſhewed to the People. But their ſport was partly ſpoiled by the Confeſſion of Iſchyras, who being ſharply reprehended by ſome honeſt Men, confeſſed the Forgery about Macarius, and the Emperour was quickly ſatisfied that it was a trick, yet as to the buſineſs of Arſenius, he wrote to Dalmatius to enquire about it, one that then was Cenſor at Antioch, foraſmuch as he was bound to take notice of any Complaints concerning the violent death of his Subjects. This was the ſame Year that Macarius the Biſhop of Jeruſalem dyed, after he had ſitten in that See Nineteen Years, whoſe Memory is Celebrated by the Roman Church, on the Tenth of March. He Succeeded Maximus, whom he had not long before Ordained Biſhop of Dioſpolis; but the People of Jeruſalem would not ſuffer there to ſettle, but reſerved him as a Succeſſor to Macarius, who knowing to be an earneſt Defender of the Concluſions of the Nicene Council, and fearing ſome of the Arian Faction might get into his Chair, willingly acquieſced in their Choice. That Dioſpolis was a City of Palæſtine, in the Tribe of Ephraim, formerly called Lydda, which Name it changed when it grew Famous for the Idol of Jupiter there Worſhipped; in after times was more taken notice of for a Council there held againſt Pelagius, and by reaſon that St. George the Martyr who ſuffer'd under the Perſecution of Diocletian, the Engliſh Patron who had large Poſſeſſions in this Country, was here Buried, it was by the Chriſtians dwelling thereabouts, called St. Georges by way of Conſecration to his Memory.

Jacobus de vitriaci Hiſt. Hieroſol. c. 57. Dr. Heylin.

34. Athanaſius being warned from Dalmatius to provide for his Tryal, ſo Induſtriouſly ordered the Matter, that purſuing him from place to place, by good eſpials at length he was detected at Tyrus, and though he denied himſelf, yet being brought before Paul the Biſhop of the place, was forced to confeſs himſelf the ſame Man, and how he had been wrought upon by Euſebius. The Emperour being hereof certified by Macarius a Prieſt whom Athanaſius had diſpatched to the Court for this purpoſe, commanded Dalmatius to deſiſt from any further Proſecution, and rejecting his Accuſers, by very obliging Letters deteſted theſe Calumnies raiſed againſt him which wrought this effect, that both Arſenius and John the late Ordained Meletian Biſhop confeſſed their fault to Athanaſius, begged his pardon, and were reconciled to the Catholick Church. And ſo as Athanaſius tells us, the Conſpiracy of the Meletians here had its period. But the Arians ſtill conſidering what an Adverſary their Cauſe had of Athanaſius, and how much Credit they had loſt by receiving the foil ſo many times, would not here give over, but leſt they ſhould be deprived of ſo fit an Inſtrument as John was, brought him about again to their Party. Then do they afreſh ſollicit the Emperour, telling him of freſh Complaints dayly coming in againſt Athanaſius, both many, and of great Conſequence: they aſſure, the Witneſſes that would now appear were not mean Perſons, and they pray his Majeſty that a Synod may be called, and the Criminal heard in a legal way.

Athan. Apol. 2.

But their Villanies are detected.

The Arians ſollicit the Emperour againſt Athanaſius.

35. Though Conſtantine (as at this diſtance one may well imagine) might have had ſufficient cauſe both to ſuſpect their Malice, and acquit the Biſhop in his own Conſcience; yet growing now old he became more eaſie to be wrought upon, both by the Importunities of his own Relations, and the Flatteries and Courtſhip of thoſe about him, Juſtice withall ſeeming to call upon him, which the name of Five Biſhops, who were ready to give in the Information, ſeemed very much to induce him to believe. He granted therefore their Petition, and appointed a Council to be held at Cæſarea in Palæſtine, a place picked out on purpoſe by Euſebius for the temper of the Clergy by whom he was to be judged, Athanaſius ſeeing very well as Matters were deviſed, and how they would end; there being ſcarce Four Orthodox Biſhops in that Conntry, gave his reaſons to the Emperour why he might juſtly decline his appearance at that place. Hereat the Emperour was nettled, as conceiving his Authority injured by ſuch a refuſal, yet he betrayed not his Indignation much further than changing the place of meeting from Cæſarea to Tyre (for which change alſo ſome pretence was made, that the Biſhops might conſecrate that Famous Church lately builded at Hieruſalem) he commanded him to appear there at his peril, and leſt he ſhould make a default, orders the Commander in chief of thoſe Parts to bring his Perſon before the Council.

Whereupon a Council is Summoned to Cæſarea.

Another at Tyre where Athanaſius is to appear at his peril.

36. To this Council were aſſembled ſuch as had been of the Arian Faction at Nice, and as Euſebius thought might be moſt for his turn, Sixty only as Socrates informeth, over whom he appointed Dionyſius the Count to preſide with a Band of Soldiers for a Guard. Athanaſius perceiving the Emperours mind to be alienated from him, and that he was to be convented before his Enemies under the Moderatorſhip of Soldiers, whereby neither could the Council, ſuch as it was, be free, debated with himſelf, whether he ſhould preſent himſelf, and for Three Months not Thirty (as the Copy of Sozomen now hath it) deferred his appearance, by which he gained time to underſtand the Matters wherewith he was charged, and how to anſwer them. Yet leſt he ſhould give his Enemies occaſion to inſult, and freſh Advantages whereby further to calumniate him to the Emperour, he appeared, and with him Forty ſeven of his Suffragan Biſhops amongſt whom Potamon and Paphnutius formerly mentioned, and Macarius his faithful Presbyter was thither brought in Chains by the Souldiers. The Accuſations were taken from the former Depoſitions againſt him in the Caſe of Iſchyras and Arſenius, which though he demonſtrated to be frivolous, and that Mans Ordination null, yet did he profit nothing, his Enemies being reſolved, the Count taking away all Freedom, and his Souldiers offering Violence to all of the Defendants Party.

37. When the buſineſs concerning Arſenius came to be opened, the Dead Mans Hand pretended to be cut off from his Dead Body, was produced, whereat Arſenius who came to teſtifie in the behalf of the Biſhop, preſented himſelf ſhowing both Hands ſound and entire to the Judges. The Arians confounded at this ſight, inſtead of Confeſſion, broke out into a rage, facing him out that this was meer Inchantment and Deluſion, and falling upon him, they had torn him in pieces, had not the Count interpoſed. As for the breaking of the Chalice, to all the ſober Party the Story ſeemed ſufficiently confuted by its own Vanity; but the Arians would not be content to hear, except they ſend ſome of their own Faction to ſee and report the Matter. This Reſolution was proteſted againſt by the two Ægyptian Biſhops, who importuned both the Council and Count that ſo ſtrange a Reſolution might not take effect, but that all things might be reſerved to the cognizance of the Emperour. But when neither the Arian Biſhops would alter their Reſolutions, nor Dionyſius the Count recall thoſe whom they had diſpatched to Mæotis, Athanaſius departed from Tyre towards Conſtantinople, to lay open to the Emperour thoſe Outragious Proceedings. Thoſe that were ſent in the mean time to Mæotis aſſiſted by Philagrius the Prefect, and the Soldiers addicted to the Arian Party, refuſed ſuch Clerks and others as were ready to appear in behalf of Athanaſius and Macarius, but taking their

After ſeveral falſe Accuſations.

Athan. ut ſuprà. Sozom. l. 2. c. 24. alii.

The Arian Biſhops deprive Athanaſius of his Biſhoprick.

Evidence from Jews, Catechumeni and Heathens, at their return to Tyre gave up to their Maſters a ſuitable Verdict, whereupon enſued a Sentence correſpondent, that Athanaſius ſhould be deprived of his Biſhoprick, be ſuffered no more to reſide at Alexandria, but John the Principal of the Meletian Faction, with others of that Gang, ſhould be received into Communion, and all reſtored to their former Dignities and Preferments. Of this their Sentence and Decree they inform Conſtantine, as alſo other Biſhops, whom they forbid to have any Communication whatſoever with Athanaſius.

38. Several of the honeſt Party ſhewed their diſlike of thoſe Proceedings at that Council with Indignation. Paphnutius evidently perceiving the drift of Euſebius and his Party, and heard they had got a Guard ſuitable to their Deſign, ſtepping to Maximus Biſhop of Hieruſalem, who being his Brother Confeſſor had loſt alſo an Eye and a Leg in the Perſecution of Maxentius, and taking him by the Hand, bad him riſe up, telling him it was not fit for them who had ſuffered ſuch things as they had for Chriſt, to abide in the company of ſuch wicked men, foraſmuch as he could not but clearly perceive how contrary to Juſtice the buſineſs was managed; and ſo departing, he told him the whole Story concerning Athanaſius, to whom Maximus ever after continued a moſt faithful Friend. And Potamon ſeeing Euſebius ſit in State as Judge, who formerly had denied his Saviour, and Athanaſius ſtanding as a Delinquent without any reſpect, though of ſo high a Dignity in the Church as Metropolitan of ſuch a See, he could not refrain himſelf, but upbraided therewith the proud and inſulting Prelate. But all to no purpoſe, Athanaſius muſt be ruined, that Arius might return, and with him Arianiſm, into the Alexandrian Province. This year died Sylveſter Biſhop of Rome at the laſt day of the Year, having governed that Church One and twenty Years; to whom ſucceeded Marcus, on the Eighteenth of the Calends of February. He died on the Nones of October, (October 7.) and after the See had been void Twenty days, Julius ſucceeded on the Sixth before the Calends of November, A. D. 336. V. C. 1089. the Ninth Indiction, the Fourth of the 278. Olympiad. Fl. Popilius Nepotianus and Facundus being Conſuls.

Sylveſter Biſhop of Rome dies.

Is ſucceeded by Marcus.

Then Julius.

Damaſus.

39. The Fathers having diſpatched this buſineſs, removed to Hieruſalem to the Conſecration of the Church upon Calvary, where they performed the Ceremony with much exactneſs according to the Emperours Orders. It happened in the mean while that Arius, by procurement of that Prieſt whom Conſtantia at the point of Death had commended to her Brother, was permitted to come before the Emperour, who promiſed him reſpect and countenance, provided he adhæred to the Determinations of the Nicene Council. He profeſſes to acquieſce in thoſe Determinations, and offers to Conſtantine a Confeſſion of his Faith in Writing, whereat many of the Orthodox Party quarrelled, for that it wanted the word Conſubſtantial. Hereupon the Emperour reſolving to reſerve the Examination of it to competent Judges, ſent it to Jeruſalem. The Orthodox there plainly perceived that by this new Creed, and leaving out the word Conſubſtantial (however he called the ſecond Perſon God, and Begotten of his Father before all Ages) he overthrew all that the Nicene Fathers had Eſtabliſhed, yet could they do no good, Euſebius his Party being ſo ſtrong, that they approved of his Confeſſion, and Decreed he ſhould be received into Communion. Athanaſius e're this was got to the Emperour, before whom he ſo laid open the Original and Progreſs of the Calumnies deviſed againſt him, that Conſtantine in great diſpleaſure commanded his Judges to appear before him. There Euſebius the Ringleader, with Five others of the moſt bold appeared, the reſt ſlipping away to their own Churches. Now made they no mention of the breaking of the Chalice, or the matter concerning Arſenius, but preventing the danger of being called to account for what had paſſed at Tyre, charged him with new and ſtrange Matter. This was no leſs than that he ſhould ſtop the Corn which from Ægypt (the Granary of the Empire) was wont yearly to be ſent to Conſtantinople.

Athan. de Synod.

Soc. l. 2. c. 22. &c Athan. Apol. 2.

Another charge againſt Athanaſius.

40. This being atteſted by Five Biſhops, which being formerly of his Party, had now apoſtatized to the Arians, the Emperour gave them credit as his Favourers, and in great wrath refuſing to hear his Apology, baniſhed him to Triers a City of the Belgick Gall, now the See of one of the Eccleſiaſtical Electors of the German Empire. He being baniſhed, the Arians alſo procured the ſame Judgment to be given againſt his Orthodox Suffragan Biſhops, and this being paſt, and the way made for Arius, they procure him Licenſe to return to Alexandria. There he had not long been, but he raiſed a Tumult in the City, moſt of the Inhabitants

Upon which he is baniſhed to Triers in Gall

Arius returns to Alexandria.

Thence is ſent for to Conſtantinople.

Socr. lib. 1. c. penult. Theod. l. 1. c. 14.

Inhabitants whereof refuſed to Communicate with him, affirming that as to Religion they were of the ſame Judgment as formerly, and being much exaſperated for the Baniſhment of their Biſhop. The news coming to Conſtantinople, the Emperour ſends for Arius and John the Meletian Biſhop his great Friend and abetter. Much of the blame lighting upon the Meletians, he was baniſhed, and Arius kept ſtill at Conſtantinople, where preſently great ſtirs happened again about him, ſome remaining ſtedfaſt to the Nicene Creed, and others affirming the opinion of Arius moſt agreeable to the Truth. At this time Alexander, who a little before had ſucceeded Metrophanes, governed that Church, a Man very Pious and Orthodox. Him Euſebius threatened ſore, in caſe he would not receive the Arch-Heretick into Communion, which he as conſtantly refuſing, till the Matter was brought before the Emperour. Conſtantine calls for Arius, and taking notice that where-ever he goes ſtill Tumults follow him; he asked him whether or no he did really imbrace and hold the Nicene Faith. He profeſſing that he did, the Emperour required his Subſcription, and when he had as willing, ſet his Hand to the Articles, to take away all ſcruple from Conſtantine, made Oath alſo, as he was enjoyned. But it is ſaid that he equivocated in this latter, having his private Opinion in his own Senſe in Writing under his Arm when he made his Oath, and that he Sware in relation to that, and not to what he Subſcribed in the Emperours preſence.

And the Biſhop commanded by the Emperour to receive Arius into Communion.

Which is prevented by Arius his ſudden death.

L. 2. c. 26.

41. The Emperour now ſatisfied about Arius his Judgment, commands Alexander the Biſhop of Conſtantinople to receive him into Communion. He ſeeing now his Diſputes would not prevail, and that there was no ſtrugling with the Emperour, betook himſelf to Prayer, wherein he ſpent ſeveral days and nights, deſiring of Almighty God, that if it was his pleaſure to permit Arius to come to the Communion, he might be taken firſt out of the way, and never ſee it; but if he intended Mercy to his Church, to cut off that Man. The Lords day being come, he paſſed early in the Morning (that he might get into the Church before Alexander) being conducted in great State, till he came to Conſtantine's Forum, where whether naturally or out of fear (which ſometimes produceth ſuch an effect) he found himſelf ſeized with a Laske, whereupon being directed to the common Privy near at hand, there together with Excrements he voided his Entrails, Guts, Spleen, Liver and all, and was found dead in a ſtrange and horrible manner. Sozomen Writes that this place for a long time continued very remarkable, ſo as to be pointed at by all Paſſengers, and ſo execrable that no Man would make uſe of it; till at length a rich Arian that he might aboliſh the memory of the thing, purchaſed the Houſe, pulled it down, and raiſed other Buildings in the room of it. But the horror of this Mans Death had this effect, that many formerly iu Error ſeeing God thus bear witneſs to the Truth, were Converted to it; thoſe of Euſebius his Party were ſtricken with great Terror, and the Emperour himſelf was more confirmed in the Orthodox Faith.

Conſtantine is Baptized at Nicomedia.

* *Soc.l.*1. c.ult. Soz. l. 2. c. 32. *Theod.l.*1. c. 31. Hieron. contin. Chr. Euſeb. An. 340. Ambroſ. Orat. in obitum Theodoſii Pomponius latus alii.

42. But he himſelf lived not long after, a Judgment as ſome ſuppoſed for his too much eaſineſs (to ſpeak modeſtly) towards that Heretick, and his very unequal carriage towards Athanaſius. Feeling himſelf ſick, he left Conſtantinople and ſailed to Helenopolis, where he made uſe of the hot Baths near the Town, but when they gave him no Relief, growing ſtill ſicker, he left them, and went to Nicomedia, where in the Suburbs he called the Biſhops together, and ſignified to them his deſire of Baptiſm, ſaying it is now time that at laſt we ſhould receive that Sign of Immortality, telling them that he had ſo long deferred it, becauſe he intended to have been Baptized in the River Jordan, after the Example of our Saviour. His Baptiſm being performed, he gave great ſign of incredible Joy, and a little after that died; as writeth Euſebius or the Author of the Hiſtory of his Life, with whoſe Narration do conſent all the Antient * Eccleſiaſtical Writers, both as to place and time, that his Baptiſm happened both a little before he died, and that at Nicomedia; although Pope Hadrian and ſome Modern Writers, as Baronius, Genebrard, and others contend that he was Baptized at Rome in the Nineteenth Year of his Reign; and Binius, who hath made Annotations upon the Councils ſtrangely affirms that the Nicene Council by the conſent of all Writers was held after that Conſtantine was Baptized. Their Arguments are drawn from a ſuppoſed Leproſie, wherewith they make the Emperour to be ſtruck for his hainous Sins, as Perſecuting of the Chriſtians till about that time, and the Murder of Criſpus his Son, with others whom he moſt unjuſtly put to death. Sylveſter Biſhop of Rome, who as they pretend Baptized him, is ſaid to have fled to the Mountains, being forced from his Flock by his Perſecution, whereas not only the conſent of Hiſtory, but all the ſeveral Edicts of Conſtantine by their Date do clearly evidence that he was converted long before this time, and Criſpus his Son, as appears by the Conſular Tables, was alive after this Year. But for the ſupportment of a ſpurious Council, which making much for the Papal Intereſt, they would have to follow this Baptiſm and held at Rome by Silveſter, as alſo to gain credit to the Donation of Conſtantine, which as an act of Gratitude muſt alſo have enſued this his Baptiſm; they take thoſe Arguments from Zozimus a profeſſed Enemy both of this Emperour and of all Chriſtianity, to the diſparagement of the Catholick Cauſe, which they would make truckle under that of a Private Church. But to all their Arguments and Weak Pretences, our Dr. Crackanthorp hath abundantly anſwered in his Defence of Conſtantine.

He is cleared from the Aſperſion of Arianiſm.

His adhering to the Nicene Creed.

43. The Baptiſm indeed of Conſtantine at Nicomedia being performed by Euſebius Biſhop of that City, as is ſuppoſed at the firſt ſight would ſeem to determine that queſtion, whether or no all his actions againſt Athanaſius, and his ſiding with that Biſhop and his Party, may not juſtly denominate him an Arian, at leaſt as to us, whoſe Capacity reacheth no further than the bounds of Probability. But although we may obſerve that in his old Age he was more eaſie and lay open to the Craft, Inſinuations and Flatteries of thoſe about him (and amongſt the reſt thoſe of that Courtly Prelate Euſebius) which Heathen † Writers have alſo taken notice of, yet have we ſufficient evidence to acquit him from the guilt of that Hereſie. For his conſtant adhering to the Nicene Faith is even in the Story of Athanaſius all along perſpicuous, againſt whom Euſebius never durſt ingage, whatever his private deſigns were, in the Notion of an Arian, pretended a love only to good Order, Diſcipline and Tranquillity of the Church, and upon pretence of Athanaſius his Male-adminiſtration, raiſed ſuch a Storm againſt that good Biſhop. The Emperour having to do with ſo ſtrong a Faction in his Court, which was formerly bred through his natural affection to his Siſter, and now carried on by the cunning of Euſebius, was drawn to do many things which really tended to the Service of that Party. But theſe Perſons appeared not to him in their true Dreſs, they acted not this part but in Diſguiſes and Vizards, they walked one way, but he being in ſight ever looked another. During his whole Reign Euſebius and his Party durſt not recant, his Recantation ever pretending an adherence to the Determinations of the Nicene Fathers. The Emperours Inclinations were for Peace, and for burying of all old Diſpleaſures, his Age deprived him of his former Activity and Sagacity, whereby he was more eaſily wrought upon, but it is clear that he never countenanced Euſebius but as a Catholick and Orthodox Biſhop.

† Victor ait Conſtantinum 10. annis præſtantiſſimum, 11. ſequentibus latronem, 10. ultimis pupillum fuiſſe.

And his Laws againſt Hæreticks.

44. The Laws alſo made by him, declare him to have been of this Diſpoſition. For in his One and twentieth year, in his own and his Childrens name, he (a) forbids that ſuch Priviledges and Immunities as he had conferred upon Orthodox Clerks, ſhould be transferred upon Hæreticks, by which muſt be meant the Arians, as well as others, who the foregoing year had been declared ſuch by the Nicene Fathers. Being ſenſible alſo what Heartburnings, Diviſions, Scandalous Words and Works thoſe Differences in Religion had raiſed, not only betwixt Chriſtians and Heathens, but Chriſtians themſelves, anathematizing and nicknaming one another, by a Law made in the Twenty third year, he commands that Infamous Libels ſhould not be examined and canvaſed but burnt, as he formerly at the Council of Nice had never looked in, but burnt ſuch Complaints and Petitions as the Biſhops had preſented againſt one another. Indeed the time was late to which he deferred his Baptiſm, but it was not his ſingle and peculiar fault, it was a bad Cuſtom which much obtained at that time amongſt all ſorts of Profeſſors; not only Emperours but others who afterwards did eſpecial Service in the Church, long deferring the receiving that Chriſtian Character, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. This may diminiſh if not quite remove the blame caſt upon this Emperour, who for further excuſe pleaded a deſign (though not neceſſary yet ſomething plauſible) of being Baptized in that place where his Saviour had formerly ſubmitted to that Ordinance. However, the Church of Chriſt having received ſuch and ſo great things from his Patronage and Protection, who was the firſt Baptized if not the firſt Chriſtian Emperour of all others; the great diſtance of time betwixt his Age and ours ought not ſo to aboliſh our Sence of thoſe Matters, as either to deſpiſe him, or be unthankful to God for ſo excellent an Inſtrument, much leſs ought we to quarrel with thoſe Writers who having felt as well the ſmart of the former Perſecutions, and undergone the

(a) Cod. Inſt. l. 1. tit. 5. §. 1.

Cod. Theod. l. 9. t. 34. §. 1.

the heat of the day of Trial, as the comfort of thoſe Refreſhments the Church received from God by his means, both praiſe the Author and commend the Inſtrument.

Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea vindicated from the Calumny of the Cardinal Annaliſt.

45. But the Cardinal Annaliſt warm in his Purple, and not ſo ſenſible of the benefit received by Conſtantine, becauſe he never felt the need of it, falls very foul upon Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea the Author of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and as he ſuppoſed, of the Book called the Life of Conſtantine. His Language towards ſuch a Reverend Biſhop cannot be excuſed of Incivility, giving him the Lye, ſo often calling him the Architect and Deviſer of Lyes, with many other extravagant Epithets, as making his Hiſtories but a Fardle of Lyes, and compoſed rather for the everſion than the Publication of true Story; though he will have them truly and clearly to hold out and maintain his own Aſſertion againſt their Author, that being not only a Lyar but an Hæretick, an Arian and Theopaskite, one worthily caſt out of the Church, and as ſuch to be rejected by all Readers. But all have not been of the Cardinals opinion, though Euſebius be not to be patronized in all Particulars. St. Hierome who was a more capable Judge, as living near thoſe times, ſaith, He hath excellently written the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and commends him both for that and his Chronicon. Evagrius Scholaſticus beginneth his own Hiſtory thus: Euſebius Pamphilus a Man without all peradventure as in other things profound, ſo in Penning excellent, is of ſuch efficacy in his Works, that although he cannot make the Readers perfect Chriſtians, yet can he ſo draw them by perſwaſion, that with prompt and willing minds they will imbrace the Chriſtian Faith. Euſebius, Socrates, Sozomenus and Theodoret, have written moſt exquiſitely of the Incarnation of our moſt loving Saviour, &c. And to paſs by many Modern Writers of the Cardinals perſwaſion as to Religion, remarkable is the opinion of one of their moſt † Grave and Judicious Authors, whoſe judgment is, that Euſebius was a Man of great diligence and labour, of exceeding variety of reading, and of very grave judgment. Neither do I know, ſaith he, whether any Author either in the Latin or Greek Church, though he ſtrive never ſo much, can leave more excellent Monuments of time.

Temporum everſor, calumniator malicioſus, profuſus adulator, &c.

Eccleſiaſticam Hiſt. politice texuit. Ep. ad Pammach. & Apol. 1. adverſus Ruffinum.

† Cænus loc. Theol. l. 11. c. 6.

And Pope Gelaſius by conſent of good Authors.

46. Pope Gelaſius indeed with his Seventy two Biſhops doth cenſure the Hiſtory of Euſebius, but it is only in reſpect of the Story of Abgarus and ſome few things more, not condemning the whole or the greateſt part thereof. But the Fathers of the Second Nicene Synod ſtruck him dead by their Decree that rejects and anathematizeth his Book, yea, all that read them, calling him Hæretick, an Arian and a Theopaskite, or one who taught that Chriſt had no Soul, but the Godhead ſupplied that Office, that ſo the Deity might be ſaid to ſuffer. But his Crime was, he † had taught that no Image could fully expreſs Chriſt, being both God and Man, and the good Fathers not enduring that any ſhould croſs their Doctrine of Images, thus brand him, making him both an Arian and a Theopaskite, that is both an Arian and not an Arian, both a Theopaskite and not a Theopaskite; for if an Arian, then could not the Deity inform the Body, Chriſt not being really God, according to him, and if a Theopaskite, then the Deity informing the Body, he muſt have been perfect God though not perfect Man, and of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father, or elſe there muſt have been two real and perfect Deities. This Hæreſie (a) of the Theopaskites ſprung not up till about the Five hundred and thirteenth year of our Lord, more than One hundred and ſixty years after the Death of Euſebius, who in all his Writings doth rightly and truly teach two diſtinct (b) Natures to be in Chriſt, and the (c) Divine Nature to be incapable of Paſſion, Affection or Mutilation. It is true that he inclined to Arianiſm before the Nicene Council, and was an earneſt defender of Arius; but this was but till that Synod, he being Reformed, continued Orthodox ever after, as both his own Writings and other (d) Authors abundantly teſtifie, together with the Suffrage of Conſtantine the Emperour himſelf, (e) who gives not only his own opinion of the Man, but that alſo of the Catholick Church. Of late times (f) Sixtus Senenſis a Man of infinite Reading, yet (abating his Parts) of great judgment, is of the ſame mind; whence it appears that no time indeed he was an Hæretick. By ignorance and Infirmity, falling into that Error, he did not through Pride, Arrogance, and Obſtinacy therein continue; but now the caſe being defined by the Church, he both conformed his Belief and Deportment to its Decrees, and dying a Catholick, was Canonized for a Saint by the Greek Church, the Commemoration of his Death being celebrated on the Twenty firſt day of June in Palæſtine.

† Citantur verba Act. 6.

(a) Prateol. in Theop.

(b) Euſeb. Hiſt. l. 1. c. 1.

(c) Apud Soc. l. 1. c. 5.

(d) Idem ibid. & l. 2. c. 17. Theod. l. 1. c 12.

(e) Epiſt. Conſt. ad Euſeb. vita Conſt. l. 3. c. 59.

(f) In Bibliotheca in Euſebio.

Conſule Dr. Crackanthorp omnino lib. Cui titulus. The Defence of Conſtantine.

So little did the Conſideration of his having been againſt Images, his telling the plain truth about the Baptiſm of Conſtantine, and his not telling that which never was (viz. about the Donation) work with unintereſted and unbyaſſed Perſons.

Vit.Conſt.l.4. c.52.

47. It is not the leaſt part of the Apology for Conſtantine, that he cauſed his Three Sons Conſtantine, Conſtantius and Conſtans to be trained up in the Orthodox Faith. Of thoſe Three two retained the Principles they had been bred in, viz. Conſtantine and Conſtans, but Conſtantius revolted and turned a bitter Perſecutor of the Church. It happened very ill that his Father made him the Executor of his Will and Teſtament, which he committed to the Hands of his Siſters Prieſt, whom ſhe at her Death had commended to his care, commanding him to deliver it to no Mans Hand but to his Son Conſtantius, hereby as it were commending the Man to his Son, if not as a Counſellor yet as an eſpecial Friend, whereby he got opportunity to inſinuate into the Son, and inſtill thoſe Principles which he durſt never own to the Father. Hereupon enſued moſt ſad and diſmal Conſequences to the Orthodox Party, this Prieſt having gained Intereſt by Degrees; for firſt he tampered with the Courtiers, then having made a Party amongſt them, betook himſelf to the Empreſs and the Ladies, but eſpecially he inveigled the Eunuchs about the Emperour, who were the great Inſtruments which he and Euſebius uſed for carrying on their Deſigns, being near to the Perſon, and having perpetually the Ear of the Prince. But in the mean time Athanaſius is releaſed from Baniſhment by the Emperour Conſtantine, in whoſe Dominions the City Triers was, to which he had been confined. He ſent him back to Alexandria with his Letters Commendatory to the Inhabitants, telling them they could not but know that his Father did not baniſh their Biſhop out of diſpleaſure, but ſent him out of the way of danger, and that when he died, he left it to him in charge, that Athanaſius ſhould be reſtored, in purſuance of which command, and to anſwer their deſires, he now ſent him to them. And ſo returned Athanaſius to his See, after he had been abſent two Years and four Months, and was received by his People with great Joy, all ſorts and degrees flocking about to ſee him.

Athanaſius is releaſed from Baniſhment.

Soc. l.2. c.2. Theod.l.2.c.1

48. Conſtantius did not at all hinder his Reſtitution, nor the return of thoſe other Biſhops which had been his Companions in Faith and Sufferings, both leaſt he ſhould ſeem to withſtand his dying Fathers orders, and ſhould thereby diſoblige his Elder Brother. But long it was not before Euſebius the Prieſt, and others of that Party began to inſinuate into this Prince, that he was by all means to be driven from that Church. "Beſides their old Ca-
"lumnies they alledge great Seditions and Slaughters to have happened at "Alexandria through the unwillingneſs of the People to receive him again;
"they affirm that being deprived by one Council, he cannot Canonically be "reſtored without another, and they again accuſe him of defrauding the "Poor of Ægypt and Lybia of that Corn which through the Munificence of "Conſtantine was wont to be beſtowed upon them. To make their Party more ſtrong, they ſend their Meſſengers into the Weſt to the other two Emperours, whom they labour to poſſeſs with the ſame prejudice againſt Athanaſius, as alſo Julius the Biſhop of Rome; but all this to no purpoſe, the Biſhop alſo ſending ſome of his Clerks, who eaſily wiped off all theſe Slanders. But, Matters grew ſtill worſe, the Arians inſinuating themſelves more and more into all Offices of the Church, and by feigned Accuſations thruſting out ſuch of the Orthodox Party as would moſt oppoſe their deſign. Alexander the good Biſhop of Conſtantinople they much grudged his Seat, but let him alone, as expecting Death ſhould ſave them the trouble of outing him. This ſhortly came to paſs, and when the old Man ſaw his end approaching, as careful to have ſome honeſt Man to ſucceed him, he named two: one Macedonius whom he thought moſt acceptable at Court, and Paulus whom for his Principles of Religion he commended to his Clergy.

Alexander Biſhop of Conſtantinople dies.

Paul choſe in his ſteed, but outed by the Arians; and Euſebius of Nicomedia tranſlated thither.

Soc. l.2. c.4. Soz. l.3. c.4.

49. Paul a Prieſt of his Church, and a Man eminent for Learning and Piety was accordingly choſen, Admitted and Ordained by the Biſhops there Aſſembled, according to the Canons of the Nicene Council. The Arians having ſtickled for Macedonius were very much concerned for the Defeat, and Conſtantius the Emperour at that time coming to the City, moſt willingly eaſed them of their grief, calling an Aſſembly of Arian Biſhops, wherein Paul was removed, and to his place preferred Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, the great Patron of the Faction, than which they could not have a more notable advantage: For now he hath not only an opportunity for reſiding conſtantly at Court, but more Power and Authority to back his purpoſes, which he quickly improves to the Deprivation of Euſtathius Biſhop of Antioch, who had been very eminent in the Council of Nice, and therefore they concluded that as well he as Athanaſius and Paul were to be removed; laying to his Charge Adultery, Sabellianiſm and other leſſer Crimes, they got him Baniſhed to Trajanople a City of Thrace, where he died and was Buried. After him they ſent many others into Baniſhment, ſome under pretence of various Crimes, others without any thing laid to their Charge, but all in truth for defending the Nicene Faith, thoſe of the Arian party though never ſo deſpicable, being put in their Places. And from this time it is, as Baronius obſerveth, that, what St. Hierome hath ſaid in his Continuation of Euſebius his Chronicon, concerning the Arian Perſecution, is to take Place, viz. That henceforth this Impiety being ſupported by Conſtantius the Emperour, Perſecuted with Baniſhment Impriſonment and other various ſorts of Afflictions and Miſeries firſt Athanaſius, and then all other Biſhops that were not of that Hæretical Party. This was the Fourth Year of Conſtantius (though St. Hierome places the beginning of thoſe things in his Second) A. D. 340. of Rome the 1093, the laſt of the 279. Olympiad, the 13 Indiction, Fl. Septimius Acyndinus, and L. Aradius Rufinus Valerius Proculus being Conſuls.

Athan. Apol. & ep. ad ſolit. agentes.

50. This ſame Year dyed Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea, Author of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, of whom we lately ſpoke, to whoſe Character had Baronius added his Induſtry in this particular, and confeſſed how much he was beholden to that very Perſon whom he had endeavoured to render ſo odious, it might have ſerved for an Epitaph more expreſſive both of the Biſhops deſert and the Cardinals gratitude. But whilſt theſe Biſhops leave either their Sees or this World, Athanaſius (as great Bodies have ſlower motions) a Perſon though more envied and Maligned, yet of more Intereſt and Authority, was not ſo eaſily removed from his Biſhoprick. Julius Biſhop of Rome receiving complaints againſt him from the Arians, as alſo his defenſive Arguments, is by both Parties choſen Arbitrator in the controverſy, and deſired to call a Synod, wherein Athanaſius his Cauſe might again be debated: He accordingly as he was Impowered calls a Synod at Rome, and appoints a time for all concerned to be preſent; Athanaſius made his appearance, and was ready to anſwer, but none of his Accuſors would come, though he ſtaid for them a Year and a half, during which time he is ſaid to have Communicated to the Italians thoſe Monaſtical præcepts which he had received from Antony in the Wilderneſs, with a Copy of the Creed, ſtill going under his Name, which being written in Latin continued long in the Archives of the Roman Church as Baronius tells us. The Arians unbethought themſelves that they ſhould aſſuredly receive the Foil at Rome, the Biſhops of the Weſtern Church being generally Orthodox, they conſidered the Cauſe ſhould only be decided by Eccleſiaſticals, where there ſhould be no Count to præſide, nor any Soulders to affright and threaten their Antagoniſts, by which means they had formerly had the better of him. They pretended they could not ſafely Travel to Rome by reaſon of the Perſian War, and detaining the Meſſenger which Julius the Biſhop had ſent for them, beyond the very day appointed, for their appearance, procured Conſtantius to ſummon them to Antioch, to the Dedication of that magnificent Church called Aureum Dominicum, formerly began by Conſtantine and now finiſhed by Conſtantius his Son.

Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea dies.

A Synod is call'd at Rome, where the Arians come not

Athan. Apol. 2

Al An. D. 340.

51. The Arians glad of ſuch excuſe for going to the Roman Synod, aſſembled together, to the Number of Thirty Six Biſhops, with whom met ſo many of the Orthodox Party as to make it up Ninety Seven, or Ninety Nine. But many refuſed to be preſent (as Maximus Biſhop of Jeruſalem for one,) knowing before hand how matters would be determined; others were ſeized on in their Journey and Impriſoned, and as for Julius the Roman Biſhop, he neither was preſent, nor ſent any in his room; however there met enough and more to do the buſineſs deſigned by the Arians, who overpowered the Orthodox, though not in Number, yet in Confidence, Reſolution, and the favour of the Emperour, by whom their Decrees and Reſolutions were made Authentick though Excanonical. Now "beſides the charge formerly laid againſt Athanaſius at Tyre, they make the ſame "complaints againſt him which they had ſent to Julius, as that he had broken "the Canons, thruſting himſelf into his former Function without the Admiſſion "and Conſent of the Council, ruſhing into the Church of Alexandria, after his re"turn from Exile; moreover that he had done many acts of Violence and In-Another at Antioch, where the Arians prevailed.

Socr. c. 8. Græc.

"juſtice, having raiſed Tumults among the People, wherein ſome were Slain, "others Impriſoned and beaten, and others he had forced to anſwer at the Bar. As for the matters objected againſt him at Tyre, they had been over and over Confuted, partly by their own Folly, and partly the confeſſion of the Parties themſelves that were brought againſt him. The report concerning the Tumults was Convicted of Falſhood, by the Letter of the Alexandrian Church, wherein Conſtantius is told that true Catholicks uſe no ſuch Weapons in their Warfare as Death, Impriſonment, Bonds or corporal Puniſhments; concerning which the Civil Magiſtrate can give beſt account: And as for the buſineſs concerning his intruſion into his Church, without leave or order; it's clear enough that he was not baniſhed by the Emperour, in order to what was done at Tyre, the Matter whereof depended upon Appeal before him: but upon new Matter Originally riſing before him, which being of a Political conſideration, concerning the publick Peace, the Emperour might as well reſtore Athanaſius, as baniſh him, without a Council.

And Athanaſius is condemned both as Guilty and contumacious.

52. Athanaſius appeared not himſelf on purpoſe as ſome think, that the matter might not be decided. Conſtantius ſent to Apprehend him, but he kept himſelf out of the way, and thereupon was Condemned both as guilty and Contumacious. To Succeed him was choſen one Euſebius, born at Edeſſa in Meſopotamia, who knowing well how he ſhould be received at Alexandria, whilſt Athanaſius was yet alive, plainly refuſed their offer: He then is made Biſhop of Emiſa, and Athanaſius his Chair is conferred on one who will not refuſe it, as made of fit Mettle for ſuch an Exploit, by Name Gregory, a Man altogether unknown, both to the Church and Province of Alexandria. Having diſpatcht Athanaſius, they go about to overthrow the Nicene Faith, but ſuch Reputation it had got, and they themſelves had hitherto made Profeſſion of it, that it muſt be covertly by degrees and by way of Inſinuation; as all Parties and Sects hate to be called by the Name of their Founders, they diſclaim that of Arius; even the Dignity of their Epiſcopal Office forbidding they ſhould become Proſelites to a Presbyter: They frame a Creed of their own, as ſcorning to Truckle under the Nicene Council, which is ſo plauſibly Penned, as yet to beware of the word Conſubſtantial, or to own the Son of the ſame Subſtance and Eſſence with the Father. This Creed they ſend in an Epiſtle to the Churches throughout every City. But continuing at Antioch a little longer, and unbethinking themſelves, they in a manner condemn it, framing a new one; for being conſcious that they had ſpoken too Jejunely concerning the Divinity of the Second Perſon, and thereby could not poſſibly ſhun that Cenſure which they had indeavoured to prevent, they now profeſs to hold that Faith which had been delivered by the Holy Scriptures Prophets and Apoſtles, and ſo own the God-head of the Son, and yield to the word Subſtance; yet they acknowledge him not of very ſame Subſtance with the Father, but as it were the Image thereof without any diſſimilitude. To thoſe they ſubſcribed and amonſt them Gregory with the Title of Biſhop of Alexandria, though as yet he had not ſeen the place; but not content with thoſe two (thinking it ſeems that by the later they had given too much to the Son of God, as by the firſt they had aſcribed too little) Theophronius Biſhop of Tyara compoſed another Form to which they aſſented; and ſtill not ſatisfied, as not knowing where to fix, Athanaſius tells us, they compoſed a fourth Form of Confeſſion, which they ſent to Conſtans the Emperour into Gall, and diſperſed all over the Weſtern Churches.

The Arians here make four ſeveral Creeds,

Soc. l. 2. c. 10. Gr.

And Twenty five Canons.

53. Beſides thoſe four Creeds, they framed Twenty five Canons, againſt which, though ſeveral of the Ancients except, as compoſed by Hereticks, yet by old Collectors of Canons have they been gathered together, as made by Orthodox Biſhops, and in the Council of Chalecdon two of them are cited word for word. For Hereticks may decree other things orthodoxly which are not material to the thing in Controverſie, and the Arians cunningly cauſed the Names of Biſhops eminent for their Zeal towards the Nicene Faith, to be ſet to the Epiſtle præfixed to the Canons, omitting thoſe of Euſebius, Theognis, Mæris and others, the moſt notorious of all Arians. And that they might not ſeem in the leaſt to thwart the Council of Nice, but as concerned for its Authority, their firſt Canon makes it unlawful to Celebrate Eaſter otherwiſe than that Council had determined. The Second ordains that Perſons Excommunicate ſhall not be abſolved without ſatisfaction made, the contrary being now practiced by a new Sect lately ſprung up, called Anthropomorphites; as alſo that none Communicate with Excommunicated Perſons. The Third commands that no Clerk remove to another Church, without his Dioceſans leave, and there continue. The Fourth

7. q. 1. Si quis Presbyter.

Ordains that no ſuſpended Biſhop or Clerk offer to execute his Function. The Fifth forbids Prieſts to ſeparate themſelves, and erect Altars amongſt themſelves in contempt of the Biſhops. The Sixth prohibits any to receive ſuch as are Excommunicated by the Biſhops, till they be either reconciled to them, or reſtored by Synods. By the Seventh, no ſtranger (Clerk) is to be received without Letters Commendatory. By the Eighth the Chorepiſcopi are only Licenſed, no Inferiour Prieſts, to give general Letters. The Ninth ſets Limits to the power of a Biſhop, thoſe of his own Dioceſs forbidding him to meddle with matters appertaining to the Metropolitan, whom it forbids to deal in things proper to him, as ſuch, without the Council and Aſſiſtance of the reſt of the (Prieſts or) Biſhops.

11. q. 4 Siquis Epiſcopus.

11. q. 3. Siquis a proprio.

Diſt. 71. Nullus atq; 6. q. 1 per Singulas.

Sacerdotum by which Biſhops are often meant.

54. Their Tenth Canon is for the Reſtrainment of the Chorepiſcopi, who though they were Conſecrated as Biſhops, yet it pleaſed the holy Synod (as theſe Men call themſelves) that they ſhould recognize the mean of their Power, governing the Churches in the Country Villages committed to them, and content themſelves with that Imployment, and the ordination of Readers, Subdeacons and Exorciſts, not preſuming to Ordain Prieſts or Deacons without the Biſhop of the Dioceſs, upon pain of deprivation. And the Chorepiſcopus they command be ordained by the Biſhop to whom he is ſubject. The Eleventh puniſhes ſuch Biſhop or Clerk with depoſition, as without the Letters of the Synod and Biſhops of the Province, eſpecially the Metropolitan, ſhall go and ſolicit the Emperour about buſineſs. This they did to take away benefit of Appeals from the Orthodox. And this Canon was objected againſt Chryſoſthom by his Adverſaries, to whom he replied that it was made by Arians, and therefore was deſervedly repealed by the Council of Sardica. But more to their purpoſe by their Twelfe Canon they deprive ſuch Prieſts and Biſhops of all hope of reſtitution, who being condemned by their Biſhops or by Synods ſhall not abide by their determinations, but have recourſe unto the Emperour. The Thirteenth prohibits Biſhops to Ordain out of their own Province, except they be ſent for by Letters from the Metropolitan and his Suffragans, under Penalty of the Ordinations being Null, and Cenſures inflicted upon their own Perſons. The Fourteenth determines that in caſe of Tryal of a Biſhop by his Comprovincials, part be for him, and part againſt him, the Metropolitan is to call other Biſhops to his aſſiſtance out of other Provinces, who in conjunction with the former are to decide the controverſy. The Fifteenth Confirms what is done againſt any Biſhop by the Univerſal conſent of the Biſhops of the ſame Province.

23. q. 8. Siquis Epiſcopus.

10. q. 5. Siquis a proprio.

9. q. 7. Nullum Epiſcopum.

6. q. 4. Siquis Epiſcopus.

Ibid,

55. The Sixteenth Canon commands that if a Nominal Biſhop (having no Dioceſs) intrude himſelf into a Vacant Church without the Conſent and Decree of a compleat Synod, he ſhall by force be thence ejected, although the People make choice of him for their Paſtor. Now a perfect Synod, that is to be underſtood where the Metropolitan præſides. By the Seventeenth it is decreed that if any Biſhop ordained to a particular Dioceſs, neglectt the charge thereof, or refuſe to take the care upon him, he ſhall be removed from Communion till ſuch he either execute his Office or the pleaſure of a Provincial Synod concerning him be known: But in caſe he be thence kept by force, or otherwiſe not by any fault of his, the Eighteenth Canon takes care that he be elſwhere capable both of Honour and Miniſterial Function, provided that he be not pragmatical in the Church where he is, and ſubmit himſelf to what ſhall be determined in the Provincial Synod. The Nineteenth Enacts that no Biſhop be Ordained without a Synod, and the preſence of the Metropolitan. The Twentieth Ordains that for diſpatch of Church buſineſs, that Biſhops meets in Synods twice a Year throughout the Provinces. By the Twenty firſt Biſhops are forbidden to change their Pariſhes Dioceſs i. e. either by conſtraint of the People or compulſion of their Fellow-Biſhops, according to the ancient appointment in this Caſe. By the Twenty Second they are Inhibited from intermedling in anothers Dioceſs; from ordaining any Prieſts or Deacons ſubject to any other Biſhop, without his directions and conſent, upon pain of a Nullity, and Cenſures to be inflicted by the Synod.

Diſt. 91. Si quis Epiſcopus.

Diſt. 92. Siquis Epiſcopus per manu.

Diſt. 9 1. Siquis Epiſcopus ordinatus.

Diſt. 65. Epiſcopus noneſt Diſt. 18. propter.

7. q. 1. Epiſcopum.

56. The Twenty Third Canon makes it unlawful for any Biſhop to appoint his Succeſſor although at point of Death: This being a breach of the Law Eccleſiaſtical, which makes this appertain to a Synod, and the reſolution of Biſhops, who in a Vacancy have Authority to promote ſuch as be worthy. The Twenty Fourth gives charge to Prieſts and Deacons to take notice of Goods belonging to Churches, that in caſe of the Death of the Incumbent Biſhop there be no confuſion, that neither his Goods be ſeized on in right of the Church, nor ſuch as

8. q. 1. Epiſcopum non liceat.

9. q. 21 quæcunque res.

really belong to the Church be imbezell'd by pretence of his Intereſt. The Twenty Fifth and laſt gives power to the Biſhop to diſpence the Goods of the Church to thoſe that have need, and to ſupply himſelf with things neceſſary, but in caſe either he himſelf or his Domeſticks, Sons or Kindred, by his permiſſion make waſt of thoſe things, and convert them that belong to the Church into their own private uſe, either the Biſhop or his Presbyters ſo doing to the great loſs of the Power and Scandal of the Miniſterial Function, it ſubjects them to the Cenſure of a Provincial Synod. To theſe Canons Thirty Biſhops are ſaid to have Subſcribed, amongſt which ſome were of the Orthodox Party; although ſome, if not moſt of them, as is clear from the Hiſtory of this affair were made to entrap them. The Sum of the Councils made by Carranza, tells us that this Council of Antioch was approved by the Sixth general Council ſummoned to Conſtantinople, and Celebrated in Trullio; as appeareth by the Second Canon of the Greek Edition, concerning which we ſhall enquire hereafter: And alſo by Pope Dionyſius, as appeareth by Euſebius in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory-book 7. * Ch. 24 and 25. Than which nothing can be more ridiculous: For how could Euſebius write of this Council who was dead the Year before? That Council which Euſebius writeth of in thoſe Chapters was held againſt the Hæreſie of Paulus Samoſatanus, about the Twelfth Year of Gallienus the Emperour, when Dionyſius was Biſhop of Rome, A. D. 264. Juſt Seventy ſix Years before this other, for which this Sciolus ſtrangely miſtakes it.

12. q. 1. Epiſcopus Eccleſiaſticarum rerum.

* Ch. 27.21. after the Greek

Andæus and his Hæreſie condemned.

57. But ſome of thoſe Canons were alſo deſigned againſt certain Hereticks newly crept up in the Church, a ſign that Thieves may fall out when they have ſeveral Ends and Intereſts. There was one Andæus born, as Epiphanius writes, in Meſopotamia, who being of a very ſtrict Life and Zealous, did ſo declaim againſt the looſneſs of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, that for his freedom of Speech being hated and perſecuted, he ſeparated from the Church, and in his old Age was baniſhed by Conſtantius into Scythia; the Biſhops having accuſed him of a deſigned Rebellion: Having many Followers he is ſaid in Scythia to have Erected many Monaſteries, and Travelling farther into Gothia, by his Preaching to have Converted many to the Faith; in great admiration amongſt all Men for his extraordinary Zeal and Sanctity. But his zeal was not according to knowledge, teaching that becauſe it is ſaid God made Man after his own Image; God had the former Shape and Members of a Man. He alſo taught that Eaſter was to be kept on the Fourteenth Moon, as the Jews obſerved it, to oppoſe which oppinion, the Firſt of thoſe Canons ſeemeth to be made, and that abſolution was to be granted to Offenders without any ſatisfaction to the Church in token of Penitence; to obviate which Doctrine they framed their Second Canon. He is blamed for condemning the Riches of the Clergy, for holding that darkneſs, Fire and Water were uncreated. His Followers from his own Name were called Andiani, but eſpecially from his opinion concerning the Form of God Anthropomorphites. They kept themſelves ſeparate from the Church, becauſe Uſurers and wicked Men were ſuffered therein, but very few of them remained in the time of Epiphanius.

Vid Epiphan. hær. 3.70. Theodoret. l. 4. c. 10. Aug. ad quod vult deum. Niceph.

Euſebius the Arian Biſhop dyes.

Tumults upon the account of a Succeſſor.

58. But the Synod of Antioch being concluded after ſome Months, the Biſhops returned to their Sees, and Euſebius the Ringleader of the Arians went to his long Home, or to his own Place; dying immediately after the Council broke up, as * Socrates tells us. Being rid of him the Orthodox party now again made choice of Paul, who had been formerly Elected; and the Arians pitcht upon Macedonius, whereupon enſueth ſuch Tumults that many of both ſides thereby periſhed, and Hermogenes a Commander, who taking a journey into Thrace, was ordered to take Conſtantinople in his way, and diſplace Paul, had firſt the houſe wherein he was Fired over his head, and then was pulled out and kil'd by the incenſed Multitude. Conſtantius upon report hereof, came from Antioch to Conſtantinople, where he thruſt Paul out of the Church, and to puniſh the Citizens took from them 40000 meaſures of Corn, viz. half of the quantity that his Father had given them daily for ever, to be ſent from Alexandria, and charged upon the Imperial Revenue riſing from Ægypt: He deferred to nominate Macedonius their Biſhop, being very angry not only for accepting the Place without his knowledge and conſent, but in reſpect of thoſe that were ſlain in the Conteſts betwixt him and his Antigoniſts; yet he gave him leave to execute his Function, in that Church only where he had been choſen Biſhop, and returned back to Antioch. And now muſt we return with him, and thence where we left, proſecute the Story of Athanaſius.

* Lib. 2. c. 12.

59. The Arians having held their Meeting at Antioch, and refuſed to appear at Rome at a Synod, to the calling of which they themſelves had given occaſion, by referring the Matter to the cogniſance of Julius; he in a Synod of Fifty Biſhops examined the Matter concerning Athanaſius, pronounced him innocent, and received him into Communion, together with Marcellus Biſhop of Ancyra in Galatia the leſſer, and many other Biſhops and Presbyters condemned and outed by the Hæretical Party. But the Arians hearing this news at Antioch where yet they continued were very wroth, and ſending back the two Prieſts he had ſent to them, whom they had retained on purpoſe all this while, ſomewhat ſharply expoſtulated with the Biſhop. They complained that the time ſet them for appearance was too ſhort, and that he had taken upon him to abſolve Athanaſius and the reſt, ſignifying that if any were baniſhed the Church, and Excommunicated by their Decree and Cenſure, it was not his part to intermeddle, nor to take cogniſance of their Sentence, no more than when his Predeceſſor had removed Novatus out of the Church of Rome, they had reſiſted and contraried his doings. In the mean time Gregory the appointed Succeſſor of Athanaſius goes down to take Poſſeſſion of the Church of Alexandria, where he is gladly received by the Arians, and as earneſtly rejected by the Orthodox, who were the more concerned becauſe Athanaſius their true and lawful Paſtor was now amongſt them, being returned from Rome upon notice of the Reſolution taken at Antioch to aſſert his juſt Title and Intereſt againſt this Intruder. But Gregory had the advantage, bringing with him Letters from the Aſſembly of Antioch, the Emperours Mandate, and being guarded by Philagrius the Præfectus Auguſtalis, who according to orders received from the Prince, had with an Army of Five thouſand Men brought him to Alexandria. Horrid Outrages were committed by both Parties to the diſgrace of the Chriſtian profeſſion, but eſpecially by the Gregorians for the better Celebration of Eaſter, which this Year fell on April 11. Athanaſius finding the City too hot for him, was forced to fly, and returned as faſt as he could to Rome, whence, that he might not be prevented by ſome falſe account from the Gregorians, he wrote his Epiſtle to all Orthodox Chriſtians a little before the Death of Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, for publick ſatisfaction he wrote in this Epiſtle ſuch things in haſte as in his other Writings he communicates more fully, eſpecially in his Epiſtle to thoſe that lived Solitarily, or Monaſtical Lives wherein he compriſeth ſuch things as were done by the Arians againſt the Orthodox Party, eſpecially thoſe of the Church of Alexandria.

Athan. Apol. 2. & ad ſcholerius.

The Council at Rome clear Athanaſius and receive him into Communion.

Gregory intrudes into the See of Alexandria.

Athan. Ep. ad Orthodoxos.

60. Gregory being got into Poſſeſſion of that Church, made a Progreſs in the Government thereof ſuitable to his beginning, managing his Office like an Hæretick and a Tyrant. In the mean while thoſe of his Party perceiving that whatever they had pretended, yet they ſuffered in Reputation as Arians, a Character they ſhunned, as ignomineous to their Epiſcopal Degree, to receive a Denomination from a meer Presbyter, and one who was Infamous both in his Life and Death, they therefore agree once more to meet at Antioch. There they frame another Confeſſion of Faith, ſo exceeding long and tedious, that it got the Epithete of μακρόστιχον, and this they ſent to the Weſtern Biſhops for their Approbation. But they miſſed of their deſign herein alſo, being ſtill unfortunate in all their Creeds. For the Cheat was eaſily perceived, they having again in this omitted the word Conſubſtantial, although they heaped great Epithets and Titles upon the Son of God; and this ſeems the true reaſon why the Weſtern Biſhops rejected their Creed, though they might pretend they were not well skilled in their Terms and Propriety of the Language, and thereby put them off, referring themſelves to the Nicene Council as ſufficient without any new Gloſſes and Interpretations; but that their Ignorance in the Greek Tongue ſhould be the only cauſe, as Socrates ſaith it was, is very improbable, the times were not ſo Illiterate, nor Intercourſe betwixt the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches ſo ſtopt up, as to give the leaſt countenance to ſuch an Aſſertion. This Synod (to which aſſembled Biſhops from almoſt all the Eaſt) was held Three years after the other, wherein were framed the Four Creeds, in the Eighth year of Conſtantius, A. D. 344. Saluſtius Autor and Leontius being Conſuls.

At another Council at Antioch the Arians frame four new Creeds more.

Διὰ τὸ ἀλλόγλωσσον εἶναι, vide Socr. l. 2. c. 19. Athan. de Synodis. Sozom. l. 3. c. 10.

61. Athanaſius all this while continued at Rome, where Julius the Biſhop could do him little good for Three years together, nor Paulus the Elect of Conſtantinople, nor any of the Orthodox Party, though he eſpouſed their quarrel and wrote into the Eaſt on their behalf. But now their Caſe became more underſtood by Conſtans the Emperour, who could not but take notice of all this Athanaſ. ad Conſtantium. Soc. l.2.c.20. Soz. l.3. c.9.

A General Council at Sardica.

noiſe betwixt the Weſtern and Eaſtern Prælates, and thereupon bethink of the Publick Peace, which is not ſooner broke any ways than through Heats and ſiding about Religion, which were alſo more unſeaſonable at this time when the Perſian, the Common Enemy from without threatened the Tranquillity of the Empire. This was a convenient Seaſon for Athanaſius to lay open his Griefs, being commended to the Emperour with all advantage poſſible both by Julius Biſhop of Rome, and Hoſius of Corduba, who alſo earneſtly ſollicited him about the calling of a General Council. Being ſent for by Conſtans, he went to Millain where then the Court was, and he and his Friends ſo wrought that they obtained a Letter from the Emperour to his Brother Conſtantius about the Summoning of a Council. He ſhewed him the neceſſity of Summoning the Biſhops of both Empires together, amongſt whom there ſeemed to be difference both in matters of Opinion touching ſome Points of Faith, as alſo for Supremacy and Juriſdiction, he deſired him to uſe his Power in getting together the Prelates of the Eaſt, who, that they might be the eaſilier perſwaded, he nominated Sardica a City of Illyricum as very convenient ſcituate upon the Borders of both Empires, but more commodious for them, with whom he would take care that thoſe of the Weſt ſhould meet at the time appointed. In the mean while was a Synod held at Colein May 11. againſt Euphrates Biſhop of that City, who for denying the Divinity of Chriſt, with Photinus and Marcellus, was depoſed by the unanimous conſent of the Biſhops of Gall, amongſt whom Athanaſius is ſaid to have been preſent.

Conc.Tom.1.

62. In the Eleventh year after the Deceaſe of Conſtantine, and the Conſulſhip of Fl. Euſebius, and Fl. Rufinus, in the Eleven hundredth Year of Rome, the Third of the 281 Olympiad, the Fifth Indiction, A. D. 347. there met (as Athanaſius wrote) about Three hundred Biſhops out of the Weſt, and (as Sabinus counted) Seventy ſix out of the Eaſt, to the Council ſummoned at Sardica, amongſt whom was Iſchyras ſo often mentioned, whom the Depoſers of Athanaſius had preferred to the Title of a Biſhop. The reaſon why no more met out of the Eaſtern Churches, though the place lay more convenient for them, and in the Territories of their own Empire, was deſpair of any Iſſue ſuitable to their former Atchievements. Some alledged infirmity of Body, and others complained of the ſhortneſs of time, blaming the Biſhop of Rome for not letting them have more timely notice, whereas an whole Year and an half intervened from the Date of the Summons to the time of the Meeting. When the Council met, the Arians perceiving how things were like to go, withdrew to Philippi a City about a days Journey diſtant from Sardica, whence they ſent to the reſt frivolous Excuſes why they could not be preſent, and withall ſignified that they could not joyn with them as long as Athanaſius and Paulus Perſons formerly condemned at Antioch, were permitted to ſit amongſt them. Hoſius who præſided in the Council, ſent them word that the Council was reſolved, though in their abſence, to proceed in the Examination of the Cauſe of theſe Biſhops, and willed them to be preſent, that they might if they could make good thoſe Charges againſt them, which never yet ſeemed juſtly proved, and prevent the Condemnation of themſelves for their unjuſt Cenſures. This warning doing no good, the Orthodox Party fell to the Examination of Witneſſes, and after a full and indifferent Hearing acquitted Athanaſius and Paulus, reſtored them to their Churches, and inflicted upon the Contumacious Biſhops the ſame Cenſures which they had formerly executed upon theſe Innocent Perſons.

The Orthodox Biſhops ſtick to the Nicene Creed.

63. After this when it was moved that a New Confeſſion of Faith ſhould be framed, it was reſolved in the Negative, foraſmuch as Multiplication of Creeds would beget Confuſion and Uncertainty, whilſt variety of Terms and Phraſes perplexed the Readers, who would not know where to reſt, or wherein to fix, and by this means all thoſe that followed might pretend to amend what their Predeceſſors had done, and ſo as well the Nicene Creed as others ſhould be thought Inſufficient and Imperfect. They reſolved therefore to ſtand by the Nicene Creed, only for to prevent miſtakes, to lay open the cunning of the Arians, and prevent their Subterfuges, they explicated (as ſome have written) the Clauſe of one Subſtance, and ſet forth the Hæreſie of that Aſſertion that the Son of God is not of the ſame Subſtance with the Father. This they publiſhed in their Acts or a Narrative of their Proceedings, wherein alſo they ſhewed their Reaſons why they acquitted Athanaſius and the reſt, with the cauſeleſs departure of the Arian Biſhops, and their obſtinate refuſal to joyn with them. They in the mean time are not idle, but act quite contrary to the Proceedings, condemning demning ſuch as had abſolved Athanaſius, and Julius Biſhop of Rome amongſt the reſt, and make a new Confeſſion of Faith, againſt which the other had firmly reſolved. By reaſon of this contrary proceeding of thoſe ſeveral Parties, the Reſolutions and Acts of this Council have been variouſly accepted and reported in latter times, many things being cited as Decreed by the Sardican Council, contrary to the Teſtimony of Athanaſius himſelf, who had reaſon to know what paſſed, although St. Auguſtin and others grant thoſe Decrees to have been of this Council, but except againſt it as Hæretical and Arian. So that great Confuſion and uncertainty even in theſe times appears to have been amongſt the beſt knowing in reference to this Council, which ſeizes Baronius with admiration. Many alſo ſince the time that he wrote, conſidering the Summons was univerſal, would gladly with him give it the name of a General or Oecumenical Council. But when they conſider how it was divided into ſeveral Parties or Factions, how many guiltleſs were condemned, and how many guilty were acquitted by both Parties, and for theſe reaſons of Ambiguity and Injuſtice, how the Orthodox for many Ages were ſhy of receiving any of its Acts as Authentical, they conclude that the Cardinal in giving ſo high a Title to this Synod, hath not at all advantaged the Opinion concerning the Infallibility of General Councils.

But the Arians make a new one.

At this Council at Sardica 21 Canons are made.

Diſt.8. Male conſuetudo.

64. For they acquitted Marcellus of Hæreſie laid to his charge by the Arians, from which Orthodox Antiquity is far from abſolving him: And ſo uncertain were this Synods Determinations, that all Parties made uſe of them, and renounced them when it ſtood moſt with their own advantage, as Baronius himſelf inſtanceth in ſeveral Particulars. So that granting the Summoning of the Council to have been Oecumenical, yet if we call Antiquity to give Teſtimony, little of certainty can it produce upon which to found any Catholick Aſſertions, the Relations of Athanaſius being moſt Authentick, which were as much known to others as us, and yet they follow other Authors. However as to Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline theſe Fathers are ſaid to have made One and twenty Canons; whereof the Firſt upon the Propoſition of Hoſius taking notice how little good former Synods had done by their Prohibitions in this Particular, ordains that ſuch Biſhops as flitte and remove from one Church City or Dioceſs to another be Excommunicated even from the Laity; and the Second at the inſtance of the ſaid Perſon decrees the ſame Cenſure to be inflicted, although they be ſollicited to this remove by the Importunity of the People, which eaſily may be by Corruption wrought into ſuch an humour. The Third Canon forbids that any Biſhop remove out of one Province into another, except he be invited by his Brethren, and if any Biſhop think himſelf agreived in any Cauſe determined by his Comprovincials, upon Hoſius his motion, it was reſolved he might appeal to the Biſhop of Rome. Indeed his Reputation was not a little inhanced by his continuing Orthodox in thoſe times of Trial. So that the Dignity of that City receiving fair advantage from theſe Controverſies, whilſt the Arians juſtly denied his right, yet the Orthodox might aſſert his capacity (not Authority) to determine their Differences. And hence were afforded Opportunities and Advantages for that Supremacy which viciſſitude of times, and the comportment of Affairs ſuggeſted afterward to the Roman Prælates. But the Canons of this Council in behalf of the Biſhop of Rome for the advancement of his Authority, the Fathers of the African Council univerſally aſſert to be Suppoſititious, who affirm in their Letters to the Pope that no ſuch thing can be found in any Synod of the Fathers. Now had there been any ſuch Canons, doubtleſs they could not have been ignorant of them.

6.q 4. Oſius Epiſcopus.

Vide Whitakerum.

Diſt.63. Qua.

65. Upon the motion of Gaudentius a Fourth Canon was made, which forbad the Ordination of a Biſhop into his room, who being depoſed, appealed to the Biſhop of Rome, till the Matter was heard and adjudged by the ſaid Biſhop. The Fifth Canon at the inſtance of Hoſius, takes care that in caſe one Biſhop in a Province be remaining, wherein formerly were ſeveral, and this Biſhop at requeſt of the People, wanting Paſtors, refuſe to ordain any more, the neighbouring Biſhops contribute their aſſiſtance to their juſt deſire, and ordain them a Biſhop. The Sixth expreſly forbids the Ordaining of a Biſhop for one Village or ſmall City, to the care of which one Prieſt ſufficeth, leſt thereby the Dignity and Authory Epiſcopal incur contempt; which it ſeemed to have done by means of Iſchyras whom the Arians had ordained Biſhop, but to ſuch a See as formerly did belong to a ſimple Pariſh, being not a Pariſh of it ſelf, but a Village or Hamlet appertaining to another Town. The Seventh Canon gives liberty, in caſe of an Appeal, to the Biſhop of Rome, the Appellant deſiring it; to that Biſhop to ſend thoſe who may joyn with the other Biſhops in judging the Appellant. The Eighth inhibits the Cuſtom of Biſhops flying to the Court, without the Commendation of their Brethren, or the Summons of the Emperour, whereby much Scandal had been lately given. The Ninth gives directions how a Biſhop may ſend his Deacon to the Metropolitan, and he commend him to thoſe Biſhops where the Court reſides. Or he may by his Deacon ſollicite his Friends at Court if he have any. And if it be at Rome, the Synod orders that the Petitions be delivered to their moſt Holy Brother and Fellow Biſhop of the Roman Church, who upon Examination finding them juſt and fitting, is to uſe care and diligence that they be conveyed to the Emperours preſence.

66. At the inſtance of Alipius, it was by the Tenth Canon made Lawful for Biſhops to betake themſelves to the Court in behalf of Infants and Widows. But leſt under ſpecious Pretences ſuch Liberty be abuſed, and ſuch Scandal happen as formerly the Impudence of ſome had brought upon the Church; the Eleventh Canon ordains that ſuch as ſhould break the former bounds be deprived. And that this Canon might take effect, Gaudentius the Biſhop further propounded, that ſuch Biſhops as lived in Canali, or the way of the publick Poſts, ſhould ſtop ſuch of their Brethren as travelled towards the Court, and upon Examination according to the Merit and Purport of their buſineſs, either forbid upon pain of Excommunication, or allow their Journey, which was unanimouſly Decreed. Yet leſt any ſhould through Ignorance of this Canon be ſurprized, at the requeſt of Hoſius, the Twelfth Canon provides that ſuch ſhould have notice of it. Then foraſmuch as great Inconvenience happened by the ſudden Promotion of Perſons to the Epiſcopal Function, and to prevent ſuch damage as may happen to the Church by Novices, the Fathers agreed to a Thirteenth Canon recommended by Hoſius, forbidding any to be made a Biſhop per ſaltum, or except he had paſſed through the Offices of Reader, Deacon or Prieſt, whereby his Abilities and Virtues might be throughly known before his Præferment to ſo high a Calling. Becauſe much Miſchief and Scandal had happened by reaſon of the ſtay of Biſhops out of their own Dioceſſes and Provinces too long a time; Hoſius alſo adviſed the Fathers, that foraſmuch as in a former Synod they deprived ſuch Lay-Perſons of Communion as ſhould abſent themſelves for three Lords days or three Weeks together from Church in the Cities where they dwelt: the ſame might be Decreed concerning a Biſhop, who without great neceſſity was abſent from his Church that ſame ſpace of time, and it pleaſing them well, a Fourteenth Canon was framed to this purpoſe. For the further inlargement of which, a Fifteenth was added at the motion of the ſaid Hoſius, wherein is alſo contained, that a Biſhop, if he cannot be in his own Territories, he ought to go to the next Church where there is a Prieſt, leaſt he ſhould paſs over a Lords-day without going to Church at all; but he is ſo to order his buſineſs where his Revenues lye, that he be not abſent from his Cathedral above three Weeks.

67. For the preſerving of Peace and Concord Hoſius procured the Sixteenth Canon, forbidding any Biſhop to receive any Clerk into Communion, Excommunicated by another, upon pain of being Cenſured by a Synod. But leſt through the paſſion and haſtineſs of any Biſhop innocent Perſons ſhould at any time ſuffer; Power is given by the Seventeenth Canon to the Neighbouring Biſhops to hear and determine ſuch Matters, and ſeverely to rebuke ſuch as they ſhould find to have carried themſelves irreverently towards their Biſhops. The Eighteenth at the motion of Januarius, forbids the enticing of Clerks from other Biſhops, and Ordaining them in their own Dioceſs: Which Hoſius found ſo reaſonable, that by a Nineteenth Canon he obtained a Nullity decreed on the Ordination of Miniſters, ſubject to other Biſhops, performed without the conſent of their Dioceſans, with Admonitions and Cenſures to be inflicted upon the Ordainers. The Twentieth Canon renews former Decrees made againſt the ſtay and abode of Clerks, ſuch as were Strangers, at Theſſalonica. The Twenty Firſt and laſt Canon at the motion of Hoſius, but ſuggeſtion of Olympius; decreed that ſuch as were Perſecuted for the Teſtimony of a good Conſcience, and for bearing Witneſs to the Orthodox and Catholick Faith, forced into other Cities, ſhould be received with Humanity and Benevolence. And the whole Synod ſaid, all thoſe Conſtitutions, let the Catholick Church diſperſed throughout the World receive; and all the Biſhops which had met together from divers Provinces, Sub-ſcribed ſaith the Latin Edition of this Council to the Number of 121. But Balſamon in his Greek Copies hath no ſuch Number, but writes that 341 Biſhops met at Sardica, and Decreed thoſe things, but in his Copies the Eighteenth Canon is wanting.

The Church as the State divided.

In Eaſt and Weſtern.

Ad ſol.:

l. 2. c. 22.
qu.

68. The Council of Sardica being broken up, and each one departed towards their proper Sees, great Outrages were committed by the Arians, againſt all ſuch of the Orthodox party as they could light off; whereof Athanaſius gives ſeveral examples. And ſuch was the iſſue of this, as well as other Councils, that the breach was ſo far from being made up, that it was much more enlarged. For the Eaſt and Weſtern Churches were, as Socrates telleth us, now divided, the place which ſevered their Communion, being the Mount Tiſucis, between Illyrium and Thrace, where every of them among themſelves, though they differed about the Faith, yet the quarrel being laid aſide, Communicated together; but beyond that, there was no Communion of the contrary Parties. They were called Eaſtern and Weſtern, eſpecially out of the reſpect to the two Empires ſo Named; not upon any exact Geographical account: As if the North and South parts of the World might not juſtly challenge their Share in the Provinces; but the Church, as ſhe took the Model of her Præcincts from that of the State, ſo herein alſo followed that Diviſion of the Empires.

Conſtans ſends to his Brother Conſtantius about Athanaſius his return to his See.

Soz. l. 3. c. 19. Athanas. aa ſolitar. Theod. l. 2. cc. 9. 10.

69. The determination of the Synod for reſtitution of the Biſhops to their own Sees. Notwithſtanding Conſtantius purſued the inclinations of the Arian Party, rather perſecuting thoſe that were already in, than reſtoring the ejected, till ſuch time as his Brother Conſtans found himſelf more than ordinarily concerned. Having found that more difficulty than ordinary was made about Athanaſius his return to his See, he ſent for him from Naiſſus, whether he had betaken himſelf, and commanded him to abide at Aquileia, under his own Protection: Then wrote he to his Brother Conſtantius, more earneſt Letters than formerly, minding how deeply the Honour of them both was concerned, in putting the determinations of that Council which had been ſummoned by their Joynt Authority to Sardica, to Execution; however he told him, that for his part he was very ſenſible, what ever he might be, of his duty in that particular, and being reſolved effectually to proſecute that deſign, he adviſed him to regard his own Honour, and reſtore Athanaſius and the reſt to their places, if not, he told him he would in Perſon make an Expedition, and ſee them reſtored to their Sees, whether he would or no. Thoſe Letters were ſent with the determinations of the Council by two Biſhops Euphrates and Vincentius, whom the Synod had choſen to go to Conſtantius, with whom Conſtans joyned Salianus a Count. Coming to Conſtantinople, and finding the Emperour was at Antioch, they Travelled thither, but before their arrival, their coming was known to Stephen Biſhop of that City, who had been a Member of the Arian Conventicle at Philippopolis.

The Meſſengers abuſed by the Villany of Stephen.

70. He as well to fruſtrate their Errand, as to blaſt the reputation both of their Perſons and Party, ſubborns a Rude young Fellow called Onager to bring a Common Strumpet into the Inn where the two Biſhops lay, and privily convey her into their Chamber: The Villany was ſo far managed as to convey the Whore into the Room where Euphrates was then in Bed, Vincentius being alſo at his reſt in an inner Chamber, and according to agreement, the Company ready at the Door entred the Chamber, and finding her there where they had put her, exclaimed abundantly, and a Tumult was raiſed: Vincentius upon this getting up, the Gates of the Inn were ſhut, yet Onager and other of the Clerks made their eſcape, but the Strumpet together with ſeven of the Conſpirators they ſeized on, and carried them before the Magiſtrates, where upon Examination the whole Plot was diſcovered, which Stephen alſo the Biſhop had not ſo much impudence to deny: Hereupon by command of the Emperour, ſuch Biſhops as then were at Antioch deprived him of his Biſhoprick, into which was choſen one Leontius, a Man not much better, who had caſtrated himſelf, as it's ſaid, that he might the more ſafely without ſcandal keep Company with a certain Woman whom he pretended to be a Virgin; and this Fellow they promoted expreſly contrary to the firſt Canon of the Nicene Council.

71. The Villany of Stephen had this effect upon Conſtantius, that conſidering with himſelf, how the Arians might have dealt in this ſort with others of the Orthodox Party, it made him ſeriouſly to reflect upon the Contents of his Brothers Letters. Having viewed the determinations of the Council, and received the advice of his own Biſhops, rather to permit the return of Athanaſius, than Ingage upon his account in a War, now at ſuch time as the Perſians were upon the Conſtantius his reply.

Borders, he ſent his Orders to his Lieutenants in Ægypt, not to moleſt thoſe of his Party. His anſwer to his Brother was, that he was very ready to comply with him, in the executions of the Decrees of the late Synod; that he was not againſt the reſtitution of Athanaſius, for whom he kept the Church of Alexandria vacant, to which he might return at his pleaſure. Athanaſius not knowing well how to truſt to his Meſſage, removed to Millain, where he received a Letter from Conſtantius himſelf, wherein he tells him, that he commiſerated his long Sufferings, that he had long e're this ſent for him to Conſtantinople, but that he expected he ſhould have made application to himſelf; which becauſe he thought he had not done, rather out of fear than any neglect of his Perſon or Authority, he now out of his good inclinations to him, aſſured him the kindneſs unasked for, of reſtoring him to his Native Country, and his Biſhoprick: When he demurred yet a little, as thinking if the Emperour had a real kindneſs for him, or intended him any good, he would rather have ſuffered him to take the neareſt way by Sea to Alexandria, than call him to Conſtantinople, and thereby force him upon a dangerous Journey, wherein he might be way laid by his Enemies; a ſecond Letter came, and a third, enforced by thoſe of ſome Noble-men his Friends, and brought by a Prieſt and a Deacon, whom Conſtantius had ſent to encourage him to the Journey.

Vide Athan. & Socrat. l. 2. c. 23.

72. Athanaſius hereupon betook himſelf to Rome, where adviſing further with the Biſhop and his other Friends, they were clear for his venturing to Conſtantinople, and Julius ſent by him Letters of Recommendation and Congratulation for his return to the Churches of Alexandria, to be ſeen in the Hiſtory of Socrates. He took his way then to Conſtantinople, where when he found not the Emperour, he followed him to Antioch, and getting eaſily Audience, was received by him very Courtiouſly. He found the Emperour conſtant to what he had written, and when he laid open his Caſe, and the many injuries he had undergone, through the Calumnies of his Enemies, he ſeemed to acquieſce in what he ſaid, and ſwore to him for the time to come, he would not harken to any complaints againſt him. His diſpatch for Alexandria he obtained ſooner through the jealouſie of his Enemies, who knowing his parts, were unwilling he ſhould contract any familiarity with Conſtantius, and his preſence ſeemed mightily to encourage the Orthodox Party at Antioch, with whom he Communicated privately, refuſing to joyn in the publick Worſhip with the Arians, who were by far the more prævalent Party in this City, and with whom the Orthodox Chriſtians were forced to joyn, having no Liberty of Conſcience as to Publick and Solemn Meetings. Yet through the connivance of Leontius, they had their liberty to honour the Son of God, according to their Profeſſion; for when the Gloria Patri was Sung, and the Arians Phraſed it Glory be to the Father in the Son, the Orthodox Chriſtians would add, and to the Son, declaring that the ſame Glory was due to the Son as to the Father. But Athanaſius conſidered his place and Sphear, and how to the ſin of joyning with Hæreticks, he ſhould add ſcandal and bad Example.

Ibid.

Athanaſius returns.

73. The Arians being conſtrained to reſtore Athanaſius in this manner, not only perſwaded their Emperour to the policy of making a Virtue of neceſſity, but to make ſome advantage alſo out of ſo bad a bargain. This was by deſiring of Athanaſius at his departure, when they thought good Nature and Gratitude would work, he having his Letters to the Churches, and all he could deſire; that thoſe of the Arian perſwaſion might have ſome one Church wherein they might publickly meet at Alexandria. To which when he could not in a manner deny, he anſwered, as not preſuming to diſobey the Emperour, but made bold unto his deſires, to return his humble Petition, that ſeeing there were many Chriſtians in that City of Antioch, which alſo in ſome points differed from Leontius, that they by his Imperial favour might obtain the like Indulgence. Conſtantius, though he diſliked the anſwer, was gravelled by the Equity of the propoſal; and the Arians conſidering that by granting the requeſt of Athanaſius, they ſhould looſe more ground at Antioch than they got at Alexandria; the whole matter was waved and paſſed over in ſilence. And much more reaſon they had, if it be true what we have from Socrates, that his Petition extended to the Catholicks, diſperſed all over, under the Government of Arian Biſhops. But thus did Conſtantius reſtore Athanaſius, abrogating what ever had been done againſt, and ſent him away with three Letters Commendatory; two to the Church of Alexandria, and a third to the Governours of Auguſtomnica, Thebais and Lybia; wherein he commands that all that Communicate with him ſhall enjoy their full full Franchize and Liberty; With him were ſeveral others reſtored, as Paulus Marcellus, Aſclopas Biſhop of Gaza, and Lucius Biſhop of Adrianople, whom their ſeveral Churches were commanded to entertain.

Athan. Apol. 2. ſocr. ubi ſuprà.

And with the Emperour Letters goes to Alexandria.

74. Athanaſius in his way homeward paſſed through Syria and Palæſtine, and came to Jeruſalem, where upon his deſire, Maximus the Biſhop called a Synod of Biſhops out of Syria and Palæſtine, by the decree of which he was received into Communion and reſtored. Now, as it ever happens to Men in Proſperity, he is courted on all hands, even by Enemies, Urſatius and Valens two of the moſt Factious Arian Biſhops ſending to beg his Pardon, and renouncing the Doctrine of Arius; which that they might ſeem to do Cordially they take a Journey to Rome, and make their Recantation before that Biſhop, whom they thought for the Dignity of his See, and his Orthodox judgment, to have been moſt Eminent in the Weſt, during thoſe Controverſies. But at Alexandria he is received with joy above the expreſſion of Tongue or Pen, ſuch as was manifeſted by publick Thankſgivings, Feſtivities, Feaſtings and other ſigns too pregnant to eſcape either to the view, or then envy of the Arians, who begin afreſh to load him with Calumnies to Conſtantius. This they thought they might now do with the better ſucceſs, becauſe Conſtans the Weſtern Emperour, his great Patron was e're this Murdered by the Treaſon of Magnentius and his Followers; who, to the great ſcandal of Religion, were the firſt Chriſtian Rebels, daring to riſe up againſt their Soveraign; a thing not once thought of by the Ancient Chriſtians, though they groaned under the Perſecution of Ethnick Princes. The Multitude of Orthodox Chriſtians being increaſed at Alexandria at his return, and the Churches, where they uſually met, being not large enough now to receive them, he was forced to make uſe of a large and ſtately one, built by Conſtantius, but not yet Conſecrated; and this they interpreted as done out of pride or preſumption, and in deſpight of the Emperours Authority, whom he would not deigne as much as to acquaint with his deſigned Dedication. They accuſed him alſo of holding intelligence with Magnentius, becauſe that Uſurper had ſent certain Italian Biſhops of Athanaſius his Acquaintance on an Embaſſy to Conſtantius, whom in their Journey, taking Alexandria in their way, had been entertained by him; and they had laid to his charge that he had many times conferred Orders out of his own Dioceſs and Province, contrary to the Canons.

where he is received with all the joy imaginable.

But is again Accuſed by the Arians.

75. Such were the difficulties that Conſtantius wreſtled with at this time, having his hands full of Magnentius, and about to grapple with the Perſian, that he thought it not ſeaſonable to meddle with Athanaſius, by diſobliging whom he might procure to himſelf freſh troubles in Ægypt, a Country he knew to be much at the Biſhops Devotion; inſtead therefore of bad Deeds, he gave him good Words, and thrice did he Write to him encouraging Letters, after the death of Conſtans, remembring it's probable what Promiſes and Oaths he had made to him. For two or three Years Athanaſius remained in quiet at Alexandria, during which time Maximus his old Friend the Biſhop of Jeruſalem dyed, concerning whoſe Succeſſors who were Arians a long time, there is great confuſion amongſt Writers, which Baronius attributes to the Strife and mutual Hatred betwixt the Arians themſelves: For as it uſually happens to all great Factions, that if they continue long, they part and divide aſunder into leſſer Diviſions; ſo happened it amongſt thoſe Hæreticks, of whom ſome thinking more honourably of the Son of God than others, although they denied alſo his Conſubſtantiallity, yet coming nearer to the Orthodox Doctrine, were called Semiarians. But Conſtantius having extricated himſelf out of his former difficulties by the ſuppreſſion of the Uſurpers, returned to his wonted humour, receiving impreſſions as formerly from the Arian Biſhops. E're his return to Conſtantinople he ordered Philip his Liuetenant to remove Paul the Biſhop thence, and reſtore Macedonius to that See, who fearing a Tumult of the Citizens, ſent for him privately and letting him down into a Boat, conveyed him ſecretly to the place of his baniſhment. This good Biſhop having long run the Fortune of a conſtant Confeſſor, at laſt arrived at the Crown of Martyrdom, being firſt baniſhed into Pontus, by procurement of Euſebius and his Party, then by Conſtantius into Meſopotamia, where he was kept at Singra, thence he was removed to Emeſa, and thence to Cucuſus a Town of Armenia, about Taurus, where he was ſtrangled by the Arians. His Body Theodoſius afterward cauſed to be tranſlated to Conſtantinople, and Buried in the Church which had been built by Macedonius his Adverſary, but was afterward known by the Name of Paul.

Maximus Biſhop of Jeruſalem dyes, and is ſucceeded by an Arian.

Paul of Conſtantinople baniſhed, and afterward murdered by the Arians.

Athanaſ. ad ſolit. Socr. l. 2.

76. Things going thus with Paul, Athanaſius his turn could not be far behind; but the Arians firſt uſe wiles and tricks before they come to force. Vrſacius and Valens, who as we ſaid pretended to be Converts, went to Rome to make their Submiſſion and Acknowledgments to the Biſhop. There they defie Arius and purge Athanaſius; but for his greater Honour they adviſe Julius to call him to Rome, that his Virtue and Integrity might be the more apparent, and greater ſatisfaction might be given to the World; concluding with themſelves, that this the Biſhop would not refuſe to do, it being an occaſion of ſhewing his Intereſt, and getting Credit to his Authority; and that Athanaſius would in vindication of juſt freedom as earneſtly refuſe to come, and ſo a breach would be made betwixt the two Orthodox Biſhops and their Churches, at which the Arians might Triumphantly enter. Julius could not do this being prevented by death after he had ſate in that See near Sixteen years. To him ſucceeded Liberius a Roman, who as ſome write, readily undertaking what he thought might make for the reputations of his See, Cited Athanaſius to Rome, under pain of Excommunication. Athanaſius though he had honoured the Roman Biſhop, and in reſpect to his Faith more then the Dignity of his See, had given him the right hand of Fellowſhip, and willingly admitted him Umpire in thoſe controverſies betwixt him and his Enemies, yet he refuſed to obey his Summons (which ſeemed to be made Authoritatively) and thereby gives ſo dangerous a Præſident for the founding of an Uſurped Supremacy.

Julius the Biſhop dyes, Liberius ſucceeds who cites Athanaſius to Rome.

Hilarii fragmenta.

Bibliotheca patrum tom. 3. col. 125.

77. Upon this refuſal Liberius proceeds to Excommunicate him as Contumacious, and receives the Eaſtern Biſhops into Communion; which coming to the knowledge of the Ægyptian Prælates, they call a Synod of Eighty Biſhops, wherein they reſolutely defend Athanaſius, maintaining his Cauſe againſt all, and confirm him in his See; which when conſidered by Liberius, he was aſhamed of his inconſideration and præcipitancy. But theſe things made much for the Arian Party, being good præparatives for what Conſtantius had deſigned, to whom now they could Characterize Athanaſius as a Man ſo troubleſome and turbulent, that even his old Friends the Weſtern Biſhops had forſaken him; Conſtantius having overcome his Enemies, and ſo proud of his ſucceſs, that he aſcribed that to himſelf which he would not allow to the Son of God, calling himſelf Æternal, and our Æternity, as a prælude to thoſe ſad Tragedies which followed, calls a Council at Arles by the advice of his Biſhops, wherein Athanaſius was Excommunicated. To this ſubſcribed amongſt the reſt Vincentius Biſhop of Capua, the Legate of Liberius Biſhop of Rome, who now in his Letter to Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba, diſlikes their proceedings. The Catholicks to divert them from their purpoſe, propoſed firſt to handle matters of Doctrine, but Valens (who together with Vrſatius his Companion had recanted his recantation,) and the reſt withſtood that proportion, and reſolving at preſent to wave the matter of Faith, carried it for the condemnation of Athanaſius, and of ſeveral others who were ſent into baniſhment.

And upon refuſal to come Excommunicates him.

Upon which Conſtantius ſummons a Councel at Arles, wherein Athanaſius and others are ſent in baniſhment.

78. This was a good Foundation for what was intended by the Arians, but whether this meeting was not ſolemn enough to carry a ſufficient ſhew of reputation, or at the deſire of Liberius and other Catholicks, another Council is ſummoned to Millaine the year following, where met of the Eaſtern Biſhops but few, by reaſon of the length of the journey, but of the Weſtern above thre Hundred, what the Arians wanted in Number was abundantly ſupplyed in the preſence and Authority of Conſtantius, who committed the abſoluteneſs of his Power into their hands, for ruin of the Orthodox Faith. They improved it ſo far as to depoſe all the Orthodox Biſhops, of which were moſt notable Euſebius of Verſailes, Paulinus of Triers, Lucifer of Calarita in Sicilie, and Dionyſius of Milan, who that they might not by their preſence in their ſeveral Countries, reſiſt the Decrees of the Synod, were ſent into baniſhment, where ſome of them were Murdered. Liberius being at Rome, thither the Emperour ſent Euſebius the Eunuch his Chamberlain, both by fair and foul means to perſwade him to joyn with the Arians, and when that would not do, ſent for him to Milan, where they had a diſcourſe recited by Theodoret, wherein the Emperour laboured by all arguments to draw him to his party; when he preſſed him to ſubſcribe to the Condemnation of the wicked Man (as he was pleaſed to call him) Athanaſius whom he charged with Treaſon and Sedition, he refuſed to Condemn him as a Man unheard, and when he preſſed him with the general practice of the World (which now ran all after Arius) he replied with an inſtance in thoſe three Perſons that withſtood Nebuchadnezars publick Edict, and that his ſingularity (as he termed it) could not weaken the Truth he profeſſed, ſo little was he moved by Arguments drawn from viſibility. When he ſaw he could not prævail he baniſhed him to Berea in Thrace; and in his place was put Fælix a Deacon of the Roman Church, as Auxentius into the See of Milan, both Arians we may eaſily believe, if we queſtion not the cunning and Policy of that Party.

And another at Millaine.

There the Orthodox are baniſhed and the Arians take their places.

L. 2. c. 16. Athan. ad ſolit & de fuga. Soc. l. 2. c. 36.

79. Athanaſius his doom we may be ſure was very heavy, when the Defence of him was a great part of the Crime for which theſe Biſhops were ſo ſeverely cenſured. By their endeavours to clear him Conſtantius was ſo inraged, that he publiſhed a moſt ſevere Edict againſt him, whereby Sentencing him to Death, he commanded he ſhould be Executed whereſoever he was found, ordering the Churches of Alexandria to be delivered up to the Arians, whom he licenſed to do even what they pleaſed. In purſuance of this Decree he ſends down Syrianus a Captain with ſome Thouſands of Men to Alexandria. The Inhabitants begged of this Syrianus that he would act nothing till they had ſent a Meſſage to the Emperour. He gave them both his Word and Oath, but a little afterward, he came upon them when they were not aware, being at Church, aſſembled with their Biſhop upon an Holy Vigil, and purpoſing to ſpend that night in Devotion, being the next day to participate of the Holy Euchariſt. He beſet the Church round with his armed Men when it was now late at night, and breaking in, made moſt horrid ſlaughter of all Perſons, no Sex Age or Quality conſidered. But he, whom they moſt aimed at, being earneſtly beſought to ſave himſelf by thoſe about him, when they firſt perceived the Treachery, refuſed to make his eſcape, reſolving to fare as the reſt did, yet in the Crowd he paſſed through undiſcovered, and by Gods great Providence got into the Wilderneſs. Thence he was minded to go to the Emperour and lay open his Caſe, before he perceived his ſettled Reſolution for his Deſtruction, which being firſt apprehended by what Quarter the reſt of his Brethren had in Ægypt, was fully confirmed to him by the Edicts ſet out againſt himſelf, whereby orders are given to apprehend him in all places, and reward offered to ſuch as could produce him alive, or bring in his Head to the Magiſtrate. The Alexandrian Churches are commanded to look upon him no otherwiſe than as the Emperours Enemy, Penalties are inflicted on ſuch as comfort, relieve, or harbour him. Thus had he no place wherein to reſt in ſafety, all the World being as it were in Arms againſt this one Man. All Officers and Soldiers are to enquire for him, ſome hunt after the prey to obtain a reward, and others would purchaſe him with Money, that by ſuch a Preſent they might procure Intereſt and Eſteem. But they are ſafe whom God keeps.

Alexandria delivered to the Arians.

Athanaſius condemned by the Emperour.

80. Though he eſcaped, ſo did not his Flock, which (though his Enemies objected his Flight againſt him) yet was better provided for by his removal, than poſſibly it could have been by his ſtay, which would have brought him to certain Deſtruction, whereas his Flight preſerved him, and thereby ſecured his Abilities for a better time and further Service. Inraged at his eſcape, they revenge it to purpoſe upon his Friends and Followers in Alexandria and Ægypt. Heraclius a Count of the Arian ſtamp, with Sebaſtian an Officer, and a Manichee, executing to the full ſuch Orders as they had received from the Emperour. Into the places of the exiled Biſhops they thruſt Men as deſpicable for Parts and Abilities, as Hæretical in their Judgments; and into the See of Alexandria one George lately come from Cappadocia, and as ſome have written originally of that Country, though Ammianus tells us he was born at Epiphania a City of Cilicia, in a fulling Mill as was reported. Indeed he is very often in antient Authors confounded with Gregory the Cappadocian, who being put into the place of Athanaſius by the Juncto of Antioch, was depoſed by the Council at Sardica, and died, as Athanaſius writes, Ten Months after the finiſhing of that Council. The likeneſs of their Names confounded Tranſcribers, who often put the one for the other; they are ſaid by ſome to have been Country men, they were both Arians, both great Adverſaries of Athanaſius, and Intruders into his See, and being great Perſecutors of the Orthodox Chriſtians of Alexandria, were both killed as ſome ſay by that injured and inraged People. It is neceſſary therefore to uſe great caution and diſtinction in the reading of Authors, who write of them both. But they may be ſufficiently diſcerned from each other by what we have formerly ſaid of Gregory, and what we now come to ſpeak of George.

George ſupplies his place.

His Character.

Orat. 21.

81. Gregory was of a Clergy-man made Biſhop of Alexandria, but this George being a Lay-perſon, having knaviſhly diſcharged a ſordid Sæcular Imployment, was thought good enough by the Arians for the Epiſcopal Function. Nazianzen tells us, that he was of a bad Stock, and worſe Qualities, not at all endowed with ingenuous Knowledge, or affable in his Converſation, not ſo much as prætending to godlineſs, or cloaking his Villanies with ſpecious Prætexts, yet fit for any bold Attempt, and a proper Inſtrument to diſturb the Publick Peace. Such an one in his beginnings as might be properly termed a Paraſite, haunting good Tables; all his Deſigns ſeeming to be laid for the filling of his Belly. His firſt Præferment was moſt baſe and ſordid, being the Proveditor General of Hogs Fleſh for the Army. And here, ſaith he, he left off his rogueing, and began his Villanies. Athanaſius writes that he was a keeper of Proviſions at Conſtantinople, where being found to have abuſed his Truſt, and converted the Commodities to his own advantage, he was forced to run, and fled into Cappadocia. But it ſeems he was taken notice of for a ſubtile headed Man, and fit for buſineſs, and (being an Arian,) for ſuch work as was to be done at Alexandria, which none but a Knave and Huckſter would, and none but a cunning and reſolute Fellow could, go through. Hereupon he was commended to Conſtantius, had his Peace begg'd, and was Ordained Biſhop of Alexandria, where he muſt aboliſh the Memory of, and expiate his former Crimes, by the Service to be performed againſt the Orthodox Chriſtians.

82. Being put into Poſſeſſion by the Emperours Officers in the time of Lent, he ſtaid till the Week of Eaſter was paſt, and then began his Villanies. Then were the Sacred Virgins clapt in Priſon, the Suffragan Biſhops haled and toſſed too and fro by the Soldiers, and the Houſes of Poor and Rich pillaged and ſacked. After the Whitſun Week the People aſſembling to the Celebration of a Faſt, would not for all this be frighted into Communion with him, but refuſing to joyn with him in the Holy Myſteries, gathered together in the Church-yard, which he underſtanding, procured that Sebaſtian to fall upon them, which he did, though on a Sunday as they were at Prayers. Enraged that he found but few, (for the hour being paſt, many were retired) he cauſed a Fire to be made, before which were brought the Virgins, and threatened with Death, except they would imbrace the Hæreſie of the Arians. When he could not overcome them by the humour of the Fire, he ſtripped them naked, and cauſed them ſo to be beaten and buffeted, that ſcarcely could their Friends know them a long time after. Forty Perſons he ſcourged ſo with the Twigs of Palm Trees newly cut, and having on their pricking knobs, that many lay long under the Chirurgions hands, and others died of their Wounds, whoſe Bodies they would not reſtore to their Friends, but let them lye unburied. Such as remained were baniſhed together with the Virgins. This done to fright the Multitude, they proceed againſt their Faithful Paſtors, that the Orthodox Doctrine might fail for want of Teachers, baniſhing ſeveral Biſhops of Ægypt, and Lybia, mentioned by Athanaſius, with certain Prieſts whom they handled ſo roughly, that ſome died in the Journey, and others in Exile. But above Thirty Biſhops they made away.

The Cruelty of George.

Athan. de fuga & apud Socr. l. 2. c. 28.

Athanaſius writes two Apologies for himſelf.

83. Athanaſius eſcaping in the Wilderneſs there lay in great ſolitarineſs, but good ſecurity a long time, ſix years it is ſaid, where he improved this ſad opportunity in Writing ſeveral Treatiſes in his own Vindication, and for the ſtrengthening of Orthodox Chriſtians. Underſtanding that his Enemies calumniated him for flying, and leaving his Flock in time of danger, he wrote that piece concerning his Flight, wherein he proves it lawful to ſhun thoſe imminent and certain perils deviſed for him, and clears himſelf of other Calumnies. And becauſe not only the Arians, but the Emperour alſo, to prævent the cenſure of Cruelty and Injuſtice, had accuſed him of grievous Crimes, and given him the Character of a moſt profligate Perſon, he wrote another Apology to him, wherein he confutes thoſe Slanders, relating in thoſe two, and his Epiſtle to ſuch as lived ſolitary Lives in the Wilderneſs, the whole Series of all thoſe Sufferings and Troubles which he and the Orthodox Party underwent. But this laſt ſeems written after the Synod held at Ariminum, about which time he alſo wrote his ſecond Apology to Liberius the Biſhop of Rome, then reſtored to his Biſhoprick In the mean time, a year after the Synod held at Milan, a Meeting of the Biſhops was ſummoned at Biterris a Town in Gall at the procurement of Saturninus Biſhop of Arles, the Ring-leader of the Arians in thoſe Parts, wherein Hilary Biſhop of Poictiers, for his former refuſal to joyn in Communion with the Hæreticks,

At a Council held at Biterris Hilary Biſhop of Poictiers is Baniſhed.

Hil. Col. 286.

and for putting up a Bill againſt them at this time was cenſured and baniſhed into Phrygia, the Faith of thoſe, who formerly were zealous in their Profeſſion, now waxed cold, and giving way to the great Deluge of Arianiſm, which out of the Eaſt bore down all before it even in the Weſtern Countries.

Leontius of Antioch dies.

Is ſucceeded by Eudoxius.

Suidas.

Socr. l. 2. c. 35, &c.

Aetius and his Hæreſie condemned.

84. This ſame year died Leontius Biſhop of Antioch, of whoſe Death when Eudoxius Biſhop of Germanicia a City of Syria heard, being then at Rome, he deſired leave of the Emperour (who now reſided there, having triumphed over his Enemies) to return to his own Dioceſs, which he pretended had great need of his Ghoſtly Council and aſſiſtance. Coming to Antioch, by the aſſiſtance of thoſe of the Emperours Chamber, he craftily inſinuated himſelf into that See, and calling a Synod of Biſhops, endeavoured to reſtore Aetius, who being formerly a Deacon in that Church, had, for his Hæreſie and Impiety by the Arians themſelves, been Excommunicated. This Man being of mean Parentage, was in his Youth taught the Trade of a Goldſmith, afterward getting a ſmack of the liberal Arts, betook himſelf to Paulinus Biſhop of Antioch, with whom he continued ſo long as the Biſhop lived, but applying himſelf to fallacious ways of Diſputing, and querks of Logick, he was by his Adverſaries drived from that City, when Eulalius was Biſhop, returning after the promotion of Leontius, he was made Deacon by him. Although he maintained the ſame things, yet did he ſeparate himſelf from the Arians, becauſe that after Arius his Perjury, they had received him into Communion, when he ſo lyed and diſſembled with Conſtantine the Emperour. By reading the Elencha of Ariſtotle he got ſuch a faculty of Diſputing captiouſly, as amazed meanly intelligent Perſons, and he would propound ſuch Fallacies, as he himſelf through his half Learning of Ariſtotle's Principles could not reſolve. He had read over ſome of the Antient Commentators, but condemned Clemens, Africanus and Origen, as illiterate Perſons. He would exclaim againſt the Divinity of the Son of God, becauſe he could not underſtand how there was an unbegotten Birth, as he ſaid, or how to imagine that the Begotten could be co-eternal with the Begetter. Incurring hatred with the Orthodox for thoſe Opinions, and with the Arians for his conceited knowledge, he was further branded with the Title of Atheiſt. For he held, as Epiphanius tells us, that the perfection of Man conſiſted in the knowledge of Divine things alone, without the acceſſion of Virtue, which he ſo far diſcarded, as he commended (inſtead of condemning) fleſhly Luſts and Pleaſures, affirming that Fornication and ſuch unlawful acts, had no more hurt in them, than picking of the Ears, blowing the Noſe, or other ſorts of avoiding Excrements.

Epiphanius.

And Photinus.

*Socr. l. 2. c. 29.

85. He eſteemed himſelf of far greater Merit than Arius, and accordingly had the Honour of giving name to an Hæreſie as well as he, his Followers being after him called Aetiani, though he had the ill luck of breeding a Scholar, who ſo far it ſeems outſtript his Maſter, that from his name Eunomius were they afterwards called Eunomiani. His great Abetter and Friend Eudoxius was ſo good a Proficient alſo in his Learning, that he had well nigh robbed him of his Glory. For priding himſelf much in being the Son of Cæſarius a Martyr of the leſſer Armenia; he alſo improved his Intereſt and Reputation for the Cauſe Hæreſie and Impiety of Aetius, as well as his Perſon, and being both remarkable for Dignity and Luxury, his Companions and Followers, inſtead of Aetiani, came to be called Eudoxiani. But all he could do was inſufficient for the recalling of Aetius, whom the Arians were reſolved to Sacrifice to their Reputation, affecting much the Title of Catholicks, and thinking to eſcape the odious Imputation of Hæreſie, by ſubjecting thoſe unto the Puniſhment who were ſcarcely their Superiors in the Guilt. But their Severity fell eſpecially upon Photinus Biſhop of Sirmium, who being formerly Principled by Marcellus, * maintained the Opinions of Sabellius the African, and Paulus Samoſatenus, affirming, “That “God is one, and alone, and not ſubſiſting in Perſons: That Chriſt is a Man “begotten by a Man, and not from Eternity, being neither of the Subſtance of “the Father, nor altogether like him. That the Holy Ghoſt is God, and no “diſtinct Perſon. The Arians, though they held the Son of God to be but a Creature, and therefore their Opinion was a little more ſound than his, yet ſhewing much Zeal for the Similitude of the Son of God, as if that would heal and make up all, procured Conſtantius, then at Sirmium, to call a Synod to that City.

Several Anathematiſms.

86. The Hæreſie of Photinus being condemned, the Biſhops drew up a ſhort Form of Faith, to which they added thoſe Anathematiſms to comprehend as well that of his, and other opinions. "Firſt, Thoſe that affirm that the Son of things which are not, or of any other ſubſtance, than of God the Father, let them be accurſed. Second, Or that there was Time or Age when he was not. Third, Or that the Father and the Son are two Gods. Fourth, Or that Chriſt was God before all Ages, and yet the Son of God, did not with the Father make all things. Fifth, Or that the Son of God, or any part of him is begotten of Mary. Sixth, Or that the Son is born of Mary, according to the foreknowledge, and not before all Ages begotten of the Father, and was with God, and that by him all things were made. Seventh, Or that the ſubſtance of God may be dilated or contracted. Eighth, Or that the Eſſence of God dilated makes the Son, or ſhall call the Son as it were dilating of his Eſſence. Ninth, Or ſhall call the Son, the Word of God ſeated in the mind of the Father, or the Word brought forth. Tenth, Or that God Man is begotten of the Virgin Mary, underſtanding thereby, that God is begotten. Eleventh, Or that ſhall expound theſe words [beſides me there is no God] to exclude thereby the only begotten, who is God from everlaſting. Twelfth, Or theſe [the Word made Fleſh] to be tranſmutation into Fleſh. Thirteenth, Or by Crucifying the only begotten Son of God, ſhall underſtand, that the Son of God did undergo Paſſion, Diſtruction, Change, Diminution, Annihilation. Fourteenth, Or that ſhall expound theſe words [let us make Man in our own Image] as ſpoken by God the Father to himſelf, and not to God the Son. Fifteenth, Or ſhall affirm that Jacob wreſtled with God, as God, or with God the Father, and not with the Son as Man. Sixteenth, Or whoſoever underſtandeth this, the Lord rained from the Lord, not to be meant of the Father and the Son, but that the Father rained from himſelf.

Vide Socr. l. 2. 3. Soz. l. 4 c. 30.

87. Or Seventeenth, "Whoſoever ſhall expound theſe Forms of Speech, the Father Lord, the Son Lord, as if the Father being Lord, be both Lord and Son. Eighteenth, Whoſoever when he ſaith Lord of Lords ſhall thereby underſtand two Gods. For we do not place the Son, ſay they, in the ſame degree with the Father, but we make him ſubject to the Father. Nineteenth, Whoſoever ſhall affirm the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, to be one Perſon. Twentieth, Whoſoever, when he calleth the Holy Ghoſt, the Comforter, ſhall thereby mean God unbegotten. Twenty firſt, Whoſoever ſaith there is no other Comforter beſide the Son. Twenty ſecond, Or that ſhall affirm the Holy Ghoſt to be part of the Father and the Son. Twenty third, Or that the Son, as one of the Creatures, is made by the Will of the Father. Twenty fourth, Whoſoever affirmeth the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, to be Three Gods, let him be accurſed. Twenty fifth, Or that the Son is begotten contrary to the Will of the Father. Twenty ſixth, Whoſoever affirms that the Son had neither begetting, nor beginning, and ſo conſequently affirm, that there are two without beginning, and two without begetting, and ſo appoint two Gods. The Son is the head and the Original of all Creatures, and the head of Chriſt is God, for ſo we refer all things reverently by the Son unto one principle of all things which is without beginning. Laſtly, Weighing deeply with our ſelves that clauſe alſo of Chriſtian profeſſion, we ſay, that whoſoever affirmeth Chriſt Jeſus the Son of God who Miniſtred unto the Fathers at the Creation of all things, not to have been before all Worlds, but only ſince the time that the Son was born of Mary to have been Chriſt, and then his Deity to have begun, as Paulus Samoſatenus was perſwaded, let him be accurſed. This we have tranſcribed, that once for all it may appear how abſtruſe was the Hæreſie of the Arians, how much it gave to the Son of God above other Hæreſies, in allowing him a Deity, confeſſing his being before all Worlds, which the Father made by him; ſometime, though not in the ſecond Confeſſion, they talk of Subſtance too and a perfect Similitude. But ſtill they deny his Conſubſtantiality, that critical term which ever limits and determines their Doctrine, though it ſhow never ſo high in the Epithets they give the Son of God. And not knowing what to ſay, or where to fix, they are guilty of prodigious uncertainty, whence ſo many Creeds and Forms of Faith, and ſo many Synods to make and marr, that Heathen Writers take notice of Conſtantius his Reign as very ridiculous in this reſpect.

88. Photinus was ſufficiently cenſured, but this confeſſion ſeeming too Orthodox, a ſecond Model was drawn, wherewith the Semiarians were offended, for that the word Subſtance was left out, and meeting afterwards at Anzyra a City of Galatia, they condemned this Model, aſſerting the word Subſtance, wherein they

A difference amongſt the Arians themſelves.

Hil. de ſyn. Epiph. hær. 73.

L. 2. c. 03.

Jacobus Capall. ad A. D. 351. 357. 359.

affirmed the Son was like the Father. This was quite contrary to the Second Decree of them at Sirmium, who, as Socrates writes, after a long contention about the ſignification of the Greek word οὐσία, and the Latin Subſtantia ; about the equality or unity of Subſtance, reſolved that the Church of God ſhould no longer be troubled with the interpretation thereof; and that for two Cauſes, both for that the Scriptures of God make no mention thereof, and becauſe the meaning thereof exceeded the capacity of Man; the Scripture teſtifiing, that no Man is able to ſet forth the Generation of the Son, in theſe words, his Generation who ſhall declare. This act therefore of the Semiarians, ſeeming ſo contrary to the publick Cauſe, another meeting was had at Sirmium, in the ſecond year after, where the Parties to agree, came to a compoſition, that the one ſhould leave out the word Subſtance, and the other yield this to be inſerted in the room of it, In all things like to the Father; and accordingly a third Form was drawn up, to which Conſtantius forced ſome Diſſenters to ſubſcribe. Now Baronius refers the firſt meeting at Sirmium to the Twenty firſt year of Conſtantius, the 357. of our Lord, although Socrates and Sozomen place it in the year after the Conſulſhip of Sergius and Nigrianus, which happened A. D. 351. He takes his argument from the Subſcription of Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba, to the Decrees of this Council, and the baniſhment of Athanaſius, which could not be before the Exile both of that Biſhop and Liberius, as alſo from the preſence of Conſtantius at Sirmium, which from Ammianus he gathers, fell out in this year. Others make there meetings held at Sirmium, viz. one A. D. 351. another the preſent 357, and another A. D. 359. Which produceth ſo many Forms of Faith, whereof the firſt was more tollerable, allowing the word Subſtance, but the Second utterly baniſhed it, as never more to be uſed, and by the third they found a middle way, leaſt Satan ſhould be too much divided againſt himſelf.

Hil. frag. Martyol. Rom. Jùl. 29. Athan. ad ſolitarios.

De. Scrip. Eccleſiaſt.

89. But when the Second Confeſſion came to be ſubſcribed, Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba, an ancient and Valient Souldier of Jeſus Chriſt, became a remarkable example of humane Frailty, who refuſing to ſet to his hand, was by Scourging and racking at length compelled to it, though a few years after, as is probably conjectured, he died at his See in the Orthodox Faith. Liberius alſo Biſhop of Rome, who formerly had ſtood out againſt Deprivement and Exile, was conquered with thoſe Baciline Arguments of the Arians, and ſubſcribed both to the Confeſſion of Faith, and the baniſhment of Athanaſius. The Cardiual Annaliſt labours hard to clear St. Peter's Chair from the guilt and ſcandal of Hæretical pravity, telling us, that it was the firſt Confeſſion of Faith to which Liberius ſubſcribed, wherein was contained the word Subſtance, and that having nothing but Orthodox in it, according to the natural ſignification of the words, he was not obliged to conſider what might be the meaning of the Arians. He endeavours to render invalid, what ever may make him guilty of Hæreſie, by aſcribing to the ſophiſtication and Tricks of the Arians, whatſoever is found to his diſadvantage in the writings of the Orthodox. But there are others, who from the credit of ſuch Authors, as they conceive were never tempted to Lye, do much otherwiſe conceive of this action of Liberius. For Felix, who had ſucceeded him after his baniſhment, perceiving himſelf to be mortally hated for his Arianiſm, and that none upon that account would Communicate with him; that he might ingratiate himſelf with the People, thundred out Anathema's againſt the Arians. Liberius perceiving this, when he was not only threatened with the extremity of Torments, but ſaw there was hopes of recovering his Biſhoprick, by complying with the Times, wrote Letters full of flattery to the Arians, calling them the Sons of Peace, and both condemned Athanaſius, and ſubſcribed to the Second Confeſſion of Faith made at Sirmium, hereby he recovered his Biſhoprick, thruſting out Felix as an intruder, whom he cauſed to be ſtarved to death: Upon which account Hilarius grieviouſly reprehended and Anathematized him, and Felix, (though upon another account ſaith Baronius,) was accounted a Martyr. The firſt that debaucht Liberius, was one Fortunatianus, as St. Hierome tells us.

Soz. l. 4. c. 13. Theod. b. l. 2. c. 26.

90 But Conſtantius the Emperour, underſtanding what Edoxius the Biſhop of Antioch had done, both in reference to the Biſhoprick, and Ætius, wrote unto the Inhabitants of that City againſt him, as one who had crept into that See without his knowledge and conſent; and as to the Hæreſie of Ætius, thinking he had not yet ſufficiently provided by the late Tranſactions at Sirmium, he reſolved to call another Council: Being ſo reſolved, he was perſwaded by the Favourers of Eudoxius, to ſummon the Biſhops to Nice, thinking, it ſeems, that this City, being as yet famous for the late Council thither aſſembled, would obliterate that Creed, and give reputation to his Hæreſie, by obtruding that for the Orthodox Faith; but afterwards the Emperours mind changed, and it was ſummoned to Nicomedia a City of the ſame Province. Here, when they ſhould aſſemble, ſo great an Earthquake happened, that it deſtroyed well nigh the whole Town, and this conſtrains them to think again of Nice. But hither alſo the Earthquake comes, and ſo prevents them, that they know not whether to turn themſelves. Some from St. Hierom gather that thence, the Aſſembly was removed to Ancyra, whither when the Prælates were travelling, Hilary wrote his Book of Synods in Phrygia, wherein he bewailes the backſliding of thoſe times, which he affirms to be ſo great, that in Ten Provinces of Aſia ſcarcely was one Biſhop to be found who knew and feared God. And now it was, that the Samiarians might make their proteſtation againſt the Second Form of Faith, agreed on at Sirmium. But the favourers of Eudoxius and Ætius perceiving things to go too favourably in behalf of the Catholick Cauſe, the word Conſubſtantial being only wanting to joyn to it, the Semiarians obtained of the Emperour that two places ſhould be appointed for the Eaſtern and Weſtern Biſhops to meet at. The pretence was, that both ſorts might have the more convenience of Travel; but the deſign, that they might not be united in one Body, for then they feared the Orthodox Party would be prævalent; but being divided into two Aſſemblies, divers forms of Faith and Decrees might paſs them, whereof they doubted not, but ſome they might either eaſily draw or wreſt to their purpoſe. In theſe changes and removes was ſpent this year, which was the Twenty Second of Conſtantius, the Fourth of Rome, the firſt Indiction. A. D. 358. T. Fabius Decianus, and Naratius Ceræalis being Conſuls.

Another Council held at Ancyra.

An Aſſembly held at Seleucia.

Socr. l. 2. c. 39.

91. The places determined for the Eaſtern Biſhops, was Seleutia, a City of Iſauria, and for the Weſtern Ariminum in Italy, where Four Hundred Prælates, ſome ſay Six hundred aſſembled. But firſt this ſame year which was the Twenty third of Conſtantius, was the third Creed made at Sirmium (as we formerly hinted) on the Twenty ſecond of May, where after great Conteſts, the Parties agreed to leave out the word Subſtance, upon condition, that Chriſt might be ſaid in all things like the Father, which held them in diſpute till the very Night preceeding the Feaſt of Whitſuntide. The Emperour Conſtantius, who was preſent at the making of this Confeſſion, ſix days after, ſent it away to Ariminum, where the firſt Seſſion was held on the Twenty firſt of July. There aſſembled ſo many of the Orthodox Party, that do what the Arians could, they carried it quite for the recognition of the Nicene Creed, and Condemnation of Arius, and his Doctrine, rejecting beſides all others Forms and Confeſſions of Faith, this new one come from Sirmium: And they depoſed Valens and Urſacius the Ringleaders of the Hæretical Party, together with Auxentius Germanius, Caius and Demophilus, becauſe they refuſed to joyn with them. Theſe Men who were wont to carry all before them, becauſe backed with the Emperours Authority, in a great fume poſt to him, to whom they lay open the danger of further troubles, after that the Council at Sirmium had taken ſo hopeful a courſe for the peace of the Church, which thoſe Men leavened with the Principles of Athanaſius, went about again to diſturbe. The Council ſent alſo their Meſſengers to the Court, deſiring, that having diſpatched thoſe matters for which they were called, they might have leave to depart to their own Sees. Conſtantius was about this time moving Eaſtward againſt the Barbarians, who broke violently into the Empire, and therefore telling them he could not at preſent attend thoſe Controverſies, he appointed them to expect his return at Adrianople.

Socr. ut rep. c. 36. Soz. c. 28. Theod. c. 19.

The Arians meet at Nice in Thrace, and make a new Creed.

92. The Arians in the mean time met at Nice in Thrace, where they drew up another Form of Faith, like unto the third made at Sirmium, leaving out both Subſtance and Conſubſtantial, and in ſome of them, in all things like, putting like only. Socrates tells us, that Urſatius called this Aſſembly together, and therein publiſhing that Confeſſion read in Ariminum, and forged at Sirmium, afterward ſet it forth as agreed to by a General Council, gave it the Name of the Nicene Faith, to the intent, that uſing the Name of Nice, he might enſnare the ignorant and ſimple ſort of People, who verily thought it the ſame Creed which had formerly been Compoſed at Nice in Bithynia; till at length the treachery of theſe Deceivers was diſcovered, and the Impoſture derided. This ſame Author writes, that the Biſhops at Ariminum, having anſwered the Emperours Letter, wherein he ſignified his pleaſure that they ſhould abide there till his return from the War, departed all to their own Sees. But Sulpicius Severus (who as he ſaith himſelf, had the knowledge of what paſſed in this Synod, from Gaudentius a Biſhop) reports, that Conſtantius having diſmiſſed the Meſſengers of the Council, who being young, unlearned, and imprudent, were drawn in to ſubſcribe the Creed of Sirmium, gave order to his Præfect not to ſuffer the Fathers to depart from Ariminum till they had alſo ſubſcribed the ſame Confeſſion. At firſt they refuſed to Communicate with their Apoſtate Meſſengers; but old Age, the cold of Winter, want of Neceſſaries, with threats of Tortures, ſo changed, if not broke them, that all in a manner ſubſcribed, and twenty who remained, were entrapped by Valens. Being allowed to add what proteſtation they pleaſed, he joyned to their Proteſtation, that Chriſt was not a Creature, as the reſt of the Creatures, whereby he meant, though they perceived not his drift, that he only was a Creature, though more excellent and perfect, as the reſt. When they had received and admitted this Clauſe, Valens and his Companions triumphed, ſaying, they had not affirmed the Son of God, not to be a Creature, but only the moſt Excellent of Creatures, and herein like the reſt. Now carried they all before them, inſomuch that the World groaned, and admired to ſee it ſelf all turned Arian. And from thoſe ſo contrary proceedings of this Council, it came to paſs, that ſomtimes it is imbraced by ancient Catholicks ſomtimes it utterly rejected as Erronious and Hæretical.

Sub. finem lib. 2.

Ingemuit totus orbis & Arianum ſeeſſe miratus eſt. Hierou. ad Lucif.

93. No better was the concluſion at Seleucia, where a Synod of about 160. Biſhops was opened on the Twenty ſeventh of September. Here the Arians themſelves were divided into two Factions, whilſt ſome would have matters of Faith firſt handled, and others would take into conſideration the Caſes of Criminals, (whereof ſeveral, out of fear, pretending frivolous reaſons, ſtaid at Seleucia) both Parties alledging the Authority of the Emperours Letters, which were Ambiguouſly written. Some cryed out againſt the making of new Forms of Faith, approving, as a Pattern, that which had been formerly drawn up at Antioch, at the Encænia or Dedication, which being to be ſubſcribed, the other Party headed by Acacius, who had importuned them to aboliſh the Nicene Creed, and make a new one, would not ſubſcribe themſelves but by their Deputies, the Deacons, and Readers. This was done the firſt day of meeting, the Doors of the Church being faſt locked, againſt which Acacius afterward proteſted, and by the aſſiſtance of Leonas a great Courtier, (who præſided by the Emperours order) having got the Factions again together, when they thought he was about to read ſomthing elſe, produced a Creed with a Præface to it. Herein after he had inveighed againſt his Adverſaries, he rejects quite the clauſes of Unity and Equality in Subſtance, both as having no ground in Scripture, and as the occaſions of great Contentions, yet withall accurſing the Clauſe of Inæquality, and holding all the Patrons and Favourers thereof as Excommunicated Perſons. When he had ſaid, Sophronius, Biſhop of Pompeiopolis in Paphlagonia, told him plainly, that if the new devices and daily invention of his brain were laid down for Creeds, it could not otherwiſe fall out, but that ſhortly they ſhould be found without one grain of Faith. In his Creed he had affirmed the Son of God to be like his Father, in the midſt of diſputation he was asked wherein? To which he anſwered, that the Son was like the Father, not in ſubſtance, but only in Will and Mind, to which when it was replied, that in Books by him formerly written, he had held the Son to be in all things like the Father, he returned this anſwer, that no Man that ever was, of old time, or of late days, is wont to be tryed by the Books he wrote. To ſuch prodigious incertainty and inconſtancy doth Hæreſie ſubject Mens minds. One while the Arians admit ſubſtance, ſomtimes not, one while like in all things, another only like, ſomtimes any thing but Conſubſtantial, other whiles ſcarcely any thing at all will be admitted.

Vide Soc. l. 2. c. 39. 40. gr. ex Sabino.

94. Leonas provoked by thoſe Diſſentions above all patience, refuſed flatly to præſide any more, and diſſolved the Council, permitting them yet amonſt themſevles to meet in the Church where the Samiarians aſſembling, deprived Acacius, with George of Alexandria, and others of his Party. Depoſing amongſt the reſt, Eudoxius of Antioch, they placed one Arianus in his See, whom after his Conſecration, their Adverſaries procured Leonas to baniſh, againſt which proceedings, after they had in vain proteſted, they ſent ten Meſſengers to plead their Cauſe before the Emperour. Thus much writes Socrates of this Council, who ſpeaks of it as Compoſed altogether of Arians, whereas Hilary in his Book againſt Conſtantius, makes mention of the Biſhops of Ægypt their ſtanding faſt to the buſineſs of one Subſtance, all except George their Metropolitan. He explains further the meaning of Acacius his Creed, which rejecting both Conſubſtantiality and likeneſs of Subſtance, yet withall condemned Diſſimilitude in the Son of God. For although they allowed him not to be like God as God, yet ſeeing he was the Son of his Will, rather than the Divinity, they allowed him like to his Father as ſuch. But in that they held him neither to be God, nor begotten of the Subſtance of the Father, therefore they would not admit of the likeneſs of Subſtance. And here they diſputed that in God there could be no Generation, becauſe there was no Female, and they proceeded to ſuch irreverent Terms as juſtly offended all Godly Ears.

Soc.l.2.c.41.gr.

Theod. l.2.c.27.
Soz.l.4.c.23,&c

Another Synod at Conſtantinople, and a new Creed.

Soc. ibid.c.42.

Ut ſuprà c.41.

How many Creeds were made ſince that of Nice.

95. But though the Semiarians had diſpatcht their Meſſengers to the Emperour, Acacius was got before them, and ſo told his Tale, that Conſtantius who ever inclined to the worſt and moſt rigorous Party, eſpouſed his Quarrel. Yet muſt another Synod be called at Conſtantinople, whither were ſummoned out of the neighbouring Bythinia about Fifty Biſhops, and a new Creed muſt be formed, wherein were aboliſhed as formerly the word Ouſiæ or Subſtance, and the Subſiſtence of Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt, forbidden once to be named. Having ſubſcribed this Creed, they took the ſeveral Cauſes of Biſhops into Conſideration, but firſt after much Diſputation condemned Aetius the Arch-Hæretick. Then proceeding againſt ſuch as they hated upon the account of private Grudges, in the firſt place they depoſed Macedonius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, partly becauſe upon his account ſome Slaughter had been committed, but indeed to revenge the Emperour of him who ſought an occaſion to do him a miſchief; it was alſo objected againſt him that he had admitted into Communion a certain Deacon taken in Adultery. They depoſed alſo Baſilius or Baſillas who had ſucceeded Marcellus in the See of Ancyra, for tormenting a Man, for forging Slanders, and diſparaging divers Perſons, but indeed for that he withſtood them ſo earneſtly, being one of the Meſſengers ſent from Selencia. After this, as well they that came from Selencia as thoſe that from elſewhere were aſſembled at Conſtantinople, were commanded by the Emperour to ſubſcribe that Creed which was lately ſent from Ariminum, though different from the other of Conſtantinople, and to be obſerved in the Weſt as this in the Eaſt. So dreadful was the condition of the Church at this time, whilſt every year produced almoſt a new Creed, and by virtue of thoſe,all Churches were ſo diſturbed,as neither could they know what to believe,nor any Paſtor left to teach them,ſuch changing and rechanging of Biſhops happened in every Province. Socrates in admiration of this number of Creeds, reckons up how many had been made ſince the Council of Nice. After that made by the Nicene Council, ſaith he, the Biſhops framed two others at Antioch when they aſſembled to the Dedication of the Church. The Third was made by the Biſhops in Gall, which were with Narciſſus who exhibited it to the Emperour Conſtantius. The Fourth was ſent by Eudoxius to the Italian Biſhops. Three were in Writing publiſhed at Sirmium, whereof one being glorioully ſet out with the Names of the Conſuls was read at Ariminum. The Eighth was publiſhed at Selencia by the Complices of Acacius. The Ninth was this ſet forth at Conſtantinople with this addition, that thenceforth there ſhould be no mention made of the Subſtance or Subſiſtency of God. Whereunto Vlphilas Biſhop of the Goths then firſt ſubſcribed, having till this time imbraced the Faith eſtabliſhed by the Council of Nice, and been an earneſt Follower of Theophilus his Predeceſſor, who was at that Council and ſubſcribed the Creed.

Soc. l.2.c.45.

96. Hilary Biſhop of Poictiers incenſed againſt Conſtantius for thoſe things, when he was now in Exile, wrote bitterly againſt him, which notwithſtanding for reaſons of State, the Emperour ſent him hence to his own Biſhoprick. Macedonius being baniſhed Conſtantinople and ſucceeded by Eudoxius, (who had formerly intruded into the See of Antioch,) now at length began to magnifie the clauſe of one Subſtance, but denied to the Holy Ghoſt the Honour of partaking thereof, together with the Father and the Son, affirming he was a Creature, and one of the Miniſtring Spirits, being only in Degree and Dignity above other Angels. The Arians gladly imbraced this opinion, being ſo conſonant to their own, that the noiſe of Contention about the Son of God, and the buſying their brains about that Hæreſie, ſeemeth indeed the only cauſe why we hear no more of this. Into the See of Antioch after the removal of Eudoxius was elected both by the Orthodox and Arians, Meletius formerly Biſhop of Sebaſtia in Armenia, each Party having a confidence in him, though he had formerly ſubſcribed the Form of Faith which Acacius his Party framed at Selencia. For ſome ſpace after his Tranſlation he meddled not with any Myſteries of Faith, but preached to his People ſuch Doctrine as conduced to Virtue and a good Life; but afterwards he preſſed them to the belief of the clauſe of one Subſtance, and to adhere to the Nicene Creed. Herewith the Arians much inraged, complained to the Emperour, who being then at Antioch, as well for this as other reaſons, another Council was called. Socrates writes that the Faction of Acacius procured it, that they might have an opportunity of renouncing the Opinion they had formerly held, that the Son is in all things like the Father. After the depoſition of Meletius, whom the Emperour baniſhed, Euroius (who formerly had been depoſed, together with Arius) was by his order promoted to the Church of Antioch.

97. The Arians met together cannot but fall upon Matters of Faith, and it pained them to think of breaking up without the Production of a new Creed. They call in queſtion what they had Decreed in time paſt, they affirm that the Clauſe of Likeneſs paſſed the Synods of Ariminum and Conſtantinople, is quite to be abandoned, and not once to be named any more; they now think it time to ſpeak plain, and no more conceal their opinion that the Son is altogether unequal and unlike the Father, not only in Subſtance but alſo in Will, as alſo that, as Arius braved, he had his Original from nothing. They were therefore from holding this Hæreſie, that the Son is unlike the Father called Anomius, and from maintaining him to have proceeded from nothing named Exucontius. And ſo fruitful is Hæreſie of other monſtrous Births, that from the Hive of Arius proceeded many other Swarms, diſtinguiſhed either by the names of their Leaders, or the particular ways and methods which they took, as the Euſebians, Photinians, Eudoxians, Acacians, Eunomians, Macedonians, Aetians, Pſatyrians Cyrtians and Dulians. But when it was demanded of thoſe Acacians why formerly they had given Chriſt the ſtile of God of God, that profeſſed they meant it in that ſence the Apoſtle wrote, when he ſaith all things are of God. And therefore the Son is of God, inaſmuch as he is included in the word All, for which cauſe they added in their Creed, According to the Scriptures. The Author of this Fooliſh Gloſs was George Biſhop of Laodicea, with whom the Acacian Faction joyning, though they were ſoundly charged with Sophiſtical dealing, yet weighed neither the Scandal nor the Cenſure. They repeated again the Form of Faith compoſed at Conſtantinople, which being done every one departed home.

An account of ſeveral Hæreticks.

98. Such was the liberty which this prophanely conſcious Age took to it ſelf, of prying into the Myſtery of the Holy Trinity, that innumerable were the Hæreſies it produced whilſt ſuch as were out of the way never could agree to walk together, and almoſt every particular Man made choice of a peculiar Path: Some that agreed to the clauſe of one Subſtance, yet fancied ſtrange things as to the Incarnation, concerning which another Hæreſie was about this time broached by one Apollonanus a Prieſt, and a Son he had of the ſame Name. Theſe two uſing too much the Familiarity of Epiphanius the Sophiſt, when upon admonition they would not forbear his company, George Biſhop of Laodicea fearing leaſt they might by his means be drawn to Paganiſm, Excommunicated them both. Diſcontented hereat, or as ſome wrote, being ſcandalized with the Arian Doctrine of the Biſhop, they fell off from the Church, and being not heeded, endeavoured to eſtabliſh a new Doctrine. Firſt they taught that God the word was Incarnate, without a Soul in a meer Body, again recanting the ſame, they affirmed, that he took a Soul, yet not the Mind nor Reaſon, but that the Godhead ſupplied the place thereof. Secondly, That he brought that Body with him from Heaven, and made it of the ſame Subſtance with his Divine Nature, and that this Body, when it came on Earth, was paſſible viſible and mortal. Thirdly, That Sin is part of a Mans Eſſence, and therefore if Chriſt had been a perfect Man, he muſt needs have been a Sinner. But beſides thoſe a worſe Sect aroſe in Meſopotamia about this time, from their Praying and Devotion called Maſſalani, Spirituales, and Euchaitæ or Præcatores, the Founders of the Sect

Soc.l.2.c.penult. Greg.Nazianz. Ep. ad Nectarium Baſil. ep. 7. Hieron. in Catal.Ruffin. Soz.

Epiph. hær. 80.

*Theod.l.*4. & 6.

Sect being certain Monks who lived in the Deſerts of that Country. They *Damaſc.hær.*80 placed all Religion in Praying, miſled by a miſunderſtanding of that of the Apoſtle, Pray without ceaſing, eſteeming all other Offices of Devotion, Piety, and Virtue, as uſeleſs and unneceſſary. They held that every Man had a Devil in him, even the Apoſtles themſelves, which can no otherwiſe be ejected, than with this Spiritual Engine; that every Man had two Souls, whereof one more than Cæleſtial, and that by this, even with their bodily Eyes they were capable of beholding the Bleſſed Trinity. They prætended to ſtrange Revelations, whereby they attained high Perfection, even as high as Chriſt himſelf, as alſo to triumph over Devils, upon which account they were called Enthuſiaſts.

99. But a Covetous Devil ſo far poſſeſſed them, that they denied any Almes ought to be given to any other, but themſelves, becauſe they were the truly poor in Spirit. They held it lawful to ſwear, and forſwear, and taught Children, that it was lawful to diſobey their Parents, ſo that the Gift or Corban were but brought into their Box. They pretended to Perfection in this Life, to ſo high a degree, that they could be impeccable in thought; had a ſtrange fancy concerning Spiritual Purgation, as if a Sow and Pigs were ſeen to go out at a Mans Mouth; and viſible Fire, yet without the Propriety of burning, to enter in. Such a virtue they made in Prayer, that it thruſt out Devils in Excrements, through the Mouth, and other parts, being quite contrary in this opinion to the Doctrine of other Monks in Ægypt about the ſame time, who refrained from avoidance of all Excrements, as a Sin, becauſe Chriſt ſaid, that thoſe things which come out of a Man, defile a Man, never conſidering the Explication of the Text, in which reſpect they condemned Marriage. So ſtrangely did the Spirit of Error poſſeſs Monks at this time, who by their Devotions and Solitary Life, contracted as much of Spiritual Pride, as Melancholly, that ſome would, as too Holy, pray with no others, and therefore both celebrated, though Lay-men, Holy Offices, and Ordained themſelves Biſhops, others caſtrated themſelves, ſome Rebaptized ſuch as turned from Arianiſm, and others behaved themſelves ſuitably to thoſe Extravagancies as Epiphanius hath related.

100. So fruitful was Conſtantius his Reign of Hereſies and Schiſms, that the Church could ſcarcely perceive her ſelf free from thoſe Calamities which the præceding Pagan times had inflicted. For though her Sufferings from without were removed, yet ſhe laboured under ſuch inward Preſſures, as almoſt equalled her former Troubles. Her beſt and moſt genuine Sons being ſo roughly handled by thoſe who challenged the ſame Original, that ſhe ſeemed even to ſlight the Friendſhip of the Scepter, which had defended her indeed from her ſworn and proteſted Enemies, but had ſtill kept her Eyes as moiſt as ever, by aſſiſting her falſe, though highly prætending Friends, in the Perſecution of thoſe moſt dear unto her. Her cries were at length heard, and his days were accompliſhed, who was the furtherer of her ſorrow. For Conſtantius, who had ſo long robbed the Son of God of his Glory, was now well nigh deprived of his own Earthly Diadem, and although he eſcaped Deprivation, yet it was by no leſs charge and price, than of his own Life, giving place to him who had ſought it, and unwillingly reſigning his Seat to that Perſon, for whom, he had in his thoughts deſigned no other Manſions, than thoſe of the dead. He according to the depraved Cuſtom of thoſe times, deferred alſo his Baptiſm to his death, and then receiving it at the Hands of Euzoius the Arian Biſhop of Antioch, ſealed as it were that Doctrine at his end, which he had ſo much defended in his Life. Yet did he much advance the common name and Intereſt of Chriſtianity, improving his Power and Authority for the Suppreſſion of Pagan Superſtition, and carrying on that Reformation which his Father ſo happily had begun. This becauſe the continued Series of thoſe Arian Controverſies permitted us not hitherto to deſcribe, we ſhall now ſee what Laws he made in reference to Religion. For by them the State and Condition of times is more fully known, than otherwiſe. Particular Relations of private Perſons may fail, their diſcovery being more uncertain, their Fear, Affection, and other Impediments more prævalent. But from the nature and courſe of the Remedy, we may beſt diſtinguiſh and judge of the Diſtemper.

Conſtantius being baptized by Euzoius the Arian Biſhop of Antioch, dies

His Laws Eccleſiaſtical.

101. And the firſt we ſhall take notice of is that Crime of Adultery, a Sin, which becauſe ſuch, it concerned Magiſtrates to prevent as Chriſtians, and becauſe of ſuch a nature as to confound genitures, and procure ſo great Thefts and Robberies, as of whole Inheritances, it behoved them to prevent, as Fathers of their Country. The Emperours therefore, in the Third Year of their Reign, and the Conſulſhip of Conſtantius and Valens, by a (a) Conſtitution, inflict death upon Adulterers as Sacrilegious againſt Marriage, not fearing the cenſure of Hæreſie for ſo doing, which had they lived in the time of (b) Binnius, they had certainly incurred. This ſame year they (c) forbid Chriſtian Women to marry with Jews, as thereby caſting themſelves into great Temptations. And by another (d Conſtitution, taking care leſt inceſtuous Marriages, a thing to frequent in thoſe days, ſhould defile the Chriſtian Faith, they forbid that any Man Marry his Brothers or Siſters Daughter. Perceiving how Religious Zeal is apt to run into the other extream, that whilſt it mends, it is always thereby apt to marr, and to change Superſtition for Sacrilege, Deſolation, and Rapine, in their Fourth Year, and the Conſulſhip of Acyndinus and Proculus, they were conſtrained to obviate that humour which ever rages in Reformations. Chriſtianity now having ſpread far and wide throughout the Empire, and Chriſtians incouraged by the Profeſſion of Princes, very zealouſly oppoſed whatever they thought tended to Idolatry, and therefore having in their Grounds many Sepulchres Conſecrated, as was the Cuſtom of old to the Dii Manes, thoſe without any regard to the Memory of their Anceſtors, or Piety to the Dead, they did not only demoliſh, but convert all Ornaments of Sepulchre to vile and baſe uſes. To ſtop therefore this current, and to prevent the objection of Pagans, that Chriſtianity diveſted its Profeſſors of Humanity, (e) a Law was made at Milan, againſt ſuch who ſhould violate thoſe Monuments of the Dead, and convert the Marble and Pillars thereto belonging to other uſes.

(a) Cod Theodoſ. l. 11. c. 36. §. 4.

(b) Adulteros morte mulctari debere docere, non modo notoriam injuſtitiam verum etiam hæreticam doctrinam eſſe. Binnius in notis ad Concil. veneticum.

(c) C. Th. l. 16. tit. 6. § 6.

(d) C. Th. l. 3. tit. 12. §. 1.

(e) C. Theod. l. 1. & 2. de ſepul. violand.

102. Neither could the Heathens take any incouragement hereat, whilſt a diſtinction was made betwixt Superſtition and Irreverence. Indeed notwithſtanding what had been done by Conſtantine, and the diſcouragement given by the preſent Princes, yet very many, and thoſe of the greateſt Ranks, as Senators, and others, were both at this time Pagans, and continued ſuch a long time after. But that by degrees the work might be brought to perfection, Conſtantius in the Fifth Year of his Reign, and the Conſulſhip of Marcellinus and Probinus, Enacts a (a) Law againſt Idolaters, which forbids all ſorts of Perſons to offer Sacrifice. This notwithſtanding, the old Inhabitant was ſo unwilling to be diſpoſſeſſed and ſpoiled of his Goods, that Five Years after, there was need of another Edict, (b) whereby the Emperours Conſtantius and Conſtans command the Temples of Pagans, which ſtood within the Walls of Cities, to be ſhut up, not thinking it fit to proceed further, but permitting thoſe that ſtood without, to remain in the ſame condition as formerly. Yet this Conſtitution ſeemeth to have had this effect, that the Year following the ancient Centenary Sæcular Games, of which we have already ſpoken largely, were not celebrated, the Pagans it ſeems being diſcouraged, or fearing to be hindred, if they went about it. Notwithſtanding what Conſtantine had done, for the incouragement of the Clergy, in freeing them from publick Offices of charge and trouble (which he even granted to the Jewiſh Prieſts) yet this was ſo far forgotten, that Conſtantius in his Thirteenth Year makes another Law, (c) whereby he ſets free Clerks and their Sons from all Curial Imployments, and from all diſturbance of Civil Offices.

(a) C. Th l. 2. de Pagan.

(b) C. Th. l 16. tit. 8. §. 3, 4.

(c) C. Th l. 16. tit. 2 §. 9.

103. The Traytor Magnentius before the Commiſſion of his execrable parricide againſt Conſtans, in compliance with the times, made Profeſſion of the Chriſtian Faith. But when he had ſet up for himſelf, either out of his own Inclination, or which is as probable, to ſtrengthen his Party againſt Conſtantius, he ſeems to have revolted from it; for he then reſtored thoſe Sacrifices which formerly had been forbidden, as appears from the (a) Code of Theodoſius. Theſe Crimes procuring vengeance from Heaven upon him, his Reign was not of ſuch length, as thereby much to endamage Chriſtianity, to which ſome amends was made by Gallus Cæſar, who ſeemed for the ſmall time he continued in Power, to be very zealous for Religion, and contributed to the Reformation. This appeared as ſoon as he was promoted to be Cæſar, when lying at Antioch he took occaſion to rid that place of a very notable piece of Idolatry. There was in the

(a) De Paganis ut ſuprà.

The Grove of Daphne deſtroyed.

Vide Baronium ad A.D. 351.

Suburbs of that City the famed Grove of Daphne, ſo much celebrated by Poets, and other Heathen Writers, for its Conſecration to Apollo, and a Temple and Oracle of the Devil. Being much haunted ſtill by the Superſtitious Gentiles, he concluded he ſhould ſpoil all their ſport if he removed thither the Body of Babylas the Martyr, ſome time Biſhop of that See. This being done, both what he had deſigned did ſucceed, and what was much more obſervable, that the Devil could not utter thence any Oracle as long as the Body there continued, which he confeſſed to Julian afterwards, whereas it was commonly thought, that this happened becauſe no Sacrifices were offered. Thus did Gallus effect that which his Uncle Conſtantine ſeemeth to have purpoſed unſucceſsfully, who to aboliſh the Memory of Apollo in Daphne, had there erected his Mother Helena's Statue, had called the place Auguſtale, and after himſelf Conſtantiniana Daphne, giving alſo to the Twenty third Legion, which he had lately raiſed, the name of Conſtantiniana Dafnenſis, as from ſeveral ancient Medals, and Inſcriptions, it doth appear.

104. But Conſtantius, that he might prævent all Treaſon againſt his Perſon, or remove that, which otherwiſe, through Gods diſpleaſure, might indanger his Cauſe, when he undertook his Expedition againſt Magnentius, and Verannio, caſhired all his Souldiers, who were not already, or now refuſed, to be Baptized, though he himſelf deferred it till his Death. It happened upon this occaſion, that ſuch as refuſed Baptiſm, were called Pagani or Pagans, which word being firſt peculiar to thoſe that were not Souldiers, in contradiſtinction to Military Men, became after this, a common name of all Ethnicks. Baronius thinks that the Gentiles might ſo be called from this reaſon, that when the Idol-Temples were ſhut up in Cities, they retired into the Pagi or Villages, to perform their Superſtitious Rites, which they did till the time of Honorius or longer. Honorius the Emperour uſing the word in this ſence, interprets it, as meaning the Gentiles, ſo that it had not been long in uſe, as applicable to Idolaters. Baronius tells us, the firſt he finds thus to uſe it, is Optatus Milenitanus, who wrote againſt Parmenianus, in the Reign of Valentinian and Valens, and he contends againſt ſuch as would produce Tertullian to the contrary. The word Gentile was taken from the Jews, but at this time the Romans, when they uſed this word, underſtood thereby Barbarians, as appeareth by the Reſcripts of Valentinian and Valens, out of the Code of Theodoſius.

Pagani who.

Vide annot. ad l. 1. Cod. Inſt. de Paganis.

de nupt. Gentil.

105. In the time of Conſtantius it ſeemeth, that Sæcular Judges drew Biſhops into their Courts, and would take cogniſance of Matters peculiar to them, and purely Eccleſiaſtical, which upon complaint of Hilary Biſhop of Poictiers, the Emperour taking into Conſideration, by a (a) Conſtitution dated on the firſt of October, in the Nineteenth Year of his Reign, and the Conſulſhip of Arbetio and Lollianus, forbids Biſhops to be accuſed in Sæcular Courts, permitting their Cauſes to be decided by their Brethren, which is to be underſtood of Eccleſiaſtical. The next Year after, taking notice how much Idolatry yet was practiced, notwithſtanding all former Laws, he in conjunction with Julian (who though a Pagan in his Heart, was at this time glad to diſſemble) publiſheth ſevere (b) Reſcripts againſt Aruſpices, Mathematicians, Magicians, Diviners, and ſuch like Creatures, with thoſe that ſhould conſult them; as alſo againſt ſuch as ſacrificed to Idols, or worſhipped their Images, making thoſe Crimes Capital, like a ſevere vindicator of the Chriſtian Religion, as he ſtiles himſelf; But this was done rather in terrour, the Rod was ſhaken, but ſeldom or never did it ſtrike Idolaters, however it might reach the Fortune-tellers, againſt whom the Emperour might be acted by other reaſons beſides thoſe of Religion. The Emperours in the following Year, and the One and twentieth of Conſtantius, (c) except from the general Collation to which Tradeſmen were bound, the Clerks called Clerici Copiatæ, that is the Libitinarii, or thoſe that ordered Matters belonging to Burials, Veſpillones or Bearers, Pollinctores, or thoſe that waſhed and anointed dead Bodies. They alſo confirmed Priviledges formerly granted to the Roman Church, out of conſideration of the Dignity of that ancient Metropolis. This ſame Year alſo Conſtantius wrote a Reſcript to the People againſt Inchanters, ſuch as diſturbed the Elements and raiſed Spirits; and to Orſitus Præfect of the City, againſt ſuch as exhibited the old ſhews of the Gladiators. It was in the Præfectſhip of this Orſitus, that the great Obelisk was removed by order of Conſtantius from Alexandria to Rome, and there placed in the Great Cicque, which

(a) C. Theod. l. 12. de Epiſc. & Cler.

(b) C. Th. l. 16. t. 8 §. 6. l 9. t. 16 §. 4, 5. De malef. & Pagan.

(c) C. Th. l. 1. tit. 1. §. 1. de Epiſc. & Cleric.

C. Th. l. 5. de malef. L. 1. de gladiat.

long time after Sixtus Quintus tranſlated into the Lateran Pallace, and made Chriſtian by a Croſs erected on the top thereof.

106. The Year following being the Two and twentieth of his Reign, and in the Conſulſhip of T. Fabius Dacianus, and Neratius Ceroalis, he publiſhed, amongſt other Conſtitutions, another Law againſt the ſeveral ſorts of Diviners, and Fortune-tellers, whom if they were found in the Court, he ſubjected to Tortures. It is probable that ſomething he had ſmelt out, concerning Julian, and what tricks he plaid at this time in Gall, where and elſewhere, when he could privately, he gave up himſelf to Magick, as we have formerly ſhewed out of Ammianus, who cannot, though a Pagan, forbear to accuſe him of exceſs in this Particular. From him alſo we may learn, that Conſtantius was about this time much moved againſt Idolaters, who ſtill continued their Sacrifices, and conſulted Oracles, notwithſtanding all his Laws formerly publiſhed againſt thoſe Superſtitions, which carried him out to that Severity, that ſuch as ſhould but be found to wear Amulets about them againſt Diſeaſes, as the Quartan Ague, or were ſeen to wander about the Tombs, he ſubjected to Condemnation. And as he bent his endeavours thus to eradicate Pagan Superſtitions, ſo did he curſe the Jews, with whom he would not have Chriſtians to Marry, or have Communion. Hieron. in Chron. The Inſurrection they made in his Seventeen Year was ſo provoking, that Gallus Cæſar, to ſuppreſs their Rebellion, deſtroyed many thouſands of Men, Women, and Children, and burnt many of their Towns. In the ſame Year died Rabba, their great Doctor both in the School called Surana, and the other named Pambitana, to whom ſucceeded Nachman the Son of Iſaac. In the Two and twentieth Year of Conſtantius, Hillel the Second, the Son of Judas, began the Computation, which the Jews uſe at this day. Jacobus Cappellus ex Zacuto & Abrahami Cabbala. He built upon the Foundations laid formerly by Hillel the Firſt, his Progenitor, who died A. D. 10. He took this for a Principle, that the Vernal Æquinoctial fell out on the Twenty third of March, which was true in the days of Hillel the Firſt; but the caſe was altered in the time of the Younger, and the ſaid Two and twentieth Year of the Emperour Conſtantius.

CHAP. IV.

From the Reign and Apoſtacy of Julian to the Second Oecumenical Council held at Conſtantinople.

The ſpace of Twenty Years wanting five Months.

1. THe Tares of Arraniſm were now grown ſo forward and flouriſhing that there wanted a Winter to check their growth, leſt they ſhould choak the Corn, and quite overrun the Lords Husbandry. As Friends, when they fall out, give advantage to ſuch as ſeek the ruin of both Nations,and formerly allied, being once grown wanton through Proſperity, firſt quarrel and weaken each other, then lye open to Forraign attempts, and in contention for the Fenns, and the right of Soveraignty, are made a prey by one that hovers above them both, for a fit advantage ſo happened it to Chriſtians after the death of Conſtantius. Flavius Claudius Julianus his Couſin German and Succeſſor (though againſt his will) having been Educated in the Chriſtian Religion, yet from a Child, if we believe Ammianus, was much inclined to Paganiſm, and if we credit himſelf, had for the ſpace of Ten years, though privately for fear of Conſtantius, yet Really and Cordially addicted himſelf to that Superſtition, reſolving that if ever his Stars ſo wrought as to make him Maſter of the Roman Empire, to recall from Exile his baniſhed Gods, reſtore them their Temples, rebuild their Altars, and kindle again thoſe Fires which the late zeal of his Prædeceſſors had almoſt extinguiſhed, without any hopes of reſuſcitation. But this he thought he muſt effect by degrees, and uſed ſuch arts as in contemplation of thoſe means which he perceived had formerly been applied unſucceſsfully,were moſt proper and likely to bring about his deſign.

Julian the Emperour.

2. His ſeverity againſt the Eunuchs and other Courtiers of Conſtantius, though proceeding from private indignation and revenge, yet being joyned with Juſtice, and meeting with the ſame paſſions and intereſts in others (who had ſmarted under the late grievances,as well as himſelf) procured him applauſe and good eſteem. He ſeemed to be ſenſible of the injuſtice of the Arians, and the hard uſage of the Orthodox, whom he reſtored to their Countries, Sees, Livings, and Eſtates. But though at firſt he compelled none to his own way, and never lived to ripen thoſe projects which he had laid as prævious to that deſign, yet did he take the courſe of all thoſe who prudently reſolve to turn the ſtrong Current of the Multitude, firſt to diſcountenance diſſentions, and give an indifferent liberty to all, yet ſo as to ſhew by his practice, what he himſelf approved, till by ſecuring himſelf of the main chance , and getting firm poſſeſſion of the Soveraignty, having once gained the Poſts of greateſt concernment, and made himſelf Maſter of all the avenues, he could turn the Engines of Peace, which are the Laws, againſt thoſe who had lately been poſſeſſed of them,and then at length enjoy,nwhen had Obedience within his beck. His indulgence therefore extended as well to Hæreticks as Orthodox. Some of that ſort, as Ætius, and others being in Exile. To all alike he gave liberty of Conſcience, Inhibiting Conſtraint and Force, which he knew,if it came once to blows, would be firſt put upon his own Party, when the Chriſtians, who filled all places within the Empire, ſhould betake themſelves to other Weapons beſides their ancient Prayers and Tears. He commanded the Temples of Idols to be opened, offered himſelf at the Sacrifices, and not content with the Devotion and Attendance of an ordinary Pagan, both took upon him the Office and Title of Pontifex Maximus, according to the cuſtom of his Heathen Anceſtors, (in which he was Initiated with the ordinary Ceremonies,) and was alſo made Pontiſe over the Eleuſinia, and ordained other inferiour Pontifes which he diſtributed into the Provinces.

He tollerates all Religions.

3. In Sozom.

Athanaſius returns to Alexandria upon the death of George.

3. In complyance with this opportunity, offered the Exiled Biſhops return to their own Sees, and amongſt the reſt Athanaſius the great Champion of Chriſts Divinity. Some ſay he appeared in his Church ſoon after the Death of Conſtantius, but Gregory Nazianzen, in the work which he conſecrated to his praiſe, ſaith, he returned thither after the Death of George, who being both hateful to God and Man, came to ſuch an end, as his Carriage and Demeanour had deſerved. For beſides what we have formerly ſaid of his Cruelties, his Avarice and Extorſions were great, wherewith he haraſed the Alexandrians. Epiphanius writes, that he ſpoyled many of them of their Patrimonies, that he ingroſſed to himſelf the trade of Nitre, and of the Salt-pits, procured the Monopile of Paper, and making a gain out of the vileſt ſorts of Materials, brought up a new Order of Lecticarii or Biere-Carriers in the Church, which he reſtrained to a certain Number to be at his Devotion, ſuffering none, but thoſe by himſelf appointed, to be employed in the Burial of the Dead. This was far from any care of ſeeing Chriſtians decently Interred, his deſign was only his own profit, not to ſpeak, ſaith he, of his laſt Cruelties. Being depoſed in the Council of Seleucia, by the Semiarian Faction, he regarded not at all the Cenſure, but returned to Alexandria, where not at all daunted, he fell upon his former Courſes, plagueing as well the Gentiles as the Orthodox Chriſtians. By theſe means he became ſo odious to all Parties and Conditions, that a fit occaſion only was wanting to diſpatch him out of the way, and that at length preſented it ſelf; about which, though there be ſome Variation in Writers as to the manner, yet all agree in the Subſtance.

The manner of his death.

4. That the Emperour had given him Licence to Convert the ancient Temple of Mithras or the Sun, which had layn a long time deſolate, into a Chriſtian Church, is affirmed by Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and that great heaps of Slaughtered Bodies which had been offered to that Idol, being found therein, were by the Chriſtians expoſed to publick view, to render the more odious the Irreligion and Impiety of the Gentiles. Hereby grievouſly incenſed, and formerly provoked, by his inſolencies having got advantage, and encouraged by the profeſſion of Julian, they fell upon him, and ſlew him in the place. Ammianus tells the Story thus, that paſſing once by the Goodly Temple, dedicated to the Genius of the place, with many People according to the Cuſtom waiting on him; caſting his Eyes upon it after a ſcornful faſhion, how long, ſaid he, ſhall thoſe ruines continue undemoliſhed? Upon report hereof, the Pagans furiouſly inraged, and hearing in the very nick of time, that their Governour was newly dead, they gladly laid hold on the opportunity, not quieting themſelves till they had torn a Man ſo generally hated, into almoſt a thouſand pieces. Ammianus relates, as cauſes of the Peoples fury, that he had incenſed the Emperour againſt them, accuſing them as ſpurning againſt his Government, that he was an Informer, and to curry favour with the Prince, had buzzed into his credulous Ears, that all Houſes in the City built by Alexander the Founder at the publick charges, he might juſtly appropriate to his Exchequer. Some imputed his death to the favourers of Athanaſius, but it is generally agreed on, that he was killed by the Univerſal conſent both of Chriſtians and Heathens, for the reaſons we have recited. The Emperour ſeemed at firſt exceedingly incenſed, threatning bitter things againſt the Murderers, but at length quallifying his paſſion, it ſuffized him to chide them by a Letter, * wherein he lays the fault upon all in general, for thoſe Cauſes before mentioned, theſe take from him the reputation of a Martyr, ſeeing it is the Cauſe, not the Puniſhment, that maketh ſuch, and deny him the Title of Saint. Upon which account we cannot have ſuch hard thoughts of Tradition, as to think him the ſame with St. George the Engliſh Patron.

* Apud Socr. l. 3. c. 3.

5. Athanaſius coming to his See, after the removal of George, was received with all joy imaginable. The Arians, baniſhed from the Congregation, held their Conventicles in private Houſes, and Elected Lucius to ſucceed in the Biſhoprick, which notwithſtanding, he went on in his way without impediment in the diſcharge of his Epiſcopal Function. In the mean time Lucifer Biſhop of Caralitanum in Sardinia, and Euſebius Biſhop of Vercellæ, a City, as Socrates tells us, of Ligurian Italians, being amongſt others recalled by the Emperours Edict, conſidering how they might recover their Biſhopricks with moſt quiet, and agreeably with the Canons, reſolved that the one ſhould go to Antioch, and the other to Alexandria, to procure a Council wherein thoſe matters might be debated. Lucifer ſending his Deacon to Alexandria, to ſignifie his aſſent to the Decrees of the Synod departed for Antioch, where he found the State of that Church much out of order, a great variance and diviſion being in the People, as well, as by reaſon of the Hæretical opinions of Euzoius, as alſo becauſe the Favourers of Meletius and the Orthodox were at odds, thoſe looking upon him as Ordained by Arians, though he held not their opinions. Lucifer Ordained Paulinus Biſhop of that See. Euſebius arriving at Alexandria, dealt earneſtly with Athanaſius about the ſummoning of a Council, to which many Confeſſors, who had lately dared to ſhew their heads, being ſummoned, they Condemned the ſeveral Doctrines of Arians, Apollinarians, and Macedonians. They affirmed the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, as being of one ſubſtance in the Bleſſed Trinity, and that the Son of God at his Incarnation, took not only Humane Fleſh, but a reaſonable Soul alſo, as the ancient Fathers had delivered.

Vide Socr. ut ſuprà. c. 6. &c.

A Council held at Alexandria.

6. The Fathers perceiving that there was ſome difference of terms betwixt the Greek and Latin Churches, in the word Eſſence, and Subſtance, and Hypoſtaſis, though they agreed in ſubſtance by reaſon of the ſeveral proprieties of Speech; by the perſwaſion of Athanaſius, ſubſcribing to the ſame thing in ſubſtance, were contented to lay aſide thoſe words which occaſioned the difference, and to uſe no other than thoſe found in the Scriptures, except in caſe of Errors, for a clearer diſcerning and judging of them. Taking into conſideration the Multiplicity of Creeds, they concluded to lay all aſide, except that of the Nicene Council, rejecting the Confeſſion made at Sardica, as well as the reſt; Athanaſius being alſo very ſenſible what imputations the Arians had laid upon his retirement in thoſe times of Perſecution, which they called deſerting of his place and truſt, he took this occaſion of clearing himſelf, and recited his Apology for his flight into the Wilderneſs. But there was an other thing which gave greater occaſion to this Meeting, and took up the greateſt debate, occaſioned by the late Arian Perſecutions. Several through infirmity had ſubſcribed, and acted againſt their Conſciences, the Terrors of Exile, and Tortures, having wreſted from them a Complyance, which notwithſtanding thoſe that had made reſiſtance and ſtood out, ſo cenſured them, that they held them unworthy of Communion, as alſo ſuch as had any charitable opinion of them. This proved ſuch a growing Evil, as ſtood in need of a ſpeedy Remedy, for which Cauſe many out of all parts, both Aſia and Italy, as well as Africk, had recourſe unto this Council. After much debate, wherein ſome would have debarred thoſe that had fallen from the Sacred Orders; it was reſolved, that ſuch as had relapſed through infirmity, or miſcarried through ignorance, ſhould upon repentance be received into Communion, and to their former Places. By this Decree, which was but conformable to what the Church had practiced in the like Caſes of Samoſatenus, the Novatians, and Donatiſts, the World was reſcued out of the Jaws of the Devil, ſaith St. Hierome.

Nazianz. Cucon. Ath.

Ruffin. 9.

7. The Reſolutions and Decrees of the Council, being diſperſed amongſt the Churches, did much good. But as God works good out of Evil, ſo the Devil will be ſure to work Evil out of Good, and turn that to poyſon, which was intended as a Remedy. Euſebius, after the Council was broken up, went to Antioch, where finding much difference about the Election of Paulinus, he endeavoured to Compoſe them to no purpoſe, and ſo got him home to his own Biſhoprick. From the State of affairs, he found reaſon to diſlike of the Ordination of Paulinus, which Lucifer underſtanding, took it as a diſparagement to his Judgment, and growing impatient, refuſed to Communicate with Euſebius. From this Indignation he aroſe to that height, as to quarrel with the determinations of the Synod, and made a Schiſm from the Church, wherein he died, giving Name to a Sect, which continuing to the time of Socrates, were from him called Luciferians. Euſebius, from Antioch paſſed through the Eaſtern Countrys, ſtrengthening ſuch as were weak in the Faith, and inſtructing them in the Doctrine of the Church, whence he travelled into Illyrium, and coming into Italy, in like ſort he dilligently preached the word of God. Athanaſius in like manner ſo managed his buſineſs at Alexandria, that the Church proceeded in a very flouriſhing Condition, till the Arians envying him this Fælicity, joyned with the common Enemy, and moved Julian againſt him, who by this time had ſo far ſettled his buſineſs, and carried on his Deſign, as to be almoſt ripe for Blood and Slaughters. We muſt a little obſerve his Methods, and trace his Steps; for his Pollicies in his own judgment were very refined, and ſuch as noted his Prædeceſſors of indiſcretion.

Socr. c. 9.

The Sect of the Luciferians.

8. His

Julian's policies and practices againſt the Chriſtians.

8. His firſt Principle was, that Chriſtians were not to be compelled to his Religion, concluding with himſelf, that ſhould he proceed to Death and Tortures, they would, as he had obſerved of former Perſecutions, and as he himſelf was wont to Phraſe it, flye as faſt, and as thick to Martyrdom, as Bees to a Hive; and thereby gain both greater Reputation and Acceſſion to Chriſtianity. He thought that thoſe whom death could not fright, yet Diſgrace and lingring Penury might drive to Idolatry. Therefore he barred to them all acceſs of Honours and Employments, and when he was about to march towards Perſia, took from all ſuch Souldiers the Military Girdle, as refuſed to Sacrifice to the Pagan Deities. He thought Scoffing and Deriſion Engines able to batter that Faith, which the Sword could not reach, and accordingly made it his buſineſs to flout at, and jear both the Chriſtian Name and Profeſſion, giving Chriſt himſelf no other Title than that of Galilæan, calling the Worſhippers of him Galileans, and this he did not only in his ordinary talk, but in his Epiſtles and Reſcripts, and at length commanded by a Law, that no otherwiſe they ſhould be called. He thought that if once he could deprive them of their Teachers, their Zeal, which thoſe continually kept warm, would at length inſenſibly cool, and come to nothing. This made him take away ſuch Stipends, Lands, and publick Sallaries, as formerly had been granted by Conſtantine and his Sons, to the publick Miniſtry. And that as well Prieſts as People, might, through ignorance, have their Spirits abaſed, and their Wits without edge; whereby they might be expoſed as well to the Contempt, as inſinuations of their Enemies, he forbad they ſhould be inſtructed in any of the liberal Arts and Sciences.

9. The Glorious advantages of Chriſtian Religion, being (as an Apoſtate) known unto him, he endeavoured to transfer upon his Pagan impiety. Being Conſcious to himſelf of the Virtues of Chriſtians, and how much they adorned their holy Profeſſion, he preſſed, upon all ſects of Philoſophers, whom as the Champions of his Cauſe, he much cheriſhed, the advantages of a good Life, which was to be anſwerable to their Pretences. To this purpoſe he appointed, that ſome ſhould be ſet apart to inſtruct the People throughout the Towns and Villages, and in a familiar way, to reduce the ſpeculative part of Philoſophy into Præcepts. The Poor he alſo took care for, that ſuch as could not work might be relieved, and the Sick not periſh for want of things neceſſary to their recovery. Reputing thoſe means moſt effectual, and as deep and prævalent Myſteries for accompliſhing that, in a Calm and Serene manner, which all the fury of ſo many Ages could not compaſs, he added ſome little Arts and Tricks to cheat the Chriſtians, and trappan them into Idolatry. Having removed the Croſs, which Conſtantine had added to the Labarum or Standard of the Empire, and reduced it to the ancient Pagan Model, he alſo added to the Images of himſelf, ſome Pictures of his Gods, as Mars, Mercury, and Serapis, that in the Ceremonies paid to his own Majeſty the reverence of thoſe Idols might be included. Such Victuals as were ſold in the Market, he would cauſe to be polluted by things offered to his Idols, and Springs to be ſprinkled with their Holy Water.

10. By theſe Courſes præſuming he could undermine Chriſtianity, he Vigorouſly proſecuted the reinforcement of decayed Paganiſm. This was both by his own example, by opening the Doors of Præferment to Pagans, and them alone, and alſo by taking from Chriſtian Diſcipline ſuch Patterns of prudential Orders, Rites, and Cuſtoms, as he thought might be productive of Peace, Security and Eſtabliſhment. To this purpoſe, he intended to erect publick Schools in each City; in the Temples he would have obſerved ſuch manners of Worſhip, ſuch Seats and Benches as the Chriſtians uſed, placed one above another; reading and explanation of prophane Authors, both in the Theoretick and Practick part, with Alternate Prayers, and Hymns, Animadverſions upon Offenders, with penitence and ſatisfaction injoyned. He purpoſed to build Hoſpitals, as alſo Monaſtaries both for Men and Women, exhorting the Pontifices to ſet about it at the publick and private charge, as Nicephorus writes, and approving much the way of Letters-Commendatory for diſtreſſed Perſons, he took this courſe of tranſmitting them from one Place and Country into another. Then did he ſpur thoſe on, who were ready enough to run of themſelves, to the reſtitution of Temples, Sacrifices, and other rites of the Gentiles, and herein when many Chriſtians, who had been inſtruments in demoliſhing thoſe Buildings, which the Laws had ordered to be pulled down, were miſerably abuſed, and Murdered; he not only connived at thoſe things, but incouraged them in ſuch Outrages. Many alſo, whom their Zeal ſo far tranſported, as to revile him for his Apoſtacy, and oppoſe his Actions, he commanded to be put to death, and applauded moſt horrid Murders and Maſſacres upon this account committed throughout the Empire. Such as refuſed to Sacrifice, and threw away the Military Girdles, though upon other Pretences, he would find ſome opportunity or other to diſgrace, and even put to death, if he perceived they were of Intereſt to oppoſe his Deſigns, and if he could ſpare them in his Wars. At length when he had ſo far brought about his deſign, as to be ſomething ſecure of his Cauſe, the Chriſtians continuing ſtedfaſt to their old Principle, of ſuffering rather than Rebelling, though they oppoſed his Proceedings now and then, as to particular places and things, and ceaſed not to tell him his own plainly; he purpoſed to make away the moſt eminent Biſhops, ſuch as were Fathers of the Church, and Props of the Chriſtian Religion. For this purpoſe, though at the firſt he pretended to be a Lover of Union and Peace, now he began to cheriſh their Differences, and uſe them againſt one another. And had he returned from the Perſian War with good ſucceſs, it was his Reſolution for that Victory, to have offered an Holocauſt of Galilæans to his Gods, and have tied Chriſtianity to his Triumphal Chariot.

UMI

11. The effects of all theſe Arts and Myſteries, was a change of the Scene for ſo ſhort a time as he play'd his Tragedy, whereby one might behold nothing but Sacrifices and Incenſe upon the Stage, which was changed into a Temple, the Diadem transformed into a Miter, and the Scepter into a Sooth-ſayers Rod; Dumb Devils in ſeveral ſhapes running too and fro, but in great Anxiety, as afraid of thoſe, who were now conſtrained to act the Parts of Fools, and forced to put on the Vizards of Idiots, that they might afford matter of Triumph, and Inſultation. The Prieſt wearing a great Beard, and a Stole, whereon were wrought Images of Bulls-heads, taking great pains to reſtore decay'd Altars, then cringing, and conjuring his obliged Deities to grace him with a verbal Incouragement, that he might know they were ſtill in being, and aſſert their right againſt the late Intruſion of thoſe miſerable Sacrilegious Wretches, whom (the Gods approving, and proſpering their own Cauſe, and Reſtitution to their antient right, againſt which no Præſcription could be pleaded,) he doubted not by moſt likely means, and due methods, to remove quite out of the way, being, as he well underſtood, a great eye-ſore to Apollo, for whom he had furniſhed and prepared his Antient and Royal Pallace. Apollo knowing his Reign was at an end, and a period ſet to his Uſurpation, would fain have put him off, as unwilling to ſhow his weakneſs; and having been Dumb for ſo many years, it was grown even a trouble to him to ſpeak; but unwilling he ſhould know the true cauſe, and thereby diſcover his weakneſs, as well as Treaſon, he gave him ſuch an anſwer, as ſhewed his Antipathy to the Servants, and Loyal Subjects of his Lord and Maſter, whereby he might ſtir him up to Perſecute them, and carry on his own work, which he was glad to ſee done, though more ſorry to think it would be but for a moment. For the Prieſt hereat inraged, and many Scuffles enſuing betwixt him, his Servants, and thoſe whom he termed Varlets, and Sacrilegious, when his Choler was up, and he had reſolved to renew the ancient Devices of his Prædeceſſors againſt them, by adding Violence to his former Stratagems. The Lord and Maſter both of Apollo, of him, and all his, did but becken to an Enemy of the Prieſt, whom he had reſerved behind the Curtain, and he breaks into the Houſe of the Prieſt, upon which news he retires, lays aſide his Miter, and reſumes his Diadem. After a little expectation, word was brought that the ſport was at an end, for the Prieſt was ſlain; whereupon Apollo gave up all for loſt, yet reſolved to play at ſmall Games rather than ſit out, and promote the differences he knew full well to be amongſt his Enemies, which proſperity he thought would not at all leſſen. And ſo the Act abruptly ended.

12. Such, if the Gravity of Hiſtory permit us to uſe thoſe Terms and Reſemblances, was the Tragedy to which Julian fitted all his Præparations. The Religion countenanced, and therefore Rampant was the Pagan Impiety Authority and Laws, trampling upon Chriſtianity, and expoſing it to the deriſion of its profeſſed Enemy. The Emperour, though taking care for Reſtitution of all Idol-Temples, yet was eſpecially concerned for the Temple of Apollo at Daphne, which he knew his Brother, his Uncle, and Couſins had moſt deſpighted, becauſe of the Oracle, which, although ſince the coming of Chriſt, the Devil had been dumb for the moſt part, as appears from many Teſtimonies, and eſpecially from that Book of Plutarch, which would fain reſolve the queſtion why Oracles were ceaſed, yet it ſeems did ſometimes, for the Incouragement of Pagans, give them anſwers. For thoſe Christian Writers which make mention of thoſe Paſſages, tell us, how the Body of Babylas, being removed into the Grave, though it drove him not quite away, yet put the Devil to ſilence, and that ſeveral reaſons were given thereof, amongſt which this obtained moſt credit, that it was becauſe no Sacrifices were offered. Julian being now at Antioch, made an experiment, offering Sacrifices in abundance, but Apollo ſtill continued dumb, at which the Emperour much diſquieted, when he provoked him to anſwer, at length had this return, That the Grove was defiled with dead Bodies. There needed no Expoſition upon this Oracle, Julian knowing that the Body of Babylas was hereby meant, which he commanded to be removed. Yet he did not offer any Indignity to the Reliques of that Holy Martyr, which the Citizens of Antioch, with great Solemnity, carried back into the City, ſinging Pſalms in the way, and this Verſe amongſt others, Confounded be all they that worſhip carved Images, and that delight in vain Gods; whereupon many were laid in hold, and ſome were tortured.

He is much concerned for the Temple of Apollo at Daphne.

Lege Chryſoſt. Orat. cont. Gentes.

Pſal. 97.7.

13. Sozomen here relates a remarkable Paſſage of one Theodorus a young Man, whom being ſet upon the Rack, amidſt his Torments an Angel comforted, allaying his pains, wiping off the Sweat, and refreſhing his Limbs with cool Water. He thus ſtrengthened and aſſiſted, ſung the ſaid Verſe with greater Alacrity, which invincible Reſolution being made known to the Emperour, he conſidered, that if he proceeded in his courſe, he ſhould looſe, and the Chriſtians gain Reputation, and gave order they ſhould all be diſcharged. The reaſon why he was the more ready to diſmiſs them, as alſo to ſuffer the Body of Babylas to be removed with ſuch Honour, might very well be the experience he had had of the Divine Vengeance upon ſome of his own Relations, as Julianus his Uncle, Præfect of the Eaſt, and Fælix, Præfect of his Exchequer, whom being formerly Chriſtians, he had by his example drawn into the Fellowſhip of Apoſtacy. Theſe two being ſent by him to the Dominicum Aureum, as it was called, that ſumptuous Church built at Antioch by Conſtantine, to fetch thence the Treaſure; Julianus firſt cauſed Theodoritus a Prieſt that kept it, when he refuſed to diſcover it, to be tortured, and when that would not do, to be Beheaded, piſſed againſt the Holy Table, gave Euzoius a box on the Ear, who would have hindred him, and ſate him down upon the Holy Veſſels, whereof Fælix viewing their Magnificence, ſaid, Look with what ſumptuous Veſſels is the Son of Mary ſerved! But Vengeance preſently ſeized on them both, Julianus his Members and Bowels putrifying in ſuch a ſort, that he could thence void any Excrements, which he vomited through his Blaſphemous Mouth, till he miſerably periſhed. Fælix ſuddenly died by Bleeding at the Mouth. And other Apoſtates by ſudden death began to receive the reward of their Impieties.

L.5.c18,19.& vide Theodoret. l.2 c.1, 12. Socr. l.3. c.19. Ruffino.

The remarkable death of ſeveral Apoſtates.

14. But when Julian had purged the Grave and Temple of Daphne from all Impurities, as he and his God accounted them, by removal of Babylas his Body, whether at the Interceſſion of the Martyr's Soul, as ſome conceive, or otherwiſe, the Temple was better purified by Fire, which the Chriſtians of thoſe times affirmed was ſent from Heaven, and conſumed the Roof and the Idol to Aſhes. Julian, though by Tortures he could not get any more out of the Prieſt, than that it was conſumed by that means, yet took this occaſion to ſlander the Chriſtians, Ammianus alſo, amongſt other opinions (which we have formerly mentioned) delivering this as one, that it was fired by their procurement, yet did certain Country-men affirm, that they ſaw a Thunder-bolt fall from the Air upon the Temple. However the Burning of it was much bewailed by all the Pagans, and Libanius a Sophiſt of Antioch compoſed ſome mourning and ridiculous Ditties. Julian more concerned than any, to divert the Joy of thoſe he thought would triumph over the Ruines, bent his Wits how to plague the Antiochians, by defiling their Fountains, and mixing things ſacrificed with their Victuals, which he practiced at Conſtantinople with more ſucceſs, for there the Citizens abſtained from them, but the Inhabitants of Antioch followed the Apoſtles Rule, asking no Queſtions for Conſcience ſake, which the more nettled the Emperour. Certain it is from all Hands, that Julian both ill treated, and was ill treated by the Antiochians. He wrote a twitting Libel againſt them, called Miſopogon and Antiochica, becauſe the Chriſtians of Antioch jeared him for his Beard, to which they made as ſawcy returns, being a little (which we cannot but take notice of) removed from that dutiful demeanour of the ancient Profeſſors even to their Pagan and Perſecuting Princes. Such force hath Proſperity over the Tempers and Conſtitutions of the very beſt.

The Temple of Apollo burnt.

The Antiochians Libel Julian.

15. He laid to their charge in that Libel, that they were wont to curſe him, and wiſh for another Conſtantine to chaſtize his Impiety, that they frequented the Tombs of Martyrs to pray to God to deliver them from his Tyranny, and followed him with noiſe and clamours when he went to the Temples. They upbraided him with his Religion, ſaying that X. and K. never hurt the City in the leaſt, by which two Letters they meant Chriſt and Conſtantine, thoſe being the firſt Letters of their Names. This oppoſiton he met with in Chriſtians did but whet his Courage, and inflame his Paſſion to a greater degree of Malice. Underſtanding that there were ſome Churches built at Miletus near the Temple of Apollo Didymæus, he wrote to the Præſident of Caria, to ſee them burnt, and levelled with the Ground. Artemius an old Soldier of Conſtantine, being ſent for from his Government of Ægypt, and finding the Emperour in Examination of ſome Prieſts of Antioch, for upbraiding him with his Apoſtacy and Impiety, was after various Tortures put to death. He incouraged the Pagans in their revenge, who to the Chriſtians making oppoſition, returned Wounds, Tortures, and Death it ſelf, in all places. At Aſcalon and Gaza the Prieſts and Virgins they horribly abuſed, ripping up their Bellies, which ſtuffing with Barley, they then caſt them quick and breathing to the Hogs. At Heliopolis a Town of Phœnicia, they pulled in pieces Cyril a Deacon, and refrained not from eating his Liver. They were ſo highly incenſed againſt him, becauſe in the Reign of Conſtantine he had deſtroyed their Images, but Vengeance overtook them, the Teeth and Tongues of thoſe who did the Fact rotting away, and the Eyes of ſuch as beheld the Spectacle; Mark the Biſhop of Arothuſa, being for the ſame cauſe ſought after to be put to Death, firſt removed out of the way, but underſtanding that ſome of his Friends were apprehended for him, returned. He had formerly in the Reign of Conſtantius, deſtroyed a ſtately Temple in that place, and now condemned to re-edifie it by Julian, refuſed. Unſpeakable were the Torments he underwent, being at laſt beſmeared all over with Honey, and hung up to the Waſps, for which Julian was noted of Ingratitude, who was ſaved from Deſtruction by the care of this Biſhop, when he and all his were ſought for to be deſtroyed, ſome ſay he at laſt eſcaped, and both by his Example and Inſtruction, converted his Tormentors. Amachius Governour of a City in Phrygia, as a Puniſhment for breaking their Idols, after long and various Tortures, was roaſted with a ſmall Fire. Such was the carriage of the Vulgar, backed by the encouragement of the Prince.

Τὸ χ οὐδὲν ἠδίκησε τὴν πόλιν οὐδὲ τὸ Κ. Soz. l. 5. *c.*19. *Theod. l.*3.*c.*17. alii.

His Cruelties.

16. When the Chriſtians complained of thoſe Outragious Dealings, his Impious anſwer was, that Afflictions rendred them more fit for the Kingdom of Heaven, as alſo to ſuch as Petitioned him for their Goods which his Officers had ſeized on, under pretence of their having converted the Materials of the demoliſhed Temples to their own uſes; for he executed upon them the old Laws made againſt Sacrilege. Rendring them uncapable of Offices when he was undertaking his Expedition againſt the Perſians, the better to furniſh himſelf with Money, he ſet Fines upon all ſuch as ſhould refuſe to Sacrifice, which Tax was very grievous, as Socrates writes, and duly demanded of Chriſtians, not only where the Emperour travelled, but alſo in ſuch Countries as he came not near. Then did the Gentiles, ſaith he, inſult over the Chriſtians; the Philoſophers celebrated their frequented Conferences, they ſolemnized certain deteſtable Rites and Ceremonies: they made ſlaughter of Infants, ſparing no Sex, they uſed their Entrails for Sooth-ſaying, and taſted of their tender Fleſh, which horrible Practices were both at Athens, Alexandria, and other places. Julian, in the mean time ſcoffed at Chriſtians for their belief, ſaying, all their Wiſdom lay in the Verb Crede, and as the Heathens of old, ſo he now derided them for worſhipping Croſſes. But he thought he had ſtill a notable device, which he kept ſecret till times were ripe for its accompliſhment. Knowing what bitter Enemies the Jews were to Chriſtians, which they had lately ſhewn alſo in his time, by burning many of their Churches, that by owning and preferring their Worſhip, he might depreſs Chriſtianity, render invalid our Saviour's Prædictions, and advance the Trade of Sacrificing, to which he himſelf was ſo much addicted, he reſolved to re-edifie the Temple at Jeruſalem, which had lain waſte and demoliſhed ever ſince the days of Veſpaſian. By his commandment the Coſt and Charges were awarded out of the publick Treaſury, and all Neceſſaries provided to the Work, which the Jews to think of, were raviſhed with Joy, and got them, for the Honour thereof, Silver Inſtruments.

He lays heavy Taxes upon Chriſtians.

His Fruitleſs attempt to re-build the Temple at Jeruſalem.

17. At the ſame time Cyril Biſhop of the Church, who was lately returned from Baniſhment, exerciſed his Faith in reference to the prædiction of Daniel the Prophet, confirmed by our Saviour, concerning the deſolation of the place, which the event failed not. For, as they were about their work, an Earthquake happened, and great Balls of Fire iſſued out of the Earth, which drove away, confounded, or deſtroyed the Workmen and Overſeers, tore up the old Foundations of the Temple, from the very bottom, and is further ſaid to have broken and melted the Tools of the Artificers. Hereby though the Jews were conſtrained to deſiſt, and confeſs the Power of Jeſus Chriſt, yet would they not forſake their Judaiſm; and notwithſtanding the thing was ſo notorious, that it was acknowledged by the Pagans, and confeſſed by their Hiſtorians, of whom Ammianus hath related the matters with ſome Particulars, yet had it not that effect, as to work any great alteration in behalf of the Chriſtians. Many Perſons indeed coming from far to behold the Spectacle, went away both convinced, and converted; but as it happeneth to ſuch as ſin with an high hand againſt knowledge, Julian became the more inraged and reſolute. Perceiving that the Temple could not be re-edified, he cauſed the Materials to be gathered together, and therewith commanded a Theatre to be built, wherein after his return from Perſia, he purpoſed to expoſe the Chriſtians of that Country to Wild Beaſts, as * Oroſius tells us.

* L. 7. c. 30.

He forbids the burying of the dead by day-light.

C. Th. l. 9. tit. 19. l. 5.

18. But his own fate preſſed him hard on to the Perſian Expedition, which before he Proſecuted, he publiſhed as was congruous, a Reſcript to the People, bearing date on the Twleſth of February, from Antioch, againſt the Violation of Sepulchres, and alſo carrying out dead Bodies to be Enterred by day-light. Hereby he ſeemeth to ſtrike at Chriſtians, who, by their too forward Zeal againſt all manner of Paganiſh Superſtition, defacing what Inſcriptions were made to the Dii Manes, were injurous to the memory of the Dead, and drew out a Reſcript of this nature, formerly from Conſtantius. The Burial of the dead in the day-time he condemns as ſtrikeing the Eyes with an unlucky Proſpect, and making the lookers on unfit for the Service of the Gods, whereas privacy was fitter for Mourning, and it being a thing indifferent to the Dead, to be buried by Night or by Day, and to ſhun Oſtentation, he thought it fit the Eyes of the People ſhould be delivered from ſuch Objects. Hereby he alſo ſeemeth to reprehend no others but the Chriſtians, who were wont to accompany their dead Friends to the Grave in great Companies, with ſinging of Pſalms, and that in the day time, concluding this laſt Office with Prayers and Praiſes to Almighty God. In latter times came in many Ceremonies; to the uſe of Incenſe, of which (a) Tertullian ſpeaks, afterwards were Lights added, in which and the Clergy (b) Stapleton aſſerts Seemlineſs, Solemnity and Sanctity to conſiſt. (c) Rebuffius affirms it to be contrary to good manners, to deſire to be buried without Ringing of Bells, for it would ſavour of Singularity. Yet Budæus a Man both very Learned and of good Repute for Morals, would be buried without any Ceremonies, as Slerdan writes, with Turnebus and others.

Quis enim dies eſt bene auſpicatus à funere, aut quomodo ad deos & templa venietur?

Ideoq; quoniam & dolor in exequiis ſecretum amat, & diem functis nil intereſſe, utrum per noctes, an per dies efferantur, liberari convenit populi totius aſpectus, ut dolor eſſe in funeribus, non Pompa exequiarum nec oſtentatio deatur.

(a) Apologet. c. 42. (b) In expoſit. Evang. Lucæ. 7. Dominica 15. poſt Penticoſt. (c) l. 202. de verb ſignif. Petr. Paris Conſil. 91. vol. 4. de orig. Campanarum & uſu vide Hoſpin. de origin. temp. c. 14. l. 2. de ſepeliendi rit. vid. Bettranchami Ep. famil. l. 2. Ep. 2. Alciat. in l. 2. c. de SS. Eccleſiis.

Burying in Churches when introduced.

19. Of old time Sepulchres were out of the Cities to the Jews and Romans. So Cicero deſcribes the Tomb of Archimedes, and Pauſanias in his perambulation of Greece, mentions many without, but none within the City. Therefore it was an extraordinary favour granted to Poplicola and his Family, mentioned by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, to Cæſar, as writes (a) Dio, and Adrian to be buried in the Forum; anciently none were buried in Churches, as appears both by the (b) Imperial and Canon Laws; at length they came to bury in Church Porches (ſo was Auguſtine the firſt Biſhop of Canterbury buried) and ſo they got at laſt into Churches * (whereof yet that part called the Baptiſterium, where the Font ſtood, was excepted) and Chancels; a Cuſtom that ſome think neither decent nor wholſome, in Populous places eſpecially, ſo that though ſuch as offended herein by former Laws, were to be puniſhed arbitrarily, yet Cuſtom prevailed ſo much to the contrary, that they became rather antiquated than repealed, which Cuſtom the (c) Canon Law ſo far gives way to, as to ſuffer a faithful Lay-Perſon to be buried in the Church. Anciently the Cæmiteries or burying-places, were (d) out of the Towns, both for cleanlineſs and health, as that Chriſtians might be put in mind that the dead are gone out of this World, have left thoſe Cities, and are made Citizens in Heaven. But as Superſtition and Covetouſ-

(a) Lib. 44. p. 243.

(b) c. de. SS. Eccleſ l. 2. c. ul. c. th. 17. Concil. Braccar. 36. 13. q. 2.

(c) nullus & gloſſa Carolus M. in th. libr. 1. c. 15 9. Non licet in Baptiſterio Corpora Sepelire. Conc. Antiſſodor. can. 14.

D. c. nullus.

(d) Theod. l. 2. c. 14. vola t. l. 22.

Covetouſneſs increaſed about the time of Gregory the Great, they began both for convenience of Ceremonies, and for Gain and Advantage, to bury in the Cities: Although the Canon Law forbids any thing to be Exacted for the Ground, yet is it the obſervation of Hoſpinian ſo true (viz. that never was there found out a more profitable device, than the ſale of Graves) that in ſome Reformed Churches this Cuſtom is become both burthenſome and ſcandalous; as in ſome Cities of * Saxony ſcarcely can a Grave be purchaſed for One hundred Joachims, and in other places which I need not mention, it ſhall coſt a Man nigh as much to bury his Son, as in Ægyt of old time (if Herodotus tell true,) his whole Education would have amounted to, but to our purpoſe.

De ſepult. c. penult.

L. 3. c. 1. de orig. templ.

* Eberharti a weihe Meditam pro federib l. 2. p. 47. &c.

20. Julian e're he ſet forward for Perſia, ſent to Delphos, Delus, and Dodona, to enquire of the Oracles concerning his ſucceſs, as Cræſus of old had done, and had ſuitable anſwers, if not ſo ambiguous, yet as deceitful. Maximus the Philoſopher; whom he prized above all Men, and as an Oracle, little leſs Infallible than the other, promiſed him the ſame, if not greater Matters, of which he was ſo confident, as ſtudying only to be grateful, he vowed at his return to offer up the Chriſtians as Sacrifices to his Gods, to deſtroy and root out the whole Party, and place the Images of Venus in their Churches. Thinking verily, that according to the Pythagorial Metamſychoſis, Alexander's Soul was paſſed into his Body, he rejected all Auxiliary ſupplies offered from other Princes, only to Arſaces King of Armenia, becauſe a Chriſtian, he wrote Letters (deſcribed by Sozomen) full of contempt of Conſtantius his Prædeceſſor, reproach of Arſaces, and Blaſphemy againſt Chriſt, threatning, that in caſe he failed to attend him with his Forces, the God whom he worſhipped, ſhould not be able to defend him. In his expedition he ſate up late writing Commentaries in imitation of Julius Cæſar, and as St. Hierome tells us, now he Compoſed ſeven Books againſt Chriſtian Religion, which were abundantly anſwered by Cyril of Alexandria. Being affrighted with ſome Prodigies, he is ſaid to have cut up a Woman to conſult her Entrails about his ſucceſs, and to have had a familiar Devil, which upon occaſion, ſent by him into the Weſt to bring him intelligence, coming to the place where a certain Monk called Publius inhabited, was ſtopped there, not able to proceed any farther. His Gods indeed, if ſo far they were permitted, did not ceaſe, by ill Omens, to lay his danger before him, but nothing could deterr him from proſecuting the means of his wretched end, which ſome Heathens aſcribed to the Chriſtians, ſome Chriſtians to an Angel, and others to the Enemy, but generally they agree in the incertainty of the Executioner, of that Divine Vengeance which took him away. So let thine Enemies periſh O Lord!

He conſults the Oracles about the ſucceſs of his Perſian expedition.

Theod. l. 3. c. 18. Nazianz. contra Julian orat. 2. Chryſoſt. adverſus Gentes.

Cedremus.

Julians death.

21. Theodoret writes, that having received the Wound, he filled his hand with Blood, and caſting it up into the Air, cryed out viciſti Galileæ. Nicophorus, that his words were Saturate Nazarene. It is reported alſo, that he complained much of his Gods, probably of Mars, which Ammianus confeſſeth; but he was ſo deſirous to be reckoned into the Number, and enjoy that eſteem amongſt the Vulgar, which Libanius gave him in his Oration, of being reckoned amongſt their Divinities, that the report goes, he would have caſt himſelf into ſome River, and ſo on a ſudden diſappearing, as Æneas of old, Romulus, and others; a report might have been plauſibly ſpread by his Followers, that he was taken up into Heaven, but the deſign was diſcovered, and daſhed by one of his Eunuchs. His Body brought back, was received every where with Scoffs and Deriſion. The Philoſophers and Magicians, his boſom Friends and Councillors, were no better treated, and the Victory of the Croſs, or Chriſt Crucified, was all over owned and magnified. His Character is variouſly taken, according to the affection and Party of the Deſigners, of which elſewhere we have ſaid enough, but much more in this Eccleſiaſtical account, the length thereof may be excuſed by the Importance of the Subject. Only at parting we may take a view of him, as he is deſcribed to us by Solomon, very aptly both as Baronius, and others judge, which will ſeem an exact Epitome of what has been at large diſcourſed. A naughty Perſon (ſaith our Tranſlation, but Homo Apoſtata, an Apoſtate Baronius reads it) a wicked Man walketh with a froward Mouth, he winketh with his Eyes, he ſpeaketh with his Feet, he teacheth with his Fingers; frowardneſs is in his Heart, he deviſeth miſchief continually, he ſoweth diſcord; therefore ſhall his Calamity come ſuddenly, ſuddenly ſhall he be broak without remedy.

See this book ch. 2. out of Ammian. &c.

Prov. 6. 12. &c.

His Character.

Homo Apoſtata, vir inutilis, graditur ore per verſo, annuit oculis, terit pede, digito loquitur, pravo corde machinatur malum, & omni tempore Jurgia ſeminat, huic extemplo veniet perditio ſua, & ſubito conteretur nec habebit ultra ultra medicinam.

22. Into

Jovian ſucceeds.

22. Into the Throne of Julian was Elected Jovian, by univerſal conſent, ſay Chriſtian writers, though Ammianus, who is very partial in behalf of Julian, makes his Election difficult, and attributes thoſe difficulties and hard conditions, with which he was conſtrained to purchaſe Peace, to his weakneſs, whereas all indifferent Perſons muſt neceſſarily aſcribe them to the temerity of his Prædeceſſor. Being a Tribune, when Julian caſhiered all Chriſtians, he willingly quitted the Military Girdle; but for his Abilities he took him into Service again, and when he was now Elected, he refuſed the Purple, crying out he was a Chriſtian, and would not command a Pagan Army, at which the Souldiers cryed out that they alſo were Chriſtians. According to this beginning he proceeded ſo far as his ſmall time would permit, revoking what ever had been done by Julian, againſt Chriſtian Religion, reſtoring all the Profeſſors thereof to their ancient Priviledges, and opening all ways for the baniſhed Biſhops to return to their own Sees. Amongſt thoſe moſt eminent, was great Athanaſius, againſt whom, as we formerly ſaid, the Arians and Pagans Conſpired, and moved Julian againſt him. Julian therefore lets him know, that being baniſhed, he had not only returned to Alexandria which was lawful, but had poſſeſſed himſelf of his Church and Government without his Warrant, which he ought not to have done; but this was not the matter, there was another thing which galled the Emperour, and that was the Converſion of ſeveral Families, and amongſt the reſt ſome Pagan Prieſts to Chriſtianity. Julian therefore is reſolved to rid the World of him, which though at firſt it did not appear, yet Athanaſius expecting the worſt, and no good from Apologies, reſolved to quit Alexandria, and that in an open way, that his Friends might not fare worſe for being thought to conceal him. The Conjurers and Magicians rejoyced exceedingly at his departure, confeſſing their Arts failed them when he was reſident; but the good Chriſtians lamented the departure of their Paſtor, to whom he anſwered, be of good Courage my Brethren, it is but a ſmall Cloud that will quickly paſs over, and ſo he took Boat for the Wilderneſs.

Soc l.3 c.14. Theod. l. 4. c. 9. Sozom l. 5.c. 15.

23. He had not been long upon the Water, when the Governour underſtanding he was gone, took Boat with an Executioner to follow, and diſpatch him, being afraid to put him to death in Alexandria, the place where he was ſo exceedingly beloved. Of this he had timely notice from his Friends, upon which Meſſage, thoſe in the Boat deſired him to Land, and make his eſcape into the Wilderneſs; but he took a contrary courſe, reſolving to turn back again, and thereby deceive him, from whom he could hardly fly; which being done, they preſently met the Purſuers, who little ſuſpecting who was there, demanded only if they ſaw Athanaſius, they anſwered they ſaw him a little above upon the River, whereupon the Governour purſued with all the Sails and Oars he could make, and Athanaſius eſcaped thither, where he hid himſelf, and lay ſecure all the while the ſhort ſtorm continued. The Alexandrians afterward laboured to mediate in his behalf to Julian, who being reſolved upon other courſes now, beſides thoſe of meer Policy, returned nothing but Rebukes and Blaſphemies to all Complaints, anſwering, that their Religion teacheth them to ſuffer patiently. But he being gone to his own place, the Cloud paſſed over, and the Skies clear, Athanaſius returned the third time out of Baniſhment, being met with acclamations and other expreſſions of infinite joy by the Multitude.

Athanaſius returns out of baniſhment.

24. Now all flock to adore the newly riſen Sun, and, as the Cuſtom is, all Sects and Factions labour to ingratiate themſelves, and if they cannot make him wholly their own, yet render him favourable to their Party. The Arians ſtickled hard, but the Semiarians or Macedonians got before them, meeting the Emperour in his return from Perſia, to whom, when they complained of the Acacians, or rigid ſort of Arians, the Emperour rejected them, ſaying, he was for Peace, and an Enemy to Contention. Acacius himſelf perceiving how Matters ſtood, and that the Empire was devolved upon a Perſon who encouraged Athanaſius, and had ſent to him to draw up a Creed or Form of Faith, which he aſſembling his Suffragan Biſhops, did as he was enjoyned, according to the Nicene Rule, was reſolved not to make tryal of that condition to which he had been the Author of bringing many Orthodox Biſhops. Fearing Baniſhment or the diſpleaſure of the Prince, who yet declared he would force none, he brought ſeveral of his Followers to Antioch, where joyning with Meletius, they held a Council, and therein, as ſaith Socrates, acknowledged the Faith of one Subſtance, and ratified the Nicene Creed; yet, as appeareth from St. Hierome, rejected the word Homouſios, or of the ſame Subſtance with the Father, as alſo Anomæos, or of a diverſe Subſtance, and choſe the word Homoiouſios, as a mean betwixt both, as aſſerting the Son neither of the ſame, nor of diverſe, but of like Subſtance with the Father, and ſo herein cloſing with the Semiarians. Their Faith they ſent in a Supplicatory Letter to the Emperour, whoſe anſwer was, that he was for Peace, and ſhould countenance and eſteem ſuch as were of that Principle and Opinion, for which Themiſtius the Philoſopher, in the Oration intituled Conſul, and made in his Commendation, extolled him to the Skies, becauſe that in granting every Man his Liberty, he ſtopped the Mouths, as he ſaid, of Paraſites and Sycophants, which kind of Men (ſuch as was Acacius) worſhip not the King of Heaven, but the Earthly Crown and Scepter, much like to Euripus, ſometimes carried this way, and ſometimes that.

25. But Euzoius Biſhop of Antioch (of his own Faction,) and other Arians, little obſerved thoſe Rules, who remembring their old Trade, endeavoured to bring Athanaſius into an evil opinion of the Emperour, laying to his charge heavy Crimes, which the Emperour little regarded, yet either ſent for by him, or of his own accord, (both which are written) he came to Court and fully ſatisfied him. Though the Emperour was for Peace and Liberty amongſt Chriſtians, yet made he a diſtinction betwixt them and Pagans, commanding the Idol Groves and Temples to be ſhut up, whereat the Ethnicks wandered abroad and hid themſelves, and ſuch as wore the Pallium or Philoſophical Habit laid it aſide, and put on the uſual and common Attire; the Bloody and deteſtable Sacrifices, wherein they had taken their fill, during the Reign of Julian, were alſo taken away. And yet though he was very cordial for Chriſtianity, and abhorred the Religion of Pagans, yet did he favour Maximus and Priſcus the Philoſophers, who had been of Council with Julian, and were the great Enemies of his Faith, for which, as alſo for his intention to adorn Julian's Sepulchre at Tarſus, ſome who pry into the Secrets of God Almighty, think him taken away ſo ſhortly after by ſudden death. However thoſe Hiſtorians that write of theſe times condole his caſe, and it is their judgment, that as well the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of the Church, as the Politick State of the Empire, would have much flouriſhed, had it ſo pleaſed the great Diſpoſer of all things, under his Government.

Jovian dies.

Vide ſupra & Socr. l. 3. c. ult.

26. Valentinian and Valens who ſucceeded him, were his Fellow Confeſſors, having both caſt off the Military Girdle, and refuſed to Sacrifice to Idols. They proſecuted the Magicians, eſpecially Maximus they handled roughly, who had not been only the cauſe of much miſchief in general to Chriſtianity, but had created trouble and danger to Valentinian. At their firſt beginning alſo they made a Law againſt Idolaters, forbidding the Celebration of their Myſteries by night. But it ſeems their Zeal was too quick, the times would not bear it, ſuch an alteration in mens minds had the courſes of Julian effected. Therefore by the violent importunity of Prætextatus a Pro-Conſul, and a vehement defender of Paganiſm, they rather diſpenſed with, than abrogated it, as Zozimus writes. For the Pagans might take it the worſe, becauſe Valentinian in the beginning of his Reign, had publiſhed an Edict, whereby he granted liberty of Conſcience to all, in which reſpect he is much commended by Ammianus. But ſuch learned Chriſtians as profeſſing the Sciences, had been inhibited by Julian, they reſtored to their antient Liberty and Priviledge, by a Law enacted for that very purpoſe. Notwithſtanding they were both Chriſtians, there was great difference as to their Faith. Valentinian clave to the Doctrine of the Nicene Council, and troubled none of the contrary Perſwaſion. Valens being Baptized by Eudoxius the Arian Biſhop of Conſtantinople, eſpouſed not only the Opinions, but the Quarrels of that Party, raiſing a great Perſecution againſt ſuch as owned the Clauſe of One Subſtance.

Valentinian and Valens ſucceed.

C. Th. l. 7. de maleſ.

C. Th. l. 9.

C. Th. l. 6. de med. & profeſ.

Socr. l. 4. c. 1.

27. Valens lying at Conſtantinople, the Macedonians waited on him, and were not ſo forgetful as not to move him about the calling of another Synod, for the Eſtabliſhment of the Faith. He thinking them of the Party of Acacius and Eudoxius, gave them Licenſe to meet together at Lampſacus, a Town ſcituate on the Helleſpont toward Aſia, where aſſembled, they eſtabliſhed the Form of Faith long before publiſhed at Antioch, and confirmed at Seleucia. They condemned Acacius and Eudoxius, who were not in capacity at this time either to hinder this cenſure, or to revenge themſelves by reaſon of the Commotions and Wars raiſed by Procopius the Tyrant. It ſeems that however theſe Semiarians ſpoke fair for the Son of God, yet they rather denied the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, which Socrates thought was a reaſon why ſo many of the Macedonian Sect in his days

Idem ibid. c. 2. & 4.

Valens calls a Synod at Lampſacus.

continued at Lampſacus. But their Decrees they ſend abroad to Biſhops of their own Confeſſion, and certain Legats to the Weſtern Biſhops, who in their Names ſubſcribe to the Nicene Faith, and the Clauſe of one Subſtance. The Letter directed to Liberius Biſhop of Rome, Socrates hath exemplified, as alſo his, in return to the Eaſtern Biſhops, congratulating with them, that thoſe who had formerly been drawn aſide at Ariminum, and elſewhere, had now acknowledged the Truth, and made Reparation to the Honour of the Son of God. Thus was he impoſed on, by the cunning eſpecially of Euſtathius Biſhop of Sebaſtia, one who had been often depoſed, and very skillful in ſuch Arts as were conducing to make advantage of times and Perſons, which he alſo did of this Letter. It ſeems that Liberius alſo had not let ſlip the opportunity afforded him under the time of Julian, of openly declaring againſt the Arians, which had reconciled him to his Flock, and obliterated the Memory of what he had done Eight Years before.

Socr. c. 11.

28. In this ſame year which was the Second of their Reign, of Chriſt the 365. they themſelves being Conſuls, the Emperours made many Conſtitutions of Religious concernment. As one (a) which exempted Religious Virgins, Widows, and Pupils, from paying of Poll Money. Another (b) that Chriſtians ſhould not on the Lords-day be convened before the Officers of the Exchequer, in Proſecution of what Conſtantine had formerly Decreed concerning the obſervation of this day. A third (c) againſt Magical Arts. Another whereby was forbidden the Condemnation of Chriſtians to the Gladiators, which Cuſtom formerly aboliſhed, had been revived by Julian. By a Fifth they increaſed the Authority and Juriſdiction of Biſhops, formerly conferred on them by Conſtantine, and added to their Antient and Primitive Power. For when Perſecutions ceaſed, and Chriſtian Religion came once to be incouraged by the Prince, Biſhops were conſtrained to erect Tribunals, which were much frequented, becauſe as Temporal Commodities ſo Suits did increaſe. The Judgment, though it was not juſt the former in regard of the Form, many things being determined by the opinion of the Church, yet was it as * one obſerves, of the ſame ſincerity. Whereupon Conſtantine ſeeing how profitable it was to determine Cauſes, and that by the Authority of Religion, which was moſt dear to the Profeſſors thereof, captious Actions were diſcovered, which the Judges could not penetrate, made a Law that there ſhould lye no Appeal from the Sentences of Biſhops, which ſhould be executed by the Sæcular Judges: And if in a Cauſe depending before a Sæcular Tribunal in any State thereof, either of the Parties, though the other contradict, ſhall demand the Epiſcopal Judgment, the Cauſe ſhall be immediately remitted unto him. Here the Tribunal of the Biſhop began to be a common Pleading place, having Execution by the Miniſtery of the Magiſtrate, and to gain the name of Epiſcopal Juriſdiction, Epiſcopal Audience, and ſuch-like. Now the Emperours Valentinian and Valens, did much increaſe their Power, giving Biſhops the care over all the Prizes of vendible things, and Authority to over-rule the Sellers in their Sale. How this their Power was either increaſed or diminiſhed we ſhall ſee hereafter.

Several Conſtitutions of Religious concernment now made.

(a) C.Th.l.4. de cenſ.

(b) C Th l.10. de exact.

(c) L.8. de malef.

De pænis l. 8.

* Author. Hiſt. Conc. Trid. l 4.

L. 1 C. de Epiſc. audient.

29. But perceiving what influence the Reputation of a Monaſtical Life had at this time into the Affairs of the State, they command ſuch Perſons to be ſought for, and pulled out their lurking places, as had deſerted Civil Offices, and betaken themſelves into the Wilderneſs. And (what ſeems of greateſt importance as to the State of Religion of this preſent time) though the neceſſities of Affairs had conſtrained them to tolerate a Liberty, yet leſt Chriſtians might be conſtrained to defile themſelves with the Pagan Superſtitions, they took care, that they ſhould not be ſet to the Cuſtody of Idol Temples by a Conſtitution directed to Symmachus Præfect of the City, and dated on the Seventeenth of November, in theſe words, Whatever Judge or Apparitor ſhall appoint men of the Chriſtian Religion to the Cuſtody of Temples, let him know that neither his Life nor Fortunes ſhall be ſpared. By which Law the Æditui or ordinary Keepers of Temples cannot be underſtood, who anciently of courſe were appointed to watch the Treaſures, Images, Furniture, and other things Sacred to ſuch Employments, from Thieves and Robbers; for ſuch were not appointed by Magiſtrates, but either by lot and deſignment out of the number of Prieſts, or by the Teſtaments, or appointment of the Founders. But extraordinary Keepers ſeem here to be meant, extraordinarily appointed by Judges and Magiſtrates, to preſerve thoſe Temples from Force and Violence. For it may well be ſuppoſed, that Chriſtians, who were ſo ill treated during the Reign of Julian, and ſuffered infinite Indignities, offered both to their Religion and themſelves, perceiving many lately erected in his time, perhaps out of the Spoils of Churches, and vexed moreover

by

C. Th. l. 1. de fide Catholica. Quiſquis judex ſeu Apparitor ad cuſtodiam Templorum hominem Chriſtianæ Religionis adpoſuerit ſciat non ſaluti ſuæ, non fortunis eſſe parcendum. Dat. 15. cal. Dec. Med. valentin. & valente Coſſ.

Vide Jacob. Gothofred de interdicta Chriſtianorum cum Gentilibus communione.

by Toleration granted to their Perſecutors, and ſomething altered in their Tempers from the patience of their Prædeceſſors, would hardly hold off their Hands from executing their Indignation and Spleen againſt the Pagan Rites and Temples, and that within the Præfectſhip of Rome, holden at this time by Symmachus.

30. Hereupon grievous Complaints being made by Pagans to the Magiſtrates, they (it is very probable) appointed their Officials Apparitors or Serjeants, to preſs Men to watch and guard the Temples, being very many, if not moſt of them both now, and long time after of that Religion, ſuch as this Symmachus himſelf was. Now they, though they had Officers enough of their own (for Cities eſpecially) or had the Power of preſſing ſufficient numbers, yet out of Envy and Revenge, they would puniſh Chriſtians by the Preſervation of what they ſo deſired to deſtroy, and forced them to this Employment, wherein their Eyes, Ears, Noſes, and all their Sences could not but be contaminated, vexed, and provoked by their Sacrifices, Incenſe, Prayers, and other Rites, their Complaints making Melody to the Pagans, who thereby had opportunity to inſult. How grievous to a Chriſtian thoſe abominable Rites were, Valentinian himſelf was very ſenſible, who having, when an Officer about the Perſon of Julian, waited on him to a Temple, was ſprinkled by the Prieſt with their Holy Luſtral Water, which he received with ſuch Indignation, as he returned the affront with blows. Being ſenſible therefore of the Indignity hereby both intended and offered to Chriſtian Religion, he forbad the thing by this ſevere Edict, at the Suit and Petition of Liberius Biſhop of Rome, or ſome of that City where this intollerable Servitude was impoſed. Therefore was this Conſtitution directed to Symmachus now Præfect there, as alſo that we have even now hinted againſt the Condemnation of Chriſtians to the ſport of Gladiators, which ſport as yet could not be removed; but ſeeing the Pagans were ſo tenacious of it, he would not have them double their pleaſure by ſuch objects. But as all Chriſtians were not free from Crimes, ſo did he not exempt them from all Puniſhments, but only ſuch as were opprobious to their Profeſſion. They were therefore lyable to that of the Bakers, a Body of Malefactors ſerving the City in that Imployment inforced alſo by another Reſcript of this ſame Emperour, to the ſaid Symmachus, which ſeems with thoſe other two to have made one entire Conſtitution, in which we have longer inſiſted, to make out the State and Condition of the times.

Soz. l.6.c.6.
Theod. l.4.c.5.

Valens is Baptized.

31. Valens being to undertake the Expedition againſt Procopius, thought fit to be Baptized, and received that Sacrament from the hands of Euzoius the Arian Biſhop of Conſtantinople, commended to him by his Wife, to whom he ſwore to defend that Hæreſie to the utmoſt. Not long after he called a Synod at Singedinum a City of Pannonia, wherein it was accounted ſufficient to aſſert the Sons Likeneſs to the Father. But the Legates ſent into the Weſt by the Council of Lampſacus, maintained the Controverſie againſt thoſe Arians, finding no greater countenance than in Illyricum, where a Council being aſſembled by the Authority of Valentinian, that Legates ſhould be ſent back to the Orientales, both in the Emperours Name and theirs, to take notice of their former Meſſage, to applaud their Faith and Courage to aſſert it, and promiſe them all conſtancy on their part, with all good Offices to be performed. This ſame Year died Acacius Sirnamed Luſcus Biſhop of Cæſarea in Palæſtine, the Anteſignanus of the Arians who choſe to ſucceed him Euzoius another of that Profeſſion, not the ſame with him, who in the time of Conſtantius, as we ſaid, was ordained Biſhop of Antioch.

Theod.l.4.c.8,9.
Socr. l.4. c. 11,
Vide Jacob. Cappellum ad
A. D. 366.

Liberius Biſhop of Rome dies.

A Tumult about the Succeſſion.

32. The Year following, which was the Fourth of theſe Emperours, died Liberius Biſhop of Rome, into whoſe See was Damaſus elected, after it had been void ſix days. But he being of Fælix his Party, though conſtituted Vicar by Liberius, great Diſſentions aroſe, and the Diſſenting Party made choice of Urſicinus a Deacon of that Church to ſucceed Liberius. Such a Schiſm and Tumult hence aroſe, that both Parties armed with Power as well as Animoſity, betook themſelves at length to their Weapons, to the great Scandal of Chriſtian Religion, and Inſultation of the Pagans, of whom Ammianus obſerves, that in one day were taken up out of one place, no fewer than One hundred thirty and ſeven dead Bodies, and Vinentius Præfect of the City, not able to quiet them, was forced to withdraw into the Suburbs. But Damaſus got the better of his Adverſary, and Urſicinus was baniſhed to Naples, where he ceaſed not to foment the

Damaſus

Vide quæ ſupra ex Amiano.

the Schiſm, and promote his own Intereſt, againſt that of Liberius. This ſame year the Emperours, by their Reſcript dated May the Fifth, commanded all Goals to be delivered at Eaſter of all Malefactors, except Sacrilegious Perſons, Traytors, Poyſoners, Adulterers, ſuch as committed Rapes or Murder; and forbad any one to be removed from Priſon to the Theatre to be puniſhed.

C. th. l. 9. tit. 38. §. 3. & tit. 20 §. 11.

33. About this time dyed Donatus, made Biſhop of Carthage by the Faction of the Donatiſts, of whom he was the head, and main Actor, into whoſe place they choſe one Parmenianus, as earneſt a zealot of the ſame Sect. He preſently brandiſhed his Quill againſt the Orthodox Party, and for that being challenged to a publick Diſputation, refuſed to entertain ſuch Commerce with the Biſhops, as unclean Creatures, whereas he eſteemed himſelf and his Followers as the only pure, undefiled, and the Children of God. But Optatus Biſhop of Milenis in Numidia, grappelled with him at his own Weapon, writing ſeven Books againſt him, wherein he chaſtized his Folly to purpoſe, yet treated his Perſon as a Brother; againſt that uncharitable and Hæretical opinion of his, that the Catholick Church was only in Africk, and that within the Communion of the Donatiſts, Ticonius an African alſo wrote, whom Parmenianus, having in vain exhorted by a Letter to revoke his opinion, did Excommunicate, as St. Auguſtine teſtifies in his Writings alſo againſt Parmenianus. During thoſe ſtirs in Afrrick, Italy was ſtill diſquietted by the Schiſms in the Roman Church, though Prætextatus the Præfect of Rome, and an Heathen, uſed all means poſſible to compound the differences, amongſt which was baniſhment of ſome of the Party of Urſicinus: The Emperour gave him order to prohibit all of that Faction, any ingreſs into the City, thinking this would be ſufficient, but they ſtill continuing reſolute, and chuſing rather to meet together privately, and in Conventicles, than to communicate with thoſe that ſided with Damaſus; he commanded they ſhould not be ſuffered to come within Twenty Miles of Rome.

The Sects of Donatiſts.

Hieron. de ſcript. Eccleſ.

Ammian. l. 27.

34. This was much about the ſame time that Valentinian the Emperour, having diſpatched the War againſt the Allemans, came to Milan, where granting out a Reſcript in behalf of Auxentius Biſhop of that City, a notable Arian; the zeal of Hilarius Biſhop of Poictiers, was much ſtirred up to undeceive the Prince as to his apprehenſions of him, and therefore came and accuſed him of Blaſphemy, whereupon a time was appointed for them to be heard, by two certain Commiſſioners, aſſiſted by ſome Biſhops. Auxentius ſo worded it in this Aſſembly, by condemning the Perſon of Arius, and colouring his profeſſion, that he went away with the credit, and Hilary was eſteemed as an envious Perſon, a ſlanderer, and ſower of diſcord, who dyed not long after, having given an account of the conference, in an Epiſtle directed to all Catholicks, that they might ſhun the Communion of the ſaid Auxentius. Hilary dyed at his own See at Poictiers, and became ſo famous for his writings, and adherings to the Orthodox Faith, that he hath obtained the Reputation of a Saint, having a Church in the upper part of the City conſecrated to his memory, wherein they ſhew a Room appointed to the keeping of a certain Trunk of a Tree made hollow, they ſay by his Bile or Choler, called the Cradle of St. Hilary, into which they put Mad-men, and think that by virtue thereof they recover their Senſes. Hereupon ſuch as upbraid one another with madneſs, bid them to be gone to St. Hilary's Cradle, though they tell ſuch like ſtories alſo at St. Tubery another Town of France, in the Province of Narboune. In the great Church alſo of Poictiers, dedicated to St. Peter, and founded by our Henry the Second, they ſhow part of that Apoſtles Beard, which they ſay was brought thither from Rome by St. Hilary, at his return from a Council held there againſt the Arians.

de.St Hilarie.

Vide Itimetta. Gallier. p. 90.

35. The warning which Hilary had given concerning Auxentius, ſeems to have had this effect, that ſome Councils were called, wherein he, and others of his Complices, were condemned, yet he kept his Biſhoprick till he reſigned his life and it together. Much about the ſame time that Hilary dyed, Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia left this life, into whoſe place was brought Baſil with much adoe, who foreſeeing what would follow, had withdrawn himſelf out of the way, but was elected notwithſtanding, by the procurement eſpecially of Gregory Nazianzen. His Brother Gregory was about the ſame time Ordained Biſhop of Nyſſa, a City of the ſame Country, who is gently blamed by Nazianzen for giving his mind to the ſtudy of Rhetorick, rather more than became a Chriſtian Man. But they were ſcarcely warm in their Sees, when they forced to diſllodge by

Naz. in conc. Baſil & Ep. 21. 23.

Valens baniſhes the Orthodox Biſhops

Valens, who though he had ſtood rather neuter, before his Baptiſm by the Arian Biſhop, yet afterward remembring the vow he had made to promote that Hæreſie, and continually encouraged by his Wife, which the Arians were ſo wiſe as to make their own, he firſt Patronized that Sect, and then fell upon perſecution of the Orthodox. He publiſhed an Edict for the baniſhment of ſuch as being formerly ſent into Exile by Conſtantius, had returned upon the promotion of Julian; and foraſmuch as many ſince that time had been ordained, care was taken that they ſhould be condemned in Synods called for that purpoſe; by virtue of thoſe tricks were driven into Exile, Gregory Biſhop of Nyſſa, Baſil his Brother, Euſebius Biſhop of Samoſata, Pelagius of Laodicea and others. About which time Eudoxius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, the Confident and Ghoſtly Father of the Emperour, went to his own place, after he had held that See Eleven Years. In the third Conſulſhip of Valentinian and Valens Emperours, the Seventh of their Reign, of the Rome 1123. A. D. 370.

Sozom. l. 6. c. 12.

36. Into his place the Orthodox party Elected Evagrius, a Man of their own opinion, who having been called out of Exile by Jovian, at that time remained in ſecret at Conſtantinople, to aſſiſt and confirm ſuch as were of the Faith of one ſubſtance. But the Arians made choice of Demophilus, whereupon aroſe ſuch Conteſts and Diſorders, that Valens then lying at Nicomedia, fearing worſe, ſent great numbers of armed Men into the City, and drove Evagrius into baniſhment. The Arians grown inſolent at this ſucceſs, and as knowing whom they had to back them, heap all publick affronts and injuries upon their Adverſaries, who thereupon betake themſelves to the Emperour for redreſs, ſending Eighty of the Prieſtly rank to Nicomedia, amongſt whom Vrbanus, Theodorus and Menedemus were moſt eminent. When they had opened their griefs, though he concealed much of his diſpleaſure, yet he was ſo inraged as to give order to Modeſtus an Officer to apprehend, and put them to death, which order he executed in ſo ſtrange a manner, as Socrates thought he was obliged to leave a deſcription of it to Poſterity: Modeſtus fearing to Execute them publickly, made them believe they ſhould be baniſhed, and for that purpoſe got them into a Ship, and thereby to be conveyed into Foraign Countries; but gave in charge to the Seamen that as ſoon as they came upon the Main, they ſhould fire the Veſſel and there leave them; they obeyed their orders to the full, for after they were come into the Aſtacen Sea, they conveyed themſelves into a Boat, and ſet fire to the Ship, which was driven by a ſtrong Eaſtern Gale into the Haven called Dacidazus, where, together with her Fraight, ſhe burnt down to the Water. This cruelty, ſaith Socrates, was revenged from Heaven by a grievous Famine, which ſorely afflicted Phrygia, whence the Inhabitants were forced to flye to Conſtantinople, and other Provinces for relief. Of which Famine St. Hierome alſo maketh mention at the Seventh year of the Emperour Valens.

His cruelty to thoſe at Conſtantinople.

Vide Socr. l. 4. c. 13.

In Chron.

37. Some Biſhops yet eſcaped the rage of theſe tempeſtuous times, rather ſecured by that veneration which their ſanctity ſtruck into the Perſecutors, than out of any merciful inclination; amongſt which where Paulinus of Antioch, Epiphanius Biſhop of Salamina, and Baſil, who being tampered with to no purpoſe to change his Religion, was condemned to baniſhment, when the Son of Valens the Emperour fell ſick, upon which accident execution of the ſentence was ſtopped, and he was ſent for to pray for the Health and recovery of the Child, of ſuch force is Conſcience to force an owe and acknowledgment, where Intereſt and paſſion are prædominent, ſome ſay, he promiſed recovery of the Child, on condition the Emperour would turn to the Orthodox Faith, which he refuſing, Baſil left off Praying, and ſo the Child dyed; others write that the condition was of bringing up the Boy in the Catholick Religion, ſome make it of not Baptizing him by Arians, others of their not praying for him; but however the Child miſcarried. Theodoret delivers it for a truth, that Valens taking Pen in hand to ſubſcribe to the baniſhment of Baſil, could not cut one Letter, but ſpoyling three Pens one after another, at laſt proceeding to attempt it, he was ſeized with a trembling in his hand, whereat aſtoniſhed, he tore the Paper; yet proceeded he to perſecute at Cæſarea, ſuch as held the Doctrine of one ſubſtance, and removing to Antioch, drove Meletius into Exile, turned the Prieſts out of their Churches, and here, as well as in other places throughout the Eaſt, tormented them, and made them away by ſeveral ſorts of deaths, eſpecially by drowning in the Sea.

He perſecutes others.

Socr. Sozom Theod.

38. The Orthodox Chriſtians in thoſe times of Perſecution not knowing well where with ſafety to meet together to ſerve God, repaired to the Church of St. Thomas the Apoſtle, at Edeſſa in Meſopotamia, in great numbers, which being underſtood by Valens, who in his Journey to Antioch, went to ſee that ſtately Fabrick, he gave the Governour a blow with his Fiſt, becauſe he had not ſcattered thoſe Conventicles, according to his former injunctions: He notwithſtanding ſo publick an affront, gave notice to thoſe Chriſtians of the Emperours pleaſure, as unwilling to put them all to death, but they nevertheleſs would not give over their meetings, which continued as full and frequent as formerly. Hereupon with a ſufficient power of armed Men he marches down to execute his Orders upon ſuch as he found in the Temple, and in his way meets a poor Woman, which having her young Son in her hand, haſted thither, and unwilling to be put out of her way, thruſt her ſelf into the midſt of the ranks to march along with them; he beginneth to ask her queſtions, to tax her folly, and expoſtulate with her, for her raſh thruſting her ſelf into moſt certain deſtruction, ſhe plainly tells him, ſhe was going where the People of God were met, and was ſo far from being deterred with his threats, that ſhe ſaid ſhe made what haſte ſhe could, leſt ſhe ſhould come to late, and fail of ſerving God by Martyrdom; he then demanded of her, wherefore ſhe carried with her the little Child, to which ſhe replyed, that he might alſo meet with the ſame meaſure, and receive the like reward. Hereat as way laid, this Officer repairs to the Emperour, and telling the ſtory, lays before him the reſolution of the whole company, and the infamy to which he would expoſe his Reign by ſuch a Maſſacre. Hereupon he deſiſts, having ſo far already proceeded in thoſe Cruelties, that ſome Rivers bluſhed at the Bloody Maſſacre of Innocents, receiving a crimſon tincture from their ſlain Bodies.

Deſigns a Maſſacre.

39. The Edict concerning the Baniſhment of Biſhops, who had been Exiled formerly by Conſtantius, it may well be ſuppoſed fell as foul upon Athanaſius as any. This Edict being backt with threats of ſevere proceedings againſt ſuch Officers as ſhould fail to execute what was enjoyned, the Præfect of Ægypt lets Athanaſius know what he was to expect, and prepare for it accordingly. The Alexandrians aware of the ſtorm, had reſolved to ſecure him from it, if poſſible, and ſend word back to the Governour, that Athanaſius was not comprized in the Edict; for though he was baniſhed by Conſtantine, yet had Conſtantius reſtored him, and he had been driven into Exile by Julian, ſuffering rather more than any other Biſhop by his direct command, from which he had alſo been reſtored by Jovian. When this would not ſatisfie, they plainly ſignified their reſolutions to protect him by force, which ſo moved the Governour, that fearing a revolt, he demurred, and promiſed all ſecurity to Athanaſius, till he could further underſtand the Emperours pleaſure; but the Biſhop was too much verſed in ſuch buſineſs, to be ſo lulled a ſleep, for either diſcovering by his own foreſight, what would follow, or receiving intelligence from ſome private Friend, he was aware of the Governours coming, and removed himſelf thither, where he was not eaſily to be found, the Governour coming in a dark and Tempeſtuous night, and finding the Bird flown, was much diſturbed with the diſappointment, and when all Men admired where he could lye ſo cloſe, they variouſly diſcourſed of the matter; his Enemies ſaid, as formerly upon ſuch occaſions, that he was a Conjurer and dealt with the Devil, ſome of his Friends attributed it to Divine Revelation, and indifferent Perſons could not but very much apprehend his Sagacity. But he lay hid, it's ſaid, in his Fathers Monument for ſome Months, till Eudoxius being dead, Valens became more peacably inclined towards the Orthodox Biſhops.

Soz.l.6.c.12.

Athanaſius forced to ſhift for himſelf.

40. The Eaſtern Church groaning thus under Perſecution, could not but juſtly expect ſome aſſiſtance and comfort from that of the Weſt. The Orthodox Biſhops having conſulted together, Commiſſionate Baſil to write to their Brethren, requiring their aſſiſtance, eſpecially that of the Italians and French, who were nearer the Emperour Valentinian, and of greateſt Intereſt with him, who, they deſired, might be moved to write to his Brother, and take him off from this ſevere courſe; but little good came of it, more than ſome com-comfortable Letters written to thoſe under Perſecution. The Biſhop of Rome, who by reaſon of his See, was firſt in order, and moſt concerned to ſtickle in their behalf, meddling little, or rather ſtifling thoſe complaints, leſt by offending Valens, he ſhould make him his Enemy, and cauſe him to Patronize the Plea, and pretence of Urſicinus, who having been baniſhed into Gall, was now permitted to return into Italy, on condition that he came not within the Suburbicarian Countries; therefore might Baſilius, as he did, write again and again, inſomuch that when ſome preſſed for a fourth Meſſage to be ſent into the Weſt, he diſſwaded it, bidding them reſt contented, and leave off their intreaties, for he was proud, and no good was to be expected. Baſil had a large ſhare of trouble, not only in reſpect of the Arian Perſecution, but through miſunderſtandings of the Orthodox Party, being accuſed of ſeveral Errors, by reaſon of the obſcurity or ſtrangeneſs of ſome expreſſions about the three ſubſiſtencies of the bleſſed Trinity, which miſtakes he cleared ſufficiently by ſeveral Writings, and after his death, his great Friend and admirer Gregory Nazianzen wiped off ſuch aſperſions as lay upon his memory, who was alſo of the Party in ſome other troubles which he underwent.

Baſil. Ep. 78. &c,

Ep. 10.

41. This Gregory was the Son of Gregory Biſhop of Nazianzum in Cappadocia, whence he had the Syrname of Nazianzen, being born * after his Father was in Orders, and as it ſeems, after he was made Biſhop of that place, which was about the Year 325. From which, to the time we now write of, intervened Forty five. He had a younger Brother called Cæſarius, and a Siſter, alſo younger than himſelf, by Name Gorgonia, of whom, he ſeems a very accompliſhed Perſon, and was very well eſteemed at Court: Gregory, as alſo his Brother, being well ſeen in Learning already, went in his Youth to Athens, at this time the moſt flouriſhing Univerſity of the Eaſt, where he contracted a familiarity with Baſil, and had occaſion of making ſuch obſervations upon Julian, who ſtudied there alſo at the ſame time, as enabled him to give him that Character we have formerly mentioned; at Athens he was detained ſome time, to read Oratory, but withdrawing himſelf thence, he was afterwards invited to Court by Julian, who had taken eſpecial notice of him; but deteſting his Apoſtacy and Principles, he refuſed the Attendance, and drew off his Brother from the ſame Imployment: Retiring to a ſolitary life with Baſil, he compoſed two Orations againſt Julian, and being e're this ordained Prieſt, was afterward called home by his Father, to aſſiſt him in his Epiſcopal Function, in which Imployment he continued, till Baſil drew him very unwilling into the Epiſcopal Rank. For Cappadocia being divided into Firſt and Second, as Baſil was Biſhop of the former, his See being at Cæſarea, ſo Authimicuus was of the later, whoſe Seat was at Tyana, betwixt them happened great Controverſies, about the extent of their Juriſdiction, which cauſed Baſil to erect ſome other Biſhopricks within his Dioceſs, and amongſt the reſt one at Saſima, over which with much adoe was ſet Gregory. But this compoſed not the differences, ſo that he perceiving he ſhould offend, both by the one and the other, Authimicuus being reſolute and chollerick, he withdrew himſelf again to a ſolitary life, bnt this diſpleaſing his Father, he obeyed his commands, returning to his aſiſtance as long as the old Man lived.

* οὔπω τοσοῦτον ἐκμεμέρηκας βίον ὅσος διῆλθε θυσιῶν ἐμοὶ χρόνος, &c. Ita Patrem inducit eum alloquentem latine de vita ſuæ edit. Morelli Paris. Tom. 2. p. 9. alibi paſſim.

42. But we muſt return to Athanaſius, and take our laſt farewel of him, who having now finiſhed his long and troubleſome courſe, was to receive his Crown. Valens wearied with his own Perſecutions, or rather underſtanding how the Alexandrians were affected towards their Biſhop, for fear of Commotions ſuffered him to return in quiet to his See, and there ſpend his laſt days, which he knew could not be very many. This was two or three years which he ſpent not only in Affairs of his own Province, but of the Catholick Church alſo, aſſiſting by his advice and Council his Fellow Biſhops, and contending for the Nicene Faith, where there was occaſion. His Maſter found him ſo doing after he had governed the Church of Alexandria Six and forty Years, and weathered out ſo many Storms of Perſecution under Conſtantine, Conſtantius, Julian, and Valens, that for Labours and Suffering

Socr. l. 4. c. 16.

Valens ſuffers Athanaſius to return to Alexandria.

Suffering next after the Apoſtles, he ſeemeth to diſcern the firſt place, and living in the Memory of Chriſtians to all Poſterity hath juſtly obtained the Syrname of the Great. He was a Pillar, ſaith Nazianzen, holding forth the Myſtery of Godlineſs againſt Spiritual Wickedneſſes in high places, meek and gentle, ſeldom angry, for which cauſe he was not unacceptable to his very Enemies, of a couragious Spirit, eſpecially in danger; not ambitious, yet of excellent Parts both for Learning and Prudence. His Perſonage was comely, his Countenance Angelical, Affable and Courteous, yet Grave. His Speech was proper, conciſe and acute, his delivery pleaſing. His Doctrine came to be accepted of by the Churches, and his Confeſſion of Faith a Rule to theirs, even to this preſent day. Such was his Sagacity, that by Gods Bleſſing he miraculouſly eſcaped all ſuch Plots, Devices, and Ginns, as were laid for him, which made the Arians ſay he was a Conjurer, and foraſmuch as in the Legend of St. George, we read that he was oppoſed by a Conjurer of this Name, we may conclude that they corrupted the true Story, changing George the Saint for George the Arian Uſurper, as they dealt with all other ſorts of Hiſtories. The death of Athanaſius fell into the Ninth Year of Valentinian; of Rome the 1125. A. D. 372. Fl. Modeſtus and Fl. Arintheus being Conſuls.

'Αγγελικὸν τὸ εἶδος, ἀγγελικὴν τὴν διάνοιαν.

Who dies.

Is ſucceeded by Lucius an Arian.

Vide Socr. l. 4. c. 16. Theod. l. 4. c. 18. Ruff. l. 2 c. 3.

43. Into the See of Alexandria the Catholick Party elected Peter, an ancient Presbyter of that Church. But the Arians produce Lucius, whom formerly they had choſen to ſucceed George, and reſolving now that they would not be defeated, they ſend, and give an account to Valens, both of Athanaſius his death, and what had enſued, who fully complying with them, appoints Euzoius the Biſhop of Antioch, being aſſiſted by a great Officer (ſome name Magnus the Quæſtor, others Palladius Præfect of the Province, and a Pagan,) to ſee Lucius poſſeſſed of the Chair. Accordingly they either Impriſon or drive away Peter, who perceiving no good was to be done, (ſome ſay he eſcaped out of Priſon) got himſelf to Rome, and by his Epiſtles gave account to the World, of the moſt horrid Outrages committed by the Arians, by Killing, Impriſoning, and Baniſhing the Orthodox, no Sex, Age, nor Condition being ſpared. Therefore the Arians being few in number, yet backed by the Emperours Authority (who by an Edict commanded all ſuch as hold the Clauſe of one Subſtance to be expelled) got Poſſeſſion of all the Churches of Alexandria. Then were Religious Houſes in the Deſert ſpoiled and beaten down to the Ground, thoſe who inhabited them making no reſiſtance, and being ſlaughtered by the Soldiers in ſo Savage a manner, as cannot well be expreſſed.

Socr. c. 17.

St. Hillary Biſhop of Milan dies.

Hieronym. in Chron.

Vita Ambroſii Theodoret. Socr. alii.

44. So ſad a change was made in the Eaſt, from St. Athanaſius to Lucius. But in the ſecond year after happened ſo happy a one in the Weſt, as made a great Compenſation to the Church, for her loſs of ſo excellent a Paſtor. Auxentius the Arian Biſhop of Milan, whom St. Hillary had in vain laboured to remove, was now taken away by death, and great endeavours were uſed by both Parties for the choice of ſuch a Man to ſucceed him, as might ſerve their Deſigns and Intereſts. Valentinian obſerving his rule not to meddle with Church Matters, had called to him the Biſhops, and given them free Power to chuſe whom they ſhould think fit; but ſuch a Tumult happened in the Church, in the heat of Contention, the People having a ſhare in the Election, that Ambroſe Governour of that Province, then in Town, fearing ſome great Inconvenience would follow, came to appeaſe it. Having admoniſhed them calmly to go to work about ſo ſerious a buſineſs, it came to paſs that he himſelf was named to be Biſhop, which he heard with much trouble, excuſed himſelf from the unfitneſs as well of his Perſon, as Abilities, being but a Catechumeniſt, whereas it was flat contrary to the Cannon of the Nicene Council, for ſuch to be ordained. When no excuſes would ſerve his turn, the Multitude being violently inclined towards him, he withdrew himſelf; but the Matter being referred to the Emperour, he acknowledged a particular Providence in the caſe, and foraſmuch as it was contrary to the Laws, for any in Publick Imployments of the State, to be received into Orders, he moſt willingly granted a Diſpenſation.

C. Th. de Epiſc. & Clericis. l. 3.

45. Ambroſe in the mean time having made his eſcape from thoſe whom the People had ſet to watch him; but upon notice of the Emperours pleaſure, was brought forth, and then apprehending it his duty to ſubmit to ſo ſignal a Providence, was Baptized on the laſt day of November, and conſecrated on the Seventh of December following, both which days fell upon the firſt Feria. Though this Election was againſt expreſs Cannons, yet was there much joy amongſt all of the Orthodox Party, and Congratulatory Letters written too and fro. And ſo highly were the Citizens of Millaine pleaſed with it, that as * Socrates tells us, being formerly at diſcord amongſt themſelves, they thenceforth imbraced Peace and Unity. Valentinian it is ſaid acknowledged the goodneſs of God towards him, that he had ſuch an Officer as was fit to be made a Biſhop; but he lived not long to ſee the happy Fruit of this Election, dying the year following at Bergutium, as we have already deſcribed the manner of his death. His humour was not to interpoſe much in Matters of the Church, as to the Government thereof, ſaying, It was not proper for him, being a Lay-Perſon, and it is certain he did not meddle enough, ſuffering his Brother to act his pleaſure againſt the Orthodox Party, of which yet he ſeemed to be a Member. But as he was unequally Yoaked with his Brother in the Empire, ſo with an Arian Wife in his Bed, which unlucky Conjunction ſo overpowered him, as to intercept and hinder that influence which elſe he might have had into the Peace and Tranquillity of the Church. Though he meddled little himſelf with the Diſcipline, yet as Emperour he joyned with his Brother in the enacting of ſeveral Conſtitutions, which being of an Eccleſiaſtical Nature, and ſo conducing to the knowledge of the State of ſuch Affairs, we muſt add to thoſe we have formerly mentioned.

Is ſucceeded by Ambroſe.

* C. 25.

Valentinian dies.

46. The firſt of theſe ſufficiently diſcovers how unwilling he was to meddle with Church Matters in the caſe of Chromatius a certain Biſhop, who being condemned in a Synod of Seventy Biſhops from them appealed to the Magiſtrate. For ſo doing by a Reſcript in the Sixth Year of his Reign, he and his Colleagues impoſe upon him a pecuniary Mulct, and take care for preventing the like in time to come. But as he was earneſt for maintaining Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, finding what eaſe it procured to his Government, ſo was he ſenſible of the forward Zeal of Chriſtians, who according to the Nature of Mankind, which is ever prone to one of the Extreams, though they could never give enough to the Church, and that Women eſpecially acted by that fervent Devotion which is commonly ſeen in firſt Reformations to overrun diſcretions, lay open to the covetous deſigns of certain Church-men. For prevention hereof, in the Seventh year of his Reign, Valentinian and his Colleagues make the firſt Law of Mortmain, directed to Damaſus Biſhop of Rome, whereby Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, Clerks, or Monks, are inhibited to receive any Inheritances, Legacies, or other Gifts from Women. Both Hierome and Ambroſe take eſpecial notice of the Cauſe, rather than the Edict it ſelf, falling very foul upon the great and ſordid Avarice of many Prieſts and Monks of that time, who accounting Gain to be Godlineſs, devoured Widdows Houſes, and made a prey of ſilly Women laden with diverſe Luſts. But this Law was afterward repealed, and others elſewhere of the ſame and larger nature, enacted according to comportment of times, and the inclination of ſuch as were poſſeſſed of Supream Power.

C. Th. l. 20. appel.

C. Th. l. 20. de Epiſc. & Cler.

His Laws.

47. This ſame year by another Reſcript, they take care for the Reformation and Improvement of the Schools at Rome, wherein they forbid any Youths to ſtay longer than the Twentieth year of their Age, out of a Senſe of the vitiouſneſs of that City it ſeems, although the placing of Univerſities in Capital Towns, contributes much to the breeding of Youth, by acquainting it more with the World and Men, and prevents that Ruſticity, to which Solitary and Monaſtical places are more ſubject. But the Year following ſeveral Conſtitutions were made, which ſhows the Temper of Valentinian very indulgent to Pagans, and indeed would make us jealous, that his ſuffering the Orthodox to be Perſecuted, and his not medling with Matters of the Church, proceeded from a great indifferency as to all Religion, gion, and unwilling to trouble himſelf with things of that nature. For whereas Chriſtians could not be Stage-players, but upon their Baptiſm changed that courſe of Life, he ſignified his Pleaſure to be, that thoſe Scenici being publick Slaves, deſtinated to the common Theatre, ſhould not be Baptized before the point of Death. By another he conferred upon Prieſts of the Gentiles, the Honour that was wont to be given to Excomites. But what was of moſt Conſequence, by another Conſtitution they permit to Pagans the uſe of the Aruſpicina, provided it were executed without Magick, and give therewith liberty to every Man to profeſs what Religion he pleaſed. Theſe things vehemently inculcate a ſuſpition of his lukewarmneſs, or (which is fully as probable) declare to us the Conſtitution of the times, to have been ſuch as inforced him to ſlacken the Reins of his Government, Paganiſm being yet ſo common and prævalent as to make ſuch a Party for ſtrength and Intereſt, as the Scepter was not in any fair Capacity to cruſh it.

C. Th. de ſtudiis liber. Rom. l. 1

C. Th. l. 1. de ſcen.

C. Th. l.7. de decur.

C. Th. l.9. de malef. tit. 16. § 9.

48. For this reaſon in Charity we may believe, he ſuffered the Altar of Victory ſtill to remain in the Capitol, and thereto the Pagan Senators to pay their Devotions, for we cannot well imagine he could be ignorant of ſuch a practice: And permitted the Ethnicks ſo far to abuſe his Indulgence, as not only to uſe the old, but erect new Altars for freſh Sacrifices, as it appears they did by ſeveral Inſcriptions. The Year following being the Ninth of his Reign, he makes a ſharp Law againſt the Manichees, prohibiting their Meetings, fining their Teachers, and confiſcating the Houſes where they held their Conventicles; whilſt his Brother Valens imploys himſelf in furniſhing Libraries at Conſtantinople. In that following, by another Law he reſtrains the Practice of Rebaptizing, uſed ſo much by the Donatiſts in Africk. And although leave was given to Pagans to ſin againſt the Law of Faith, yet not againſt that of Nature; if as Chriſtians the Emperours would not reſtrain them, yet as Princes and as Men. Therefore whereas they aſſumed the Ancient Barbarous Power of Life and Death over their Children, thinking it a ſmall matter to kill their Infants by a Conſtitution in the Eleventh of Valentinian, that unnatural Cuſtom is taken away. As for that Law mentioned by Socrates, whereby out of love to Juſtina, he ſhould give liberty to all Perſons to Marry two lawful Wives, it may juſtly be ſuſpected of falſehood. For by Heathen Writers he is ſaid to have been very Chaſt, that Juſtina which Socrates would have a Virgin, had been Wife, as appears from Zozimus, to Magnentius the Tyrant, and Married to Valentinian after the Death of Severa. It was a thing ſo contrary to Chriſtianity, that Heathens themſelves diſapproved it. Neither do the Hiſtorians of thoſe times make mention of ſuch a Paſſage. Only Socrates who lived long after, and ſuch as received it on truſt from him. For Valentinian it may be ſaid that he was a Chriſtian Emperour, and had been a Confeſſor before he reached that Dignity. On the other ſide it may be believed, that through his connivance at his Brothers Actions, the Pagans had far better quarter during his Reign, than had the Orthodox Chriſtians themſelves.

Ambroſ. Ep. ad Valentin. Jun.

Vide Inſcript.

C. Th. l.3. de hæret.

C Th l.14. de ſtudiis liberalibus tit. 9. §. 2.

C.Th. l.9 tit. 14. §. 1.

49. At the ſame time as Valentinian died, his Brother Valens then at Antioch, with greater violence Perſecuted the Orthodox Party, till Themiſtius the Philoſopher took off the edge of his hatred, by ſhewing him that there were greater and many more Diſſentions amongſt Pagans, in reference to Religion, than amongſt Chriſtians about Matters of Faith. Yet did he but divert the Storm upon the Monks of this time, upon whom he looked as Fugitives from the Commonwealth, and ſuch as caſt off thoſe Obligations which nature and their Country had laid upon them, to betake themſelves to a courſe of idleneſs. Having formerly laid ſuch Burthens upon them again, as Conſtantine and Conſtantius had taken from off their ſhoulders; by another Reſcript he now commands them to be pulled by the Ears out of their Monaſteries, and liſted in the Army, or upon refuſal to be knocked in the Head, whereupon great Outrages were committed upon this ſort of People about this time, and they received Letters full of comfort from ſeveral eminent Eccleſiaſticks of this Age, who were generally affected to the Monaſtical Life. At the ſame time Gratian

Soz. l.6. c.25. Socr. l.4. c.27.

C.Th. de Decur.

Valens ſevere towards Monks

Oroſ. l.7. c.33. Hieron. in Chron.

tian in the Weſt ran a contrary courſe, who ſucceeding to his Fathers Principles, as to Religion, yet, out of a ſence it ſeemeth of his remiſneſs in point of Diſcipline, and too great Indulgence towards the Arians, the Year after his death, forbids their Aſſemblies under the notion of Hæretical Conventicles, and confiſcates the places of their Meetings. The ſame Year alſo the Three Emperours, Gratian, Valentinian, and Valens, joyn in a Conſtitution for the regulating of Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, ordaining that the leſſer ſorts of Faults ſhould be heard and determined in Dioceſan Synods, but greater Crimes by higher Powers. In the mean while Paganiſm rather recovered ſtrength than otherwiſe, the Gentiles erecting many Monuments of their Superſtition, as to the Mother of the Gods, the Great Gods, (Dii Magni) and at this (the Daughter of Gnaeus, which gave name to the Country of Attica) the Emperours conniving at this Practice, as not able to reſiſt that Impiety, which had been foſtered to ſuch a degree of vivacity by Julian, as was to be dulled and abated by time, before the Scepter could give it its fatal ſtroak.

C.Th. de hæret. l. 4.

*C.Th.l.*16.*tit.*2. §. 23.

*Inſcript. Gruteri p.*28.

50. But Valens, being at length taught ſome Moderation by Afflictions, having received a great overthrow from his Enemies, which was ſeconded with dreadful Peſtilence and Famine, began to be more favourable to the Orthodox Biſhops, recalling them out of Baniſhment, though he did not reſtore them to their Sees. Yet they at Alexandria took heart, and being encouraged by the Letters which Peter their Biſhop brought from Damaſus Biſhop of Rome, they expelled Lucius from the Biſhoprick, who got him in all haſt to Conſtantinople, and confirmed Peter in his Seat, wherein he ſate but a ſhort time, for he died not long after, and left his Brother Timothy to ſucceed him. This ſame Year the Emperours, by a Conſtitution, exempt all Clerks from Perſonal Imployments. And Gratian by another Reſcript, reſtrains the Donatiſts in Africk from their common practice of Rebaptizing, as alſo the Aſſemblies of the Manichees, amongſt whom was Auguſtine a young Man of the Age of Three and twenty, of which number the odd Three he had ſpent as an Auditor and Novice in their Diſcipline. He was born, as he himſelf writes, at Tagaſte a Town of Numidia, in the Nineteenth year of Conſtantius, and the Conſulſhip of Arbetio and Lollianus, on the Thirteenth of November. His Mother Monica being left a Widdow about the Seventeenth year of his Age, a moſt Religious Matron, was much afflicted for him, ſeeing him run ſuch a courſe of Hæreſie and looſeneſs. And not only by her importunate Prayers and Tears laboured for his Converſion; but dealt with ſuch as ſhe thought moſt able to convince him of his Folly, to reaſon him out of the Manichæan Errors, and urged thereunto a certain Orthodox Biſhop, eſpecially, who thinking it not ſeaſonable as yet to incounter him whilſt young, hot, and newly entred into that courſe, he abounded ſo much in his own ſence, ſhe ſtill followed him, weeping and bewailing her Sons condition. With which when the good Man was wearied, and could not put her off, he bad her, Go her ways, for it could not be, that a Son of thoſe Tears could periſh; as we ſhall ſee it came to paſs.

Hieron. in Chron. Oroſ. l. 7. c. 73.

C. Th. l. 16. t. 2. §. 24.

C.Th. ne ſanct. bapt. iter.

De vita beata & Confeſſ.

51. But ſuch is the condition of this preſent life, that as one comes upon the Stage of the World to act his part, another paſſeth off, having done his duty, which was the lot of Baſil, the great Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, who dyed on the firſt day of January, and of the following Year: A Man of ſuch eſteem in his life time, that what ever he did was accounted a ſufficient and warrantable Pattern, and even ſuch paſſages as in another would have been accounted defects, as proceeding from him, were taken for no other than perfections; when dead, ſo precious was the memory of him, that through the great crowd at his Funeral, whilſt Multitudes flocked to pay him their laſt reſpects, many were preſſed to death. His Abſtinence and Auſterity of life, were ſuch, that he only fed upon Bread and Salt, and drank nothing but pure Water; contented himſelf with one Coat and Gown, and made the ground his Bed; he was of tall and upright Stature, dry and lean in his Body, blackiſh wanniſh Complexion, had a large Noſe, a round Forehead, wrinckles in his Face, long Baſil Biſhop of Cæſarea dies.

Ὁ Κόσμος σκηνὴ ὁ Βίος πάροδος.

Naz.

Baron. ex Anonym. codicem vatican.

long Vizaged, had hollow Temples, wore a great Beard, was ſomthing gray, and looked thoughtfully; he is ſaid to have præſcribed Rules of living to Monks, Clerks, and Lay-Perſons: Yet this Aſſetica aſcribed to him, are not to be found amongſt the reſt of his Works, in the Catalogue of Nazianzen. And Euſtathius who Inſtituted the Monaſtical life in Armenia, hath been by ſome eſteemed the Author of them; the Rule alſo going under his Name, is juſtly ſuſpected, foraſmuch as there is no mention of it in Nazianzen; and there is another ſaid alſo to be his, which contains only Thirty five Chapters. In the midſt of his Book concerning the Holy Ghoſt, Eraſmus thinks ſome things inſerted which are no wiſe like his. His Epiſtle to Cæſarea Patricia is alſo ſuſpected. And the Book written of his life, under the Name of Amphilochius is by all Parties accounted ſpurious, being full of Fables and things repugnant to other good Hiſtories, and therefore unworthy of credit in the opinion of Baronius himſelf.

Sozom. l. 3. c. 13.

Vide Juell. Duplicat. contr Hardart. 1. §. 33. Ad. A. D. 378.

Valens burnt alive by the Goths.

52. A Month after the death of Baſil, dyed alſo Ephræm the Deacon at Edeſſa, on the firſt day of February, a Man of extraordinary Sanctity, whoſe Vertues are much ſet forth by Gregory Nyſſen, in an Anniverſary Oration. And this year was the laſt alſo of Valens the Emperour, whom as we may ſay, the Goths burning a live after a defeat in Battel, thereby revenged upon his Body the injury he had done to their Souls, by ſeducing them from the Orthodox Faith to the Arian Hæreſie. His death brought a new life and reſuſcitation of the ancient Heat and Vigor into the Eaſtern Churches; which Gratian by a ſeaſonable Law for Reſtitution of all baniſhed Perſons to their proper Places, ſo cheriſhed, that the Catholick Doctrine began ſpeedily to flouriſh again. Yet ſo powerful was the Arian Faction, that he thought it unſeaſonable to apply any ſudden remedy to that Sore, and therefore he gave liberty of conſcience to all excepting the Euxomians, Photinians and Manichees, the groſſer ſort of Hæreticks. But that the Catholicks might not be overpowered by Faction or Intereſt, and receive the full benefit he intended them, Theodoret tells us, he ſent into the Eaſt one Sapores, a Man of great note, who publiſhed an Edict at Antioch, and turned the Arians out of thoſe Churches into which they had intruded. The Orthodox Biſhops incouraged by his preſence, and the favour of Gratian, met together at Antioch, where conſulting how they might beſt improve the opportunity God had given them for the reſuſcitation of the true Faith, and proſperity of the Churches, they firſt compoſed differences betwixt Meletius and Paulinus, both Biſhops of that Church, ordaining, that the Survivour ſhould be immediately ſeized of the Biſhoprick upon the others deceaſe, without any farther Election, to which award they bound by oath Six of the Principal Presbyters of the Church, who ſeemed moſt fit to ſtand as Competitors at the next Vacancy of the See.

Gratian reſtores the baniſhed Orthodox in the Eaſt.

Socr. l. 5. c. 2.

Soz. l. 7. c. 1.

L. 5. c. 2.

Some Hereſies revived.

L. 5. c. 5.

53. Hereby was removed much matter of Scandal, for the caſe of thoſe two Perſons had occaſioned great Tumults and Seditions. The Friends of Meletius, as Socrates writes, would have joyned them together in the Epiſcopal Function; but Paulinus objected it was againſt the Canons, for any Ordained Arian Biſhops to execute that Office, and when he would not conſent, the People endeavoured to effect it by force, making preparations for his Inſtallment in a certain Church within the Suburbs. This being done, all the City was in an uproar, and great diſſentions continued amongſt the People, till this means of reconciliation was found out, wherewith the Multitude was fully quieted, only the Favourers of Lucifer, who had Ordained Paulinus, were offended with this Manner of dealing, and took hence occaſion (to make (ſaith Socrates) or rather) to continue Schiſm, pretending that Meletius being Ordained by Arians, could not poſſibly be admitted to the Government of that See. But the Biſhops having thus removed this notorious Eye-ſore, appointed certain eminent Biſhops to viſit other Churches of the Eaſt, and to Conſtantinople was Gregory Nazianzen ſent, which of all others ſtood moſt need of an able Phyſician. Yet, as it happeneth to thoſe, who have to do with ſuch diſtempered Perſons, as account their Diſeaſes health ; his kindneſs was returned with opprobrious Language : And as Licurgus of old, when he acted the Phyſician of the State, they caſt Stones at him, all which Indignities he bore with great pity and patience, continuing three years in this employment, wherein he made thoſe five famous Orations, concerning Theology, which deſervedly procured him the Syrname of the Divine.

Carm. de vita ſua.

A diſcourſe about Hypoſtaſis.

54. At this time there was much ado made about the word Hypoſtaſis, which ſome underſtanding in the ſame ſence as Subſtance, condemned ſuch as aſſerted three Hypoſtaſes in the Bleſſed Trinity, as thoſe that hold three Gods; and on the contrary thoſe, who took the word as it is uſed for Subſiſtance or Perſonality, it condemned ſuch as rejected it, as guilty of the Hæreſie of Sabellius. Of this ſort it, ſeems was Meletius, who importuned Hierome to confeſs the Hypoſtaſes, but he refuſed to comply with him therein, and conſulted Damaſus Biſhop of Rome by Letters. This Perſon whom the Church in all Ages ſince his time hath, and that deſervedly ſo much eſteemed, was born at Stridon, a Town of Dalmatia, where his Parents lived in good rank. In his Youth he travelled to Rome with Bonoſus his Foſter Brother, a young Man of a very great Fortune, where they became Auditors to Donatus, and performed their exerciſes in declaming, and otherwiſe, according to the Cuſtom. Here when he arrived at ripeneſs of Age, he was Baptized, and then leaving that courſe of life, which formerly had been none of the ſtricteſt, he betook himſelf to great ſeverities and laborious neſs in Study : Afterwards he travelled Gall, Pontus, Bithynia, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Syria, and Thrace, to improve himſelf by the Converſation of learned and Pious Men, and being much taken with the Lives and Rules of ſuch as profeſſed the monaſtical life in Syria, he was ſo allured by their example, that he choſe the Deſert of Chalcis, a Province lying betwixt the Syrians and Saracens for his abode. Here beſides the conſtant practice of Scleragogy, he followed his book with great diligence, having got togather in this place a good Library, through the aſſiſtance of Evagrius, one of his Aſſociates, a very rich and noble Prieſt, afterwards Biſhop of Antioch. But that which much Crucified the contentment he received from this courſe of life, was the jealouſie and ſuſpicion, which he being a Weſt-Country Man, incurred with the Eaſtern Monks, and the contention which followed about the word Hypoſtaſis.

In Ep. paſſim. in chron. alibi.

55. Having been formerly, whilſt at Rome, acquainted with Damaſus the Biſhop (with whom he continued as Amanuenſis for ſome time, till he was wearied with the vitiouſneſs of the place) he conſulted him by Letters, and at length tired with the importunities of Meletius and his Party, againſt whom, he ſeemed to patronize Paulinus, he returned unto him to Rome, after he had ſpent ſix or ſeven Years in that ſolitary courſe of life. Some ſay he firſt went to hear Gregory Nazianzen at Conſtantinople, where he ſpent three Years, and ſaw Jeruſalem before his return to Rome. Nazianzen at the ſame time was viſited by another Perſon of great Fame, one Maximus of Alexandria, a Chriſtian made of a Cynick Philoſopher, who boaſted himſelf born of Martyrs, and had got repute for being baniſhed for his Faith, into the Deſert of Oaſis ; coming loaded with Fame to Conſtantinople, he was kindly received by Gregory, who honoured him with an Oration, made in his Commendation, of which afterward he changed the Title as written in praiſe of Hero his Companion ; but in ſhort time his deſign was diſcovered, which was to creep into the See of Conſtantinople, for which he had the incouragement of Peter the Alexandrian Patriarch ; although he had formerly pretended to favour the cauſe of Gregory, who was very much deſired by the People. Seven Biſhops by him ſet on, when Gregory lay ſick in the Suburbs, uſing the help of ſome Alexandrian

Vide Baronium ad Ann. D. 378.379.

Vide Naz. Contra Maximum & in carm. de vita ſua ut ſuprà Edit. morell.

andrian Marriners, whom they had hired for their purpoſe, privily in the Night endeavoured to thruſt him into the Epiſcopal See; but the Alarm being given, they were beaten out of the Church by the Multitude; yet nothing hereat diſmayed, afterward they cut of his Hair, which he wore now after the Cynick faſhion, (for neither he, nor Hero, though they were Chriſtians abandoned their former Habit, and Deportment, as Nazianzen reports of them) and Ordained him Biſhop, in the houſe of a Player, which practice being abhorred by all, as well Arians, as others, he was driven out of the City: Betaking himſelf to Theodoſius, from whom he received no incouragement, and being rejected alſo by Peter of Alexandria, he thereupon fell into diſcontent, and the Hæreſie of Apollinaris.

Theodoſius made Emperour.

L. 5. c. 6.

56. This ſame Year which was the Fifteenth of Gratian, and the Fourth of Valentinian the Second, was very auſpicious to the Church, in the promotion of Theodoſius to the Empire, who mended much what had been marred by Valens. Socrates writes, that falling into a very dangerous Diſeaſe at Theſſalonica (in the Second year) he was very deſirous of Baptiſm, for of old he was trained up in Chriſtian Religion, and addicted himſelf wholly to the Faith of one Subſtance. Having ſent for Acholius the Biſhop of the place, he demanded of him, of what Faith he was, to which Acholius anſwered, that the opinion of Arius prevailed not throughout Illyrium, neither was the new-found invention of his peſtilent Brain planted in the Churches of that Country, but that all Chriſtians throughout thoſe Coaſts retained that ancient Faith, which had been delivered by the Apoſtles, and continued by the Council of Nice; which the Emperour hearing, willingly received that Sacrament at his hands: A few days after being ſomewhat recovered, he went towards Conſtantinople, the Twenty fourth of November, in his firſt Conſulſhip, and the Fifth of Gratian, where in the following Month he reſtored to the Catholicks thoſe Churches which for forty years had been unjuſtly detained by the Arians, who in vain fretted at ſo great both diſgrace and loſs, eſpecially of the great Church, which by force they were ready to maintain, till overpowered by a Band of Souldiers, ſent by the Emperour. Thus by deeds did he confirm what he had formerly profeſſed to the World, having at Theſſalonica publiſhed a Law, wherein Prohibiting and condemning all Hæreſies, he commands all his Subjects to imbrace that Faith which had by St. Peter the Apoſtle been commended to the Romans, and which at preſent Damaſus Biſhop of that See, and Peter of Alexandria (both whom he knew as, their Prædeceſſors for the moſt part to have been Orthodox in their opinions) owned and imbraced. At the ſame time and place, by another Reſcript, he diſcountenanced all Violators, and breakers of Divine Law. And forbids by another, any Criminal Inquiſitions to be made in Lent. This ſame year alſo thoſe Emperours reinforcing the former Chriſtian Cuſtom, forbid ſuch as were baptized, to be drawn back to the Service of the Stage.

Is baptized.

Soz. l. 7. c. 5. Marcel. in Chron.

And is kind to the Church.

C.Th.l. 2. de fide Catholica.

C. Th. l. 25. de Epiſc.&cler.

C. Th. l. 4. de quæſt.

C. Th. l, 15 de ſcenicis. §. 4.

57. The following year was fully as propitious to the Orthodox, wherein the Emperours proſecuting their Patronage already undertaken by another Law, commanded, that in all places their Churches be reſtored to them, prohibiting the Arians, Photinians, Eunomians, with other Hæreticks, to hold any Aſſemblies within the Towns. But Theodoſius, who was the prime Author and procurer of thoſe Laws, that he might not ſeem to carry on all things by force, and the terror of Imperial Authority, knowing how the Arians were addicted to Councils, and ſufficiently underſtanding the intereſt and univerſality the Catholick Faith at this time obtained throughout the World, and not doubting of the good effects of a Council, which ſhould be indifferent and free, and not clogged with the late force, and partiality of the Arians, he reſolved to ſubdue them by their own Weapons. The Hæreſie of the Macedonians who denied the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, he eſpecially intended to eradicate by this Council, having never had any ſuch effectual proper Remedy as yet applyed, perſwading himſelf that they were not of ſuch obſtinate and refractory principles as the Arians. And whereas the promotion of Gregory Nazianzen was much ſtomached by ſome ſorts of Perſons, upon the account of Maximus, Demophilus, and for other private reſpects, he reſolved by this Council, which he ſummoned to Conſtantinople, to provide for the filling of that See. Accordingly he ſummoned the Biſhops to Meet, though Damaſus* Biſhop of Rome was againſt the holding of this Council.

Summons a general Council to Conſtantinople.

* Repugnante Damaſo Baronius ad A.D. 553. num. 2.

CHAP.

Chap. V.

From the Second Oecumenical Council ſummoned by Theodoſius the Firſt to Conſtantinople, to the Third called by Theodoſius the Second to the City of Epheſus.

The ſpace of Fifty Years.

1. THE Second Oecumenical Council, ſummoned by Theodoſius the Emperour to the City of Conſtantinople, met together in the Month of May, the Fifteenth year of Gratian, the Sixth of Valentinian the Second, the Third of Theodoſius, Emperours, of old Rome the 1134. of New Rome the One and Fiftieth, the Seven and fiftieth after the Aſſembling of the Nicene Synod, the Firſt of the Two hundred and ninetieth Olympiad, the Ninth Indiction, the Four hundred and nineteenth of the Æra Hiſpanica, A. D. 381. Fl. Siagrius and Fl. Annius Eucharius being Conſuls.

2. Of thoſe which imbraced the Nicene Creed, here met Timothy Biſhop of Alexandria, who had ſucceeded Peter his Brother, after he had poſſeſſed that Chair Eight years, (however Socrates ſaith, he continued but a ſhort time,) Cyril Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who now after his Recantation addicted himſelf to the Faith of One Subſtance; Meletius who had been called hither a while before to the Enſtallment of Gregory Nazianzen, Acholius Biſhop of Theſſalonica, Gregory Nyſſen, with others, to the number of One hundred and fifty Biſhops. Of the Macedonian Sect alſo aſſembled to the number of Six and thirty, whereof the greater part from the Helleſpont, and thoſe of moſt note were Eleuſius Biſhop of Cyzicum, and Maxianus of Lampſacus. It being a very neceſſary Ingredient to the Legality and Authority of a General Council to have it free, we cannot imagine that Theodoſius ſhut the Doors againſt the Arians, ſuch as had been fairly poſſeſſed of their Biſhopricks, or that he ſummoned this Council of ſuch Biſhops only as were of his Faith, which Socrates ſeemeth to affirm. But a good riddance had been made of the Arians out of the Churches, by thoſe Laws enacted for Reſtitution of the Catholicks to their proper Sees, and the Cuſtom of Titular and Supernumerary Biſhops, (who cannot challenge ſuch Intereſt in Church Matters) their thruſting into Synods to give voices not yet being received; their Party was inconſiderable, (if they adventured to be preſent, who were only valiant when backed with Authority,) and therefore no notice is taken of it.

Socr. l. 5. c. 8. lat.

Arians as well as others admitted to this General Council:

Seaven Canons now made

3. In this Council, at the beginning whereof Gregory Nazianzen præſided, were framed Seven Canons, “The Firſt of which confirms the Faith of the Three hundred and eighteen Fathers, who aſſembled at Nice in Bithynia, to anathematize all Hæreſie, eſpecially of the Eunomians, Arians, Macedonians, Photinians, and Apollinarians. The Second prohibits Biſhops to meddle with Matters which lye out of their Dioceſſes, and thereby confound Churches, which formerly had been regulated and bounded. Accordingly they ordain that the Biſhops of Alexandria govern only the Churches in Ægypt. The Oriental Biſhops thoſe of the Eaſt alone, reſerving the Honour of Primacy to the Church of Antioch, according to the Rules of the Nicene Synod. And the Biſhops of the Dioceſs of Aſia they charge to concern themſelves only therein, as alſo thoſe of Pontus and Thrace in the Dioceſſes thereto belonging. The Third prohibits Biſhops, without Invitation, 9. q 2. Epiſcopi qui extra diæceſim quem Can. Caranza mutilat.

9.q.2.c.9. Non invitati Epiſcop. ubi ex hor. videre eſt diff. inter hunc can. Græcum, & Dionyſianum. Diſt.21. c.3. Conſtantinopolitanæ civitatis.

" to move out of their Dioceſſes either for Ordination, or any other diſpoſition of Eccleſiaſtical buſineſs, in obſervance of the Rule concerning every Dioceſs before recited; for it is manifeſt that in every Province the Provincial Synod ought to order and govern all things according to what was deſigned in that of Nice. The Fourth Decrees that the Churches of God which are ſettled in Barbarous Nations be ordered and governed according to the Cuſtom of the Fathers. The Fifth declares the Biſhop of the City of Conſtantinople ought to have the Honour of Primacy next after the Roman Biſhop, and thereof renders this reaſon, becauſe it is New Rome, even the ſame which procured to the other the Primacy of Order, viz. becauſe he was Biſhop of the Old, or Mother Rome. The Sixth determines concerning Maximus the Cynick, and his inordinate Ordination made at Conſtantinople, that he neither be taken for a Biſhop, neither ſuch for Clerks as had been ordained by him in any degree, all things appearing null which had been done by him. The Seventh Canon contains a Confeſſion of Faith agreeable to that of the Nicene Council, which having not ſpoken fully concerning the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, the Fathers now add, And in the Holy Ghoſt, the Lord and Giver of Life, proceeding from the Father, together with the Father, and the Son, to be worſhipped and glorified, who ſpake by the Prophets.

Several Hereſies condemned.

4. Not only were the Hæreſies againſt the Divinity of the Son and Holy Ghoſt condemned, but ſuch as had been the Authors of them, wherein the Semiarians, though they had been ſummoned by the Emperour, refuſed to joyn, who together with the Biſhops of his opinion, uſed all means poſſible to perſwade Eleuſius and the reſt of the Macedonians to reconcile themſelves to the Catholick Church. They put them in mind of the Meſſage which Euſtathius and others in their names carried to Liberius Biſhop of Rome, and the reſt of the Weſtern Prælates, that not long before they had communicated without exception in all Churches with ſuch as profeſſed the Faith of One Subſtance, and they preſſed them with what they had formerly owned and decreed, proteſting that this their averſion was neither Godly, nor Chriſtian, ſeeing they had formerly ratified the ſelf ſame opinion and Faith with them. But neither admonition nor reprehenſion would prevail, they ſaying flatly, That rather than they would ſubſcribe to the Faith of One Subſtance, they would joyn with the Arians, and having made this anſwer, they left Conſtantinople, and ſent Letters abroad into all Churches, that they ſhould not in any wiſe conſent to the Faith of the Nicene Council.

Socr.l.5.c.8.

Idem ibid.c.9. Naz. carm. de vita ſua.

Meletius Biſhop of Antioch dies.

A difference about his Succeſſor.

5. Though the buſineſs of the Council was finiſhed, yet certain accidents happened, which held the Fathers ſtill together. It happened that Meletius the Biſhop of Antioch died, whom Gregory Nyſſen commended in a Funeral Oration. Now according to former agreement, Paulinus was to ſtand poſſeſſed of the See as the Survivour; but certain Factious Perſons named Flavianus a Prieſt of Antioch to ſucceed him, which was received, and inforced by the younger ſort of Biſhops, hot, and accommodating themſelves to the times, and the courſe of Preferment, who urged that it was not to be endured, that a Perſon ordained by a Weſtern Prelate (ſuch Lucifer was) ſhould be Biſhop of Antioch, and ſtrenuouſly aſſerting the worth of the Eaſtern Church before that of the Weſt, in that Chriſt himſelf had honoured the Eaſt with his Nativity. Gregory Nazianzen endeavoured to compoſe the Tumults hereupon raiſed, by propounding that Paulinus might be ſuffered to enjoy the Chair for that little time he was to live, and then the Orientals might maintain their right in the Election of his Succeſſor. But hereby he incenſed thoſe of the contrary Faction againſt himſelf, as favouring the Occidental Biſhops in the Cauſe of Paulinus. Whereupon he began to ſettle in that Reſolution he had e're this taken up, of quitting the See of Conſtantinople, and in much diſpleaſure departed from the Synod. He being withdrawn, they choſe Flavianus Succeſſor to Meletius, by which means the former Diſſentions and Tumults were continued, the Church of Antioch being again divided, though one and the ſame People was ſubject to two Biſhops, who both of them ſeemed to hold in Solidum.

6. This diſpleaſed Timothy Biſhop of Alexandria alſo, who, whilſt thoſe things were in hand, came to Conſtantinople with ſome of his Suffragans, and certain Biſhops of Macedonia. He declaimed alſo againſt the Confirmation of Gregory in the See of Conſtantinople, as done by Meletius of Antioch, whereas he challenged that right, as belonging to the Chair of Alexandria, which had precedence next that of Rome before the meeting of this Council. Herewith Gregory was ſo nettled, that now he perfected his Reſolution, and making ſeveral Orations to the Fathers, abdicated himſelf from that See, and having hereby obtained leave of Theodoſius the Emperour, departed into his own Country with ſuch diſdain and ſtomach, that he took up another Reſolution never to come more into ſuch Aſſemblies, and though he was the year following urged with much importunity to return to Conſtantinople, where theſe ſame Biſhops were again aſſembled, he flatly refuſed, as having never ſeen, as he ſaid, any good to come by Synods. After the departure of him, and ſuch as were addicted to him, at the procurement of Diodorus Biſhop of Tarſus in Cilicia, was choſen Nectarius a Native of that City, a Catechumeniſt as yet, well ſtricken in years, a Courtier, therefore however well ſkilled in Secular buſineſs, yet little acquainted with the concernments of the Epiſcopal Function, which to teach him, he kept with him one Cyriacus a Cilician Biſhop, as Sozomen writes, who tells us, that the Biſhops having written down the names of thoſe they thought fit for the place, he was from amongſt them all choſen by the Emperour. Socrates ſaith, he was of noble Linage, whoſe Anceſtors had been Senators, that he was a Man of unblameable Life, Pious Converſation, and though he was by Office a Prætor, yet the People made choice of him for their Biſhop. and by the approbation of One hundred and fifty Prælates he was enſtalled Biſhop of Conſtantinople.

Gregory Biſhop of Conſtantinople quits his See.

A Synod at Conſtantinople

Ep. ad Procop.

Nectarius choſen in his place.

7. The Council yet depending, Theodoſius the Emperour on the Nineteenth day of July publiſhed an Edict, "whereby he forbad Arians, Eunomians, and "ſuch like Hæreticks to build Churches, either in, or without Cities, which, "ſince they were outed of their Poſſeſſions unjuſtly got, they had attempted "to do. By another he alſo inveighs againſt Manichees, Eucratites, Apotacticks, and Hydropaſtes, other Hæreticks, making them infamous, and "uncapable of making Teſtaments, as he did Apoſtates about the beginning "of the Synod. But that we may come to the concluſion of the Council, Socrates ſumming up what was done therein, tells us in ſhort, that then it was decreed, that the Biſhop of Conſtantinople ſhould have præcedence next after the Biſhop of Rome, the reaſon being, becauſe that City was called New Rome. Again, ſaith he, they ratifie the Faith of the Nicene Council, they divide Provinces, and ordain Patriarchs, they decree that no Biſhop ſhall leave his own Dioceſs, and intermeddle with Foreign Churches, for unto that time, by reaſon of the great ſtorm and heat of Perſecution, it was at every ones choice and liberty. Nectarius Biſhop of Conſtantinople had that great City, together with all Thrace, allotted to his Juriſdiction; the Patriarchſhip of Pontus was aſſigned to Helladius Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, after Baſil. Unto Gregory, Brother of Baſil, fell Nyſſa, a City alſo of Cappadocia; unto Otreius the Biſhoprick of Meletina in Armenia. Amphilochius Biſhop of Iconium, and Optimus of Antioch in Piſidia, had the Patriarchſhip of Aſia. The Province of Ægypt fell to Timothy Biſhop of Alexandria. Pelagius Biſhop of Laodicea, and Diodorus of Tarſus, are appointed over the Eaſtern Dioceſs, reſerving the Prerogative of Honour to the Church of Antioch, the which then preſently they granted unto Meletius. They decreed moreover, that if neceſſity did ſo require, a Provincial Synod ſhould determine Provincial Affairs. The Emperour gave his Aſſent to all aforeſaid, and ſo the Council was diſſolved. Thus Socrates, whoſe words concerning the diviſion of Dioceſſes, are to be underſtood according to thoſe Rules we have formerly laid down.

Several Edicts of the Emperor againſt Hereticks.

C. Th. de hæret. l. 8.

L. 7.

C. Th. de Apoſtatis l. 1.

L. 5. c. 8.

8. This Council which had begun in May, thus concluded about the end of July following, on the Thirtieth day whereof Theodoſius the Emperour publiſhed a ſevere Law againſt the Macedonians, as well as others, being then condemned Hæreticks. "Herein he commands that forthwith all Churches ſhould "be The Macedonians condemned Hereticks.

Cod. Theod. l. 3. de fide Cathol.

“ be given to thoſe who held the one and equal Majeſty of Father, Son, and “ Holy Ghoſt, and were of the ſame Faith with Neſtorius, Timothy, Gregory, “ and other Biſhops in that Synod, and whoſoever diſſented in Faith from “ them, ſhould all be expelled as manifeſt Hæreticks, never to be readmitted. In which Law, ſeeing the Macedonians are called manifeſt Hæreticks, that is, ſuch as are convicted and condemned by a General Council, it is not to be doubted, that at the promulgating of this Law, both the Emperour and Catholick Church hold that Decree of the Second Council, as a * Learned Man obſerves againſt the Macedonians, to be the Judgment of an Holy, Lawful, and approved Oecumenical Synod, ſuch as was the moſt ample Conviction of an Hæretick, and manifeſtation of an Hæreſie. Now this Edict was publiſhed before Damaſus Biſhop of Rome either approved this Council, or ſo much as knew what was done in it, the firſt news what was done herein not coming to him till after the Synod of Aquileia, (as both Sigonius and Baronius himſelf affirms) which was held on the Fifth of September, a Month after this at Conſtantinople was ended. Seeing then it is certain that this General Council was ended, and the Decrees thereof not only approved, but put in execution by the Church, not only before the Pope of Rome confirmed it, but before he knew what was done and Decreed therein, it is a Demonſtration that a General Council, or a Decree thereof, may be, and de facto hath been judged by the Church, both of them to be of full and Synodical Authority, and approved by the Church, when the Pope had confirmed and approved neither of both.

* Dr. Crackanthorp of the firſt General Council, c. 18. §. 19.

This Council held without the approbation of the Biſhop of Rome, yet Oecumenical.

9. Nay, neither Damaſus, nor any of his Succeſſors, till Gregory's time, approved this Council, as this Biſhop witneſſeth, who writes in one of his Epiſtles, That The Canons of the Conſtantinopolitan Council condemn the Eudoxians, but who that Eudoxius was, they do not declare; and the Roman Church hitherto neither hath, nor receiveth thoſe Canons, or the Acts of that Synod, but herein it accepteth it, in that which was defined againſt the Macedonians by it, and it rejecteth theſe Hereſies, which being therein mentioned, were already condemned by other Fathers. Hence it appears that the Romans did not approve the condemning of the Macedonians, becauſe it had been Decreed in this Council, for then they ſhould have approved the Canon againſt the Eudoxians, and all the reſt of the Canons, ſeeing there was the ſame Authority in Decreeing them all; but the reaſon why they approved that againſt the Macedonians was, becauſe Pope Damaſus had in a Roman Synod, wherein Peter Biſhop of Alexandria was preſent, diverſe Years before this Council of Conſtantinople condemned that Hæreſie, and what Hæreſies were by former Fathers condemned, thoſe, and nothing elſe did the Roman Church approve in this Council. Untill the Age wherein Gregory lived they did not receive this Council, for the word Hactenus which he uſeth, muſt refer to that, not to the time of his Writing this Epiſtle, which was in the Fifteenth Indiction, for in the Ninth Indiction, or Six Years before, he himſelf profeſſeth to imbrace this Second Council, as one of the Four Evangeliſts, which alſo to have been the Judgment of that Church he witneſſeth in the Eleventh Indiction. And as the Council it ſelf was rejected by them of Rome, ſo eſpecially that Canon which gives Patriarchal Dignity to the See of Conſtantinople, and to the Biſhop thereof præcedence before theſe Patriarchs of Alexandria, and Antioch, and Authority over the Churches in Aſia Minor, Thracia, and Pontus.

Ep. 31. l. 6. Et vide Notatam omnino ad Diſt. 22. cap. 3. Conſtantinopolitanæ Canon his ex iis eſt quos Apoſtolica Romana ſedes à principio & longo poſt tempore non recipit, quod ex Epiſtola 51. alias 53. Leonis Papæ 1 ad Anatolium Conſtantinopolitanum & aliis ejuſdem Epiſtolis facile eſt cuivis cognoſcere. itemq; ex 2. Epiſtolis Leonis ix. una adverſus præſcriptiones Michaelis & Leonis c. 28. altera ad eundem Michaelem, ſed multo clariùs ex 8. Gregorii Epiſtola 31. l. 6. ad Eulogium Alexandrinum & Anaſtaſium Antiochenum atque ex Epiſtola Nicolai 1. ad Michaelem Imp. quæ incipit Præpoſueramus. Quanquam Conſtantinopolitani Epiſcopi Imp. potentia freti ſecundum locum Patriarchalium ſedium ſibi uſurparunt idq; tandem pacis & tranquillitatis cauſa fuit ipſis conceſſum. Sicut in c. antiqua. de privi. Inno. 3. Papa diclaravit.

Hactenus nec habet nec recipit.

10. How great averſion the Church of Rome had to the meaning and deſign of this Canon, and how far it was from approving it, appears from ſeveral Epiſtles of Pope Leo, eſpecially that to Anatolius, wherein he rejects it, as contrary to the Nicene Decrees, which he there defineth (erroniouſly ſure) to be immutable, as if one General Council could not undo, what another had done in things circumſtantial and indifferent. The Legates of this Leo in the

Vide Not. ſupra

the Council of Chalcedon, according to their Inſtructions, proteſted that the Canons of this Council were not accounted for Synodal, and by command of the Apoſtolick See, as they ſaid, earneſtly oppugned this eſpecially, againſt which alſo Damaſus, as Turrian the Jeſuite obſerves, had in a Roman Synod formerly made a Decree. And others of them ſay it was not allowed of till the Council of Lateran under Innocent the Third, which was ſix hundred years after the death of Gregory. Yet all this while was this Canon (which ſome make the Third, others the Fifth, as Gratian hath it), approved by the Church, and Authority aſcribed to it, as of a General Council. By warrant hereof Anatolius in the Council of Chalcedon and Eutychius in the Fifth Synod, in the right of their See of Conſtantinople, took place of the Patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch, none in thoſe Councils repining thereat, nay God himſelf, as there is ſaid, approving that præcedence. And whereas this order had not been obſerved in the Epheſine Latrocine, Flavianus Biſhop of Conſtantinople being placed after thoſe of Antioch and Jeruſalem, the Fathers in the Council of Chalcedon ſtormed hereat, demanding why Flavianus did not ſit in his proper Seat? which was next to the Roman Biſhop or his Legates.

Act. 16. p. 136. & 137.

Lib. de Synodis 6, 7, 8. p. 65. Notat. ubi ſupra & Sanderus de viſibili Monarchia.

A. 1215.

Vide Dr. Crackanthorp quo ſupra.

The Biſhop of Conſtantinople next to Rome.

11. By Authority of the ſame Canon, Chryſoſtome, when Biſhop of Conſtantinople, depoſed Fifteen Biſhops in Aſia, ordained others in their rooms, celebrated a Council at Epheſus, and to it called the Aſian Prælates, about Twenty Years after the making of this Canon, which had they not counted authentick, they would not, by obeying him, have broken the other laudable orders of the Church. The Judgment of the whole Council of Chalcedon, and conſequently of the whole Catholick Church of that Age was, that this Canon was to be received and approved. They both knew there was ſuch a Canon, and that Cuſtom and Practice did concur with it; whereupon the glorious Judges, after full diſcuſſing of this cauſe (when the truth of this Canon had been diligently examined) teſtified and ſentenced, that the Biſhop of Conſtantinople had rightful Authority to ordain Metropolitan Biſhops in the Dioceſſes of Thrace, Aſia, and Pontus, and the whole Synod conſented to them, firſt proclaiming, This is a juſt Sentence, This we all ſay, and then in the very Synodical Epiſtle to Leo teſtifying the ſame, viz. that they had confirmed that Cuſtom to the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, that he ſhould ordain Metropolitans in Thrace, Aſia, and Pontus, and thereby had confirmed the Third Canon of the Second Council. And this they did, though the Legates following their Inſtructions received from Leo, were ſo averſe, that they ſaid not without ſome choller, Let our contradiction cleave to theſe Acts. Juſtinian the Emperour, One hundred and ſixty Years after, confirms this Canon amongſt the reſt, commanding it to be written in the Diſticks or Eccleſiaſtical Books, and publickly to be read in the Churches, in token of publick and univerſal approbation of the ſame. The Emperour doubted not of obedience to be performed, as well by thoſe of Rome as others, and they were ſilent, none contradicting or ſpeaking againſt this Canon, till after his time, being loath to exaſperate him. Yet did they not approve it, as appears from what hath been ſaid, although the General Council of Chalcedon, and the Catholick Church both approved, and eſtabliſhed it. So little neceſſity was there for a particular Biſhop to approve or confirm what had been Decreed by the Major part in a Council; although ſuch as conſented were ſaid to confirm the Decres; as a Synod held at the Helleſpont ſaith of this Synod of Conſtantinople, that Timothy, with the other Biſhops then preſent, confirmed it, calling the Conſent and Subſcription of the Biſhops preſent thereat, a Confirmation of the Council. But to return to our buſineſs.

Concil. Chalc. Act. 11. in fine. Act. 16. p. 136.

Poſt. act. 16. Rel. ad Leon.

Ibid. p. 137.

Novel.

A General Synod may make Canons without Confirmation of any particular Biſhop, or of the Pope.

Vide p. 168. inter Epiſt. poſt Concil. Chalc.

12. This ſame Year, by command of Gratian the Emperour, and at the earneſt deſire of Palladius and Secundianus two Arian Biſhops, a Council was held at Aquileia, whereat were preſent Two and thirty Biſhops, and amongſt the reſt Ambroſe of Milan, and Philaſtrius of Brixia, two Legates from the African Church, and Three from the Gallican. Herein the ſaid Palladius and Secundianus, though they appealed to a General Council, and to the Sæcular Powers, were with their Hæreſie condemned, and all the work finiſhed in one Action, from One a Clock till Seven. And in this ſame year (if Baronius gueſs it rightly)

Gratian calls a Synod at Aquileia.

Tom. 1. Con

An other Cæſar-Auguſtus wherein Priſcillianus the Arch-Heretick is condemned.

rightly) fruitful in Synods, was another Synod held at Cæſar-Auguſta or Saragoſſa in Spain, on the Fourth of October, againſt Priſcillianus the Arch-Hæretick and his Diſciples. This Man, as Severus writes, being a Spaniard born, wealthy, and of very good parts, but given much to vain Glory, and above meaſure to Magical Arts, had been infected with the Hereſie of the Gnoſticks, which one Mark an Ægyptian of Memphis brought firſt into France, and afterward into Spain; being once poyſoned himſelf, he uſed ſuch Arts and Induſtries as Inſtill the Venom into the minds of many others, of all ſorts of Sexes, ſome Biſhops being alſo drawn in, as Salvianus and Inſtantius. Here-at the Churches being ſtartled, after ſome private oppoſition made by certain Biſhops, a Council was got together, wherein the Parties not daring to appear, were condemned abſent, yet had they ſo much reſolution and courage as to Ordain Priſcillianus Biſhop of Avila in Spain (the See long after of Toſtatus that voluminous Writer) and though the Orthodox procured a Reſcript fom Gratian the Emperour to baniſh them Spain, as condemned Perſons, yet uſed they ſuch Induſtry, that having in vain ſought aſſiſtance and incouragement from the Biſhops of Rome and Milan, at length, they corrupted Macedonius the Magiſter Officiorum, and by his means obtained the former order to be reverſed, their Sees reſtored, and their Perſecutors baniſhed in their rooms.

The opinions of this Sect.

Jura perjura Secretum prodere noli.
Aug. de hæres Hieron. in chron.

13. Theſe Priſcillianiſts held an hodge podge of all Hæreſies together, raked out of the filth of the Gnoſticks, Manichees, and others. They taught Lying to be no ſin, and lawful to Swear and Forſwear, rather than reveal any thing to their diſadvantage; they hold with Origen, that Souls ſinned before they came into Bodies. With the Gnoſticks and Manichees, they made two Gods, one Good and the other Evil. They taught with Bardeſanes, that every Man had his fatal Star, and that our Bodies are compounded according to the operation of the Twelve Signs of the Zodiack. They confounded the Perſons of the bleſſed Trinity, with Sabellius; they declaimed againſt Wedlock, ſeperating married Perſons, and with Tatianus and the Eucratitæ cryed out againſt the eating of Fleſh, as an unclean thing, and made by the Evil God, or malignant Angels. It was their Doctrine and Practice to faſt on the Lords day, and on Chriſtmas day, becauſe they held that Chriſt did not take true humane Fleſh, againſt their faſting on the Lords Day, the Synod Decreed and Anathematized all ſuch as faſted on that day, whether in reference to any time, miſperſwaſion or Superſtition.

Cauſa temporis aut perſuaſionis aut ſuperſtitionis can 2. Tom. 1. canc.

Die dominico jejunium nefas eſſe ducimus. de Corona mil. c. 3.

Idem ad uſus Pſychicos c. 15.

14. To faſt on the Lords day, it was ever accounted an abominable thing, in Ignatius his Epiſtle to the Philippians, he is called a killer of Chriſt, who faſts on the Lords day, and on the Sabbath or Saturday. Tertullian ſaith expreſly, that they counted it wickedneſs to faſt on the Lords day, nay even the Montaniſts themſelves, though otherwiſe frequent in their Faſts, and exceſſive in their Scleragogy, yet excepted this day out of their Auſterities. But the Manichees toward the end of the Third Age, out of their Singularity, changed the Cuſtom, and faſted on this day. Of whom St. Ambroſe ſaith, that they could not do it, becauſe they juſtly condemned them for ſuch a Practice; which Auguſtine alſo at this ſame time witneſſeth to have been a great ſcandal. Euſtathius, as Socrates calleth him, or Eutactus, as Baronius will have him, renewed the practice of the Manichees, which was preſently condemned by a Provincial Synod, held at Gangra in Paphlagonia, which Decreed, that if any upon pretence of abſtinence faſted on the Lords day, he ſhould be Anathema. Now whereas the Synod of Saragoſſa condemns faſting on the Lords day, in reference unto times; this ſeems to have reference to the time of Lent it ſelf, wherein it was accounted unlawful to faſt on this day, as is clear from many Teſtimonies of Fathers and Synods. Therefore whereas from the firſt Sunday in Lent, unto Eaſter day, intervene juſt Forty two days, the Church of this Number faſteth only Thirty ſix, and to make it up Forty, according to the example of our Saviour; the four days between Shrove Tueſday, and the firſt Sunday in Lent, are added, as long ago * Rupertus (who lived at the beginning of the Twelfth Century) obſerved. But thus much of the Hereſies of Priſcillianus and his Followers, who the better

Ep. 86.

L. 2. c. 33. lat. or c. 42. gr.

Faſting on the Lords day condemned.

Can. 18. Tom. 1. conc.

Vide Ambro de jejunio. c. 10 Hier. ad Lucin. Epiphan. expoſtid. num. 22. Chryſoſt. hom. 11. in Gen. 2. Syn. Agath. c. 12. Aurel. 4. c. 2 better to maintain their Singular and Hæretical Tenets, beſides the Scriptures received other Apocryphal Writings.
* De divin. offic. l. 4. c. 9.

The Pagans forbidden to Sacrifice.

C.Th.l. 7. de Pagan

C.Th.l. 8. de Pagan.

15. This ſame year the Emperours, taking notice how much Paganiſm through the encouragement of Julian, and connivance of Valentinian had increaſed, forbid their Sacrifices and Meetings. But this Law ſtood but as Probationer till the year following, being then abrogated in part by another, which gives them leave to meet, yet ſo as they wholly ſhould abſtain from Sacrifice. The truth is, they found their Zeal too ſtrong for the Intereſt, Peace and Security of the Empire, wherein Paganiſm had yet ſuch a Party, that moſt of the Senators were of that perſwaſion, and about this time the Conſul and his Wife both Ethnicks. Another Law they made againſt the Clandeſtine Conventicles of the Manichees. And they publiſhed alſo an Edict for the reſtraining and puniſhing Luſty Sturdy Beggars, which as ſome have obſerved, had been much increaſed ſince the times of Chriſtianity: For the ancient Chriſtians endeavoured nothing more than the manumiſſion of Slaves, upon which account, out of deſire of Liberty, many of that condition became Proſelytes. Out of the Hiſtories of Africk, we are told that Paulinus Biſhop of Nola ſold all that he had, and at length himſelf to the Vandals, therewith to get Money to redeem Chriſtian Captives. Hence came Manumiſſions to be made in Churches by the Biſhops, and that on the Lords day, and after the time of Conſtantine, eſpecially the number of poor and Indigent Perſons, having nothing they could call their own but liberty, increaſed to ſuch vaſt Multitudes, that no greater grievance lay upon Cities, than ſuch Confluence of beggerly Perſons, having no Trade nor courſe to live.

Hieron. ad Marcellum Zoz

C.Th.l 9. de Hæretic.

Vide Bodinum. de republ. l. 1. *c.*5.

An Edict againſt Sturdy Beggars.

C. de Epiſcopis & clericis. tot. tit.

16. Hereupon at the earneſt deſire of the Biſhops, Hoſpitals and Alms-houſes for the ſuſtenance of Strangers, Infants, Aged, Sick and Lame, unknown to former times, began to be erected by Princes or others. St. Baſil complaining in his Sermons, that the ſighs and lamentations of ſuch as languiſhed in the Churches, were confounded and mingled with the Prayers of Prieſts and People. Julian the Apoſtate, as we have already ſaid, perceiving this was a very taking and plauſible means to procure reſpect to Religion, reſolved to Erect alſo ſuch Hoſpitals, and to this piece of Policy excited his Pagan Prieſts. And for as much as thoſe indigent Liberty or Freemen, did commonly expoſe their Children, as knowing that upon the Chriſtian Principles and profeſſion of kindneſs and mercy, they would be provided for, Gratian made a Law that they ſhould remain in Servitude with thoſe that educated them. Not long after Valens his Uncle permitted by an Edict, that Vagrants and Beggars ſhould be reduced to Servitude, forbidding alſo upon pain of death, his Subjects to betake themſelves into deſert places, there to lead an idle life, which he commanded ſhould be inflicted upon many, who contrary to the Laws, had withdrawn, and lived in thoſe times ſolitarily in the Wilderneſs; yet had not thoſe Laws ſuch effect, but that Beggars ſtill increaſing, and luſty Fellows able to work, chuſing rather to live in idleneſs and penury, the Emperours re-inforced the former Edicts, by theirs of this Year, which was that following the Synod of Conſtanoinople.

*C.l.*1. & ſeq. de Infant. liberis.

A Synod held at Rome.

Ad A: D. 382. ex collectione Creſconianā

17. But although Damaſus Biſhop of Rome was againſt the ſummoning of that Council, yet this year immediately ſucceeding, he had a deſire to have a General and Oecumenical Synod held at his own City, and for that purpoſe ſollicited the Emperours; they having conſulted the Eaſtern Biſhops, anſwered it was neither neceſſary nor convenient to have ſo many General Councils called in ſo ſhort a time; for this would make them cheap and contemptable, as Synods had been in the Arian days, and by the Journeys, and long abſence of Biſhops, the ſeveral Flocks ſhould be expoſed both to want and danger. However Damaſus and other Weſtern Biſhops, are ſaid to have held a Synod at Rome, the acts whereof are loſt, but amongſt others, one Canon was made, as Baronius tells us, quite contrary to what had been determined in the Council of Conſtantinople, in favour of that See; giving the firſt place to the Patriarch of Rome; the Second to him of Alexandria, his See having in the name of St. Peter been Conſecrated by Mark his Diſciple and Evangeliſt; and the Third to the Patriarch of Antioch, becauſe St. Peter there reſided before he came to Rome, and there the Faithful were firſt called Chriſtians; a reaſon indeed ſufficient to have given him Præcedence above the other two, had not the Polity of the Church imitated that of the Empire, and the Biſhop of Rome obtained præcedence for the Dignity of that City, to which Conſtantinople now being Second, or New Rome, the Fathers had as much reaſon to alter the Caſe, and advance the See to the ſame place and Dignity.

Gratian withdrew the allowance for Pagan Sacrifices and Prieſts.

Which cauſed them with Maximus the Tyrant to murder him.

18. The Year following was very fatal to Paganiſm, wherein Gratian the Emperour withdrew the former allowance for Sacrifices and Stipends allotted unto Prieſts, and ſo by taking away all incouragement, and removing the Fuel which hitherto maintained the flame, ſtruck at the Root of that Superſtition. For this cauſe (and not for having rejected the Title of Pontifex Maximus, which neither he nor any of his Chriſtian Prædeceſſors ever uſed) his Heathen Subjects might take part with Maximus the Tyrant, by whoſe Treaſon he was this year murdered at Lyons; his Piety and worth is very much extolled by St. Ambroſe, and Auſonius his Schoolmaſter, whom he dignified with the Honour and Imployment of Conſul, and otherwiſe very gratefully rewarded, having as Baronius obſerves, ſo much worth in him, as to underſtand and conſider that Maſters equally with Parents, can never be ſufficiently requited. This Auſonius Gallus was a great Rhetorician, and an excellent Poet, as appears by what he hath written, and a Chriſtian he ſhows himſelf by his Religious Poems, however his Amorous Verſes have procured him, with ſome Readers, the repute of a Pagan; his pains were ſo well beſtowed upon Gratian, that Theodoſius wanting a Tutor for his young Son Arcadius, whom he had named Auguſtus, and aſſumed as his Partner in the Empire, deſired of Gratian that he would ſend to him out of the Weſt, a fit Perſon for ſo great a Truſt. Gratian herewith acquainting Damaſus Biſhop of Rome, he commended to him Arſenius a Deacon of that Church, a Perſon very remarkable for Piety and Learning, who was ſent accordingly to Conſtantinople, when he undertook his charge, Theodoſius giving the Youth into his hands, ſaid, Hence forth thou art more his Father than I. Coming upon them at a time into the School, he found Arcadius ſitting, and Arſenius ſtanding by, as he was teaching him, for which he chode the Maſter, as not maintaining the Authority and Decorum of his place, to whom, when Arſenius anſwered, that it was not fitting he ſhould ſit, and teach an Emperour, Theodoſius out of diſdain, took from his Son the Badge of his Imperial Dignity, cauſed Arſenius to ſit down upon the Throne, and Arcadius to ſtand bareheaded before him, ſaying, Then his Son would be worthy of Empire, if with knowledge, he were alſo indued with Piety.

furius.

In a Synod at Conſtantinople the Hæreſie of the Saccophori is condemned.

19. This year was another Synod ſummoned by Theodoſius, to Conſtantinople, the Decrees of which, againſt the Hæreticks were followed and re-inforced by his Edict, wherein amongſt others, mention is made of the Saccophori, who were the ſame with Maſſalians, and ſo called from wearing Sackcloath, againſt which Hæreticks, one or two Synods were alſo holden about this time. But whilſt Theodoſius thus advanced the Orthodox Faith in the Eaſt, Chriſtian Religion it ſelf was in a little danger in the Weſt, where at this time a great Famine raged, eſpecially in the City of Rome. Symmachus the year following being Præfect of the City, a Man exceedingly affected to Gentiliſm, but otherwiſe of good repute, and exceedingly eloquent, taking the advantage afforded him by the death of Gratian, and Power of Maximus, when he thought Valentinian the young Emperour, would be very unwilling to diſoblige his People, preſented him a Petition in the Name of the Senate, for reſtitution of the Worſhip of the Pagan Gods, put down by the late Laws of Gratian. According to the old Cuſtom of Pagans, who if any diſaſter happened to the Commonwealth, laid the blame upon Chriſtianity, and the neglect of the Gods; he imputed the late Famine to no other cauſe, than the taking away the maintenance of Prieſts, and Veſtal Virgins; but the device was quickly ſmelt out by Ambroſe of Milan, who writing to the Emperour and re-felling all

C.Th.l. 11. & 12. de hæret.

Chriſtianos ad Leones.

Amb. ep. 30.

all the Arguments and Objections of Symmachus, prevailed ſo far as that an abſolute denyal was returned.

Damaſus Biſhop of Rome dies.

A. D. 384. Valentin. II. 9. Theod. 6.

20. This Year, as Baronius gathereth from the Date of certain Reſcripts, died Damaſus Biſhop of Rome, though Marcellinus Comes placeth his death Two years before, at the Month of October. Damaſus Portuenſis in his Book of Popes Lives, of Popes falſely aſcribed to this Biſhop, will have his Death to have happened on the Eleventh day of December, after he had ſitten in that See Seventeen years and three Months wanting Four days. The See was vacant One and thirty days, and then ſucceeded him Siricius a Roman by Birth. About this time Theodoſius taking into his conſideration, that Jews made Slaves of Chriſtians, and many of them thereby became Proſelytes to their Impiety, forbids by an Edict that any Chriſtians be in Servitude to them. And by another preſcribes Arians, Macedonians, Eunomians, and Apollinarians, formerly expelled, who ſtill had the boldneſs to return and boaſt of their Doctrine. In the Weſt Priſcillianus ſtill created trouble to the Orthodox Biſhops, to obviate whoſe Hæreſies, at the importunate Suit of Ithacius a Biſhop and great oppoſer of that Hæretick, a Synod was held at Bourdeaux in Aquitaine, by command of Maximus the Tyrant. So ſoon as Maximus had entred Triers, Ithacius puts up to him great Complaints againſt Priſcillian, wherewith the Emperour (as Severus calls him) throughly moved, writes his Letters to the Præfect of Gall, and the Vicar of Spain, commanding that all Perſons tainted with that Hæreſie, ſhould be conveyed to the Synod at Bourdeaux. Of theſe Inſtantius being brought to his defence, when he could ſay nothing conſiderable for himſelf, was pronounced unworthy of the Epiſcopal Function. Priſcillian from the Biſhops appealed to Maximus, and that by their permiſſion (for which the Hiſtorian blames their Fatherhoods) and therefore to him go both the Criminals and their Accuſers, of whom Idacius and Ithacius Biſhops are much blamed for their too violent Proſecution, and the later as Audacious, Impudent, Talkative, Profuſe, and given much to his Belly, whoſe cuſtom it was to accuſe them that were either Studious, or uſed Faſting and Scleragogy, as the Aſſociates and Diſciples of Priſcillian, and was ſo bold as to object the Crime of Hæreſie to Martin a Biſhop of that time, and a Man to be compared with the Apoſtles themſelves.

Siricius ſucceeds.

*C.Th. l.*3. *tit.*1. §. 1.

*L.*13. de hæret.

A Synod held at Bourdeaux.

*Sulp. Severus Hiſt. l.*2. *p.*174. &c. Edit. Giſſelini.

21. For Martin (Biſhop of Tours) being now at Triers, continually urged Ithacius to deſiſt from this Proſecution, and beſought Maximus to abſtain from the Blood of thoſe Wretches, whom it ſufficed to have Excommunicated by Sentence of the Biſhops, being declared Hæreticks, alledging it was a new and unheard of Crime, for a Sæcular Judge to decide Cauſes of the Church. As long as Martin continued at Triers, the Tryal was deferred, and when he departed, he got from Maximus a Promiſe, that he would not take their Lives, but afterward the Tyrant was drawn to the contrary Perſwaſion by Magnus and Rufus, two Biſhops, and committed the procedure to Evodius a Man bitterly ſevere, who after two Hearings of Priſcillian, wherein he was Convict, and confeſſed he had made Uncleanneſs his buſineſs, kept Meetings of lewd Women by Night, and accuſtomed to Pray naked, he pronounced him Guilty, and committed him to cuſtody till the pleaſure of the Prince was known. Maximus was clearly for condemning him to death, which after Ithacius ſaw reſolved, and the matter brought beyond poſſibility of prevention, to decline the Odium he ſaw would fall upon him, withdrew out of the way. But for Form ſake, to conclude the Proceſs, Maximus appointed another Accuſer to demand Sentence, which was accordingly pronounced, and executed upon Priſcillian, Feliciſſimus, Armenius, Latronianus, and Euchrecia the Wife of Dolphidius the Rhetorician, whoſe Daughter Procula, had been got with Child by Priſcillian. Inſtantius the Biſhop, and Tiberianus, were baniſhed into the Iſland Sylina beyond Brittaine, and others were either put to death, or for a time confined to certain places in Gall.

Wherein Priſcillian and others are condemned and executed.

22. Thus ſaith Severus, were thoſe Men, who were indeed unworthy of Life, by the worſt of Examples, either put to death or baniſhed, this Tyrant Maximus, being the firſt that made Hæreſie Capital, contrary to the judgment not only of Martin, but Ambroſe, Auguſtine and other Pious Men of this Age. And, as it uſually happeneth in this caſe, the Hæreſie of Priſcillian was not only not ſuppreſſed by his death, but more ſtrengthened, and farther propagated. For his Followers, who formerly honoured him as a Saint, now reverenced him as a Martyr. The dead Bodies were conveyed back into Spain, and their Funerals celebrated with great Devotion. It became the greateſt Point of Religion to ſwear by Priſcillian, and amongſt the Orthodox ſuch Differences continued, and ſuch abominable Diſſentions, as could not be ſtilled for Fifteen years. And then, when by reaſon of the diſagreement of Biſhops eſpecially, all things ſeemed to be diſturbed and confounded, every thing being carried either by hatred or Favour, Fear, Inconſtancy, Envy, Faction, Luſt, Avarice, Arrogance, Drowzineſs, and Sloath; at laſt many contended madly, and pertinaciouſly againſt a few diſcreet and ſober Perſons. And in the mean while the People of God, and every good Man, became a by-word, and a mocking ſtock. With theſe words Sulpicius Severus concludes his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, concerning the Excellency whereof, Joſeph Scaliger and Giſſalinus eſpecially, a Learned Phyſician, who publiſhed it with Annotations, are to be conſulted. Though all good Men out of an averſion they have to Vice, and by reaſon we are only ſenſible of preſent things, are apt to eſteem their own times the moſt vitious, yet his complaints confirm much to us the Character which Eraſmus gives of this Age, that It was a matter of Wit to be a Chriſtian, that Faith was rather in their Papers, than their Souls, and there were almoſt as many Creeds, as Profeſſors.

Severus Hiſt. quo priùs & Dial.3. Ambroſ. Ep.27. Aug. in Creſc. l.3. c.50.

Which Severity encreaſes the Hereſie.

Illis temporibus ingenioſa res fuit eſſe Chriſtianum. Illa ætate in chartis erat fides potiùs quam in anima, ac penè tot erant ſymbola quot profeſſores. Præf. in Tom. 2. Hieronymi.

23. Ithacius, who had been the great Proſecuter againſt Priſcillian, continuing at Triers, where ſeveral Biſhops, who approved what he had done, and eſpouſed his cauſe as common, were aſſembled, Martin the Biſhop of Tours was in behalf of ſeveral who had, according to their Allegiance, taken the part of Gratian, conſtrained to go to Court. Maximus who protected the Biſhops, by their advice had reſolved to ſend ſome Officers into Spain, furniſhed with ſufficient Power, to make Inquiſition after Hæreticks, and ſpoil them of their Lives and Eſtates, by which courſe there is no doubt but a very great number of Holy Men would have been deſtroyed, little diſtinction being made amongſt the ſeveral ſorts, judgment being given from the eye alone, and one eſteemed an Hæretick rather for his pale Face or Garment, than his Faith. The Biſhops knowing how little pleaſed Martin would be with theſe things, yet were very much concerned leſt he ſhould refuſe their Communion, as foreſeeing that his Example and Authority would eaſily procure him many Followers. Conſulting therefore with Maximus, they think fit that certain Officers ſhould be ſent to meet him, with orders not to come to the City, except his purpoſe was in a peaceable manner to demean himſelf toward the Biſhops there reſident. He craftily overreacheth them, profeſſing that he came in the Peace of Chriſt, and entring the City by night, went to the Church to his Devotions, and the next day to the Court, to ſollicite the Tyrant in behalf of many Perſons, of whom the chief were Narſes a Count, and Leucadius a Præſident, who both had been of Gratian's Party.

Ad comitatum ire compulſus. Severus. Dial. 3. §. 15.

24. But being as well deſirous to preſerve the Hæreticks, as ſuch Orthodox Chriſtians as would ſuffer with them, he made it his greateſt buſineſs to prevent the diſpatch of the Tribunes into Spain with ſo ſevere a Commiſſion. Maximus held him in ſuſpence a day or two, either for that he would put weight upon the buſineſs, or by reaſon of his implacable diſpoſition, or which was then generally gueſſed, out of Covetouſneſs, to which Vice, although otherwiſe he was indued with many good qualities, as Severus reports, he was much addicted, except in his excuſe it be alledged, that the Treaſury had been exhauſted by former Princes, and the great expence he was put to by

Pia enim erat ſolicitando Martino ut non ſolum Chriſtianos, qui ſub illa erant occaſione teſtandi, ſed ipſos etiam hæreticos liberaret.

Martin Biſhop of Tours perſecuted by the Heretical Biſhops.

by the Civil Wars, and perpetual Marches neceſſitated him to ſuch courſes as were burthenſome to the People. But in the mean time thoſe Biſhops, with whom Martin refuſed to communicate, being ſenſible of the danger to which they ſhould be expoſed, in caſe the earneſtneſs of Theogniſtus, who alone had publickly condemned them, ſhould be backed by the Authority of Martin, come trembling to the Emperour, complaining that Matters thus ſtanding, they were præcondemned and loſt Men, that this Man ought not to have been received within the Walls, who was become not only a Protector of Hæreticks, but their Avenger, and in truth that they had profited nothing by the death of Priſcillian, if Martin might be ſuffered to revenge his Cauſe. In ſumm, they caſt themſelves at his Feet, and with many Tears, and great Lamentations, implore his Royal Authority and Power to be imployed againſt this one Man, who in Conjunction with Theogniſtus, as they had good cauſe to apprehend, might procure the overthrow of their Cauſe and Fortunes.

25. Little wanted of Martin his being condemned to the ſame Lot with the Hæreticks. But though Maximus too much favoured theſe Biſhops, yet he had him in ſo great eſteem and reverence for his Piety, that he reſolved to try another courſe, and therefore talks with him in private very lovingly, and labours to perſwade him that the Priſcillianiſts had been condemned, rather by publick Juſtice, than the Proſecution of the Clergy, and that there was no cauſe why he ſhould ſhun the Communion of Ithacius, and the reſt of his Party: That Theogniſtus had done it more out of Malice, than for any good reaſon, and was ſingular in this Separation; in concluſion, that Ithacius had been acquitted by a Synod, which had met a few days before. Martin being nothing moved with theſe fair words, Maximus was very angry, and ſtarting away from him, gave orders that Executioners ſhould be ſent to diſpatch thoſe for whom he had interceded; which as ſoon as he underſtood, though in the night, he got back into the Court, and promiſed, that in caſe they might be ſpared, and the Journey of the Officers into Spain countermanded, he would communicate with Ithacius. All this was inſtantly granted by Maximus, and the day following Martin, who judged it fit for him to comply, that he might divert the Sword which hung over the Necks of thoſe formerly condemned, communicated with theſe Prælates at the Conſecration of Fælix a moſt Holy Biſhop, and one that deſerved to have been ordained in better times in the opinion of Severus. But the Biſhops having got Martin amongſt them, with all earneſtneſs imaginable preſſed him to ſubſcribe to what they had done, but could not wreſt it from him; He departed the next day, and in his Journey as he much bewailed his communicating with thoſe Men, though for ſo little a ſpace, Severus tells us, that an Angel appeared to him, comforting and exciting him to re-aſſume his former Virtue and Conſtancy. From this time he never communicated with any of Ithacius his Faction, confeſſed afterwards with Tears, that by ſo doing, though but for a moment, yet he had loſt ſome of his former Power over the Evergumeni. And although he lived Sixteen years longer, yet he never came at any Synod, but ever ſhunned the Meetings of Biſhops, being of the ſame judgment herein with Gregory Nazianzen, and ſenſible of the great Corruptions of the times.

And forced to communicate with them.

Sedecim poſtea vixit annos, nullam Synodum adiit, ab omnibus Epiſcoporum conventibus ſe removit

26. The year following being the 385. of our Lord, the Tenth of Valentinian the Second, in the firſt Conſulſhip of Fl. Arcadius the Emperour, and Fl. Banto; the Year after the Birth of Honorius, Timotheus Biſhop of Alexandria departed this Life, and was ſucceeded by Theophilus. Concerning Timotheus this is memorable, that he ordained Ammon a moſt Holy Monk, though to prævent being a Biſhop, he had cut off one of his Ears, alledging, that the Law which was objected to the contrary, had been obſerved by the Jews, and profeſſing that if he found a Man that had loſt his Noſe, but retained his Piety, he ſhould not at all ſtick to ordain him Biſhop. This Year Valentinian the Emperour publiſhed an Edict for releaſing Priſoners at Eaſter, whereat Ambroſe Biſhop of Milan took occaſion to upbraid him with Impriſoning Godly Men

Socr. l.5. c. 12.

Timotheus Biſhop of Alexandria dying, Theophilus ſucceeds.

Balſam.

C. Th. l.8. de indulg. crim.

Men at the ſame time, wherein it was the Cuſtom to ſet Malefactors at Liberty. For the Year following he ſet forth another Edict, whereby he granted to the Arians liberty to meet together, at the Inſtigation and Procurement of Juſtina his Mother, a Woman ſo addicted to that Hæreſie, that ſhe uſed all indeavours poſſible to promote it, and for that purpoſe indeavoured to take from the Catholicks the great Church in Milan, and deliver it to them, which Ambroſe oppoſing, ſhe raiſed a great Perſecution againſt him. Theodoſius in the Eaſt, bent his endeavours againſt Paganiſm, which ſtill ſeemed to revive, and recover ſtrength, notwithſtanding all the fatal ſtroaks it had received. In the ſame Year wherein Valentinian publiſhed his Edict about emptying the Goals, he gave out another Reſcript againſt Idolaters, and ſuch as conſulted the Entrails of Beaſts, for the knowledge of things to come. Yet were the times ſtill ſo bad, and the minds of his Subjects ſtill ſo addicted to that Impiety, that the Temples, and a great part of the Pagan Superſtition, for all theſe Laws, he was conſtrained ſtill to permit, and the year following, he with his two Colleagues, Valentinian and Arcadius, inſtead of diſſolving, decide a Controverſie about the Adminiſtration of the Heatheniſh Rites, in a Conſtitution directed to Florentius the Præfectus Auguſtalis to this purpoſe.

Valentinian favours the Arians in the Weſt.

But Theodoſius endeavours to ſuppreſs them.

C Th. de fide Cath. l. 4.

Paul. in vita Ambr.

Socr. l. 5. c. 11.

C. Th. de Pagan. l. 9.

27. In obtaining the Archyeroſyna, or Chief Prieſt-hood, let him firſt be conſidered, who has done moſt Service in his Country, provided he have not forſaken the Service of the Temples, by applying himſelf to Chriſtian Religion. For it is unſeemly, yea, to ſpeak more truly, unlawful that Temples, and the Solemnities thereof ſhould appertain to their care, the Conſciences of whom have been wrought upon by a true Senſe of Divine Religion, and whom it became, although they were not prohibited, by all means to ſhun ſuch an employment. Given at Conſtantinople on the Sixteenth day of June, Honorius the moſt noble Child (at this time about a Year and three quarters old) and Evodius being Conſuls, viz. A. D. 386. the Eleventh of Valentinian, of Theodoſius the Eighth, the Fourteenth Indiction, of Old Rome the 1139, of the New the 56.

In conſequenda Archieroſyna ille ſic potior, qui patriæ plura præſtiterit, nec tamen à Templorum cultu obſervatione Chriſtianitatis abſceſſerit. Quippe indecorum eſt, imo, ut verius dicamus, illicitum, ad eorum curam Templa, & Templorum ſolemnia pertinere, quorum conſcientiam vera ratio [vera ratio vel veneratio] divinæ Religionis imbuerit, & quos ipſos decebat tale munus, etiamſi non prohiberentur, effugere emiſſa 16. Calend. Jul. Conſtantinop. Honorio NO. P. & Evodio Coſſ. 1. E. A.D. 386. Cod. Th. de decurion. l. 12.

28. This Archyeroſyna or Chief Prieſthood, was not the Præſidency in the College of Prieſts, as ſome have imagined. But thoſe that bore this Office, as we may learn from the Epiſtles of Julian in this Age, had it incumbent upon them to overſee and order the Temples, appoint what was convenient to each, take care of their external Ornament, and govern, and moderate the Prieſts therein Miniſtring. Such Chief Prieſts, in Greek 'Αρχιερεῖς, were of old Scopilianus in Aſia, whoſe Life is written by Philoſtratus, under Julian the Apoſtate, Arſacius in Galatia, Theodorus in Aſia, (to whom he wrote two Epiſtles yet Extant, the 49. and 63.) and Chryſanthius in Lydia, as Euvapius ſignifieth in the Life of Maximus. Thoſe Solemnities of the Pagan Temples (as Tertullian ſtileth them, beſides others) were the Celebrations of Publick and Religious Mirth, and Vows, Feſtival Aſſemblies, Games and Solemnizations of Antient Sports; to which adhered ſomewhat of Gentiliſm, and Superſtition belonging to the Temples. Feaſts and Banquets which were eſpecially univerſally and Religiouſly obſerved on New-years-day, as beſides many more ancient, ſeveral Writers of this Age do teſtifie. Vows made on the Third of January in the Temples, with Feaſts and well-wiſhes for the Health of the Prince. Such alſo were the Saturnalia, the Brumæ, or, as the Canon of the Synod in Trullo hath it, he Bromalia, celebrated in Honour of Bacchus, Syrnamed Bromius, and the Sacrifices of the Luſtra. Theſe, and ſuch like, were the Pagan Solemnities, to the obſervation and care of which, the Gentiles endeavoured at this time to force the Chriſtians, who alſo many of them of their own accord joyned in the Celebration of thoſe Myſteries, whereof the Chriſtian Writers of thoſe times complain, and as Tertullian of old exhorted Chriſtians to fly from ſuch Impurities, ſo both Synods and Emperours by Canons and Laws endeavoured to obviate this their Scandalous and (in many reſpects) pernicious Practice.

Archyeroſyna what.

Vide Jacob. Gothofredum ubi ſupra.

Aug. Serm. 6. de urbis Domini

De fidelatria c. 17.

29. For this Archyeroſyna or Superſtitious employment being conferred on ſuch as were Senators, and bore the greateſt Offices in Cities, or had performed beſt ſervice to their Prince and Country was much ſought after, even by ſome Chriſtians themſelves, who ſtudied more their reputation than the diſcharge of a good Conſcience, eaſily being perſwaded, that Prævarication and unlawful Communication in Heatheniſh Myſteries, would not ſtick to this Action, which only reſpected the Decency and order of Adminiſtration, and was void of Superſtition in it ſelf; however it had regard to the Pagan Temples, and the Solemnities thereof. Now by the Inſcription or Direction of this Law, to the Præfect of Ægypt (who as we formerly ſhewed, was called Auguſtalis) this vicious Cuſtom, as we may learn, was moſt prævalent in that Country, which having of old, been more than any other addicted to Idolatry, was ſtill more tenacious of it, as appears by a Law made the præceding Year, which notwithſtanding yet the year following, viz. A. D. 387. So little Reformation was wrought, and former Conſtitutions ſo little obeyed, that to inforce them was ſent Cynegius the Præfectus Prætorio into Ægypt, who prohibited Sacrifices, as Zozimus with great grief witneſſeth, as alſo Idacius. And notwithſtanding all thoſe indeavours, yet were not theſe Sacrifices wholly forborne, and laid aſide, till the Year 391. through the indeavours of Evagrius the Præfectus Auguſtalis, and the Count of Ægypt, at the earneſt importunity and procurement of Theophilus the Biſhop of Alexandria, as appears from Eurapius, in the life Ædeſius. Zozimus, our own Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and a Law Extant in the Code of Theodoſius. Neither is it to be doubted, but that Theophilus, by whoſe mediation and indeavours, Sacrifices at length were prohibited and taken way, procured alſo that the Chriſtians, within his Patriarchal care, ſhould be forbidden to diſcharge any more this Pagan and ſcandalous Office, whereof we treat.

C. Th. de Paganis l. 9.

L. 4 p. 764.

Chron.

Pp 73. & 77. L. 5. p 799

11. Cod. Th. de Paganis.

This Office of chief Prieſthood forbidden to Chriſtians.

30. For although they themſelves defiled not their Perſons and profeſſion, by the Superſtitious Worſhip uſed in and about the Temples, and neither thoſe Solemnities full of groſs Idolatry and Pagan Impieties, yet as the Law expreſſeth it, it was unſeemly, or to ſpeak more truly, unlawful for Chriſtians to have charge of Temples and their Solemnities, who ought to ſhun ſuch an employment, though not thereto obliged by any prohibition. This becoming in thoſe times a caſe of Conſcience; the practice was condemned as unlawful by Gratian, as Zozimus the Hiſtorian witneſſeth, and Tertullian had long before ſo decided it, in ſeveral places of his Book concerning Idolatry, for this charge, though it could not be called Sacrificing, yet as he terms it, might juſtly have the name of Adſacrificium, which word being rightly adjudged, and reſtored to him by a learned Man, he might as well uſe as Admilitia is uſed by the Lawyer. Had theſe Solemnities been harmleſs mirths, deſtined only to Recreation, no ſuch prohibition had been laid on Chriſtians, but the very end and deſign of them was ſuperſtitious and Pagan. As the Celebration of Games and votive Sports were in honour of their Gods obſerved, in memory of their Nativities, and Dedication of their Temples, as Lactantius writes, who thereupon concludes, that what Chriſtian ſoever was preſent at the Spectacula, or ſhews which were made for a Religious end, ſuch an one departed from the worſhip of the true God, and betook himſelf to the Pagan Deities, whoſe Nativities and Feſtivals he ſo Celebrated. For the Pagan uſed to keep holy the Eucania, or days of the dedication of their Temples, and had their Feaſts and Banquets (Sympoſia) in honour of their Gods; whence alſo proceeded their Confraternities.

All Pagan Superſtition for bidden to Chriſtians.

Ad cap. 16. L. vaic. π de offic. Præf. præt. Admilitia commilitium ſeu Συστρατεία ut ad ſacrificium.

Συνθυσία.

Συμπόσια

Φρατρεῖαι.

31. As Chriſtians of themſelves were too forward to undertake the charge of Archyeroſyna, tempted with the reputation thereof, ſo at theſe Games and Feaſts, they were ſtill conſtrained by the Pagans to be preſent, in other Countries beſides Ægypt, inſomuch that the African Fathers a little after, about the year 399. could not but take notice of it, and ordain that the Emperours be Petitioned, that ſeeing in many places, theſe Feaſts were kept contrary to Divine Præcepts, and which taking their Original from Pagan Error, Chriſtians were compelled by Ethnicks to Celebrate, whereupon another Perſecution ſeemed ſecretly to be made under Chriſtian Emperours, they would pleaſe to forbid ſuch Cuſtoms, and cauſe them

Cuſtoms of Pagan Original or reſemblance forbidden to Chriſtians.

In concil. Cath. ſub. Honorio. cc. 60. & 61. cod. Afr. Ἐκ τῆς ἐθνικῆς πλάνης προσενεχθέντα Ἀρχὴν ἐσχηκότα ἐςὶ τῆς ἑλληνικῆς πλάνης them to be prohibited in Cities and Countries, under a certain Penalty, alledging, that Chriſtians ought not to be compelled to thoſe things which are contrary to Gods command, and in doing which they ſhould incurr great and apparent danger of their Souls. By ſuch like means as this, it came to paſs, that whereas by permiſſion of ſome Conſtitutions of Chriſtian Princes, thoſe votive Feaſts and Solemnities had been obſerved through the parts of Africk, with this caution, that they ſhould be Celebrated without any Sacrifice, or other damnable Superſtition, as Honorius limits them (which Law is ſtrangely retained in Juſtinian's Code) yet Nine years after they were utterly removed, taken away, and prohibited by the ſame Emperour in another Conſtitution, together with the other Reliques of Pagan Superſtition, who makes it utterly unlawful to hold thoſe Feaſts, or any other Solemnities; giving unto Biſhops Power and Authority to prohibit them, by the ſame Law which Tribonianus, though he retained the former, yet hath omitted in Juſtinian's Code.

Cod. th. de Paganis l. 17.

C. th. de Paganis l. 19.

32. So jealous were the Fathers of the Church, leaſt Chriſtians ſhould defile themſelves with Pagan Impurities, and thereby give matter of ſcandal both to Infidels and Profeſſors, that by their own Writings, Canons, and Imperial Conſtitutions by them procured, they laboured by all means to cauſe them to ſhun all appearance of evil in this reſpect. And for thoſe reaſons they were alſo ſometimes ſo moved, as to condemn, forbid, and put down ſuch Cuſtoms and Actions, as were taken from Pagan Præcedents, though well intended and directed to a good end. So Ambroſe Biſhop of Milan at this time, perceiving how by the heedleſneſs of Church Officers, many Pagan Cuſtoms had crept in amongſt the Chriſtian Rites, both ſet himſelf withall his might to eradicate them, and with all expedition; therefore he not only declaims earneſtly againſt ſuch as ſuperſtitiouſly obſerved the Calends, or firſt day of January, procured, that on that day wherein the Pagans Feaſted, Chriſtians ſhould faſt and afflict themſelves, and cauſed Acclamations and Shoutings which had wont to be made at the eclipſe of the Moon, to be wholly left off, but aboliſhed the Agapæ or Chriſtian Feaſts wont to be kept in Churches, becauſe they had ſome reſemblance to the Pagan Parentalia; by whoſe example Auguſtine, when Biſhop of Hippo, was ſo moved, that he alſo procured them to be put down in the Church of Africk. Yet notwithſtanding was it impoſſible to ſhake off ſuddenly all that might ſeem to have reſemblance to Pagan Cuſtoms. For thoſe habits ſtick cloſe to Nature, wherewith ſhe is firſt of all endowed; as an empty and hungry ſtomack, moſt imbraces and ſucks ſuch Juices as are firſt powred into it, and the Veſſel retains that ſavour which being yet freſh and new, it had firſt imbibed with the Liquor, ſo doth the mind of Man moſt delight it ſelf with the memory of thoſe things, places, and times, wherewith in its Infancy it was acquainted, and however education and more ripe judgment may inform the underſtanding, yet the fancy is ſtill tickled, and the affections inſenſibly overpowered, by ſuch apprehenſions as were moſt familiar and coetaneous to their ſimple and naked Originals.

Idem ſerm. 30.

Aug. conf. 6. 2. Ep. 64. conc. Carth. 3. c. 30.

33. Hence it came to paſs, that notwithſtaning all thoſe Laws, Canons, and Præcepts, yet old Cuſtoms were ſtill continued for a long time after, of ſuch a Nature and Deſign, as could not but ſavour of Pagan Superſtition, as worſhipping of the Sun, with others which we may have occaſion hereafter to mention. And the Fathers of the Church, eſpecially the Roman Biſhops were content to take off the Profeſſors of Chriſtian Religion from ſuch practices, by not only permitting them to apply certain Cuſtoms to Chriſtian ends and purpoſes, but to Inſtitute alſo and Ordain ſeveral Rites and Ceremonies which had ſome reſemblances to Ancient though Ethnick patterns, as appears abundantly from what Polydore, Virgil, and others have written of their Originals. And if in their Natures they were indifferent, if honeſt in their Deſigns, effectual in their Methods, for removal of impious Cuſtoms, if every way innocent, and in the main conducing to make impreſſions in the minds of Men, and introduce ſuch Ideas as would obliterate old præjudices, and eſtabliſh Pious affections, they were ſo many arguments of Chriſtian Prudence, which ought to moderate, and ſway the Councils of thoſe in Authority, according to time and place, the exigencie of affairs, and the good or ill uſage of ſuch Cuſtoms and Inſtitutions. Julian made uſe of ſuch Chriſtian Rites as he ſaw were prudent, and conducing in their very Nature and drift to order, ſettlement, and exegetical impreſſions, and why might not Chriſtian Governours, as well as he, aſſume the quality of the Serpent, which is not inconſiſtent with the nature of the Dove? and having to do with ſuch Perſons as had been inured to ſuch Cuſtoms, by a change of the deſign, and propoſal of a new end, render them not only Innocent, but ſignificative, and edifying, all Creatures being the poſſeſſion of God, and the uſe of them as applicable to his Glory, as to vain and impious purpoſes.

Several Pagan Rites and Ceremonies nevertheleſs uſed.

34. But as there are no certain and particular Rules for individual actions, theſe things being left to the care and charge of Governours, who are only limited by decency and order, and confined within the borders of Ædification; ſo accordingly were they affected, and ſteered the Helm as variouſly directed by Comportment of things, times, and Perſons, in thoſe primitive and more pure Ages of the Church; yet may we obſerve that the vulgar, as in all other caſes, ſo in this, would be Maſter of Words, Phraſes, and Terms. Therefore though Pope Silveſter, as Polydore Vergil is of opinion, out of hatred both to the Names and Memory of the Gentile Gods, gave order that the days of the week ſhould be called by the name of Feriæ, and the diſtinction to be made by Prima Feria, Secunda Feria, Tertia Feria, &c. Yet ſo that the Sabbath and the Lords-day ſhould hold their Jewiſh and Chriſtian Names, and Places, as they did before; this became no certain Rule to Chriſtians, Writers, or others. For though that day we ſtill call Saturday, had amongſt them the name of Sabbath, which was peculiar to it, and applicable to no other day whatſoever, for many Ages; and although that day on which our Saviour aroſe from the Dead, be by St. John called by the name of the Lords-day, by St. Paul the firſt day of the Week; yet Juſtin Martyr gives it the appellation of Sunday, which it ſtill reſerves, as alſo Tertullian by whom it is ſtiled ſomtimes Dies Solis, and ſometimes Dominicus, and in many Edicts of Chriſtian Emperours, in the Synod held at Dixſoluſinum, in the lower Bavaria, A.D. 772. It hath alſo the name of Sunday, not to ſpeak of Writers, and the ordinary ſpeech of the Vulgar, with which this ſame name hath prevailed in all Ages downward. In like manner the Months have retained their ancient Pagan names, though at firſt given to them, as well as to the days of the Week in memory of their Fictitious Deities, the uſe of which, neither as to the one, nor other ſort, did the Fathers forbid and condemn, although perhaps they could better have liked others; for if we keep the name of March, and yet think not on Mars, why may we not, ſaith a Father*, preſerve the name of Saturday, without thinking of Saturn. So long hath this Cuſtom of Speech continued, that the innocency of the preſent deſign, together with the ignorance of the Vulgar, as to its ancient ſignification, may juſtly remove all ſuſpition of the prophaneneſs, and conſequently the unlawful uſe thereof. The Holy Ghoſt it ſelf hath not diſdained to apply unto ſacred purpoſes, words of Art uſed by Pagan Writers, as Paradiſus, Hades, Apoſtolus and Clerus.

De invent. l. 5. c. 6.

The days.

ἡ τȣ̃ ἡλίȣ ἡμερα

And Months called as by them.

* Aug. contra. Fauſt. l. 19. c. 5.

35. But to return to the ſeries of Church matters, in this ſame year, which was the Eighth of Theodoſius, dyed Cyril Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who had much experienced the viciſſitude of humane affairs, and the condition which attends thoſe that will live Godly in this preſent World, having been often driven from his See, and reſtored again, from the times of Conſtantius. There are extant certain Catechiſmes, which, as it's ſaid, he made in his Youth, but are ſuſpected. He was ſucceeded by John, who as Hierome writes, (inveighing againſt him, under the name of Prætextatus) had formerly joyned with the Arians and Macedonians, and now of late, had been drawn off to the Orthodox Party, by the hopes of a Biſhoprick. This year was alſo the laſt of Philaſtrius Biſhop of Brixia, who wrote againſt Hæreſies a good Book, wherein yet go under that name certain Tenents which this Age will eaſily excuſe from error. Auguſtine by this time was reclaimed from his erronious and looſe courſe of life, having the præceding year, and the Thirty firſt of his Age, began at Milan to be touched with a ſenſe of the Orthodox Faith, and reality of Chriſtian Religion. For there wanting a Profeſſor of Cyril Biſhop of Jeruſalem dyes.

Hieron. de ſcript. Eccl.

John ſucceeds him.

Idem ep. 61.

Philaſtrius Biſhop of Brixia dyes.

Aug. confeſſ. l. 8. c. 9. & 5. 13. & 6. 11.

Auguſtine reformed from his looſe courſe of life.

Ep. 84. de doctr. Chriſt. 25. Retract. 2. 4

Rhetorick in that City, and Symmachus Præfect of Rome, being deſired to ſend a Man fit for ſuch an imployment, by the aſſiſtance of his Friends the Manichees, he procured to be ſent, being now Thirty years of Age, where falling into the Company and Familiarity of Ambroſe the Biſhop, by degrees he began to apprehend and diſlike the errors of the Manichees; yet for the time, this change conduced ſo little to his proficiency in Chriſtian Religion, that he did but make an alteration hereby to Antichriſtianiſm, being much inveighled by the Academick Philoſophers, who at this time were in great eſteem, and thereby hindred the progreſs of the Chriſtian Doctrine. For they openly ſtuck not to affirm, that Chriſtians had taken many Sentences out of Plato, and particularly St. John the Evangeliſt the Exordium of his Goſpel, foraſmuch as Plato talks much about the word or λόγος, but in ſo vaſt a different manner from that word, as it is ſacred in Chriſtianity, that ſuch as are but meanly converſant in both, may eaſily diſcover the cheat, that it is in vain to inſtance in particulars; however this prejudice was in this Age whereof we write, none of the leaſt remora's to the progreſs of Chriſtianity, though ſome of later times have ſo canted in Platonick expreſſions, and doated upon his miſapprehended Myſteries, as to conjoyn them with the Magnalia of our Faith; and more miſchief had been the effect hereof, had not Ambroſe obviated the deſign, by his Books written concerning Philoſophy, againſt Plato and thoſe his Followers, wherewith Auguſtine when older and wiſer, confeſſed himſelf much edified.

Confeſſ. paſſim.

Is Baptized at Milan by Ambroſe the Biſhop.

Vide poſſ. in vita Aug.

36. Monica his Mother, following him to Milan, omitted no means ſhe thought proper for his effectual Converſion, which was better and more eaſily accompliſhed, after the return of his Concubine into Africk, by whom he had a Son called Adeodatus. At the entrance of Banto upon his Conſulſhip, he made a Panygyrical Oration, before Valentinian the Emperour, upon occaſion whereof, afterward, he bewailed the ſtate of his Soul, at that time, which with ſome impetuoſity was carried out in the Proſecution of Carnal and Ambitious purpoſes, and wholly taken up in a diſquiſition of Academick queſtions, and Platonick Speculations. But at length, by the reading of St. Paul, and the fruitful converſation of Simplicianus, a Pious and Learned Prieſt, it pleaſed God, by degrees, to inſtil into his heart the knowledge and love of the truth, ſo that being as we ſaid converted in the Thirty firſt year of his Age, after he had continued a Catechumenus for two years or more, he was baptized in his Thirty fourth year at Milan, by Ambroſe the Biſhop of that City, in the Feaſt of Eaſter, together with Adeodatus his natural Son, a Youth of about Fifteen years of age, of extraordinary parts, who dyed not long after in Africk, and Alipius of Hippo his dear Friend; after which they departed for Rome, and there, expected till the year following, a convenient time for returning into their own Countries.

The ſeveral Ranks and Degrees of the primitive Converts.

As Audientes.

Euſeb. l. 6. c. 2.

37. We have often made mention of the Catechumeni, concerning whom, though the Reader, by the Circumſtances of the Story, may apprehend ſufficient for the knowledge of their condition in reference to Chriſtianity, yet for his clearer inſight into theſe Eccleſiaſtical affairs, it ſeems requiſite to ſpeak ſomthing more, both concerning thoſe Perſons, and other ſorts, and ranks of Men, as they ſtood in relation to the Church. For there were ſeveral ranks and degrees, through which the ancient Chriſtians thought fit that Converts ſhould paſs, for the information of their minds, and the ſubjecting of their Spirits to the holy Diſcipline, before they would admit them to the Sacrament of Baptiſm, the Euchariſt, or Holy Orders. The firſt rank was of thoſe, who were to learn the firſt Rudiments of Chriſtianity, who were admitted to their Schools to hear the Chatechiſts (ſuch as Origen was in the Church of Alexandria, though not in Holy Orders, and but Ten years of Age) concerning whom Euſebius writes, that many Gentiles came to hear him Preach, and were converted, as Plutarch and Heracles his Brother, the firſt of whom ſuffered Martyrdom, and the other became afterward Biſhop of Alexandria. Such as were bred up thus in Schools, were called Educati, and they and others being admitted to Homilies, Expoſitions, and Inſtructions in the Church, were called Audientes, this being the firſt ſtep in the Chriſtian School, and it pleaſed God, by his Preaching and Inſtruction to convince ſuch as came rather for Novelty many times, than love to the truth, or perhaps to Scoff and Deride; if they began to like of the way, and judge it worth their while to lift at (though not juſt take up) the Croſs of Chriſt, they were admitted to the rank of Catechumeni, for a more clear and full underſtanding of the Myſteries of Faith, being permitted to ſtand in a more convenient and honourable place, than the Audientes, and as appertaining to the Church, though not yet fully received into her boſome, they were ſigned with the ſign of the Croſs at their Admiſſion. Theſe were the Chriſtian Embrio's, who increaſing in the knowledge and the Holy Diſcipline, received from the Church ſuch wholſome nouriſhment, as thereby to grow to the perfection of Children, vivacious and ready for the birth at what time they were regenerated by Baptiſm.

Catechumeni.

Ambr. de iis qui init. c 4. Aug. in lib. de ſymbolo ad Catechum.

Competentes.

Symbolum etiam placuit ab omnibus Eccleſiis una die, id eſt ante octo dies dominicæ Reſurrectionis publice in Eccleſia competentibus prædicari

Perſicus. Demonſtr. Problem. p. 31.

Ambro. de Sacrum. l. 2. c. 7.

Tertull. adverſus Prox. c. 16.

Baſil. de Sp. Sancto l. 2. c. 15. & 27.

Concil. Tolet. 4. c. 5.

De conſecr. diſt. 4. c Papa eſt tantum.

Greg. l. 1. Ep. 41

38. For which, when they were thought fit, and ſufficiently inſtructed, they gave up their names to the Biſhop, and humbly deſiring to be partakers of that Holy Sacrament, they had the name of Competentes, to whom the Ninth Canon of the Council of Agatha ordains, that the Creed be publickly Preached in the Church Eight days before Eaſter, or on Palm-Sunday, which was performed in that part called Baptiſterium, the place where the Font ſtood. This Creed (which was not read at the Service to which the Catechumeni were admitted) they were thoroughly to learn and underſtand, and for thoſe days intervening before Eaſter, to faſt and abſtain wholly from Corporal Pleaſures, as a means for Humiliation and Præparation to ſo ſolemn an Ordinance. On Eaſter Eve in ſome eminent place they recited the Creed, the Articles whereof (of the Apoſtles Creed) were not at this time whereof we write digeſted into that order and method which they now retain, it being obſerved by Learned Men, that St. Auguſtine in his Book concerning the Creed to the Catechumeni, therein neither maketh mention of the deſcent into Hell, neither of Life Everlaſting. The Party being brought to the Font, it was demanded of him, if he believed in God the Father, and upon anſwer, that he believed he was dipped once; then was he asked, whether he believed in Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, and upon the reply, being dipped the ſecond time, the laſt demand was, if he believed in the Holy Ghoſt, and upon the like return, the dipping was the third time repeated: This Cuſtom of dipping thrice in the more Primitive times, was introduced in remembrance of the Reſurrection of Chriſt on the Third day, afterward, to ſignifie the Bleſſed Trinity in oppoſition of the Arian Tenents. In proceſs of time, when Hæreticks abuſed this Threefold dipping, to ſignifie Three Natures of the Three Perſons, Gregory the Firſt, being conſulted by Leander a Spaniſh Biſhop, declared, that whether the Party were dipped Thrice or but once, he received that Sacrament, the Threefold Action ſignifying the Three days Sepulture of Chriſt, and the Three Perſons in the Bleſſed Trinity; ſo alſo one ſingle Act denoting the Unity of Subſtance in the Trinity of Perſons. But leſt by complying with the Cuſtom of Hæreticks who dipped Thrice, they might ſeem to conſent to their deſign, he adviſed, that in Spain the Baptized Perſon ſhould be but once dipped. Which Advice was afterward confirmed and inforced by the Fathers of the Fourth Council of Toledo.

39. The Subſtantial part of the Sacrament being performed by dipping (whether Once or Thrice) in the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, having been enjoyned to renounce the Devil and all his Works, the Pomp and Vanity of the World, they were Signed with the Sign of the Croſs, by which Solemn Ceremony, the Ancient Chriſtians teſtified their Faith in the Croſs, that is, the Death of Chriſt, being not aſhamed to own him for their God and Saviour, even by ſuch a Token as was matter of Scandal to the World, and thereby they would alſo excite themſelves, and admoniſh thoſe newly initiated, to a remembrance of their duty ingaged in this Virtual Stipulation, and to diſcharge their Baptiſmal Vow. That they might better perform this duty, they were aſſiſted by Confirmation, wherein were uſed Prayer, and Impoſition of Hands, which if uſeful then for thoſe that were Perſons of full Age, hath this advantage beſides in ſuch as are Baptized Infants, that now as it were by a repeated Act, they renew their Baptiſmal Vow, and take upon themſelves, what others in their names had promiſed, Inſtructi, Neophyti. Tirones.

Fideles.

a ſtrong inducement and tye upon them to diſcharge that duty which now they have owned, and to which they have publickly profeſſed to adhere. Being thus Baptized and made Chriſtians, they were termed, Inſtructi, Neophyti, and by alluſion to the Sæcular Warfare, Tirones. To expreſs the Effects of Baptiſm, they wore White Garments, till the Octaves of Eaſter, the Lords-day following, or Low-Sunday, which hereupon was called Dominica in Albis. Now were they reckoned amongſt the Fideles or Faithful, being permitted to ſtay after the Sermons and Reading of the Scriptures, allowed to behold the Holy Myſteries of the Altar, and partake of the Lords Table, all which had been denied to them when Catechumeni, to whom after the ſaid Sermons and Readings, Miſſa eſt was pronounced, being not permitted to view the Sacraments. Yet were not thoſe Novices for all this, permitted ſuddenly to enter into Holy Orders, it being againſt expreſs Canons, for ſuch to be made Prieſts and Biſhops, although in the caſe of St. Ambroſe and ſome others, the publick utility procured a Diſpenſation and Exception to this General Rule.

Aug.Confeſſ. Poſſid.in vita.

Lib. 1.

Gregory Nazianzen dies.

Græcus codex vatican. apud Bar. ad A. D. 389.

40. But (to return from this Digreſſion) the Year following, wherein Timaſius and Promotus were Conſuls, the Fourteenth of Valentinian the Second, and the Eleventh of Theodoſius A. D. 389. Auguſtine having wintered at Rome, paſſed down to Oſtra, intending there to Sail over into Africk, but there he was kept for ſome time by the Sickneſs of his Mother Monica, which Pious Matron here ended her days. Having performed the laſt Offices of Duty to her, he ſailed over with a proſperous Gale, together with Alipius and Evodius his Companions, who accompanied him into the Country, where they ſpent their time in diſcharge of all Godly Exerciſes, and Auguſtine wrote ſeveral Books before he entred into the Orders of Prieſthood, which he mentioneth in his Retractations. This ſame Year alſo departed to a better Life, in the Sixty fifth Year of his Age, Gregory Nazianzen Syrnamed the Divine, his Death happening Three Years before St. Hierome wrote his Book concerning Eccleſiaſtical Writers, which the Author himſelf affirms to have been in the Fourteenth Year of Theodoſius. He was of a middle Stature, a ſweet and pleaſant aſpect, ſomething pale, his Hair on his Head very thin, yet his Beard thick, his Noſe ſomewhat flat, eye-brows high, his right Eye being a little contracted by a Skar. Though he ſeemed to be of a robuſt Conſtitution, yet was he ſorely broken by continual pains of the Gout, and other Infirmities, which confining him to his Bed, he therein refreſhed himſelf with ſeveral Elegant and Witty Poems made concerning himſelf upon various Occaſions, of which moſt are yet Extant. He complains not ſo much of his Bodily Infirmities, as the pricks of the Fleſh wherewith he was ſorely afflicted, which having eaſily conquered in his Youth, by all the means and endeavours he could uſe, he could very hardly ſubdue in his old Age. He had made his Teſtament ſome years before, by which he gave all he had to the uſe of the Poor of the Church of Nazianzen, except certain Legacies left to his Kindred. Therein mentioning Alypiana by the Name of his Daughter, and Meletius his Son in Law; Baronius is careful to put us in mind, that neither was ſhe indeed his true Daughter, nor he his Son in Law, foraſmuch as he himſelf profeſſeth, that he retained his Virginity inviolable. But ſhe, together with Eugenia and Nonna, were the Daughters of Gorgonia his Siſter, Married to Vitalianus, to whom ſhe bare alſo Two Sons Peter and Phocas. Alypiana was Married to Nicobulus an eminent Perſon, and was the Mother of Nicobulus the Younger, of whom Gregory alſo maketh mention. But although Nazianzen being a Biſhop, had no Children, yet his Father had, who was a Biſhop too, and begot them in Wedlock after he was initiated in the Holy Orders, which we are content, ſeeing he himſelf hath no mind to it, to obſerve for the Cardinal. Amongſt his Works which paſs under the Name of Nazianzen, the Tragedy doth not at all ſavour of his Style, nor obſerves the ſtrict Rule of Iambicks, according to his Cuſtom, imitating rather Euripides as our Fulke hath obſerved.

Several Edicts of Theodoſius.

C. Th. l. 18. de hæret. l. 11. de Malef.
C. Th. l. 5. de paſt.
L. 19. de hæret.

41. About this preſent time, Theodoſius the Emperour gave out a Reſcript againſt the Manichees, aſwell inhabiting in the City as other places, Commanding that “ Every where they ſhould be expelled. Another Edict he publiſhed at Rome “ againſt Enchanters. Another at Milan, Forbidding execution of Malefactours “ in Lent, wherein abſolution of Souls (as he Phraſeth it) is expected: And “ at the ſame place by another Reſcript in the month of November he Prohi“ bits the Aſſemblies of all Heretical Clerks. But as the Emperour took care for the checking of thoſe new roots of bitterneſs, which elſe would have ſprouted more, and endangered the true and genuine Corn, ſo this year he laboured as much for the eradication of the old ſtock of Paganiſm, which notwithſtanding all the Blows it had received, yet ever and anon ſeemed again to take freſh Root and bloſſome: Symmachus the famous Senatour and Oratour having clawed him by a Panegyrick, as he had formerly flattered the Tyrant Maximus, thought he had brought him by his pleaſing Language into ſo good an humour, that he dared to requeſt of him, that the Altar of Victory formerly in the Senate Houſe might be reſtored. Hereat he conceived ſuch Indignation againſt him, that he Baniſhed him his Preſence; and although afterward he was ſo far reconciled to him either through his Apology of the Mediation of a Novation Biſhop (as Socrates would have it) as both to paſs by the Offence, and the following year to honour him with the Title of Conſul, yet he proceeded more vigorouſly againſt that Superſtition, for which he had interceded. For it appears from Prudentius the Poet, that after his arrival at Rome he made it his chiefeſt care to purge that City from Paganiſh Superſtition and Idolatry, taking order with the Citizens, that Sacrifices and Heatheniſh Feſtivities ſhould be aboliſhed, and the Statues of Idols be broken in pieces, except ſuch as were moſt notable for the exquiſiteneſs of the Workmanſhip and fame of the Artificers.

Who endeavours to ſuppreſs Paganiſm.

Socr. l. 5. c. 14. Prudent. carm. adverſus Symmachum.

42. Hence it came to paſs, to the great grief of the Pagans, that the Capitol was deprived of its Gods, the Neſts where they had harboured, being all rent, and broken. And if Zozimus ſays true, Avarice cloathed it ſelf with the appearance of Zeal; as it ever happens in Reformations: For Stilico, he tells us, took away the Plates of Gold from the Door of the Capitol, and his Wife Serena, depriving Rhea the Mother of the Gods, of thoſe Jewels which hung about her neck, apply'd them to her own private uſe and ornament. But had the Chriſtian zeal of Theodoſius ſtayed here, the Pagans had not ſorrowed to ſo high a degree. Still remained the Temple of Serapis at Alexandria, one of the greateſt Marks and Encouragements of their ſuperſtition yet ſtanding, famous throughout the whole World for the ſtatelineſs of its Structure, the Solemnity of its Worſhip, and the antiquity thereof; but this very Temple this ſame year, by command of the Emperour, was utterly deſtroyed. The Pagans of Ægypt (as we noted before) were of all others moſt tenacious of their Heatheniſh Rites, and comported themſelves leſs than any others to the practice and courſe of the preſent times, not forbearing to teſtifie their diſlike by extravagant practices upon occaſion, as they did at this ſeaſon, raiſing great Stirs and Tumults againſt the Chriſtians their Neighbours, who had diſcovered and laid open the wickedneſs of ſome of their Gentile Myſteries. The deſtruction of the Temple had been predicted by Beſſarion an Abbat, as alſo by Antoninus an Ethnick Philoſopher or Magician, which foretelling of his did very much incourage and confirm the Pagans, and open their Mouths in pleading for their Gods, though otherwiſe the loſs they had ſuſtained by the deſtruction of their Temple, had ſhut them with Shame and Conſternation. This gave occaſion to St. Auguſtine to write a Book concerning the Divination of Spirits, as he himſelf teſtifieth at the beginning of that Work.

Lib. 5.

Demoliſhing the Temple of Serapis at Alexandria.

Ruffin. Marcellinus.

Eunapius in vita Ædeſii.

Which very much inrages the Pagans.

43. What indignation was conceived by the Pagans, for the ruine of this famous Temple, appears from Eunapius Sardianus the Compiler of the Lives of Philoſophers, a Man extremely addicted to Heatheniſh Superſtitions and Magical Arts, and who lived at this time whereof we write. He rails exceedingly againſt Theophilus, whom he calls a Piacular Man, and the reſt that were employed in that work deriding them for making War againſt the Stones, Statues, with other Materials, and twitting them for their Avarice, Sacrilege and Impiety, in ſpoiling the place of its rich Ornaments and Treaſure. But he hath no patience when he comes to relate how into theſe ſacred places, as he calls them, were Chriſtian Monks introduced, men in appearance (ſaith he) but living as filthily as Swine. He adds, that they did publickly commit infinite and unſpeakable Villanies, yet was it held a piece of Piety in them to Conculcate and defile the eſteem and reverence of the Holy place; for at that time (ſo he goes on) every one that wore Black, and ſhamed not to appear publickly in bad Cloathes, obtained a certain Tyrannical kind of Authority, into ſuch an opinion of Vertue was that ſort of men advanced, of whom alſo is ſpoken in the Commentaries of Univerſal Hiſtory. They placed Monks (ſo he proceeds in his Ethnick fury) at Canobus, that for Gods who are ſeen no otherwiſe than by the mind, they might give divine Honours to Slaves and Flagitious perſons, for they ſhewed for Gods the ſeaſoned and ſalted Heads of ſuch, as for the multitude of Villanies, had by the Judges been put to death, to thoſe they bowed the Knee, thoſe they received into the number of Gods appearing all ragged and naſty at their Sepulchres: Amongſt theſe ſome were Martyrs, others Deacons, and were accounted Meſſengers and Arbitratours of Prayers and Petitions with the Gods, whereas they were perfidious Slaves, ignominiouſly ſubjected to Stripes, and bearing Scars in their Bodies, the Marks and Tokens of their Wickedneſs and Villanies. Yet ſuch Gods doth the Earth bring forth. Thus the Impious Wretch out of his blaſphemous mouth belcheth Lies and Slanders againſt the glorious Martyrs; a very fit Authour for the Cardinal Annaliſt to uſe in behalf of his Catholick Religion and Worſhip of Relicks, againſt the Hereticks of this Age (us poor Proteſtants) if all be conſidered: Juſt ſuch another as Apion or Tacitus, or ſome ſuch lying and railing Rabſhekah, in the Jewiſh Matters.

44. But Ruffinus hath deſcribed, together with this moſt Magnificent Temple, L. 2. c. 22, &c. theſe moſt Flagitious Myſteries wont to be celebrated with thoſe privy Frauds therein uſed to deceive the People. Socrates writes, how Theophilus the Biſhop L. 5. c. 16, 17. of Alexandria being authorized by the Emperour to deſtroy theſe Cages of unclean Beaſts, ſhewed forth to the open face of the World the vain and ridiculous Practices uſed both in the Temple of Serapis and others, cauſing ſuch things among them as reſembled the Yards of men to be carried through the Forum, to their utter Shame and Ignominy. That the Pagans inhabiting Alexandria, and above the reſt ſuch as profeſſed Philoſophy, ſeeing how things went, could no longer contain themſelves, but added new and far more grievous Offences to their former Acts, both Tragical and exceeding in Cruelty. They all jointly ſet upon the Chriſtians, who ſtanding upon their defence, a great Fray enſued, wherein died a far greater number of the Faithfull, than of the Pagans, who now in their cold bloud conſidering what they had done, and apprehending the Emperour's ſore diſpleaſure, ran away and hid themſelves in ſeveral lurking places, of which number were Helladius and Ammonius, both Grammarians, of whom Socrates ſaith, he was Scholar in his younger years.

Cauſing them to fall upon the Chriſtians, of whom a great number are ſlain.

45. But the Fray being over, the Governour of Alexandria and the General of the Army came to aſſiſt Theophilus in the overthrow of the Temples, which now went down apace, the Idols of the Gods being turned into Kettles and other neceſſary Veſſels, for the Emperour commanded they ſhould be ſold for the benefit of the Poor. Yet did Theophilus order that ſome one Idol ſhould be reſerved and ſet up in ſome publick place of the City, therewith to diſgrace the Ethnick Religion in after-time. Socrates aſſures us, that to his knowledge Ammonius the Grammarian was much troubled thereat; ſaying, that the Pagan Religion thereby was ſubjected to much Infamy and Reproach. This was the greateſt blow that the publick profeſſion of Paganiſm had received, this place of Alexandria being, as it were, the Fountain of that Worſhip and Superſtition, which being deſtroyed and removed out of the way, the other Houſes, which were but as Chapels in compariſon of this Temple, were more eaſily demoliſhed. But the Gentiles acted with deſpair and rage, aſſembled all men for de- Sozom. l. 7. c. 15. fence of their Gods, and killed many Chriſtians, amongſt whom was Marcellus Biſhop of Apamea in Syria, by whoſe care the famed Temple of Jupiter in that City was demoliſhed. Sulpicius Severus tells us alſo of ſeveral Temples razed by procurement of St. Martin in Gall, ſo that the Weſtern Biſhops were not behind their Brethren in contributing their utmoſt diligence for eradicating of this Superſtition which held them yet ſtill ſeveral years e'er it could univerſally be accompliſhed, ſo difficult a matter it was to enter into the ſtrong Man's Houſe to bind him and ſpoil his Goods.

Amongſt whom was Marcellus Biſhop of Apamea in Syria.

46. About

L. 5. c. 19.

The Function of the Shriving Prieſt laid down upon what account.

46. About this time it ſeemed good unto the Church, (ſo Socrates expreſſeth himſelf) to take away the Office of ſuch Prieſts, as were appointed throughout every Church, to receive Penitents after Confeſſion, unto the Company of the Faithfull; and that for this occaſion. Since the time that the Novatians ſeparated themſelves, and refuſed to communicate with ſuch as fell in the Perſecution under Decius, the Biſhops added to the Eccleſiaſtical Canons, that in every Church a Prieſt ſhould be appointed, for the re-admiſſion of Penitents, to the end that ſuch as had fallen after Baptiſm ſhould in his hearing confeſs their Sin and Infirmity; which Canon is as yet in force among other Sects, onely the true Chriſtians imbracing the Faith of one Subſtance, together with the Novatians have Baniſhed this Penitential Function. Neither did the Novatians at the beginning allow of this addition; but the Biſhops now governing the Churches, although they retained this Cuſtome of a long time, yet removed it out of the Church in the time of Nectarius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, by reaſon of an heinous offence committed in the Church, in ſuch ſort as followeth. A certain Noblewoman came to ſuch a Prieſt and confeſſed orderly the Sins ſhe had committed after Baptiſm, at length accuſed her ſelf of another Crime, declaring that a Deacon of that Church had abuſed her Body. For this Offence, by this means brought to light, the Deacon was Baniſhed the Church, and the People was much moved, aſwell in regard of the heinous offence committed, as that the Church was thereby much loaded with Reproach and Infamy. But the Prieſts being ſharply rebuked, and the aforeſaid Crime objected to them, Eudæmon Miniſter of that Church adviſed Nectarius the Biſhop to take away the Function of the Shriving Prieſt, and grant free liberty to every one as his Conſcience ſerved him, to partake of the Holy Myſteries, to prevent the like Scandal for the time to come. So much did Socrates hear of this matter from Eudæmon's own Mouth.

Theodor. l. 5. c. 17. Sozim. l. 7. c. 24 Niceph. l. 12. c. 40, &c. Ambr. Ep. 28. & in fun. Theod. Aug. de Civit. Dei l. 5. c. 26. alii.

Theodoſius commits an act of Cruelty for which he undergoes Eccleſiaſtical cenſure.

47. About the ſame time Theodoſius the Emperour committed ſuch a piece of Severity as gave occaſion to ſuch an act of Church Diſcipline, which as for the Dignity of the Subject hath been remarkable to all Poſterity. The thing was this. The Inhabitants of Theſſalonica quarrelling with Botherictus, the Præfectus Militum in Illyricum, about their Waggon-driver, whom being impriſoned, he refuſed to releaſe at their deſire for the running of a Solemn Race, roſe againſt him and ſlew him, which thing brought to the Ears of the Emperour did much incenſe him, yet at the interceſſion of Ambroſe and other Biſhops attending him at Milan, his Choler ſeemed to be allayed, and he promiſed to paſs by and forgive the Fact. But the Courtiers coming to talk with him perſwaded him not to let goe unpuniſhed a Matter of ſo bad Example, and thereupon the People being invited to the Circenſian Games, were compaſſed about with Souldiers, who without any difference of Age or Sex, Guilty or Innocent, fell upon them, and running through the Streets killed all, aſwell Strangers as Citizens, whom they met; ſo that about 7000 Perſons were thus ſlaughtered in a matter of three Hours ſpace. The News coming to Milan, where the Biſhops were aſſembled in a Synod, Ambroſe in the Name of all, firſt by Letters ſignified to the Emperour, how horrid a Fact he had committed, and that thereby he had rendered himſelf unworthy of Chriſtian Communion, and when Theodoſius came to give ſatisfaction, and remove the Scandal, he publickly and ſtoutly refuſed him entrance into the Church for eight Months, till his Penitence might fully appear, enjoyning him withall to make an Edict, whereby Sentence of Death and Confiſcation of Goods ſhould be ſtopped from Execution for thirty days, that the Merit of the Cauſe might in ſuch a ſpace of time be throughly weighed and examined.

In Anthropog.

Vide Hoſpinranum de origine, &c. templorum. l. 2. c. 1.

48. The Emperour received this Chaſtiſement with wonderfull Humility, Patience and Moderation, ſetting thereby ſuch a Copy and Pattern of ſubmiſſion to Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, as St. Ambroſe, St. Auguſtine, with the reſt of the Churchmen and Writers of that Age, and all ever ſince have both applauded and admired. But Eraſtus an eminent German Phyſician, ſo learned in his Art that Riolan eſteems him the greateſt man that hath lived ſince Femelius, whatever his ſucceſs was in Theology, wherein he travelled much alſo, hath paſſed a ſharp Cenſure upon this Diſcipline ſo ſeverely preſſed upon the Imperial Majeſty of Theodoſius, terming it an unjuſt Act, and affirming, that it can never be maintained by any true and ſolid Reaſons. However the Humility of Theodoſius aſwell herein was eminent as in another point, wherein St. Ambroſe alſo largely ſhewed his Eccleſiaſtical Authority. It was the Cuſtome at Conſtantinople for the Emperours perours to ſit within the Chancel amongſt the Clergy, at celebration of Divine Service, which Theodoſius thinking with as little difficulty to doe at Milan, the Biſhop would not ſuffer him to enjoy that privilege and convenience in his Church, but bade him go out and ſit with the reſt of the Laicks in the body of the Church, to which order he not onely ſubmitted whilſt he there reſided, but at his return to Conſtantinople is ſaid there alſo to have obſerved it, though invited by the Biſhops to reaſſume his former Seat: and Sozomen tells us, that his Succeſſours herein followed his example, of which this Hiſtorian himſelf was an Eye-witneſs. But here for the underſtanding this and other paſſages more fully, we ſhall ſpeak ſomething concerning the form and faſhion of their Churches in thoſe Primitive times, with the order of their ſitting, and how each Perſon was placed according to his calling and function, being much aſſiſted in the diſquiſition of this matter from what our moſt Learned Mountague hath written of this Subject.

And is removed from ſitting in the Chancel by St. Ambroſe of Milan.

The firſt places dedicated to Divine Service.

49. The firſt place we meet with wherein Chriſtians made their Aſſemblies was that Ὑπερῷον, or upper Room, mentioned in Scripture, where the Diſciples aſſembled preſently after our Lord's Paſſion. Yet according to convenience, and as they might doe it with ſafety they met ſometimes in one place, and ſometimes in another. In proceſs of time, divers devout Chriſtians gave their own Manſion Houſes to be Meeting places for their Synaxes or Holy Aſſemblies, which Theophilus (he to whom St. Luke Dedicateth his Book) is ſaid to have done at Antioch, being if not the very firſt, yet one of the firſt of thoſe Benefactours, which example was followed by Claudius Pudens a Senatour at Rome, who conſecrated his Houſe to Divine Service, with the Title (as they called it) of Eccleſia Paſtoris, or the Shepherd's Church. By little and little in ſucceeding Ages Houſes were built for this very purpoſe, eſpecially in peaceable times, as under Titus, Adrian, Antoninus Pius, Commodus and others. Theſe they called Ædes Sacræ, Oratoria, Εὐκτήρια, Martyria, Κοιμητήρια, Domus Orationis, Eccleſiæ and by ſome other Names, never in thoſe ancient times Templa or Ναοὶ, Templum and Eccleſiæ ſtanding ἐκ διαμέτρου, in oppoſition, before the time of Conſtantine: yet even in theſe times were ſome called Κυριακαὶ, built and adorned more than ordinary, all which were demoliſhed by Edicts of Diocleſian and Maximinus. After the converſion of Conſtantine they began to be built ſumptuouſly, and to be called Templa, but not Monaſteria, Semnæa, Synagogæ, or the like. Yet in Ignatius his Epiſtle to the Trallians, the Chriſtian Aſſembly is termed Synagoga, contrary to what is affirmed by Gregory Martin a certain Literator, who brauls againſt us for ſometime uſing the word Congregation for the Church (which we did in that notable Collect before the late Reviſing of the Liturgy) as if they two were incompoſſible.

Their appellations.

The order and method of ſeating the Congregation.

50. The moſt ancient Chriſtian Churches were of an Oval Figure, or Ἐπιμήκεις, like ſome ſort of Ships (upon which account the Body of the Church by Canoniſts is ſtill called Navis) long, narrow before and behind, bulked out on both ſides in the middle. In the midſt was the Biſhop's Seat, ſtyled Βῆμα for the Aſcent to it, and Θρόνος for its eminency. At the Eaſt was placed the Altar, though at Antioch ſometime in the Weſt. In the middle was alſo the Ambo or Deſk where the Old and New Teſtament was Read to the People by the Anagnoſtes or Reader. Round about the Biſhop's Seat ſate the Presbyters, and behind them ſtood the Deacons, except the Primicerius Diaconorum, or the Archdeacon, who conſtantly attending the Biſhop ſtood cloſe by him, being ever the Eldeſt in time, and not preferred out of affection; excepting alſo thoſe Deacons who by courſe attended at the Women's Seats to ſee all things decent and in good order. On one ſide ſate the Lay-men, and on the other the Women, ſeparated from the Seats of the Biſhops and Prieſts by Cancelli or Rails, as alſo from each other. At the Mens Seats attended the Oſtiarii, as the Deacons at thoſe of the Women. Young Men, if there was room ſate, if not, ſtood; Boys were with their Fathers, Girls with their Mothers. Widows and Elder Women ſate foremoſt, Married Wives and Mothers by themſelves. The Younger ſort of Women, if there was room, ſtood among the Grave Matrons; if not, behind them. The Deacons took care that none talked, whiſpered, laughed, coughed or ſneezed aloud, ſlept or otherwiſe miſdemeaned themſelves in the time of Divine Service, every one being to demean himſelf with deſcretion, as underſtanding the buſineſs in Hand, with ſobriety, watchfulneſs and attention to what was done or ſaid. As for private Oratories or Chapels they had none, for private Houſes or ſeveral Families, which uſe when afterward it crept into the Church, being-Ἐπιστημόνως, νηφαλέως, ἐγρηγορότως, ἐντεταμένας τὰς ἀκοάς.

Private Chapels forbidden.

De Conſec. Q. 1. c. clericos qui miniſtrant vel baptizant in Oratoriis quæ intra domos ſunt, cum conſenſu Epiſcopi loci hoc facere præcipimus. Si quis vero hoc non obſervaverit deponatur.

ing forbidden, and the Uſer cenſured by a Council in the Greek Church, we find prohibited alſo in Gratian's Decree, by the thirty firſt Canon of the ſame Council in Trullo. Such Clergymen were declared Excommunicate, that adminiſtred Baptiſm, or uſed Prayers in Oratories or private Houſes, which in opinion of the Greek Canoniſts is forbidden in the fifth Canon of the Council of Antioch, and the Thirty firſt Canon Apoſtolical (as they are called) and held no better than a Schiſmatical Conventicle, erecting Altar againſt Altar. However we ſee both by the Roman Canon Law, and our own Provincial Conſtitutions and Cuſtoms, that Liberty was afterward indulged of having private Oratories or Chapels to Noble Men and others, a thing perhaps of leſſer inconvenience than another practice crept very lately into our Churches, both contrary to Primitive Patterns and the practice of all Churches, aſwell Reformed as others. Every Man muſt now (as if like Horſes, each Chriſtian would kick another) have his own Stall ſo elevated, that he can ſcarcely look over it, as fit onely for lolling and ſleeping, ſo that if all kneeled when they Pray to their Maker (which certainly is the humbleſt poſture) a Stranger coming in ſhould not ſee one Man in the Church beſides the Miniſter. A Cuſtome which is both the effect and the cauſe of pride, ſloth, irreverence and contempt of all good order. But enough to our purpoſe.

C. Juſt. lib. 9. Tit. 47. *c.*20.

51. The Law made by Theodoſius for deferring execution Thirty Days, is yet extant both in the Code of Theodoſius and Juſtinian, directed to Flavianus the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum and Italy, in the Name of Gratian, Valentinian and Theodoſius from Verona, in the Conſulſhip of Antonius and Syagrius, which is eight years before the true date thereof, for elſe Theodoſius muſt have come into Italy before the Expedition of Maximus, which is againſt the teſtimony of all Antiquity, or the Law muſt have been made by ſome other than him, which at length was abrogated by Nicephorus Botoniates. But to paſs to other matters. At this time great ſtir was made by Jovinian a Monk of Milan, who holding Wedlock equal in Honour with Virginity, was oppoſed and condemned as a great Heretick by Siricius Biſhop of Rome, Ambroſe of Milan, and Hierome, the later of whom in writing againſt him ſeemed ſo to extoll Virginity, as with the Manichees to deſpiſe and caſt duſt upon Marriage, which being very ill reſented by many good Men, he was forced to write an Apology and explain himſelf. Theſe ſtirs were followed or accompanied by others about the writings of Origen, of which John Biſhop of Jeruſalem was the great Defender. To him firſt wrote Epiphanius Biſhop of Salamina the chief City of Cyprus, againſt whom he had conceived great Indignation, both for ordaining Paulinianus the Brother of Hierome in Paleſtine out of his own Dioceſe, and eſpecially when he prayed for uſing this expreſſion, Lord grant to John that he may Believe aright. Epiphanius in his Letter ſo excuſeth himſelf, that he alſo reckons up many errours of Origen maintained by him; and ſignifieth, that the true offence he had given him was, his reprehending him for ſo doing.

Stirs about Jovinian.

Siric. Ep. 1. Am. Ep. 80, &c. Hier. adverſus Jovin. & Ep. 51, 52.

And Origen.

Op. Hieron. tom. 3. Ep. 16. & 64.

52. This Letter paſſing from one to another, Euſebius of Cremona deſired Hierome to Tranſlate it into Latin, and keep it private, which he did about eighteen months. But then John made means to get it into his Hands, and accuſed Hierome both as an unfaithfull Tranſlatour, and a turbulent Perſon, who ſought to encreaſe differences in the Church, by adding Oil to the Flame of that Controverſie, which might elſe have been extinguiſhed. Hierome herewith netled, writes againſt him two Letters to Pammachius his great Friend, a Man of Noble extract, as deſcended from the ancient Family of the Camilli, wherein he vindicates himſelf as to the Tranſlation, having uſed no greater liberty than a faithfull and Learned Man juſtly might. And then he accuſeth John as addicted to the Errours of Origen, which he ſheweth to have been many, and more bitterly inveigheth againſt them than Epiphanius had done two years before, though he himſelf had tranſlated many of Origen's Books, on which he had not been wanting to beſtow very large Encomiums. But upon this account he alſo began to ſpeak and write very ill of Rafinus and others whom formerly he had extolled to the Skies. Toward the latter end of one of his Epiſtles he makes mention of a Solar Eclipſe, which had happened a few months before, to the great conſternation of thouſands of people, about Whitſontide. This fell out on the ſixth of June one and twenty days after Whitſontide. And in the ſame year the Sun was again obſcured on the ſecond of December, which Cabricius erroneouſly, if Capellus be Judge, caſteth back to the twentieth of November; and becauſe this Eclipſe preceded the Coronation of Honorius forty days, Proſper and Marcellinus write as if it had faln out the very day of that Solemnity.

Eod. tom. Ep. 17. & 64. & Tom. 1. Ep. 5. & 25.

Ep. 17.

53. A-

Valentinian the ſecond murthered by Arbogaſtes a Frank.

Obiit ſine baptiſmo & tamen vita fruitur æterna.

53. About this time in the ſeventeenth year of his Reign was Valentinian the ſecond murthered by procurement of Arbogaſtes, the Frank. Ambroſe Biſhop of Milan made his Funeral Oration, wherein he hath this expreſſion, He died without Baptiſm, and yet enjoyeth Eternal Life, for he was but a Catechumenus though ſo long a Chriſtian, and born of Chriſtian Parents, ſo prevalent was as yet that bad cuſtome of deferring Baptiſm. Theodoſius was now got back to Conſtantinople, where having Built a Church in Honour of St. John Baptiſt, Baronius tells us, that the year preceding the Birth of Valentinian, he cauſed the Head of that Saint which had been found in the time of Valens to be therein depoſited. Concerning this Ceremony, ſuch Writers as mention it agree not amongſt themſelves neither as to the time nor manner. Other Tranſlations alſo of this Head are ſaid to have been made into Alexandria and Gall by other Perſons. The Rhemiſts tell us in their Teſtament, that St. John Baptiſt's Head is at Amiens in France: others ſay his Head is in St. Silveſter's Abbey in Rome, beſides the ſcattered pieces of it in other places. There were alſo kept two Anniverſaries for two ſeveral Findings of his Head, whereof one was in the Ruines, you muſt know, of Herod's old Palace, and another in the Field of Emeſa. It's more worth the while to take notice that this year Auguſtine was ordained Prieſt by Valerius Biſhop of Hippo, to the great content and ſatisfaction of the People, though to his own regret and trouble. Being now Prieſt, the Biſhop cauſed him to Preach in his preſence quite contrary to the Cuſtome of Africk, which permitted not Presbyters to Speak in the Church when the Biſhops were there; but after this example given, it began to be broken and antiquated in other places.

Auguſtine ordained Prieſt.

Poſſid. in vita c. 5.

54. Eugenius whom the Murtherers of Valentinian had put in his Place, being cheated by the Promiſes of the Pagan Prophets, who made him confident of his ſucceſs, gave them ſome liberty and encouragement in their Superſtition, which cauſed Ambroſe to write to him, and blame him for ſo doing; as alſo Theodoſius to make a new Edict for obviating the progreſs of their Religion, forbidding them abſolutely in any place to Sacrifice. He made alſo ſeveral Laws againſt Hereticks, and ordained that ſuch Debtours as fled to Churches ſhould either preſently be taken thence, or that ſuch Biſhops as protected them ſhould pay their Money, which once fell to the ſhare of St. Auguſtine when Biſhop. He being but Prieſt as yet, had a great and publick Diſpute at Hippo with Fortunatus a Manichee, concerning the Original of Evil, wherein he gave him ſo eminent a foil, that he durſt not any more appear in that City. At this time Parmenianus the Biſhop of the Donatiſts dying at Carthage, Primianus was firſt choſen in his room, and then afterward Maximianus by others, whereupon aroſe a great Schiſm amongſt the Donatiſts themſelves, of which Auguſtine often taketh notice. The matter being brought before three Councils, Maximianus in them all had the better of his Adverſary, but in a Fourth conſiſting of three hundred and ten Biſhops, held on the Eighth before the Calends of May, two years after the beginning of the Diſpute, Primianus had the upper Hand, which great variety of paſſions and inclinations very much confounded the Donatiſts. The year after theſe things happened the Death of Theodoſius, to the great detriment of Chriſtian Religion, had not his Sons Arcadius and Honorius at their firſt entry by ſeveral new Edicts eſtabliſhed and ſecured the Profeſſion thereof, receiving as a reward of their Zeal protection from the treacherous attempts of Ruffinus and his Companions.

A new Edict againſt the Pagans.

C. Th. de Pag. l. 12.

C. Th. de his qui confug. ad Eccleſ. l. 1.

Theodoſius the Emperour dies.

C. Th. paſſim.

55. The ſame year that Theodoſius died, was Auguſtine in the forty firſt year of his age made Biſhop of Hippo, though Valerius the Incumbent was yet living. He was for his Piety and Abilities grown by this time into ſo great eſteem, and ſo much taken notice of in all Countries, that Valerius fearing he might be called to ſome other place, and the Chruch deprived of ſo good a Paſtour, dealt with the Primate of Africk that he might be Conſecrated in his life-time, it being a thing highly convenient, and not altogether without precedent. When he had prepared the matter thus, and made the deſign known to the People, they received it with great applauſe, and in a manner conſtrained Auguſtine to accept thereof, though it was flatly againſt the Canons of the Nicene Council for a ſecond Biſhop to be ordained to a Church of which he confeſſeth that both he himſelf and Valerius was at that time ignorant. About this time Fritigildis a Queen of the Maxomanns hearing of the fame of Ambroſe, imbraced (as Paulinus writes in his Life) the Chriſtian Faith, and procured from him a certain Catechetical Treatiſe for her fuller information therein. At the requeſt of the Biſhop, ſhe perſwaded her Husband to ſubmit to the Romans, and came to

Auguſtine made Biſhop of Hippo.

Poſſid. in vita. Proſper. in Chron. Aug. Ep. 33. 110.

Milan to ſee that good Prelate, but he had left this life e'er her arrival there, dying not full three years after the departure of Theodoſius, the day preceding the Nones of April and Eaſter-day, after he had ſitten in the See of Milan 23 years and about 4 months, and ſcarcely completed his grand Climacterical. As St. Ambroſe wrote ſome Books which are not extant, ſo many now extant under his name he never wrote as is confeſſed on all ſides. Amongſt the ſpurious things aſcribed to him it's obſervable that the Miſſale going under his name makes mention of the Feaſt of the Aſſumption which was not received till After-ages. Neverthe-leſs his ſervice Book or Officium Ambroſianum ſuppoſed made by him was long in reſpect and uſe, till Pope Hadrian calling a Council with Aſſiſtence of Charles the Emperour aboliſhed and burnt it commanding that of Gregory univerſally to be uſed. But not long continued this in ſuch eſteem but that the Roman Service came to be of two faſhions, the new and old, as may be ſeen in Pamelius his Preface before Micrologus, who reporteth alſo out of Radulphus de Rivo that about the year 1277 Pope Nicholas the third removed out of the Churches of Rome the more Ancient Service Books and brought into uſe the Miſſals of the Friars Minorites, inſomuch that about 100 years after the ſaid Radulphus happening to be at Rome found all the Books to be of the new ſtamp. But of later chopping and changing hereafter.

Durand. l. 5. c. 2.

56. St. Ambroſe was followed into a better World by Nectarius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, who died on the 27 of September of the ſame year, and Martin of Tours who departed this Life the night intervening betwixt th 10*th.* and the 11*th.* of November. To St. Ambroſe ſucceeded Simplicianus and in the Room of Nectarius was conſecrated, Feb. 26. John a Prieſt of Antioch, for his Eloquence ſirnamed Chryſoſtome notwithſtanding the oppoſition of Theophilus of Alexandria who pretending a right in the Election of Biſhops to that See endeavoured to bring in Iſidore a Presbyter of his own Church. To St. Martin that wonderfull Biſhop of Tours (whoſe miraculous Life is Written by Sulpicius Severus a Roman Citizen, a Man Noble, as Gennadius calls him, both in Birth and Learning) ſucceeded Briccius on the 29*th.* of November, though Baronius contendeth that this happened not till the fifth year after, rejecting the Teſtimony of Gregory one of Martin's Succeſſours and alledging that of Severus. And all theſe were followed to another Life by Siricius the Roman Biſhop who died February 21. of the following year having ſate in that See 13 years and about two months. He firſt received Monks into the Clergy whereas formerly they were reckoned but amongſt the Laicks. In the Weſt alſo as ſome obſerve he diſallowed the Marriage of Prieſts, admitting ſuch to Orders as were Married, but forbidding after Orders received the uſe of Wedlock. The See was void 20 days and then was Elected Anaſtaſius and conſecrated on the 14 of March the firſt Feria, being by Birth a Roman and however his Predeceſſour had inveighed againſt Marriage of Eccleſiaſticks, a Prieſt's Son, as Baronius himſelf gathereth from his Epitaph.

Nectarius of Conſtantinople dies. Martin of Tours departed this Life. To Ambroſe ſucceeded Simplicianus. To Nectarius John. To Martin Briccius.

Siricius Biſhop of Rome dies.

Anaſtaſius ſucceeds.

Sozom. l. 6. c. 2.

Hoſpinian. lib. 3. de orig. Monach. c. 12.

57. The year wherein St. Ambroſe died was the third Synod of Carthage held counting from the time of Conſtantine as the Compiler did who yet ought rather to have called this the ſecond, and that which he calls the ſecond he ought to have reckoned for the ſixth, as Baronius gathereth from certain circumſtances. In this Synod are ſaid to have been enacted 50 Canons, amongſt which none is more remarkable than the 26 which ordains that the Biſhop of the firſt See be not called Princeps Sacerdotum Prince of Prieſts, or Summus Sacerdos the Chief Prieſt, or any ſuch thing, but onely Biſhop of the firſt See. This Canon Gratian hath put into his Decree a to which is added b neither may the Roman Biſhop be called Univerſal, for Confirmation of which he brings in firſt c Pelagius the ſecond prohibiting any Patriarch to be called Univerſal, and then part of an d Epiſtle of Gregory to Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria, wherein he expoſtulates with him for giving him the Title of Univerſal, deſiring him that he would doe ſo no more for this reaſon, Quia vobis ſubtrahitur, quod alteri plus quam ratio exigit præbetur, Becauſe ſo much was taken from him as without cauſe was given to another; and then having told him that he deſired rather to be eminent in goodneſs than glorious Titles, he backs or rather illuſtrates his former reaſon by a ſecond, adding, Si enim univerſalem me papam veſtra ſanctitas dicit, negat ſe hoc eſſe, quod me fatetur univerſum; ſed abſit hoc, recedant verba quæ vanitatem inflant & charitatem vulnerant. For if your holineſs call me Univerſal Pope, you deny your ſelf to be that which you confeſs me to be, Univerſal, which God forbid. Forbear thoſe ſpeeches which puff up vanity and Wound Charity. No more of the Epiſtle hath Gratian tranſcribed, this making ſufficiently for his purpoſe, but the Gloſſars think themſelves concerned to tell you

A Synod held at Carthage.

One of whoſe Canons prohibits any Biſhop of the firſt See to receive the Title of Univerſal.

a Diſt. 99. c. 3.
b Univerſalis autem nec etiam Romanus Pontifex appelletur.
c Can. 4. Nullus Patriarch.
d Can. 5. Ecce in præfatione. lib. 7. Ep. 30 Indict. 1. 5.

you farther that Gregory in that part which follows lets him know that this Title had been offered to his Predeceſſours in the Council of Chalcedon and from other Fathers, but they refuſed it; and they inſtance in ſeveral Popes, who have had glorious Titles given them by other Biſhops. Baronius is fearfull you ſhould think thoſe words Neither may the Roman Biſhop be called Univerſal ſhould be part of the Canon, aſſuring you they are Gratian's own, neither appoſite for explication of this Canon but onely as a hint or contents of what follows. He diſclaims any right the African Church had to give Laws to that of Rome Superiour to it; tells you the Biſhops of Rome might have ſome reaſon to refuſe the Title of Univerſal, which yet was their due, and concludes it was out of modeſty that even the African Fathers refuſed thoſe Titles which both as Metropolitans and Biſhops belonged to them.

58. But, what if this Title had been given to ſeveral of Gregory his Predeceſſours, ſo was it to others alſo as we have * formerly ſhewed eſpecially to the Patriarchs of Conſtantinople. Neither is it material whether the words formerly mentioned were part of the Canon or Gratian's own words, for if they were his, and contents of what follows, yet being true contents and being ſufficiently made out by what Pelagius and Gregory ſay in the following Canons, we hope the Cardinal will allow the effect and purport of them to be Authentical, though theſe words be not, the Authour of which they will commend and diſpraiſe, allow and reject at their pleaſure, as he ſpeaks for or againſt them. To let paſs what the Cardinal takes for granted, and which we ſhall never yield, that the African Church was ſubject to the Roman; though the African Fathers had nothing to doe to give Laws to that of Rome, yet they might doe it (perhaps) to their own People, for the Canon is not againſt ſuch as ſhould take, but rather thoſe that ſhould give this Title which thoſe of Africk might doe to him as well as others. Whatever reaſons Baronius alledgeth for the Roman Biſhops their refuſal of this Title is not very material, ſeeing both Pelagius and Gregory aſſign a true and urgent cauſe, viz. the wrong and prejudice that ſhould thereby be done to other Biſhops, which, however out of complement and aſſentation ſuch Titles may have been given both to him of Rome and others, yet is a ſufficient Bar to all ſuch real and ſerious pretenſions. And if the deſign of the Canon was to remove or to prevent arrogance in Biſhops, it cannot well be imagined againſt whom this Engine ſhould be levelled, whoſe Pride it ſhould be deſigned to batter ſooner than that of Rome, the eminency of which City together with other conſiderable accidents Elevated the Biſhop's Reputation, and drawing the Eyes as well of the Africans as others upon him, drew out alſo expreſſions which puffed up vanity and wounded charity as Gregory expreſſeth it.

* Suprà, c. 8. Paragr. 24.

Another ordains that decrees of Councils be read at Conſecration of Clerks and Biſhops. Feaſting in Churches forbidden by another.

Another pretended one counting thoſe Books of Scripture Canonical which really are Apocryphal.

59. To ſpeak of one or two more of thoſe Canons which are moſt worthy of conſideration, the third ordains that Decrees of Councils be read to ſuch Biſhops and Clerks as are to be conſecrated for their better information how to demean themſelves, which as Poſſidius tells us in his Life St. Auguſtine procured out of a ſenſe that he himſelf and ignorantly at his conſecration offended againſt the Nicene Council. The 30 Canon which forbids feaſting in Churches ſeemeth alſo to have been made through his mediation, for being very ſenſible of the diſorders which were committed by occaſion of this junketing in memory of Martyrs, and at the Graves of deceaſed Perſons, he had formerly written to Aurelius Biſhop of Carthage to put them down. But there's another Canon we muſt not paſs over with ſilence becauſe they of Rome make noiſe enough about it, and that is the 47 which reckoning up the Canonical Books of Scripture amongſt them count thoſe which we call Apocryphal. But that this Canon is ſuppoſititious, at leaſt Dubious, our Divines contend for theſe reaſons. Firſt becauſe it is commonly called the 47 of this third Council of Carthage, yet in ſome Books reckoned the 24*th.* of another Synod held under Boniface, as Surius Witneſſeth. Then in this Catalogue are received five Books of Solomon, which number doubtleſs is faulty. Again the Synod in Trullo approves both this Synod of Carthage and that of Laodicea, which it could not doe if this Council held for Canonical what the other judgeth no better than Apocryphal. And laſtly, this Synod could not juſtly receive any Books, as Canonical but as the Fathers had received before it, who rejected thoſe Books as it were eaſie to ſhew, particularly from * Athanaſius, † Cyril, || Cyprian, Epiphanius, * † Gregory || Nazianzen, Hierome and others. Farther we ought to take notice that Canonical amongſt the Fathers is ſometimes taken abſolutely and ſimply ſometimes more largely and generally, as it is oppoſed to profane and ſecular writings. In the firſt ſenſe the Holy Scriptures, as we count them, are Canonical onely,

Cap. 8.

Eph. 46.

* In Synopſ.
† Catecheſ. 4.
|| In expoſitione.
* Symbol. de menſur. & ponderibus
† In carm. de genuinis ſ. Scripturæ locis.
||Præf in. Eſdram & Nehe. Quæ non habentur apud Hebræos nec de 24 ſenibus ſunt procul abjicienda.

onely, in the ſecond not onely they but ſuch Books as were compoſed out of them and contained Hiſtories relating to this Church and in this ſenſe the Canon might ſay we take all thoſe for Canonical which we have received from the Fathers to be read in the Church.

Two other Synods held at Carthage.

60. The year following on the twenty ſeventh of May, was another Synod of 73. Biſhops held at Carthage, in Books called the Fifth, but which ought rather to be counted the Third, wherein a Canon was enacted concerning baptizing of Infants, and a Petition ordered to be put up to the Emperours, for the rooting out of Idolatry. And this ſame year in the 8th. of November, was the Fourth Carthaginian Synod celebrated by 214 Biſhops, who enacted 104 Canons, amongſt which the 64 ordains, that he ſhould not be accounted a Catholick, that deſignedly faſteth on the Lord's Day, the 100 forbids Women to baptize, the 44 commands that Clerks neither wear long Hair, nor long Beards, and the 84 Orders the Biſhop do forbid none to come into the Church, and hear God's word, whether Gentile, Heretick or Jew, till the Miſſa of the Catechumeni, or that Service was finiſhed, whereat ſuch were ſuffered to be preſent. Thus did Chriſtian Religion not onely ſubſiſt, but thrive, and get ground, notwithſtanding all the Arts and Devices which Pagans could uſe. For this you muſt know, was the terrible year wherein the Ethnicks had foretold the Worſhip of Chriſt, ſhould receive its Period. Perceiving as St. Auguſtine tells us, that it was ſo far from being rooted out by perſecutions, that on the contrary it wonderfully increaſed, they deviſed certain Greek Verſes, as given in anſwer to ſome Pagan, who conſulted an Oracle. Theſe acquitted Chriſt of this Sacrilege (as they impiouſly ſtyled it) and laid all the blame upon St. Peter, who they foretold ſhould by the Name of Chriſt be worſhipped 365 years, and then the Religion ſhould ſpeedily and infallibly ceaſe. Theſe years added to the 33 years, Our Saviour is ſuppoſed to have lived upon Earth fix the end of this term, according to the vulgar Computation, in the 398 year of our Lord, the 6th. of Honorius the Emperour, of Rome the 1151, the 11 Indiction Fl. Honorius Auguſtus the fourth time, and Fl. Eutychianus being Conſuls.

De Civitate Dei, lib. 18. cap. ult. ------- Chriſtum quidem ab hujus tanquam Sacrilegii crimine faciunt innocentem, Petrum autem malefacia feciſſe ſubjungunt ut coleretur Chriſti nomine 365. Annos, deinde completo memorato numero Annorum ſine mora ſumeret finem.

The Pagan Superſtition and Temples put down and demoliſhed, both in the Weſt and Eaſt.

61. How vain were the Hopes founded upon this lying Oracle appeared the following year, wherein Paganiſm it ſelf received another ſtroak, by putting down the obſcene and filthy ſhew of the Mamma, which having been formerly forbidden by an Edict, had been again reſtored three years agoe, but now either at the Interceſſion of John Chryſoſtome the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, who ceaſed not to declaim againſt theſe Spectacula, or it being found by experience, hard to ſeparate the Sport from its obſcenity which had been pretended, was now by another Edict quite aboliſhed. But this was but a Rite or Appendix of Pagan Superſtition, which now it ſelf this very year as St. Auguſtine obſerveth, went to wreck in all Places, the Temples of the Gentile Gods with their Idols, being every where demoliſhed, eſpecially in Africk by Gaudentius and Jovius, two Counts of Honorius the Emperour. Now as it ordinarily happeneth upon ſuch occaſions, the Multitude ſhewed more Zeal than Prudence, for being licenced by the Edicts of the Emperours, to demoliſh thoſe Temples of Idols they fell upon many excellent and ſtately Buildings, and thereby very much defaced the Cities. This drew forth a Reſcript from Honorius, commanding the People to abſtain from publick Buildings, and permitting lawfull Sports, and ſuch Recreations as were harmleſs and free from Pagan Impurities: Arcadius in the Eaſt gave them liberty to demoliſh ſuch Temples as were in Countrey-Towns, and though in Cities they were permitted to ſtand for an Ornament of the Places, yet did Chriſtians remove their Idols, and convert them to the uſe of their own Religion, which was generally done in all Places, though ſome were granted to private Perſons, as appears by a Reſcript, dated 16 years after this, and directed to the People of Carthage. Here the moſt magnificent and ſtately Temple of their Dea Cæleſtis, was turned into a Chriſtian Church, and received the Chair of Aurelius, the Biſhop of that City. This Dea Cæleſtis of the Carthaginians, was the ſame with Aſtarthe the Queen of Heaven, and Goddeſs of the Sidonians. The Idol which gave Oracles, as Capitolinus tells us, was placed upon a Lion, and contained moſt of the Names of all the Pagan Deities, being worſhipped by ſeveral ſorts of

C. Juſtin. lib. 11. c. 45.
C. Th. de pœnis leg. 17.
C. Th. l. 15. c. 16. §. 2.

C. Juſtin. c. 1. c. 11. §. 3.
Sicut ſacrificia Templorum prohibemus ita volumus publicorum operum ornamenta ſervari.

Ibid. §. 4. Ut profanos ritus tam ſalubri lege ſubmovimus, ita feſtos conventus civium & communem omnium lætitiam non patimur ſubmoveri inde abſq; ullo ſacrificio atque ulla ſuperſtit. damnabil. &c.

Ibid. §. 5. C. Th. l. 16. Herodian lib. 5. cap. 15.

Λίβυες μὲν οὖν αὐτὴν Οὐρανίαν καλοῦσι, Φοίνικες δὲ Ἀστροάρχην ὀνομάζουσι Σελήνην εἶναι θέλοντες.

of People, by reaſon of the Diverſities of Names, rather than diſtinction or variety of things, as St. Ambroſe informeth. For though this Goddeſs was married by Heliogabalus the Emperour to his God, we do not hear ſhe was fruitfull.

Contra Symmachum.

62. Chriſtians having the liberty either to demoliſh or rifle thoſe Pagan Temples, had opportunity to pry into, and diſcover the inwards and moſt ſecret Myſteries of their Superſtition. Hereby was the impoſture of the wooden Snake diſcovered at Rome, where a quick one, or that of Æſculapius (who had many hundred years before, becauſe of the Plague been pretended to be brought from Epidamnus) was ſaid to live in a Cave. And the Privacies of Apollo Palatinus, being now unlocked and ſearched, the Books of Sibylla, wherein the remarkable Accidents and Fatalities of the City were ſaid to be predicted, were found and burnt by Stilico, which Rutilius a Pagan Poet of that time ſadly laments. Neither did the Gentiles take this patiently, ſit ſtill and look on, but in ſeveral Places made Inſurrections, attempted the Reſcue of their Idols and Temples, and ſuffered not the Chriſtians to overcome without a bloudy Triumph. At the ſame time the Church was vexed by Inteſtine differences and diſputes. For in Africk the Donatiſts plaid ſuch Pranks, that the Emperours Command by an Edict, that the Royſters which roved up and down ſhould be puniſhed and reſtrained by the Sword. Whereupon Petilianus complaining, and crying out againſt Perſecution, Auguſtine replies that Thieves and Robbers were not to be heard if they quarrelled with Migiſtrates for reſtraining their Villanies. The Manichees were alſo ſo inſolent, that this ſame Biſhop who had more reaſon to underſtand them than moſt others, ſound himſelf concerned at this time to write 33 Books againſt Fauſtus, a Ringleader amongſt thoſe Hereticks. The contentions about the Writings of Origen, rather increaſed than otherwiſe, againſt which Hierome was the main Combatant falling foul, eſpecially on John the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, with whom to ſome Perſons he ſeemed rather to be offended than with Origen himſelf, yet did the Epiſcopal Dignity of John ſomewhat repreſs his Choler which flew all out upon Ruffinus, whoſe Perſon was not guarded by any ſuch Circumſtance. But he bitterly inveighs not onely againſt him but all Origeniſts, who ſome years before had in appearance made up the far greater part of the Chriſtian World. When Theophilus Biſhop Alexandria, conceived they were to be wone and reduced by fair means, Hierome tells him by Letter, that ſuch Levity diſpleaſed many good Men, and ſo far wrought with him, that he not onely expelled them out of Egypt, but that they might be ſo uſed in other places, wrote his paſchal Letters againſt them, by which for the following year he appoints Eaſter to be kept on the 19*th.* of Pharmuth, or the 14*th.* of April, requiring Epiphanius to procure his Letters to be publiſhed throughout Iſauria, Pamphilia and Thrace. Hereupon the Origeniſts are alſo condemned by the Reſcripts of the Emperours.

Proſper.

Aug. ep. 202, &c.

Which cauſed Inſurrections in divers Places.

The Royſters puniſhed by the Edict of the Emperours.

C. Th. de Epiſcop. lib. 31. Aug. adverſus literas Petil. l. 2. c. 43, *&c. De correctione Donatiſt. c.*11.

*Hierom. Tom. Ep.*30, 31, &c.

The Origeniſts condemned.

63. In the 400*th.* year of the ordinary Æra of Chriſt, the Conſulſhip of Fl. Stilico and Fl. Aurelianus in the Month of September, was the firſt Provincial Council held at Toledo, a City of Tarracoma in Spain, conſiſting of 19 Biſhops, for ſetling matters about the Priſcillianiſts, wherein were compoſed twenty Canons for eſtabliſhing Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline. Hereof the ſecond is obſervable, which Gratian hath inſerted into his Decree, forbidding Penitents to be admitted into the Clergy except upon Neceſſity, and then amongſt Door-keepers and Readers, yet ſo as not to reade the Epiſtle or Goſpel. And if any had been formerly ordained Deacons, they were to be reduced amongſt the Subdeacons, ſitting with them as the Gloſs expounds it in the Quire, and at meat, but without performing any thing of the Office. Now they explain whom they mean by a Penitent, viz. ſuch as ſolemnly did Penance, for having after Baptiſm committed Murther, or other grievous Sins, and had been reconciled to the Church in Hair-cloath. The 8*th.* Canon forbids any one who had ſerved in the Wars againſt Chriſtians to be received ſo high as the Degree of a Deacon. Several of the reſt concern the Wives and Children of Biſhops, Prieſts and other Clerks, which whilſt the Fathers were enacting, and endeavouring for Peace and Unity in Spain, the Difference ſtill continued in the Eaſt, concerning the Opinions and Books of Origen. From the Eaſt the Contention flew into Africk and Italy, and in Rome Origen found many Favourers, amongſt which Melania was very eminent, who much favoured the Cauſe and Perſon of Ruffinus. But Marcella a notable ſtickler for the other Party, with Principia were ſo addicted to Hierome, that they ceaſed not to inſtigate, by all means poſſible, Anaſtaſius the Roman Biſhop againſt Ruffinus, whom they procured him to cite to render a reaſon why he had tranſlated the Books of Origen περὶ ἀρχῶν at Rome, and after he had mightily extolled them to the World, had preſently thence withdrawn himſelf. He anſwered without making appearance by Letter, that he had not fled from Rome, but returned into his own Countrey, which he had not ſeen for full thirty years; that he was now weary and broken with Travel and Old Age, and thereſore reſolved there to fix, and that he had not been the firſt Tranſlatour, nor had firſt extolled and commended to the World the Works of Origen. This refuſal provoked Anaſtaſius, not onely to condemn Origen but Ruffinus too, and the following year he renewed his Cenſure. Afterward he ſeemed ſomewhat to relent and incline a little to the Origeniſts, but as Hierome writes, was then tranſlated, leſt by intreaty he ſhould be brought to alter his Sentence formerly given. For he died on the twenty ſeventh of April of this preſent year, as ſome gather from certain Writings of St. Hierome, after he had governed but three years, though Baronius contends that he died not till April following, and ſo ſate in the See of Rome four Years, a Month and thirteen Days. Of his Actions recorded this is moſt remarkable, that he compelled Prieſts to ſtand whilſt the Goſpel was reading. For at this aſwell as at other times, there being great emulation betwixt Prieſts and Deacons in the Romiſh Church, the Deacons puffed up by the continual Addreſſes made to them from the People, becauſe they diſpenſed the Goods of the Church, preſſed upon the Prieſts, preſuming to ſit amongſt, and give them their Bleſſing in the ordinary Feaſts, and the Prieſts on the other hand acted by too much Indignation, diſdained to ſtand upon their feet, when the Goſpel was read by the Deacons.

A Provincial Council held at Toledo.

Or for convenience Gratian hath it. Diſt. 50. c. penult. Placuit.

Anaſtaſius Biſhop of Rome dies.

64. We have formerly told the Reader, that Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria being by Hierome incenſed againſt the Origeniſts, baniſhed ſuch Monks as were of that Perſwaſion out of Ægypt. Theſe men betake themſelves to Conſtantinople, the Biſhop whereof they acquaint with their grief, and indeavour to ſet him againſt Theophilus. Having the advantage of ſpeaking face to face, they brought him into a good Opinion of their Cauſe, and made him patronize their perſons by writing to the Biſhop, whereby a very ill underſtanding was begot betwixt the two Prelates. But the Monks perceiving that they had profited little by ſeeking the Patronage of John Chryſoſtome, and that Theophilus was rather the more incenſed both againſt themſelves and him, made their Addreſs to the Emperour, to whom they accuſed their Biſhop of ſo heinous Crimes, as very much indangered his Head. Chryſoſtome being ſuſpected to have an hand in the deſign, was very ill ſpoken of by the Party of Theophilus, and now Epiphanius ingages himſelf openly in the Quarrel, who having ſent the Decrees of the Synods held at Alexandria and Cyprus againſt the Origeniſts to Conſtantinople, when he perceived he profited nothing, but thoſe men were rather kindly entertained, reſolved to go thither and oppoſe them in Perſon. In performing his Reſolutions great Conteſt happened betwixt him and Chryſoſtome, concerning which, various, uncertain and ſeveral incredible Reports are made, but Epiphanius in one reſpect had a great advantage of the other, for Chryſoſtome by the ſeverity of his Carriage and Reproofs had incurred the diſpleaſure of many perſons, but eſpecially the hatred of the Great Ones at Court. His rigorous Exaction of Diſcipline made his Clergy hate him. His refuſal to eat with other men, and to be preſent at Feaſts and lawfull Divertiſements increaſed the rumours, and gained credit to the Reports which they had raiſed, when he fell upon the Magiſtrates and Courtiers, they by their Countenance and Intereſt gave reputation to his Accuſers, but when he came to fall out with Eudoxia the Empreſs, that utterly loſt him. The inſulting Invective he made againſt Eutropius the Eunuch, who took Sanctuary in the Church after he had procured the Emperour to take away the Privilege of thoſe places, being againſt a man in miſery, though a guilty and obnoxious perſon, got him the Repute of Ill-natur'd and Cruel. The thing that preſerved his Reputation and life was his excellent Preaching, which yet was the leſs eſteemed of by reaſon of an Æmulatour he had in the City.

Socrates l. 6. c. 4, &c.

65. This was Severianus a Syrian Biſhop of Gabale, who underſtanding that Antiochus his Countreyman the Biſhop of Ptolemais had got good ſtore of money by preaching at Conſtantinople, made him a ſtock of Sermons, wherewith he came and ſet up in that City. At firſt by his Flatteries he prevailed much upon Chryſoſtome, and got his good eſteem, but being popular for his Sermons, when the Biſhop had withdrawn himſelf to Epheſus for filling that See, then vacant by the death of the Dioceſan; he began to make a Party for himſelf, and draw the affections of the People from their proper Paſtour to himſelf. The Jealouſie which hereupon aroſe was increaſed into Enmity it ſelf by means of Serapion, an inſolent lent and turbulent Deacon of that Church, who on a time refuſing to riſe up and ſhew reſpect to Severianus, though a Perſon ſo far above him as dignified by the Character of a Biſhop, Severianus thereupon could not forbear from reviling him, and brake into this Expreſſion, If Serapion die a Chriſtian, then Chriſt was not made Man. The latter part of theſe words Serapion relates to Chryſoſtome as ſpoken by themſelves, who thereupon having this advantage as he thought againſt him, flew out into great Paſſion and Invectives, neither would be reconciled to him till Eudoxia the Empreſs in the Apoſtles Church caſt her young Son Theodoſius, if Socrates was well informed, at his feet. Whatever ſhe did in this caſe, if ſhe was not already, long it was not e'er ſhe fell out with him, and conceived an implacable hatred againſt him. The Emperour Leo in his Oration in praiſe of Chryſoſtome aſſigneth the original cauſe to his rebuking of her for ſpoiling the Widow of one Theognoſtus of part of her Husband's Eſtate, who had been unjuſtly condemned, and defrauding another Widow of Alexandria of a Sum of Money due to her. It's reported of her, that ſhe fell out with Epiphanius at his coming to Conſtantinople, becauſe he would not condemn John of Hereſie, threatning to open the Idol Temples and permit the Pagans the exerciſe of their Superſtition. However it's reported from ſeveral hands that Chryſoſtome and he parted in diſpleaſure, and at his departure they mutually propheſied, he that John ſhould die in Exile, and John that he ſhould not live to return to his own See, both which it's ſaid came to paſs, though there be no great certainty concerning the time of Epiphanius his death. Amongſt the Writings which go under his Name, the Oration in praiſe of the Virgin Mary is none of his, though cited by Baronius, Caniſius, and à Caſtro, but a Declamation of another Epiphanius of later time, ſmaller Learning, poorer Credit and Authority in the Church, one of the Conveners at the ſecond Nicene Council.

Mountague.

Tom. Conc. 1.

Two Councils held at Milenis in Numidia.

66. This ſame year, viz. the CCCCII. of the ordinary Æra of Chriſt, was a General Council of the African Biſhops held at Milenis in Numidia under the preſidentſhip of Aurelius Primate of Carthage. There was another held at this place ſome fourteen years after, and the Canons of both are confounded by the compilers, as alſo with thoſe of other Synods, for the firſt eight in order which reſpect Pelagianiſm can hardly be thought to have been made by the Fathers at this time wherein that Hereſie was ſcarcely born, at leaſt known unto the World. In the date the Collectours give the title of Clariſſimi to the Emperours, which how ridiculous it is, appears by what we have formerly diſcourſed of ſuch titles of honour, they had found V.C. in the Copies, which ſtanding for their fifth Conſulſhip they thus ignorantly interpret. In the mean while the enemies of John Chryſoſtome proceeded in their plots and deſigns againſt him. Socrates and others tell us, that being diſpleaſed with the Empreſs for taking the part of Epiphanius, he flew out into invectives againſt all Women, and ſpake ſo deſpitefully of them in his Sermons, particularly from that Text, Gather to me thoſe that eat of the table of Jezebel, that ſhe being made to believe he meant no other than her ſelf, and Antiochus and Severianus, whom ſhe maintained in the City, complained of him to the Emperour. It happened opportunely for them that Theophylus Biſhop of Alexandria, being then ſummoned to Court as a criminal, was on his way thither. He is received not as ſuch, but in triumphant manner lodged in the Palace, ſay ſome, and now private Cabals are held for the methods and ways of deſtroying John. They ſent ſome Spies to inquire out the faults of his youth, thence to get ſome reflecting matter, but the deſign not taking, ſeven and thirty of them met together at Chalcedon, whither they cite him four times to appear before them, and when he refuſed them as unequal Judges, and was defended by forty other Biſhops which aſſembled to him at Conſtantinople, they condemned him as contumacious and depoſed him from his Biſhoprick. When word hereof was brought to Conſtantinople all the City was in an uproar, watching day and night leſt their Biſhop ſhould be taken from them, but the importunity of the Empreſs was ſo preſſing upon her Husband, that by his command a guard of Souldiers took him by force, and putting him by night into a Boat, carried him to Pretenum a Mart Town of Bithynia over againſt Nicomedia, the People following and oppoſing the Souldiers to no purpoſe.

John Chryſoſtome of Conſtantinople depoſed.

67. This violent hurrying him away ſo inraged the Multitude that a great Sedition followed. As thoſe in adverſity are generally pitied, many that formerly had ſpoken againſt him, began now to take his part, and the Sermons of Severianus did but add Oil to the Flame, who ceaſed not to declaim againſt him, not as a Man that had been condemned for any Crime, but onely as a proud and inſolent perſon. Things came to ſuch a paſs, that the Emperour with thoſe about him thought it requiſite to recall

But recalled.

Lib. 5. c. 34.

Is in diſpleaſure of the Empreſs Eudoxia.

Socr. l. 6. c. 16. Lat. vel 18. Gr.

recall him, and accordingly Briſo an Eunuch belonging to the Empreſs was ſent and brought him back to the City. Theodoret lays the cauſe upon a great Earthquake which happened at this time, by which Eudoxia was terrified and driven into this reſolution. At his return he would gladly have remained without the City till he could be acquitted by another Aſſembly, and ſolicited the Emperour in that affair, but the People compelled him to go to his Church, and to preach to them as at other times, whence his Adverſaries gathered matter again wherewith they charged him upon the next opportunity. He continued in his Chair for about the ſpace of a year, preaching to the People thoſe excellent Diſcourſes, which being taken from his Mouth in Short-hand by ſome on purpoſe appointed, were afterwards publiſhed, to the great edification of the Church in all ſucceeding Ages: At length he ſplit himſelf upon the ſame Rock, incurring afreſh the diſpleaſure of the Empreſs upon this occaſion. The People erected her a Statue of Silver upon a pedeſtal of Porphyre very near to the Church of Wiſedom, and at the Dedication celebrated Shews and Plays after the accuſtomed manner. Now either for that there was ſomething in this Solemnity which ſavoured of Impiety and Superſtition, the bonds of Chriſtian liberty, and Imperial Laws made concerning ſuch matters being violated, or becauſe the place being too near the Church the noiſe and tumults made a diſturbance in Divine Service, and in a manner prophaned the Ground; or out of his innate prejudice againſt all manner of Spectacula, and the ſevere auſterity wherewith his beſt friends cannot deny but he was much tranſported, he declaimed earneſtly againſt the thing. The Empreſs herewith being ſore netled, and with the many ſcoffs and taunts he uſed againſt ſuch as were Authours of the Solemnity, threatned him depoſition and death alſo, and eaſily perſwading Arcadius her Husband to lend her his Imperial Authority, wrote to the Biſhops his Enemies requiring them to meet with all ſpeed at Conſtantinople. Chryſoſtome upon notice hereof ſo far accommodated himſelf to the humour and condition of the times as to make another Sermon againſt her with this Exordium, Herodias rageth afreſh, ſtomacheth again, danceth as formerly; ſtill ſeeketh the Head of John to be preſented her in a Platter.

And in a Council held at Conſtantinople is baniſhed.

Lege Palladii Dial. de Vita Chryſoſtomi. Aug. de laudibus.

To Anaſtaſius ſucceeds Innocent in the See of Rome.

68. His Enemies the Biſhops being re-aſſembled conſulted all manner of ways how to accompliſh the buſineſs for which they were called. In concluſion, when they had examined many Witneſſes but found no teſtimonies ſtrong enough to convict him of any crime, they fell upon that point upon intruding into his See, and produced againſt him the Canon of the Council of Antioch, which ordains, That whoſoever being depoſed juſtly or unjuſtly ſhould repoſſeſs himſelf of his See, without a Synod conſiſting of a greater number than thoſe who depoſed him ſhould be again expelled and made irregular. Againſt this Canon he juſtly excepted that it was made by the Arians on purpoſe to intrap Athanaſius and therefore ought not in conſcience to be urged againſt him, but they eaſily overruled his Plea by intereſt in the Emperour, whom having wearied with their importunities they procured to remove him. At firſt he was commanded to keep his Houſe, but when he refuſed to neglect his duty in the Church, except compelled ſo to doe, and his Enemies ſtill urged his expulſion to Arcadius, he was at length carried bound like a Malefactour into exile, thoſe Biſhops that were of his Party being impriſoned, and the People in vain bemoaning as well their own loſs as the ſufferings of their Paſtour. Preſently after happened a dreadfull Fire, which beginning in the Church flew thence into the Palace where the Senate ſate and did very much miſchief. The followers of John the exiled Biſhop accuſed the Partizans of Theophilus as Authours thereof, and they again charged them with it, whom they branded with the Name of Johanites. Socrates indeed lays it upon them as done out of indignation at what the Biſhop ſuffered, however ſuch inquiſition was made, and ſuch tortures inflicted upon them by Optatus a Pagan, the Prefect of the City, that ſeveral of them upon this account have had the Honour to be reckoned amongſt Martyrs. Chryſoſtome ſeeing no relief could be obtained in the Eaſt, where Theophilus his bitter Enemy was ſo potent, betook himſelf to the Biſhop of Rome, whom by Letters he acquainted with his caſe. This was Innocent who ſucceeded Anaſtaſius, after the Church had been vacant one and twenty days. He would gladly have promoted and ſhewed the Power and Intereſt of his See, in giving him aſſiſtence, but his endeavours aſwell as aims were to no purpoſe.

Arſaſius choſen in the Chair of Chryſoſtome at Conſtantinople.

69. For the Enemies of Chryſoſtome to fill his Chair, and cut off all hope of his Reſtitution, elected Biſhop of Conſtantinople Arſaſius an old decrepit Man, of fourſcore years of Age, Brother to Nectarius who had formerly governed that See, a Man leſs Eloquent than Fiſhes, and a worſe Singer than the Frogs, if

Palla-

The Secular Games Celebrated.

Vide Part 1. p. 661. ſect. 19.

And the Spectacula of the Gladiators.

Prudentius adverſus Symmach. c. 2.

Palladius be Judge, but of ſingular modeſty and of meek behaviour, in the opinion of Socrates, who thereupon obſerveth, that the Church in his time enjoyed great eaſe and quietneſs. But many contemning him for the vaſt difference they found betwixt his parts and thoſe of his Predeceſſour, and eſpecially induced by a ſenſe of that wrong which they conceived to be done to John, refuſed utterly to communicate with him, and ſeparated themſelves from his Church, which ſo provoked thoſe of his Party, that great Perſecutions were raiſed againſt them, ſome Imperial Edicts being procured for correction and reſtrainment of thoſe who refuſed to communicate with him and his Fellow Biſhops. In the mean time, whilſt Chriſtians by perſecuting one another, and rending the ſeamleſs Coat of Chriſt, gave matter of ſcandal to the Enemies of their Religion, a greater matter of ſcandal was offered to ſuch in the Weſt, by renewing a great and ſolemn act of the old Pagan Superſtition. This was the Celebration of the old Secular Games, which had been omitted ever ſince the Converſion of Conſtantine the Great, but now by permiſſion of Honorius, who was made to believe that the omiſſion of them would be fatal to the City, were for this one time more reſtored. Concerning theſe Solemnities, we have heretofore ſufficiently ſpoken. This was the two hundredth year from that wherein Severus the Emperour celebrated his Games of an hundred and ten years, whereby it came to paſs that they were confounded with the Centenaries, but the Romans, out of a fond reſpect to their old Superſtition, deſired to have them this way celebrated rather than not at all; and Claudian in the name of other Pagans, overcome with joy in Poetick Raptures, celebrates the praiſe of the Emperour for this ſo great an expreſſion of kindneſs to his Subjects of the old ſtamp. But the Pagans having this Inch of liberty given them, improved it (as the Proverb hath it) to an Ell broad, procuring the old Spectacula of the Gladiators alſo to be reſtored, to the view of which the Veſtal Virgins went out in a ſolemn Proceſſion. For theſe and other things, as Divines obſerve, the Land groaned, and both Emperour and People ſuffered the dreadfull effects of God's Anger and Indignation, which within a year or two abundantly ſhewed themſelves in the Invaſion of Italy and other Parts of the Weſt by the Barbarous Nations.

Arſacius of Conſtantinople dies.

Atticus elected in his ſtead.

John Chryſoſtome dies in exile.

Socr. l. 5. c. 17.
Soz. l. 8. c. 27.
Palladius ubi ſuprà.

Socrates.
Soz. l. 8. c. 2.
Niceph. l. 10. c. 2.
Theodoret. l. 5. c. 28.
Palladius Metaphraſis.

70. The ſame year that Chryſoſtome was driven into exile, St. Auguſtine the Biſhop of Hippo diſputed publickly in his Church two days together with Fœlix the Manichee, who overcome with his Arguments, confeſſed the truth, and renounced his errours. The year following, being the four hundred and fifth year of our Lord, in the ſecond Conſulſhip of Stilico, and the firſt of Anthemius on the eleventh of November, Arſacius the pretended Biſhop of Conſtantinople died, having held the See a year and two months. About the Succeſſion great heats and contention aroſe, and the Diſputes continued for four months, after which in the next year, in the ſixth Conſulſhip of Arcadius and the firſt of Probus was Atticus Elected, a Man born at Sebaſtia in Armenia, brought up in the Monaſtical courſe of life by thoſe of the Macedonian Hereſie, from which afterward turning to the Catholick Faith he was made Prieſt of the Church of Conſtantinople, and became a ſtickler againſt Chryſoſtome; of mean learning, but of very good natural parts, and fit for buſineſs. By this means was Chryſoſtome kept out of his See, and ſtill impriſoned, very hardly uſed, and removed at length from Arabiſſus toward Pityventis on porpoſe to haraſs him to death, in which Journey he died, and paſſed to an heavenly Countrey, whom in this World neither his eminent Piety, ſingular Learning, nor incomparable Eloquence could protect from the calumnies of Sycophants and unjuſt oppreſſion. He was born at Antioch in Cœloſyria upon the River Orontes, of a Noble Family, his Father's Name Secundus, and his Mother's Anchuſa. He ſtudied at Athens, where applying himſelf to Libinaus for Rhetorick, and Androgathius for Philoſophy, he profited in Learning to the admiration of the whole Univerſity, being yet a Pagan. Afterwards he and his Parents were converted, though he was very well learned in the Laws, yet reſolving to betake himſelf to the Monaſtery, he ſtudied Divinity under conduct of Diodenis, Carterius, Euſebius, Emiſenus, and Baſil the Great. Then was he made Reader of the Church of Antioch by Zeno Biſhop of Gara, a Deacon by Meletius, after three years by Euagrius a Prieſt, and at length Biſhop of Conſtantinople, and Patriarch of the Churches throughout Thrace, Aſia and the Maritime Coaſts. A moſt excellent both Man and Chriſtian, but as ſuch want not their failings, ſo is he obſerved to have been too rigid and auſtere, by which defect he ſeems partly to have brought much trouble upon himſelf. He wrote ſome Books whilſt yet a Reader, ſome when Deacon, others when Prieſt, but moſt after he came to be Biſhop. His Works yet extant were by Eraſmus digeſted into five Tomes, ſince that publiſhed in an Excellent Edition by our Sir Henry Savil. Many Spurious pieces bear his name, which Sixtus Senenſis and others have detected. The Liturgie ſaid to be his is of the ſame ſtamp, for it hath a Prayer for Alexius the Emperour who was Born long after his death, and for Nicholas the Pope or elſe the Patriarch of Conſtantinople. The Copies much differ one from another. Amongſt the Saints there remembred mention is made of Chryſoſtome himſelf. Worſhipping the Image of Chriſt is ſpoken of, whereas he in his genuine writings as his 50th Homily upon Matthew accounts the Art of Painting Superſtitious; and the ſecond Nicene Synod though it ſcrape up all the Teſtimonies it can in behalf of Images, yet never citeth the Liturgie of Chryſoſtome.

Several Judgments upon his Perſecutours.

71. Eccleſiaſtical Writers obſerve that many and remarkable Judgments fell upon his perſecutours not long after they had accompliſhed the effects of their Malice. Obſervable is that ſtory told of Cyrinus Biſhop of Chalcedon, on whoſe foot Maruthas Biſhop of Meſopotamia treading againſt his will, when they were aſſembled in a Synod againſt John, it ſo corrupted of the bruiſe that he was forced to cut it off, but the putrefaction running over his whole Body, and falling at length into his other Foot he was conſtrained to loſe both and miſerably died. Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria whoſe carriage in this buſineſs makes us ſuſpect he too much deſerved the Character given him by Socrates, notwithſtanding that Baronius would fain make him a good and holy Man, not long after was taken with a Pain in his ſide and died. Antiochus and Severianus ſcarcely overlived him. Hail of an unuſual bigneſs fell at Conſtantinople, four days after which was taken away Eudoxia the Empreſs by a miſerable manner. Neither were other Calamities wanting, as Plague, Famine, Inundations, Earthquakes, Droughts, Wars and ſuch like miſeries as ſhortly after befell Greece. However Chryſoſtome was looked upon in the Eaſt whilſt he lived, when dead his memory preſently began to be very pretious throughout the whole Church, which Innocent the Biſhop of Rome perceiving excommunicated Arſacius his Succeſſour, though already departed this World, together with the Emperour Arcadius and Theophilus the Biſhop of Alexandria, if credit may be given to the later Greek Hiſtorians, and a Book in the Vatican Library cited by Baronius, whereas the more Ancient Writers and thoſe of better Note relate no ſuch matter, and Theophilus whom they will have depoſed ſate faſt in his See till his death, not to ſpeak that the Synod which Condemned Chryſoſtome how unjuſtly ſoever, could not with more Juſtice be condemned by Innocent without an hearing.

Vide Socr. l. 6. Cap. 14 Lat. Sozo Niceph. Th

Several Edicts againſt the Pagans, Cœlicolæ and Jews.

72. The year following, being the 408 of the ordinary Æra of Chriſt, Honorius the Emperour publiſhed ſome Reſcripts againſt the Donatiſts and Pagans, which upon the death of Stilico were become high and domineering in Africk to ſuch an height that pretending ſuch Laws as had been made formerly againſt them to have been his mere device without any Imperial Authority, they roſe up againſt the Orthodox Chriſtians and murthered certain Biſhops. In one of thoſe Reſcripts of the Emperour together with the Donatiſts are the Cœlicolæ condemned, who are alſo in another Edict of the following year joyned and ſentenced with Jews. What theſe Cœlicolæ ſhould be is very obſcure, the name being new and unheard of as the Edict it ſelf bears mention, though they are joyned alſo in an Edict of Conſtantine. Some have thought them Pagans and Worſhippers of the Dea Cœleſtis formerly mentioned, ſome a ſort of Eſſeni amongſt the Jews, who Worſhipped the Hoſt of Heaven; but that they were Chriſtians herein appears becauſe they were Baptized. Yet are they not reckoned amongſt Hereticks by thoſe that have made Catalogues of ſuch, ſo that they ſeem to have been a ſort of Judaiſing Chriſtians or Chriſtianized Jews, and to ſhun the Odium of Judaiſm might take upon them this name of Cœlicolæ living under their Majores, as the Jews did under their Patriarchs. But this ſame year alſo Theodoſius the Emperour gave out another Edict againſt the Jews who upon pretence of celebrating the Memory of the hanging of Aman dragged Croſſes up and down the Streets and burnt them in deriſion and deſpight of Chriſtian Religion. He requires the Governours of Provinces to prevent this Scandal and upon Commiſſion of the like Offence threatens the Jews with forfeiture of their remaining Privileges. About this time died Porphyrius Biſhop of Antioch a great Adverſary of Chryſoſtome's, who after the death of Flavianus had invaded that See by fraud and Tyranny. For whilſt the whole City in the grove of Daphne was intent upon the Spectacula, he was ordained Biſhop by Severianus, Acacius and Antiochus thoſe of his faction with ſuch ſpeed that

C. Th. de hæret. c. 19. & de Paganis.

Ut ſuprà, l. 43. Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 9.

Cœlicolarum nomen inauditum quodam modo nonum crimen ſuperſtitionis vindicavit. Vide gloſſam in leg. 12. tit. dict. Aug. Ep. 163.

Vide cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 9. leg. 3.

Tit. eod. l. 11.

Porphirius Biſhop of Antioch dies.

Sozom. l. 2. c. 24. Niceph. l. 13. c. 30. Theodor. l. 5. c. 35.

that many accuſtomed Rites were thereby omitted, for which fact the People was ſo inraged that they had ſet fire to his Houſe and burnt him, but that by ſtrong hand they were overpowered by the Governour of the Town, whom he had corrupted with Money. In his place was choſen Alexander a Man brought up in the Monaſtical courſe of Life, and of great repute for Piety and Learning, who by joyning in one the parties of Paulinus and Meletius reſtored Peace to that Church, and made an end of that Schiſm which had laſted ſixty years, from the Ejection of Euſtathius.

Alexander ſucceeds him.

Alaricus lays Siege to Rome.

73. The next year was the City of Rome beſieged by Alaricus, upon which occaſion when as the Pagans betook themſelves to their falſe Deities, Zozimus their Hiſtorian relates that Innocent the Biſhop of that City did ſecretly conſent to certain ſolemnities of that ſuperſtition induced by the great proffers made by the Tuſcan Aruſpices, for which report as a mere Scandal Baronius is exceedingly concerned. Conſidering the temper of the relater we cannot but joyn with the Cardinal in his charitable opinion, (though this be not ſo much a reaſon to him as ſomething elſe, and he refuſe on Authority how vile ſoever of which he may make uſe againſt us Hereticks) yet cannot but wiſh that he who ſhewed ſo much zeal in behalf of a particular Biſhop would have employed a little in oppoſing ſome Reliques of thoſe Heatheniſh impieties which yet cleaved to the Profeſſours of Chriſtianity. For not to ſpeak of that Deluge of Wickedneſs of which Chryſoſtome, Hierome and other Fathers of this time complain, which ſpread both over the Eaſtern and Weſtern Empire, the Emperours though Chriſtians as well as their Pagan Predeceſſours ſuffered their Images to be adored, and this very year according to the old Cuſtome ſpeak of themſelves as Gods, and Attribute Divinity to their Perſons, none opening his Mouth in reprehenſion of ſo unwarrantable a pratice. Notwithſtanding the Fathers of the Church, to give them their due in this particular, ceaſed not to declaim againſt the Spectacula and the Licentious practices of the Stage, of which the Pagans, as Auguſtine obſerveth, were the firſt Founders, yet Chriſtians ſtill too much loved and retained theſe obſcene Sports, frequenting Bawdy Houſes, Salvian alſo complains, and the Emperour Honorius is noted as guilty of inceſt for having Married two of Stilico's Daughters Succeſſively. Yet amidſt thoſe great difficulties wherewith at this time he was incumbred, he forgot not to publiſh ſeveral wholeſome Laws againſt Magicians, Pagans, Jews and the lately mentioned Cælicolæ, which are yet extant in the Code of Theodoſius; in behalf of Priſoners alſo, commanding that every Lord's day they ſhould be let out of Priſon to receive the Almes of good People, and to the publick Bathes for the Improvement of Religion; the conſideration of which made St. Hierome deny it was for his Sins that ſo great Calamity now befell his People, and lay the Siege and Captivity of the City of Rome at the Doors of the obſtinate and perfidious Gentiles.

Honorius ſends forth his Edicts againſt Magicians, Pagans, Jews and Cælicolæ.

Nulli habetur ambiguum etiam ab hæredibus & pro hæredibus poſſe reſcripta noſtri numinis allegari. c. Th. l. 1. t. 2. l. 10.

Tit. de mulct. Pagan. de cuſtod. reorum.

Ruffinus dies.

74. The year following wherein Rome was taken by Alaricus being the 410 of the ordinary Æra of Chriſt, Ruffinus the Prieſt of Aquileia and great Patron of the Perſon and Works of Origen died in Sicily, having retired himſelf thither upon aproach of Alaricus. Againſt him St. Hierome unhandſomely inſults being now dead, and not able to anſwer for himſelf; but he had given him ſuch Nick-names whilſt alive, that no wonder he ſhould maintain what he had formerly ſaid and done: For in his Writings he ordinarily gives him the name of Scorpius, ſometimes he calls him Grunnius, the forerunner of Pelagius, and other good Epithetes he gives him, by the conſent and Approbation of Baronius, who over and above accuſeth him for foiſting into the Books he Tranſlated things quite different from the Deſign of the Authour. Indeed his Tranſlations of Greek Authours as now extant ſeem to have been the products of a moſt negligent, ignorant and diſſolute Interpreter, but the Annaliſt hath no great reaſon to condemn him in this Point having made ſo much uſe of him in reading thoſe which he could not underſtand in their own Language. This makes him accuſe Joſephus moſt falſely for contradicting himſelf about Salome, as if he ſometimes called her Herod's Siſter, and ſometime his Wife, whereas the very place he quotes is Siſter, but herein he follows Ruffinus his Tranſlation, and having no ſkill in the Language (which certain it is he had not, ſaith one who was able to judge) or otherwiſe relying upon Interpreters he is often plunged upon Abſurdities as in due time and place may be made apparent. In the mean time we ſhall take notice that Theodoſius the Emperour this year publiſhed ſeveral Reſcripts againſt Priſcillianiſts, Eunomians and Montaniſts to be ſeen in the Title of Hereticks in the Code of Theodoſius. As alſo that about this ſame time Syneſius whoſe Epiſtles are yet extant was made Biſhop

of

Tom. 1. Ep. 16. 59. Præf. in Hieron.

Bp. Mountague, Appar. c. 4.

Theodoſius publiſheth ſeveral Reſcripts againſt the Priſcillianiſts, &c.

Syneſius made Biſhop of Ptolemais.

Vide Euagrium, l. 1. c. 15. Syneſii Epp.

of Ptolemais, concerning whom ſome admire he ſhould be reckoned amongſt Eccleſiaſtical Writers, much more intruſted with ſo great a charge. He was Born a Greek and Pagan, of a Noble Family, in his Youth given to Hunting and the ſtudy of the Liberal Sciences, wherein he excelled being of the Platonick Sect. Euagrius who calls him Biſhop of Cyrene deſiring not to forget him, that the excellency of his vertues, as he ſaith, might ſet forth the ſimplicity of his Style, writes, that he was ſo eloquent and ſo profound a Philoſopher that being had in great admiration by impartial Chriſtians they perſwaded him to be Baptized, and take upon him the Prieſtly function, though he neither admitted nor would be brought to believe the Article of the Reſurrection; and this they did, hoping very charitably of him, that thoſe things would follow after his other vertues, and that the grace of God would ſuffer nothing to want in him that belonged unto his Souls health, which hope of theirs, ſaith our Authour, was not in vain. For how Excellent he proved, both the learned Epiſtles he wrote, after he was Prieſt, and the Book he dedicated to Theodoſius, with other notable Monuments of his induſtry, do declare.

75. This that Euagrius writes of him is but agreeable to what he ſaith himſelf in his Epiſtles; yet Baronius concludes that aſſuredly there was no ſuch matter as his being ordained by Theophilus, the Biſhop of Alexandria holding ſuch an opinion concerning the Reſurrection, pronounces thoſe highly miſtaken that believe it, and as knowing fully his mind affirms he did but jeſt and not write what he thought, his deſign herein being to prevent the impoſition of the Epiſcopal function upon him, which he as much as death abhorred. Certainly Euagrius and Nicephorus might by living nearer to his Age have as good opportunity, to know the meaning of Syneſius as the Cardinal, whoſe good opinion of Theophilus (for Men muſt be good or bad as maketh for his great deſign) hath no good foundation in Antiquity. Syneſius not onely refuſed to be Biſhop upon the account of the Reſurrection (for Hereticks ſeldom refuſe ſuch conditions as may enable them better to propagate and countenance their errours) but out of a Lazy humour which very hardly would admit of buſineſs, and eſpecially becauſe he flatly refuſed to live without his Wife in the Miniſtery (which ſince the promotion of Siricius had become too commendable) neither converſe privately with her as a Concubine, whom both God, the Law and the ſacred hand of Theophilus, as he ſaith himſelf, had given to him. Notwithſtanding this his Proteſtation yet the People was ſo importunate that Theophilus ordained him Biſhop, not hoping that he would change his mind as to keeping his Wife, but in his belief as to the Reſurrection; for the Cardinal is not ignorant (however he conceals all he may) that notwithſtanding the Cuſtome which at this time obtained in Theſſaly (introduced by Theodorus a Prieſt of Triva and Authour of certain wanton and amorous Books intitled Æthiopica) that a Prieſt uſing the Company of his Wife which he Married when a Lay-man ſhould be depoſed, yet ſuch Biſhops and Prieſts in the Eaſt as refrained their Company did it at their own choice without any Law or Compulſion, and many of them notwithſtanding their Government and Adminiſtration of their Epiſcopal function, in the time of Socrates begat Children on their lawfull Wives, which we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew that in the Eaſt they ever did, and in the Weſt for many Centuries yet downward, till the Decrees of the Roman See at length with much adoe obtained. As for Syneſius after his Conſecration he contended againſt Hereſies indeed, and exhorted his Presbyters ſo to doe. Of his Writings few are extant, except a Volume of his Epiſtles, from which it appears that he thought ſoberly and orthodoxly concerning the Holy Trinity, concerning other Doctrines he ſpeaks not much, but of this little whatever he thought of the Reſurrection, ſome things cannot be commended, as that the Mind of Man is the Seed of God, that Angels by their converſation with Men have contracted ill affections, that thereupon the Son of God came down, that ſins are purged by puniſhment. When Biſhop he wrote ſome Books concerning hunting, much buſied himſelf about the works of Homer and ſuch frivolous things. In adverſity he was ſo overcome with paſſion and dejection that he was near killing himſelf for the death of his Son. It repented him that he had ſuffered the Epiſcopal function to be impoſed on him. He lived ſtill with his Wife, and begat Children after his Conſecration, and was of a candid, free and open ſpirit. But enough of Syneſius.

Lib. 5. c. 22.

His Works and Character.

76. The year following, which had Theodoſius the Emperour alone for Conſul, by reaſon of the Diſorders in the Weſt, a Conference was held at Carthage, betwixt the Catholicks and Donatiſts, which though it had the uſual effect upon the Diſputants themſelves, yet of the ordinary People, and thoſe called Circumcel-

Aug. Brev. Coll.

Theodoſius publiſheth an Edict againſt the Donatiſts.

C. Th. de Hæret. l. 52.

Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria dies.

Cyril ſucceeds.

Lib. 7. cap. 7.

Peſtifero vomuit coluber Sermone Britannus. Proſper Aquit.

Morgan or Pelagius an Heretick.

Camden. in Ceſtria. Uſſerius de primord. Eccleſ. Britan.

Cœlum non animum mutant qui trans mare currunt.

liones, very many are ſaid to have been reduced into the Right way; and the Emperour following on the ſtroke lately given by the Orthodox Biſhops to this Hereſie, in the next year publiſheth a ſevere Edict, which inflicts exile and moſt grievous Fines, upon ſuch as ſhould ſtill pertinaciouſly continue in that Schiſm. This ſame year on the fifteenth of October, died Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria, of a Lethargy, after which followed a great Conteſt about the Election of his Succeſſour, ſome ſtickling hard for Timothy the Archdeacon, and others for Cyril the Nephew of Theophilus. Though Abundantius Governour of the Town uſed his utmoſt endeavour for promotion of the former, yet Cyril carried it three Days after the deceaſe of his Uncle, and if Socrates deal fairly with us, aſſumed to himſelf more Power than he ever had enjoyed. From this time forth, he tells us, the Biſhop of that See beſides the Government of his Clergy and Juriſdiction in Eccleſiaſtical matters, took alſo upon him the management of temporal Affairs, as a token whereof Cyril preſently ſhut up the Novatian Churches in Alexandria, and not onely rifled them of all their Treaſure, but robbed alſo Theopemptus, their Biſhop of all his Eſtate. But from theſe differences at Alexandria a Diſſention of greater Conſequence diverts us, a notable Hereſie ſpringing up in the Church at this time, the Sower of which Cockle had his Birth and Original in this our Iſland of Britain. His Britiſh Name was Morgan, in Greek and Latin Pelagius, ſignifying in Engliſh, near the Sea. He was a Monk of the Monaſtery of Bonium or Bangor in Flintſhire, wherein lived two thouſand Perſons famous for their diligent labour, aſwell as their ſolitary Courſe of Life; but quitting that Place travelled up and down the World, and contrary to the obſervation paſſing the Seas changed his mind, aſwell as the Air, and either received from others, (for Baronius would lay the load upon Ruffinus) or himſelf conceived many and grievous Errours, which now diſturbed the Peace of the Church, after her Triumphs over the Arian Hereſie.

First taken notice of by St. Chryſoſtome.

In Chron. de peccat. merit. l. 3. cap. 1.

De peccator. meritis & Ep.

* Demſter. Hiſt. Scot. l. 15.

Ep. ad Cteſiphontem.

Being ſummoned to Dioſpolis, he hypocritically recants his aſſertions.

77. The firſt that took notice of his heterodox Opinions, St. Chryſoſtome ſeemeth to have been in his fourth Epiſtle to Olympias, wherein he lamenteth his fall, whom formerly he had looked upon as an Holy Man. This was two years before the death of that good Biſhop, the ordinary year of our Lord, 405. about ſeven Years before the time that Proſper aſſigneth for the Worlds taking notice of this Hereſie, though St. Auguſtine alſo much about that time, as we may eaſily perceive had ſmelt it out. But all this while for fear of a diſcovery, and the brand he ſhould infallibly receive from the Hands of the Pious and Learned Fathers of the Church, he publiſhed his Tenents in the Names of other Men, by the means and procurement, eſpecially of Cæleſtius his chief Diſciple. Not onely St. Auguſtine (whom as * ſome obſerve how truely I know not, by Divine diſpenſation, Africk brought forth the ſame day, that he was born in Britain, as an Antidote againſt the Poiſon) both by Words and Writing oppoſed this Doctrine. But St. Hierome alſo, though concealing both the Names of Pelagius and Cæleſtius, yet hinting at his Original by twitting the Iſland of Britain as fertile in Tyrants, and the Scotiſh Nation. He deduceth the Pedigree of theſe Errours, from the School of the Stoicks, all along through the Succeſſions of Origen (who yet certainly was rather a Retainer to the Academy than the Porch) Euagrius, Ponticus, Ruffinus, and others of that perſwaſion, taking in the Alliance of the Manichees and Priſcillianiſts, and deſcending to Jovinianus. At length Cæleſtius publiſhed his Hereſies at Carthage, yet craftily under the notion of queſtions onely, where aſſoon as publiſhed, they were refelled and condemned by an Aſſembly of Eccleſiaſticks, there gathered together. After this Pelagius not able to hold any longer pulled off the Vizard of an Orthodox Prieſt, and openly maintained his opinions, upon ſpreading whereof and advice from Carthage, a Synod of Biſhops was held at Lidda or Dioſpolis a City of Paleſtine, under Eulogius Biſhop of Cæſarea, and Metropolitan of that Province where Pelagius recanted, and out of fear hypocritically anathematized his former aſſertions.

Which are theſe.

78. Thoſe were twelve in number as Baronius findeth them in the Creſconian Edition, inſerted after the Epiſtle of Aurelius Biſhop of Carthage, to thoſe of the Provincia Bizacena. 1. "That Adam was created mortal, ſo that whether he had "ſinned or no he ſhould have died. 2. That his Sin hurt onely himſelf, and not his "Poſterity. 3. That Infants newly born are in the ſame State, that he was before "his Fall. 4. That neither through his Death and Prevarication do all Men "die, neither through Chriſt's Reſurrection ſhall riſe again. 5. That Infants "though they ſhould never be baptized, yet may obtain Eternal Life. 6. That “Rich men though baptized, yet except they renounce all they have cannot obtain the Kingdom of Heaven. 7. That the Grace and Aſſiſtence of God is not afforded to the ſeveral Acts, but they depend upon free Will, belong to the Law and Doctrine. 8. That the Grace of God is given according to our Merits. 9. That none could be called the Sons of God, except they were made utterly void of all Sin. 10. That the Will is not free if it ſtand in need of God's Aſſiſtence, it being in the Power of every one to doe or not doe any thing. 11. That our Victory is not from the Help and Aſſiſtence of God, but proceeds from our own free Will. And 12. that forgiveneſs of Sin is not given to thoſe that ask it, for the Grace and Mercy of God, but according to the Merits and Endeavours of ſuch as by their Repentance do deſerve it. Thoſe Aſſertions are of the very ſame Nature, with ſuch as are found in the Books of St. Auguſtine, St. Hierome, Proſper and others, who have had occaſion to mention them in their Writings, and ſpeak of ſome other Tenents, moſt of which are rather Conſequences of thoſe, as ſome of thoſe are of others, than really divers and diſtinct from them; the Summ of all being this, that as we are born without Goodneſs and Vertue, ſo abſolutely without vice or flaw in our Wills and Inclinations. For if all depend merely upon our own Will, the Law might ſend them to Heaven who lived under it, aſwell as the Goſpel can do us, and if they really were not, yet they might have been without Sin; and to what purpoſe ſhould the Church put up her Prayers and Petitions for Infidels, and ſuch as reſiſt the Truth, or that thoſe who are already converted, ſhould grow in Grace and Vertue, and perſevere in them till the end, if we receive not theſe things from God, but are endowed ſufficiently with Power within our own ſelves, and the Grace of God be onely conferred on us according to our own Merits and ſelf Sufficiency? what need Saints pray to have their Sins forgiven if they live without them, or not to be led into Temptation, if they ſtand not in need of God's Aſſiſtence, but have Power enough in themſelves, and their Wills be ſufficient to weather it out againſt all hardſhips and oppoſition? As for the Grace of God, it appears from the fourth Canon of the Council of Milevis (which as we ſaid before muſt have been holden not till the diſcovery made of this Hereſie) that Pelagius and his moſt thorough paced Diſciples, underſtood no more by it than the Revelation of the Divine Will, whereby a Man might know what was agreeable or diſſonant to it; but as for the Power of fulfilling God's Command, that a Man hath for his own natural ſtrength, ſtanding in no need therein of his Grace and Aſſiſtence. Though Pelagius by his great diſſimulation impoſed upon the Fathers aſſembled at Dioppolis, yet their jealouſie thereof ſeems not utterly wanting, in that they gave him no Letters teſtimonial of his Repentance and Sincerity, which happened well both for themſelves and other Orthodox Chriſtians, he in a ſhort ſpace recanting what he had before them renounced, and licking up his Vomit, which he had in appearance ſpued out in their preſence.

A Tumult at Alexandria, but ſuppreſſed.

79. Whilſt Pelagius a falſe Brother raiſed ſuch ſtirs and Contentions amongſt Chriſtians themſelves a notable Tumult happened at Alexandria, betwixt ſuch as bore that Name there, and the Jews and Pagans of that City upon this occaſion. A certain Dancer ſhewed his feats of activity upon a Saturday, which being the Sabbath of the Jews, they thereat took great offence, and burning ever with hatred againſt Chriſtians raiſed a Tumult, which for this time was appeaſed by the Care and Endeavours of Oreſtes the Prefect of the City. But it happening that Oreſtes fixing upon the Theatre, ſome Decree or Law to be for the future obſerved by the People, ſome of Cyril the Biſhop's Friends were curious to peruſe it, and amongſt the reſt one Hierax a Grammarian in great grace with him, whom as ſoon as the Jews beheld they cried out upon him, that he came thither for no other end than to move Contention betwixt Chriſtians, and thoſe of their perſwaſion, and laying hands on him, haled him to Oreſtes. He being a Pagan and a great Enemy of Cyril, whom he hated as well upon account of his Faith as Profeſſion, becauſe that the Power of the Biſhops in Alexandria had much abridged the Authority of the Governours, cauſed him to be ſeverely beaten. Cyril upon notice hereof, ſends for the moſt eminent amongſt the Jews, and threatens them with condign Puniſhment, in caſe they gave not over theſe mutinous Courſes, wherewith they were grievouſly offended, and ſet themſelves more carefully than ever, to work ſome natable feat, and ſhew their utmoſt rage and ſpleen againſt the Profeſſours of Chriſtianity. One certain Night having prepared themſelves for this purpoſe, they ſet ſome to crie Fire in the Streets, and to give out it was in the Church of Alexander, which aſſoon as the Chriſtians heard, Socrat. l. 7. cap. 13. &c. Niceph. l. 14. cap. 14.

Another upon which the Jews are diſ-driven and driven thence.

they iſſue out of their Houſes, and from all Coaſts making toward that place, fall amongſt the Jews, lying in Ambuſh for them, by whom they are miſerably ſlain without reſpect to any Condition. Hereupon Cyril the Biſhop gets him to the Synagogue of the Jews, of whom ſome he causeth to be put to death, the Eſtates of others to be ſeized, and baniſheth the reſt, whereby they who had inhabited the City from Alexander's time, were now diſperſed into all Countries.

Upon which a Quarrel 'twixt the Governour and the Biſhop ariſeth.

80. Oreſtes the Governour taking the thing it ſelf in ill part, as depriving the City of thoſe People, which by their egregious cunning in trade and practice in brokage, make their Company deſirable to ſeveral Places, and worſe as done by him, makes a great complaint hereof to the Emperour. Cyril was not wanting to himſelf on the other hand, in laying open the Inſolence and Cruelty of the Jews, yet deſired to be friends with Oreſtes, which offer the other would not cloſe with, either merely by reaſon of his Ethnick, and inveterate prejudice, or for that he intended to act the ſecond part of what the Jews had formerly performed. But their Enmity daily increaſing, the Monks that inhabited the Mount Nitria took notice thereof, and being at leiſure, alſo as hotly diſpoſed, as lately when Theophilus armed them againſt the Party of Dioſcorus, reſolved to maintain the Quarrel of Cyril his Succeſſour, and fifty of them coming to Alexandria aſſaulted the Governour as he rode in his Chariot, calling him Sacrificer, a Heathen, and giving him much other opprobious Language. He to appeaſe them, told them he was a Chriſtian, having been baptized by Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, but they would give no credit to his words, and proſecuting what they had begun, one amongſt them, Ammonius by Name, gave him ſo ſore a blow on his Head with a ſtone, that the bloud guſhed out about his Ears, and the Officers and Sergeants attending him out of fear ſhifted for themſelves, the Governour continuing in this danger, till the Citizens came in to his reſcue, and ſeized on Ammonius, whoſe Fellows had made a ſhift to get away. Him the Governour cauſed to be tortured to death, and both he and Cyril again by writing, make their caſe as good as they can poſſibly to the Emperour. But the Biſhop buries the Corpſe of the Monk in a peculiar Church, changeth his Name from Ammonius to Thamnaſius, and in a kind of Funeral Sermon extolls the noble Courage of the Man, the great Combat he endured for Godlineſs, and gives Command he ſhould be called a Martyr, which gave offence to the more moderate and ſober ſort of Chriſtians, that knew how to diſtinguiſh betwixt the Cauſe, and the Puniſhment, and were ſatisfied that the Monk died not for Chriſt, but ſuffered what was due to his ſeditious and unwarrantable Enterprize.

Which is ſcandalouſly carried on.

81. Theſe juſt and ſober Sentiments of the judicious ſort of Chriſtians, cauſed Cyril to ſuffer the thing to dye, and be forgotten with the Monk, but ſtill the grudge continued betwixt him and Oreſtes, which produced another piece of imprudence, and ſcandal on the Chriſtian Part, after this manner. There was a Woman at Alexandria, by Name Hypatia, the Daughter of Theon the Philoſoper, who trained up in her Father's way excelled all the Philoſophers of that time, continued in Plato's School the exerciſe formerly practiſed by Plotinus, publickly read the Doctrine of all Philoſopers to ſuch as from all Countries flocked to hear her, and was had in extraordinary Honour and Eſteem, not onely for her Learning, but exceeding Modeſty, Gravity and Courage, which ſhe had ſucked in from her Philoſophical Principles. Many Letters of Syneſius to her are yet extant, who calls her Lady and Miſtreſs, and Suidas takes notice of her, as a moſt chaſt Virgin. This Perſon it ſeems being in great favour with the Governour, the People grew jealous, that ſhe did ill Offices betwixt him and the Biſhop, and in concluſion certain frantick and raſh Fellows headed by one Peter a Reader of the Church, watching her as ſhe came home to her Houſe, pulled her out of her Chariot, and dragging her into the Church called Cæſarium, ſtripped her ſtark naked, with ſharp ſhells rent the Skin from her Body till ſhe died, then quartering her brought the Quarters to a place called Cinaron, where they burnt them to Aſhes. This diveliſh Act brought great ſcandal to Chriſtianity in general, aſwell as the Church of Alexandria, and the Perſon of Cyril. Socrates is ſo preciſe in the Account thereof, that he notes it was committed in the fourth year after Cyril's Conſecration, the tenth Conſulſhip of Honorius, and the ſeventh of Theodoſius (which was the 416 of the ordinary Æra of Chriſt) in the Month of March and the Ember-days. Yet Baronius admoniſheth his Reader not to give credit to the Relater of thoſe Stories, whom being a Novatian he concludeth prejudiced againſt the Biſhop, for what at his firſt coming to his Office he had done againſt thoſe of that perſwaſion. However we commend the Cardinal for his Charity to a Perſon of ſo eminent Dignity in the Church, or rather, if one might dare to judge, to his Champions the Monks, of whoſe bald Skulls (if they ſhaved themſelves at this time) he is as tender as of the Biſhop's Mitre, yet out of a principle of indifference we muſt alſo tell the Reader, that others converſant in Antiquity do obſerve, that as this Age was generally very corrupt, ſo no greater Plague happened to the Church and Common-wealth, than that of the Monaſtical Life, which for about an Hundred years had filled the World with ſo many drones, that ſcarcely did any hope he could be ſaved except quitting his ſtation, in which God's Providence had placed him, he expoſed the Church and State to the Luſt and Tyranny of Robbers and Thieves, who at this time broke into all Places. And becauſe Faithfulneſs is the moſt requiſite Quality in an Hiſtorian, we cannot but farther alledge in Socrates his behalf, that thoſe times whereof he now wrote, were as the Morning to his own Day, and therefore however, he or any other might Counterfeit what there was no clear Light to diſcern, and tell Stories which none could contradict, being beyond the Memory of any alive, yet at ſuch time as the Knowledge of matters muſt needs be freſh, it were extreme Folly to aſſert ſuch Fables as both their freſh Date, and Eminence of Perſons by whom, and of Places where, they ſhould be acted muſt neceſſarily lay open to the Contradiction and Deriſion of Eye-witneſſes and By-ſtanders.

The Jews grown more inſolent, are puniſhed by Edicts from the Emperours.

82. But as for the Jews, their ſufferings were ſo far from humbling them, that inſtead of making amends for what they formerly committed, they perpetrate other outrageous acts, which draw down more ſevere puniſhments upon them. For ſhortly after in a place betwixt Chalcis and Antioch in Syria, called Inmeſtar at the time of their Plays and Interludes, in deriſion of Chriſt and Profeſſours of Chriſtianity they nail a Child of that Profeſſion to a Croſs, lift him up into the Air, and having derided and other ways abuſed him, ſcourge him to death; which being known procured great diſorders betwixt the Chriſtians and them. And the Emperours acquainted with the horrible Fact, gave orders to the Magiſtrates of the Countrey to make diligent inquiſition, and ſeverely puniſh it; whereby it came to paſs (as the Hiſtorian phraſeth it) that the Jews inhabiting thoſe Parts, for what they had ſhamefully committed in jeſt were puniſhed in earneſt. The Reſcript it ſelf is not extant in either of the Codes, but this year Theodoſius by an Edict ſtill remaining in his own Book, commands the Honorary Prefectſhip to be taken from Gamaliel (whom Baronius rationally conjectureth to have been their Patriarch mentioned by St. Hierome) and other puniſhments to be inflicted on that vagabond People, which example Honorius following in the Weſt, a little after publiſheth ſuch another Law againſt Jews having any Civil or Military employment.

Socr. l. 7. c. 16.

C. Th. de Jud. l. 22, & 24.

John Biſhop of Jeruſalem dies, Praylus ſucceeds.

Innocent Biſhop of Rome departs this life. Ordained the Sabbath or Saturday for a Faſt.

83. In the twenty fourth year of the Reign of Honorius, the four hundred and ſixteenth of Chriſt, died John Biſhop of Jeruſalem, after he had governed that See thirty years, into whoſe room Praylus was elected. And the year following was the laſt of Innocent Biſhop of Rome, who died on the twentieth of July, after he had ſate in that See fifteen years, one month and ten days. Platina telleth us in his Life, that buſying himſelf much with things appertaining to Chriſtian Religion, amongſt other things he ordained that the Sabbath or Saturday ſhould be a Faſt, both becauſe our Lord lay that day in the Grave, and for that his Diſciples thereon faſted. This we find in a Decretal Epiſtle to Decennius Biſhop of Eugubium going under his Name, wherein the reaſon for Faſting on Saturday is given, becauſe that day and the day before were ſpent in ſorrow and heavineſs by the Apoſtles, who alſo hid themſelves for fear of the Jews. As for theſe Decretal Epiſtles of his, Learned Men do very much ſuſpect them forged, becauſe they contain many Traditions utterly unknown to the Divines and Writers of that Age; and intire Paragraphs are found in them, which are alſo to be ſeen in the Writings both of the preceding and following Popes. The third Epiſtle to Exuperius makes mention of five Books of Solomon; the twenty ſecond talks of the Epiſcopal Infulæ, which then were not in uſe amongſt Chriſtians. The Epiſtle to the Council of Carthage is ſilly and ridiculous; the ninety firſt and the ninety third amongſt thoſe of St. Auguſtine are eſteemed no better than ſpurious by Eraſmus. However we muſt own this Faſting on Saturday to have been a Cuſtome in the Roman Church before this Decretal of Innocent, if ſuch there were. Indeed in the Eaſtern Church the Sabbath or Saturday was kept as a Feſtival, as appears by one of the Canons going under the Name of the Apoſtles, and it was unlawfull to Faſt on it, if we give credit to it and the Epiſtle which bears the Name of Ignatius, to the Philippians, inſomuch that this practice in after times was charged as a fault upon thoſe of Rome by the Sixth Council of Conſtantinople, and Photius Patriarch of that See; yet in the Weſtern Parts where there were fewer converted Jews (whoſe ordinary meeting on that day might give occaſion to the Cuſtome, as alſo a deſign to draw in thoſe of their Nation) and where thoſe Hereticks mentioned by Irenæus, who held themſelves bound to Faſt on the Saturday, becauſe they fanſied the Evil God who created the World had finiſhed his work, and that day was the beginning of all evil; where theſe, I ſay, gave no occaſion to croſs their Folly and Superſtition by a contrary Cuſtome, it was deſtinate and appointed to a Publick Faſt.

Tom. 1. Conc.

Can. 65.

Εἴ τις κυριακὴν ἢ σάββατον νηστεύει πλὴν ἑνὸς σαββάτου, οὗτος χριστοκτόνος ἐστί.

L. 1. c. c. 20, &c.

84. Some have conceived the Cuſtome thence taken, that St. Peter being on the Lord's Day to conteſt with Simon Magus, the Church of Rome ſet the preceding day a part for faſting and humiliation, to implore the Bleſſing of God upon a buſineſs of ſo great importance, which yet moſt of the Romans themſelves did not believe. Others thought the difference of Cuſtoms proceeded from the different Apprehenſion and Senſe which Chriſtians had of Chriſt reſting in the Sepulchre, whereupon the Eaſtern People in memory of his Reſt would not make it a faſting day, whereas thoſe of the Church of Rome, in ſign and token of his humiliation choſe to faſt upon it. But the reaſon given by the Decretal of Innocent, ſeems more full and proper than any. Now when we ſpeak of the Weſt, we do not mean that all Weſtern Churches followed herein the Church of Rome, for as they were inclined ſome obſerved one, ſome the other Cuſtome. In many things it's clear, that the Britiſh Churches conformed themſelves to the manners of the Eaſt, which it's evident alſo that Milan did in this particular. For Paulinus aſſures us in the Life of St. Ambroſe, that he never uſed to dine but on the Day of the Sabbath, the Lord's day, and the Anniverſaries of Saints and Martyrs, yet ſo as when he was at Rome he would not be ſingular, but conform himſelf to their Faſhions and Cuſtoms. In Africk alſo we are informed by St. Auguſtine, that ſome Churches in the ſame Province dined, and ſome faſted on this day, and ſo continued the difference, thoſe of the Eaſt fretting in vain againſt the Church of Rome, till after various ſtrugling in ſeveral reſpects this Church got ground, and in this as other matters impoſed her Cuſtoms as Laws upon the reſt of the Weſtern World. But, enough of this. Platina tells us farther, that he ordained certain Rules concerning Jews, Pagans and Monks, that by conſent and approbation of Theodoſius, he either baniſhed the City or drove into Monaſteries the Cataphrygæ Hereticks, of whom Montanus, Priſcilla and Maximilla were Founders. And he dedicated a ſtately Church to Gervaſe and Protheſius, for which a certain Matron called Veſtina, had left a great Summ of Money. Concerning the Furniture and Endowments of this Church, the Reader if he pleaſe may conſult that Authour. Innocent after he had at four ſeveral times conferred Orders, and therein ordained 30 Presbyters, 12 Deacons, and 54 Biſhops, died, and was buried in the burying place at the Bear with the Cap in Rome.

Which hath been otherwiſe obſerved in ſome parts of the Weſt and all the Eaſtern Churches.

Theodoſio annuente.

In Cœmeterio ad Urſum pileatum.

Zozimus choſen Biſhop of Rome.

He admits Pelagius and Cœleſtius upon their appeal to him.

85. On the 29*th.* of Auguſt following, was Zozimus choſen to ſucceed him, the Son of Abraham, and a Greek by Birth. Upon this alteration in the See of Rome, Pelagius, and Cœleſtius his Scholar beſtir themſelves, and make application to the new Biſhop, whoſe aid and aſſiſtence they implore, as unreaſonably condemned by the African Fathers, and thoſe of Dioſpolis. Pelagius tells him their opinion onely was, that as Man always ſinneth, ſo may not ſin thereby, acknowledging him but to have Freedom of Will; and cunningly ſubmits all to the opinion and cenſure of the Biſhop, who hereupon admits his aſſertion, imbraces his Perſon as innocent, and receiving Cœleſtius upon the ſame ſubmiſſive appeal, writes to the Biſhops of Africk, commending theſe Hereticks to them as Catholick Men, and accuſing their Accuſers as Calumniatours, and infamous Perſons. The African Fathers having received his Letters, therein find fault with two things, firſt, that he had commended and approved an erroneous Sentence; ſecondly, that he had uſurped Power of abſolving them who had been condemned in Africk, and they had now the more cauſe to complain, by reaſon of another appeal made about this ſame time to him. One Apiarius a Prieſt of the Church of Sicca, very infamous upon ſeveral accounts, not onely by his own Biſhop, but by other Prelates met together, upon this occaſion was excommunicated. He betakes himſelf alſo to Zozimus, complaining he was much injured, who without hearing his Accuſers, admits him to Communion, and underſtanding that the

And alſo Apiarius ſending his Legates with a pretended Canon to ſet forth his Title to ſuch Appeals.

African Fathers were about to aſſemble in the ſixth Carthaginian Synod (as it is called) he diſpatcheth toward them Fauſtinus a Biſhop, with Philip and Aſellus two Roman Prieſts, to whom he giveth in Commiſſion (the Latin word for it is Commonitorium) to plead the Cauſe of Apiarius, to procure Urbanus the Biſhop of Sicca to be excommunicated, or to cite him to Rome, there to anſwer, except he would ſubmit, and by all means to plead his own Right as Biſhop of Rome, to receive Appeals from Biſhops and Prieſts, cenſured either by their Biſhops, Metropolitans or Synods, and to ſend his Legates into Africk, to take Cognizance of the Cauſes of ſuch Appellants. As an Argument he commands them to urge a Canon of the Nicene Council, whereby this Privilege was granted to the Roman See.

86. The Legates pleading by Word of Mouth, the Cauſe for which they were ſent; urged alſo the Nicene Canon, a Copy of which they pretended to produce. The Fathers perceiving whither the Matter drove, upon ſearch proteſted there was no ſuch Canon in their Archives to be found: What had been propounded concerning Apiarius and his Biſhop, they were troubled to admit, declared plainly, they could not ſubmit to any ſuch Juriſdiction of the Roman See, till they ſaw better proof; and to ſearch out the truth, were reſolved to ſend to Alexandria, Antioch and Conſtatinople to inſpect the moſt Authentick Records of that Council, deſiring the Legates alſo, that they would either take the pains to go or ſend to thoſe Places. In the mean time they were content, that Biſhops might appeal to the Roman See, and the Cauſes of Clerks be determined by the Biſhops of their Provinces, but no longer than till a ſearch could be made into the Nicene Decrees. This they would doe for quietneſs ſake, and write Letters to Zozimus himſelf, who dying e'er the return of the Legates, or ſhortly after (that we may join together for the better underſtanding, what was done under ſeveral Popes about this Affair) Boniface his Succeſſour reſolved to maintain the ſame cauſe, and ſent the ſame Perſons back to the Carthaginian Council. There followed much Diſpute betwixt the Fathers and them; but to the ſame purpoſe, the Synod adhering to its former reſolution, to give liberty of appeals, onely till they could receive a certain Information concerning the Nicene Canons; for procurement of which, they deſire of Boniface by Letter, that he alſo would improve his Intereſt. But it ſeems both the Legates, and he that ſent them, were Deaf on that Ear, and Conſcious to themſelves of the goodneſs of their Cauſe, they are ſuſpected to have been ſo far from ſending, that by their Procraſtinations they hindred others from going into the Eaſt for ſome time, ſo that a Return of the Meſſage was not made till the fourth year, wherein the Biſhop of Alexandria ſent to the African Biſhops, the ſo much deſired Copy of the Canons, together with notice, that the Eaſter following was to be kept on the 15 of April. Theſe Canons are recited in the firſt Tome of the Councils, wherein is not to be found one Syllable concerning Appeals to the Roman See, or the Primacy of the Roman Biſhop, over foreign Churches. The Fathers having peruſed them, procure them to be ſent to Boniface for his ſatisfaction.

Which is admitted till ſuch time as the truth did more fully appear.

Zozimus dies.

Boniface his Succeſſour puts in the ſame Clame.

But is rejected there being not any ſuch Canon ever made in the Nicene Council.

87. Boniface dying not long after, the Controverſie was not buried with him, being revived by Cæleſtinus, the following Biſhop, upon the ſame occaſion as it had begun. For Apiarius having betaken himſelf to the Tabraceni, was there again for his good deeds excommunicated, which not enduring, he betakes himſelf to his old Refuge, and appeals to Cæleſtinus, who receiving him into Communion, ſends once more the former Legates to expoſtulate with thoſe of Africk, and require that what had been demanded by his Predeceſſours, as to the Privilege of the Roman See might be made good. They according to their Inſtructions, complaining that the Privileges of the Roman See were infringed, and the Decrees of Nice broken, had ſtill the ſame anſwer as formerly, and after three days contention, the Biſhops adhered to their former reſolution agreeable to that of their Foreſathers againſt the See of Rome, in the year 255, and what the Biſhops of Spain, in the year 255 had reſolved. At length Apiarius diſtruſting his Patronage, and conſcious of his Guilt falls down on his Knees, confeſſes the Crimes laid againſt him, and begs Pardon of the Synod, which afterward decrees, that none hereaſter in Africk, having Metropolitans of their own, appeal to the Biſhop of Rome, the firſt Cognizance of the Cauſe remaining with the Biſhops and Metropolitan, the ſecond with a Provincial Council, and the final Reſort to be to an univerſal one; and that for the time to come, no Right or Juriſdiction of the Roman See, over the African Churches be owned. Moreover they write to Cæleſtinus himſelf Letters, wherein having given him an account of

He dying Cæleſtinus revives it.

And receives the ſame Anſwer from the African Biſhops.

of Apiarius and what he had confeſſed, they earneſtly deſire him, that for the time to come he would not eaſily admit any flying from them, nor receive any Perſon to Communion whom they had excommunicated. Foraſmuch as he might eaſily perceive, that this was ſo defined by the Nicene Synod. They intreat he would reject all Prieſts and other Clerks which ſhould flie from them, ſeeing that by Decree of no Council, there was any thing derogated from the Church of Africk, and the Decrees of Nice moſt manifeſtly leave as well inferiour Clerks as Biſhops to their Metropolitans, moſt prudently and juſtly providing, that all buſineſs whatſoever ſhould be determined in the Places where they riſe, the Grace of the Holy Ghoſt not being wanting to any Province, which thing as equitable ought to be obſerved by the Prieſts of Chriſt with all Conſtancy imaginable, eſpecially conſidering that any one may freely if he find himſelf agrieved, appeal either to the Synods of his own Province, or to a General Council.

Prudentiſſimè enim juſtiſſiméq; providerunt quæcunq; negotia, in ſuis locis ubi orta ſunt, finienda: nec unicuiq; Provinciæ gratiam ſancti Spiritus defuturam quæ æquitas. à Chriſto ſacerdotibus & prudenter videatur & conſtantiſſimè teneatur: maximè quin unicuique conceſſum eſt, ſi judicio offenſus fuerit cognitorum, ad Concilia ſuæ Provinciæ, vel etiam univerſale provocare.

88. They * think this they write to be Reaſon, except there be ſome who believe, that God can inſpire every particular Man with a Spirit of diſcerning, and deny the ſame to an innumerable Company of Prieſts gathered together in Council. They demand how a tranſmarine Judgment can be good, whether ſufficient Witneſſes, either by reaſon of their Sex, their Age or Infirmity, or many other intervenient Accidents cannot come? And || as for him that ſhould ſend any Legates, they did not find it was ſo ordained by any Synod. They tell him plainly, that the Canon he had ſent them by Fauſtinus the Biſhop, they could not find in the Authentick Copies of the Nicene Synod received from Cyril of Alexandria and Atticus of Conſtantinople, which they had heretofore tranſmitted to Boniface his Predeceſſour. They bid him ſend no more his Clerks called Executores, leſt the ſmoaky pride of this World ſhould be brought into the Church of Chriſt, which ſhews all that deſire to ſee God, the light of Simplicity and Humility. And expecting that he would not ſend Fauſtinus any more into Africk, they take their leave of him with a Prayer for his long Life, and the kind appellation of Domine Frater. Thus do the African Fathers, reaſon and plead with Cæleſtinus, with ſuch fairneſs and Chriſtian Lenity, that Baronius makes this, and that mild Courſe which St. Auguſtine takes to diſſwade the Biſhop of Rome, an Argument of their obnoxiouſneſs to their Juriſdiction. By this Letter it ſelf, let the indifferent Reader judge whether the Cardinal have any Reaſon to affirm, that they do not deny his Authority to receive Appeals, and that their words manifeſtly declare they onely are grieved with the manner of proſecution. Doth the Teſtimony they cite from the Council of Nice, I pray, reſpect the manner of the proſecution, or the buſineſs of Appeals themſelves, and the concluding of Controverſies? Doth their exception concerning the Holy Ghoſt's inſpiration, concern the Method of Appeals, or the referring of Cauſes to Synods? We may without offence ſuppoſe that the Decrees of Nice, which they quote were not made concerning the manner of Appeals, but the very being of them; but it's in vain to contend with a Perſon reſolved to ſay any thing.

* Niſi fortè quiſquam eſt qui credat, unicuilibet poſſe Deum noſtrum examinis inſpirare juſtitiam & innumerabilibus congregatis in concilium ſacerdotibus denegare.

|| Nam ut aliqui tanquam à tuæ ſanctitatis latere mittantur, nulla invenimus Patrum Synodo conſtitutum.
Vide Can. 101. Concilii Africani.

89. If the African Biſhops intended not to derogate from the Roman Right to Appeals, as he would have them, why did they make ſuch a Canon as we find to be the twenty ſecond of the Synod of Milenis, and the ninety ſecond of the Council of Africk, which Gratian alſo has taken into his Decree, ordaining that Prieſts, Deacons, or others of the inferiour Clerks if they find themſelves agrieved by the Judgements of their own Biſhops in their Cauſes, might be heard by the neighbouring Biſhops, who by conſent of their own Prelates, being allotted them as Judges, might decide their Controverſies. But if they thought fit to appeal, they ſhould appeal to none except the African Councils, or the Primates of their Provinces. And if any thought fit to appeal to any beyond the Seas, he ſhould be received to Communion by none in Africk. The Gloſs preſently puts you in mind of Gratian his Reſtriction of this Canon, who indeed comes in afterward with his Niſi forte, Except they appeal to the Roman See, for proof of which he then produces the ſeventh Canon of the Sardican Council, which giving leave to the Biſhop of Rome to interpoſe his Authority, we have formerly mentioned. But let any Perſon reade the Letter of the Fathers to Cæleſtine, and withall conſider, that about this very time this Council of Milenis was held, as Baronius himſelf proves, and if he judge whether all circumſtances conſidered, Gratian's Niſi forte be of any value, and whether the Biſhops intended that the See of Rome, againſt whoſe Juriſdiction they had ſo ſtrugled, ſhould be excepted. As for the Canon of the Synod of Sardica, the Cardinal to vindicate his Popes from forgery (of which ſome Innovatours, as he calls the Centuriatours, do accuſe them) thinks it miſtaken by them for ſome other of Nice, or ſome one of Nice put amongſt thoſe of Sardica, or becauſe the Synod of Sardica was held to confirm the Council of Nice, it was accounted, as it were, the ſame with it, nay in ſome reſpects prefers it before that of Nice; for as it was equal with it in being Oecumenical, ſo there was in it thirty five Biſhops, together with Gratus Biſhop of Carthage, whereas in the Nice Council no more African Fathers are found than onely one Cæcilianus, whereupon he concludes that the African Biſhops could not without breach of the Catholick Peace reject the Canon of the Synod of Sardica.

Cauſ. 2. quaſt. 6. c. 35. Placuit.

90. But if this be not plain ſhuffling, let any indifferent Perſon tell what is. Perhaps and perhaps the Cardinal may ſay now; but ſurely he could not think that in all theſe Debates and Pleadings pro and con, if they had meant this or that, found the thing here or there, upon denyal that there was any ſuch matter as the Nicene Canon, it would not have been mentioned, inſtanced, and thereupon Iſſue have been joyned. But, to ſee how Baronius takes and refuſeth, accepts and rejects, imbraces and ſcorns every thing, any thing, the ſame thing, as they make for or againſt his great Deſign, let but the Reader conſider what he writes of that Council of Sardica, how he confeſſeth that by reaſon of the contrary manner of proceeding in that Council, the Reſolutions and Acts thereof have been variouſly reported and accepted of in later times, that many things are cited as decreed by the Sardican Council contrary to the teſtimonies of Athanaſius; and that St. Auguſtine and others granting ſeveral Decrees to have been made by this Synod, yet excepting againſt it as Heretical and Arian: in concluſion, ſo great was the uncertainty and confuſion, in thoſe times themſelves, amongſt ſuch as had beſt reaſon to know, in relation to this Synod, that the Cardinal writing of it is thereupon ſeized with admiration. Now it's not onely an Oecumenical Synod, but ſuch an one as though all Orthodox Chriſtians in the beſt times were ſhie of receiving its Decrees, yet the Africans muſt under pein of Schiſm ſubmit themſelves to its Canons and Decrees. But what if there were no ſuch Canons made by this Synod; what if neither that of Sardica nor any other Council ever ordained any ſuch matter about the Roman Juriſdiction, and Appeals to that See, from the time of Chriſt, to that of this Controverſie? By the deciſion of that Queſtion before an impartial unprejudiced Judge we are content to abide, and our Witneſſes are thoſe African Fathers, who it any ſuch thing had been, they had certainly better reaſon to know than any of theſe laſt Ages, hear therefore their Teſtimony. The ſeventh pretended Canon of the Council of Sardica ordains, that in caſe of Appeal the Biſhop of Rome may ſend à Latere his Legate or Legates to hear, and by his authority to determine with other Biſhops the matter in Controverſie; but the Biſhops of Africk in their Letter to Cæleſtine ſay in ſo many words, Ut aliqui tanquam à tuæ ſanctitatis Latere mittantur nulla invenimus Patrum Synodo conſtitutum: viz. that any may be ſent as à Latere from your Holineſs we do not find ordained in any Synod of the Fathers. They were in the words immediately preceding ſpeaking of the inconvenience of Tranſmarine Judgments. But one might object though it be ſo inconvenient for Perſons to go over Sea, yet the Biſhop of Rome may ſend his Legates to them, to Anſwer which Queſtion or rather prevent it, they come in with a Nam ut aliqui, &c. as in the foregoing words, and then proteſt in particular againſt that pretended Nicene Canon. This is ſufficient to diſcover as well the truth it ſelf as the Cardinal's ſhuffling, without this reſerve, that had there been any ſuch Decree of Nice or of Sardica, it ſpeaks not as owning any ſuch Authority in the Roman See as formerly inveſted in it upon any account whatſoever, but for convenience of Tryals de novo this forged Canon erects a Tribunal for the Roman Prelate.

Who declare that the Pope hath no power given by any Synod of the Fathers to receive Appeals from or ſend his Legates into any part of Africk.

91. But Zozimus, that we may return and take the reſt along with us, died after he had ſate in the Roman See a year, four months and ſeven days, and was buried in the via Tiburtina, by the body of St. Laurence. Of this Biſhop two Decretal Epiſtles are extant, one to Iſychius Biſhop of Salonæ, and another to the Clergy of Ravenna. He forbad ſlaves to be made Clerks, and amongſt ſome other trifles made this Decree. Againſt the Ordinances of the Fathers, the Authority of this very See cannot make or change any thing. For with us Antiquity flouriſheth firmly rooted, to which the Decrees of the Fathers have procured reverence. If this be true, and the ordinances of the Council of Nice quite ſpoil the Pope of his ſo large pretended Juriſdiction. Two or three days after his Death two were choſen in his room, Eulalius the Archdeacon, and Boniface a Prieſt. Symmachus being at this time Prefect of the City, gave notice of the Schiſm to Honorins the Emperour, to whom he alſo ſignified that Eulalius was moſt legally choſen, and was the true and rightfull Biſhop of Rome. But Boniface his Friends pleaded for him on the other ſide, and Letters were ſo multiplied, that Honorius thought fit to ſummon them both to Ravenna on the fiſteenth of January, whereas Zozimus died on the twenty ſixth of December. The Emperour cauſed alſo many Biſhops to meet together for deciſion of the Controverſie, but ſuch factions, heats and conteſts appeared, that it was impoſſible to reconcile the difference, whereupon Honorius commanded them both to forbear the City. Yet notwithſtanding Eulalius attempted to celebrate the Feaſt of Eaſter (which this year fell upon the thirtieth of March) and raiſed ſuch a Sedition that ſcarcely could be expelled by Symmachus the Prefect, whoſe Perſon had been brought into extreme danger. Symmachus ſending a Relation of theſe things to the Emperour, he writes back to him to bring Boniface into the City, and there eſtabliſh him in the Chair as the true and undoubted Roman Biſhop, Eulalius being ſentenced uncapable of the Office by the Emperour and a Synod on the ſeventh of April.

Contra Statuta Patrum condere aliquid, nec hujus quidem ſedis Romanæ poteſt authoritas, apud nos enim reconvulſis radicibus vivit antiquitas, cui Decreta Patrum ſanxere reverentiam. Tom. 1. Conc. cauſa 25. q. 1. c. 7.

Upon the death of Zozimus a diſpute aroſe 'twixt Eulalius and Boniface for the See.

Which is decided on behalf of Boniface by the Emperour's order.

92. This ſame year being the four hundred and nineteenth of our Saviour, many Cities and Towns of Paleſtine are ſaid to have been overthrown by Earthquakes, and he himſelf to have appeared over Mount Olivet near to Jeruſalem in a Cloud, upon ſight and hearing whereof, many Pagan Nations were converted to the Truth. This year alſo Cryſantius the Novatian Biſhop died at Conſtantinople, after he had governed ſuch Congregations as were ſubject to his diſcipline ſeven years, to whom Paul ſucceeded, of whom Socrates relates ſuch an Act as he thinks worthy to be Ingraved in Marble, and to remain to all Poſterity; the thing was this: A certain Jew feigning a deſire to become a Chriſtian, was often Baptized, and by that means got much Money. After he had couzened ſeveral Sects as the Arians and Macedonians, he comes to Paul, from whoſe Hands he beſeeches him he may receive the Holy Sacrament of Baptiſm, who granteth his requeſt on theſe conditions, that he learned the Articles of Faith, and gave himſelf to Faſting for many days. The Jew being conſtrained to Faſt, called every day for Baptiſm, and Paul moved by his importunity, made all things ready for it, providing him a white Veſtment, and cauſing the Font to be filled with Water. But when the Jew approached, all the Water by a ſecret operation was ſuddenly dried up; at which amazed, they yet thought it might poſſibly run through the hole at the bottom of the Font through which they were wont to let it goe, and therefore ſtopped all the holes and chinks, and poured in freſh Water: yet when the Jew was brought the ſecond time, and hanged his Head over the Font, the Water again vaniſhed every drop, which Paul the Biſhop beholding, told the Man that he horribly diſſembled, or had been unwittingly Baptized; but when upon the noiſe of the Miracle many flocked unto the place, one among the reſt happened to know the Jew, and ſo the truth came to light.

Marcellinus in Chron.

Lib. 7. c. 17.

93. At this time a great Perſecution raged in Perſia againſt the Chriſtians of that Countrey: the occaſion this. Arcadius the Emperour before his Death made Iſdegerdes the Perſian King, Tutour or Guardian to his Son Theodoſius, which buſineſs cauſed many Embaſſies to be made to and fro, wherein on the Roman part amongſt others was Maruthas a Biſhop of Meſopotamia employed, by whoſe Piety and Induſtry the Villanies and Impoſtures of the Magi being diſcovered, Chriſtian Religion was much propagated, and the King almoſt perſwaded to become a Chriſtian. But after his death the Friendſhip betwixt the Romans and that Crown was broken, and a great Perſecution enſued under his Son, as Socrates writes, others ſay it began under Iſdegerdes himſelf, and Vararanes, Bararanes or Gararanes his Son continued it; under whomſoever it began, the imprudent Zeal of Audas a Biſhop in Perſia firſt kindled the flame which devoured ſo many Martyrs. He cauſed to be demoliſhed the Pyræum or Temple dedicated to Fire, which as their God was held in great reverence by that Nation, and refuſed to repair it though commanded by the King, who putting him to Death, gave order that that the Churches of Chriſtians ſhould be demoliſhed, and then moſt cruelly raged for ſeveral years againſt the Profeſſours of the true Religion. Many are the kinds of Torments which the Faithfull underwent in this fiery tryal. Of ſome they flay'd the Hands, others the Backs; from others they pulled the skin over their Ears down to their Shoulders. Some thus deveſted of their natural Covering they tormented by ſharp Reeds ſtuck into their fleſh. Many they ſhut up in pits, and put therein Rats and Mice to devour them alive, having bound them ſo as they could neither with their Hands or Feet defend themſelves. Notwithſtanding all that Devils and the Magi their Inſtruments could invent, yet were the Faithfull ſo far from being terrified, that as in the moſt Primitive times, they rather offered themſelves and ran to meet the Crown of Martyrdom. Of theſe Hormisda and Saene were eminent Courtiers, together with James, who by the King's perſwaſion firſt renounced his Religion, but was again reduced by his Wife and Mother, and ſtoutly confeſſing his Faith in his Saviour, had by the angry King's order all his Limbs cut from his Body, of which the Trunk and Head onely remaining; when by theſe Torments he could not be forced to renounce his Religion, this was at laſt ſmitten off with a Sword.

A Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians in Perſia.

Socr. l. 7. cc. 8. & 18. & 20. Theod. l. 5. c. 38. Diaconus Niceph. l. 14. c. 48.

94. Marcellinus in his Chronicon fixeth the beginning of this Perſecution in the ninth Conſulſhip of Theodoſius Auguſtus, and the third of Conſtantius Cæſar, which Socrates will have continued for two years till the thirteenth of Honorius and the tenth of Theodoſius, but Theodoret prolongeth to no leſs than thirty. At length certain Chriſtians eſcaping out of Perſia, related to the Romans the miſerable and afflicted eſtate of the Churches, and imploring their aid and aſſiſtence, Theodoſius very readily cloſed with their Requeſt, and when the Perſian demanded his Fugitives, anſwer was made, that he was reſolved to try the utmoſt rather than ſuffer his Chriſtian Brethren to be ſo cruelly intreated. The Perſians taking this in evil part ſeize as many Romans as they can, whom they condemn to the Mines, and on the Goods of Merchants contrary to all former Treaties. Theodoſius therefore ſends his Forces to invade them, who hired a vaſt number of Saracens to aſſiſt them; but the Saracens ſeized with a Pannick fear ſlew one another and fled, and the Perſians being overthrown in ſeveral Engagements, thoſe Select Troops, called Immortal, miſerably periſhed. Theodoſius though he had good advantage, and might have proſecuted the Victory, yet for the ſake of the Churches made Peace, and the Perſecution ceaſed. To the Story of this War belongs a Preſident of Chriſtian Charity related by Socrates, which muſt not be paſſed over in ſilence. The Romans having taken Priſoners above ſeven thouſand Perſians, refuſed to releaſe them, and had ſo little care of their ſubſiſtence, that they were ready to ſtarve with Hunger; which Acacius Biſhop of Amida conſidering, called together his Clergy and told them, that God ſtood not in need of either Cups or Diſhes, that therefore foraſmuch as their Church had many Utenſils of Gold and Silver beſtowed on her by Religious and Pious Benefactours, he thought it requiſite the Captive Souldiers ſhould therewith be redeemed, and reſcued from the miſery of Captivity and Hunger. Having ſaid thus much, he cauſed the Plate to be ſtamped into Money, whereof one part he ſent as a Ranſome, a ſecond to relieve the Neceſſities of the Priſoners, and a third to bear their Charges into their own Countrey. The Perſian King was exceedingly ſtruck with admiration at ſo Noble an act, perceiving that the Chriſtians knew how to overcome him with Engines of mercy and goodneſs, aſwell as thoſe of Hoſtility, and deſired to ſee ſo excellent a Perſon, which by the Interpoſition of Theodoſius he obtained. And it is not to be doubted but by this Chriſtian Office many Perſians were perſwaded to imbrace the Chriſtian Religion, as alſo by the Journey of Acacius, who having fed them with the Bread which periſheth, no doubt would uſe all means to make them Partakers of that which endureth to Eternal Life; and as a Reward of his Piety and the Gift of true Wiſedom, obtained long Life, (for he ſurvived to a great Age) and alſo (true) Riches and Honour.

Which is ſtopt by the interpoſition of Theodoſius.

Socr. lib. 7 c. 21. Niceph. l. 14. c. 22.

And the Charity of Acacius Biſhop of Amida.

95. At the ſame time that this Perſecution began to rage in Perſia, viz. the CCCCXX year of our Lord, that great and famous Light of the Church St. Hierome departed this Life at Bethlehem on the laſt day of September, and was there buried. Concerning his Age, which certainly was great, there is no ſmall difference amongſt Writers; ſome will have him to live ninety eight years, Proſper ninety one, but Baronius more probably no more than ſeventy eight. For Learning he rather excelled than equalled any one Father. The Books he wrote were very numerous yet not all extant as appears in ſeveral mentioned by (a) Caſſiodorus, (b) St. Auguſtine and (c) himſelf. To thoſe that are extant many Suppoſititious have been added, which have been detected by Marianus Victorius, Eraſmus, Sixtus Senenſis and others. And as many have been feigned as written by him, ſo others as to him, amongſt which are notorious thoſe from him to Chromatius and Heliodorus, and from them to him. His Epiſtle to theſe two Biſhops concerning the Nativity of our Saviour, hath been often branded in the Roman Schools, as by Melchior Canus, Molanus and Sixtus Senenſis, who affirmeth it a Fiction of the Valentinian and Gnoſtick Hereticks; yet Chriſtophorus à Caſtro a Spaniſh Jeſuite in his Deiparæ Hiſtoria, undertakes the protection and defence of that impious Impoſture. And both from this and the Protoevangelium Jacobi (which as Bellarmine confeſſeth, was never received and acknowledged in the Church, and is rejected and condemned by à Caſtro himſelf) both Lying Fabulous Legends, wherein is much ſtuff to be found concerning the Bleſſed Virgin and her Parents, Damaſcene, Germanus, Nicephorus, Sergius of Heliopolis, Andreas Hieroſolymitanus, Hippolytus with other Homilians and Rhapſodiſts, have borrowed Materials with very poor judgment and diſcretion, and therewith imbelliſhed their Legends, Hiſtories, Homilies and Panegyrical Harangues. And after them (ſaith our Biſhop Mountague) Baronius comes in the Rere, who more than once lays his Judgment at Stake upon the Relation of ſuch forged Fopperies, which he takes up by Retail upon their Word and Credit, without examining what authority they had to relate them.

St. Hierome dies.

Marcell.

His Works.

(a) Juſt. diu lect. cc. 2. 3, &c.
(b) De hæreſ. ad Quodvultdeum.
(c) Contr. Jovin. l. 2.

In particular his Tranſlation of the Holy Scriptures.

96. But, amongſt all the Works of St. Hierome, he deſerved more of the Church by none than his Tranſlations of the Holy Scriptures. For though they were tranſlated into the Languages of (a) many Nations, yet the Fountains of theſe Tranſlations had not been too pure, and ſo various, aſwell as corrupt, were thoſe in the Latine Tongue eſpecially, that they could hardly be (b) numbred, all being taken from the Greek Interpreters, not the Hebrew Text. The firſt Tranſlation of this Text, as is known almoſt to every Man, was that of the LXXII through procurement of Ptolemy Philadelphus, called in the round Number the Septuagint, being in ſuch eſteem in the Chriſtian Church, that (c) Epiphanius holds them for no leſs than Prophets, and (d) Juſtinian the Emperour enjoyning the Jews his Subjects to uſe eſpecially the Tranſlation of the Seventy, gives this reaſon, that this number of Interpreters was as it were enlightened with Divine Grace. Yet as men they ſometimes ſtumbled, in ſome places adding, and in others taking away, which made the Apoſtles leave them often when they left the Hebrew, and to deliver the ſenſe thereof according to the truth as the Spirit directed them. In concluſion, this Tranſlation not contenting, no not thoſe of the Jews, Aquila a Proſelyte fell in hand with a new Tranſlation in the time of Adrian the Emperour. After him Symmachus a Samaritan an Ebionite made a third attempt. Theodotion an Epheſian and a Marcionite a fourth under Commodus. A fifth Edition was made by an uncertain Tranſlatour found in the ſeventh year of Antoninus Caracalla in Jericho, hidden in a Tub together with other Hebrew and Greek Books. A ſixth was alſo made by an uncertain hand, and found as the former in Barrels at Nicopolis in the Eaſt, or the Actiacan Shoar in the Reign of Alexander Severus. Theſe Tranſlations coming into the hands of Origen, he took care that the Bible ſhould be written out in this manner. To the Hebrew Text placed in one Column he adjoined another Column of Hebrew but written in Greek Letters and Characters, that it might be read by Grecians; to theſe two Columns he added four other, viz. thoſe of Aquila, the Septuagint, Symmachus and Theodotion, placing that of the Septuagint in the middle, as Epiphanius thinks for its excellency, and called this Edition the Hexapla; to which afterwards adding the fifth and ſixth anonymous Tranſlations formerly mentioned, he called the ſecond Edition the Octapla. Now from all theſe bad Greek, many Tranſlations had alſo been made in Latine, as we ſaid before, and ſo bad that it provoked Hierome to make a new one. For as the Septuagint it ſelf was imperfect, the reſt could not be exceedingly good, Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion being Judaizing Hereticks, as he * termeth them, in particular Aquila, whoſe Tranſlation was the beſt, and is onely allowed by Juſtinian to the Jews next after the Septuagint, of a Greek firſt became a Chriſtian, then giving himſelf more than was meet to curious Queſtions of Aſtronomy, Vide Epiphan. dicto loco.

* Præf. in lib. Job.

(a) Multarum gentium linguis Scriptura ante tranſlata docet falſa eſſe quæ addita ſunt, &c. Hieronym. præf. in 4 Evang.

(b) Latini Interpretes nullo modo numerari poſſunt. Aug.

(c) Vide eund. de ponderibus & menſuris.

(d) *Sacrorum librorum traditionem fecerunt tanquam prophetiæ gratia circumfulgente, ex Novel.*46. *cap.*1. ad quam vide quæ notantur per Interpr.

being caſt out by the Church he betook himſelf to the Jews, and that he might endamage the cauſe of Chriſtians endeavoured to corrupt the Tranſlation of the Seventy, and ſuch places of Scripture as bear manifeſt Teſtimony unto Chriſt. Therefore St. Hierome ſet upon the Work and made a Tranſlation out of the Fountains. For as he himſelf † affirmeth to Lucinius Bæticus and Gratian from him in his Decree, as the credit of the old Books (of the Old Teſtament) is to be tried by the Hebrew Volumes; ſo thoſe of the New by the Greek Tongue. Of the Vulgar and other Latine Tranſlations we ſhall ſpeak in due time and place.

* Ut veterum librorum fides de Hebræis voluminibus examinanda eſt, ita novorum Græci ſermonis normam deſiderat. Diſt. 9. c. 6. Ut veterum & Hieron. ad Lucinium Bæticum. Ep. 28.

An Edict of the Emperour Theodoſius, declaring the Prerogative of Conſtantinople.

97. The following year which was the 421 of our Lord, in the Conſulſhip of Euſtathius and Agricola, an Edict was publiſhed by Theodoſius the Emperour directed to Philip the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, for removing of Innovations, obſervance and vigorous Execution of the Ancient Eccleſiaſtical Canons through all the Provinces of that Countrey; that if any doubtfull matter aroſe it ſhould be determined in a Synod not without the Cogniſance of the moſt Reverend Biſhop of Conſtantinople, which City enjoyed the Prerogative of old Rome. Baronius the Champion of old Rome mightily quarrels with this Law, as publiſhing falſe Doctrine through the ſuggeſtion of Atticus the Biſhop of the New, who for the advancement of his See feigned Canons ſo Ancient that indeed they never had any beginning. He not onely queſtions the being of ſuch Canons, but denies alſo that by any other Authority than that of the Secular Prince, by Decrees of any Council, the City of Conſtantinople enjoyed the prerogative of old Rome in matters Eccleſiaſtical. As to the buſineſs of Illyricum, he both affirms this See never to have had any Juriſdiction over it before this time, nor for many years after enjoyed any. But if Atticus his concern for his own See ſo far Tranſported him as to impoſe upon the credulity of the Emperour, the Cardinal's zeal for that of Rome, ſometimes alſo bribes his Underſtanding to caſt Miſts before the Eyes of his Incautelous Readers, which he may doe at a cheaper rate than Atticus ſurely could in Matters of ſuch Conſequence abuſe his Prince. Had any ſuch Canons been made for the Intereſt of the Roman Church, he would have told us that ſuch they were, but they are loſt, for the Council of Nice doubtleſs made more than thoſe twenty which are commonly aſcribed to it; that the Canon of Sardica cannot be found, which, doubtleſs, once had a being, becauſe ſeveral Popes did not fear to cite it to the African Fathers in behalf of their Right to receive Appeals; that an Edict of the Emperours was a thing more ſolemn than to be founded upon light Surmiſes, Lyes, and Falſhood; that many things were which do not at this diſtance appear to us; that if no credit be to be given to Authentick Laws, there is no heed to be taken of any publick Monuments; in concluſion, that Atticus never would have dared to broach ſuch a thing which he knew could not be concealed, but coming to the Ears muſt needs open the Mouths of his Æmulatours, eſpecially thoſe in Italy.

Omni innovatione ceſſante vetuſtatem & canones priſtinos Eccleſiaſticos qui uſq; nunc tenuerunt, etiam per omnes Illyrici Provincias ſervari præcipimus: ut ſiquid dubietatis emerſerit, id oporteat (non abſq; ſcientia viri Reverendiſſimi ſacroſanctæ Legis Antiſtitis Eccleſiæ urbis Conſtantinopolitanæ quæ Romæ veteris prærogativa lætatur) conventui ſacerdotali ſanctóque Judicio reſervari. D. Prid. Id. Jul. Euſtathio & Agricola Conſſ.

Cod. Juſtin. lib. 1. Tit. 2. §. 6. de Sacroſanctis Eccleſiis, & C.Th. Epiſcopis & Clericis, l. 46.

98. Whether the Cardinal tell true, when he writes, that the City of Conſtantinople at this time did not enjoy any Prerogative of Old Rome by virtue of the Canons of any Synod, let the Reader judge by what we have ſaid at the beginning of this Chapter concerning the Conſtantinopolitan Council. As great heed is to be taken of what Reflexions he makes upon a buſineſs which happened the year following. Patroclus a certain Biſhop by the favour and aſſiſtence of Conſtantinus the Magiſter Militum, with whom he was very familiar, having diſplaced Herotes a good man and Diſciple of St. Martin, had thruſt himſelf into the See of Arles, and not therewith content had invaded the Rights of another Metropolis, ordaining a Biſhop in the Province of Narbone. Boniface the Biſhop of Rome not onely repreſſed this Inſolency, but by Letters dated on the 28 of January to Hilary Biſhop of Narbone, commands him to uſe the Right of Metropolitan, to conſider what was to be done, and make Report thereof to the Apoſtolick See, ordaining that every Metropolitan ſhould content himſelf with the Exerciſe of Juriſdiction within his own Precincts, and not thruſt his Sickle into the Corn of another man. Thus the good Mother deſires that her Daughter may be more wiſe and vertuous than her ſelf, and the Diſſolute Preacher cries, Doe as I ſay, Patroclus thruſts himſelf into the See of Arles. And ordains a Biſhop in the Province of Narbone.

Which is taken notice of by Boniface who preaches contrary to his own Practice.

Proſp. in Chron. Bonif. Ep. 2.

ſay, but doe not as I doe. He writes this at the ſame time as he endeavoured by all means to intrude into the Affairs of Africk, and challenged the Privilege of Appeals upon pretence of a Nicene Canon, which the Biſhops rejecting as forged, had ſent to Alexandria for authentick Copies, which this ſame year were ſent by the Patriarch of that See. As for what he ordains about the Metropolitan he tells him, he acts according to the Preſcript of the Nicene Canons, the ſixth indeed of that Council taking care of the Juriſdiction of the Metropolitans. Whence Baronius will perſwade his Reader, that he moſt manifeſtly ſees that the Nicene Council ſo took order for having the ſeveral Provinces ſubject to Metropolitans, that yet the Apoſtolical See as he calls it, ſhould Jus dicere or exerciſe Juriſdiction over all. Certainly his Reader cannot but ſee moſt manifeſtly that this is a mighty Conſequence, let him ſhew where any yet ſoe, any ſuch proviſo or ſalvo is made by any true Canon of that Council. He will find it perhaps written on the back ſide of that other Canon concerning his Popes Juriſdiction over the African Churches. It is certainly a courſe ſo weak as any one may moſt manifeſtly diſcern it, to argue from pretence to true Title, from intruſion to rightfull and juſt poſſeſſion; which would have notably ſerved the deſign of Patroclus. It ſeems becauſe Boniface and his Fellows thruſt their Sickles into the Corn of the Africans and Galls, therefore they had a Right to reap their Harveſt, and in truth the one aſwell as the other by permiſſion (nay Ordination of the Nicene Canons.

99. The enſuing year Theodoſius the Emperour ſet forth ſeveral Edicts againſt Hereticks, Jews and Pagans, yet to be ſeen in his own Code. As to the latter Theodoret tells us, that he commanded all footſteps of their Superſtition to be removed, that nothing might remain to the obſervation of future times, and indeed two years after by a Reſcript he forbad all Pagan Worſhip upon pain of Death, commanding all their Temples, Chapels and Oratories, if any remained, to be demoliſhed and expiated, by placing there the ſign of Chriſtian Religion; which Edicts had not the wiſhed effects, as appears from others publiſhed long after by Martianus and Valentinian, Leo and Anthemius, to be mentioned in their proper places. This ſame year which was the laſt of Honorius the Emperour, died Boniface Biſhop of Rome on the 25*th* of October, after he had governed five years all but two Months and three Days, and was buried in the Via Salaria near the Body of St. Felicity the Martyr. Platina tells us of great matters ordained by him: viz. That a Woman or Nun ſhould not touch the Sacred Palla or Surplice, nor the Frankincenſe: That no Slave or Indebted Perſon ſhould be received into the Clergy. He built an Oratory in the Cœmetery of St. Felicity, and adorned her Sepulchre with Marble, gave a Silver Platter of twenty Pounds, a great Cup to the value of ten, three Silver Crowns, and of the leſſer ſort of Chalices two. Under his Name are extant three Epiſtles, One to the Emperour Honorius, wherein having mightily applauded the Vertues of that Prince, he prays him to preſerve the Peace of the Church of Rome againſt ambitious and factious Perſons; to which the Emperour anſwered, that his pleaſure was, and hereby declared it to be, that if in a Schiſm two chanced to be elected, neither of them ſhould hold, but a third Perſon freely and Legitimately choſen. His ſecond is directed againſt one Maximus a Biſhop and a Manichee, accuſed of Impiety, Murther and Contumacy, againſt whom he orders the Biſhops of Gall to proceed, whether he appeared or not; concluding, that whatſoever they reſolved was neceſſarily to be confirmed by his Authority, ſo cunningly ambitious were the Roman Prelates at this time, that if any Church out of reſpect to the Dignity of their See or Ability of their Perſons asked them any advice, they would preſently pretend to Juriſdiction, this being their ſlight wherewith at firſt they began to lay the Yoke upon the Provinces. His this third Epiſtle he wrote to Hilary Biſhop of Narbone, about the buſineſs whereof we have already ſpoken. Beſides theſe in his Letters, the firſt Tome of the Councils mentions five other Conſtitutions. “ 1. That none ſhould be ordained Prieſt before “ he had completed thirty years of Age, how worthy ſoever, becauſe Chriſt be“ gan not to Preach untill that time. 2. Differences ariſing amongſt Biſhops “ ſhould be decided by the Metropolitan, and if they would not ſubmit to his “ Award, the Primate ſhould determine the Controverſie without Appeal.
“ 3. Whatever had been Conſecrated to God be it Man or Beaſt or any other “ thing, ſhould remain in the power of Prieſts, the Offender againſt this Decree “ to be Excommunicated as Sacrilegious. 4. Biſhops, Prieſts, and the like Per-“ ſons, diſagreeing amongſt themſelves, ſhould be Excommunicated till Repen-

L. 5. c. 36.

C. Th. de Epiſc. & Cleric. de Judæis de Paganis.

C. Th. de Paganis. l. ult.

Boniface Biſhop of Rome dies.

In vita Bonifacii primi.

Tom. 1. Concil.

His Works.

“ tance, and not reſtored till they had ſpent as much more time in Penance as “ they had done in Quarrelling. The 5th requires, That a Biſhop removed from “ his Biſhoprick daring either to return or depart from the place to which “ he had been confined, ſhould be thruſt into a Monaſtery in ſome other “ Province.

Cœleſtinus ſucceeds him.

Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople dies.

100. In the time of this Boniface begun the Seventh Council of Carthage, as it is called, or the African Council, which it ſeems continued a long time, the Prelates going and coming as there was occaſion. But theſe Carthaginian Councils are ſtrangely conſounded one with another, and probably the ſixth and ſeventh were the ſame. After the death of Boniface the Roman See was vacant nine days excluſively, and then was choſen and ordained Cœleſtinus a Campanian by Birth on the fourth of November the firſt Feria, being the forty fifth Biſhop of Rome according to Platina, the forty firſt after the account of Proſper, and the forty third in the Opinion of Marianus, ſo great certainty is there of this Succeſſion ſo much talked of. Two years after on the tenth of October in the eleventh Conſulſhip of Theodoſius and the firſt of Valentinian the third, Anno Dom. CCCCXXV. died Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, after he had held that Chair nineteen years and ſeven months wanting three days. He is commended as a Wiſe and Religious Governour, extolled for his Bounty to the Poor, wherein he had onely reſpect to want not to any Party, but chiefly regarded ſuch as were aſhamed to beg. Underſtanding that certain Novatians who differed from the reſt in the keeping of Eaſter, had tranſlated the Corpſe of Sabbatius out of the Iſle of Rhodes, buried it ſolemnly, and prayed upon his Tomb, he procured in the Night the Body to be removed to another place, which being done they ceaſed to pay any more honour to his Sepulchre. He was lucky in aſſigning Names to ſeveral things. The Rode in the Mouth of the Euxine Sea, formerly called Poyſon, he named Medicine. Chryſopyle, being a Rode at the head of the Boſphorus mentioned by Strabo, Nicolaus, Damaſcenus and Xenophon, and aſſigned for payment of Tribute, in imitation of it he gave to a part of the Suburbs of Conſtantinople the Name of Argyropyle. Socrates magnifies the good opinion he had of Novatus, and his kindneſs to that Sect. He reduced into Communion the Johannites or Followers of Chryſoſtome, by receiving his Name into the Dyptica, and commanding his Memory to be celebrated at the time of Divine Service, as the manner was of other Holy Biſhops deceaſed. Notwithſtanding what Socrates writes of his favouring the Novatians, he is commended by St. Auguſtine and Proſper for his Orthodox Doctrine.

Vide ejus Epiſt. ad Calliopium Epiſc. Niceæ apud Socr. l. 7. c. 25.

Aug. contra Jul. l. 1. Proſp. de Ingratis.

Socr. l. 7. cc. 26, 27, 28.

Siſinius ſucceeds him, who appoints Proclus to the See of Cyzicum, but is oppoſed by the Laity who elect Dalmatius.

101. After his death there was much ſtir made about the Election of another Biſhop, ſome being inclined towards Philip, others towards Proclus, both Prieſts of that Church, but the generality much deſiring the promotion of Siſinius a Prieſt of Elæa a Church in the Suburbs over againſt the City, where the Citizens were wont to celebrate the Feaſt of our Saviour's Aſcenſion. At length the conſideration of his Piety and Charity towards the Poor prevailed, and the Laity getting the upper hand he was conſecrated on the twenty eighth of February in the twelfth Conſulſhip of Theodoſius, and the ſecond of Valentinian, which Philip his Competitour ſtomaching exceedingly inveyed bitterly againſt it in an impertinent and confuſed Work he wrote againſt Julian the Emperour, called The Chriſtian Hiſtory. Proclus the other Competitour upon the death of the Biſhop of Cyzicum, was appointed by Siſinius to ſucceed him, but the People hearing of his coming elected one Dalmatius a Religious man to govern the Biſhoprick, neglecting (ſaith Socrates) the Law and Canon which commandeth that no Biſhop be appointed and ordained without the conſent and authority of the Biſhop of Conſtantinople. They made no account of that Canon, becauſe it commanded, as they thought, that the ſaid Authority ſhould be given to Atticus alone. That ſuch a Canon there was the Hiſtorian confeſſeth, who lived about this time; but the People the Laity it ſeems, which as appears in the ſtory of Siſinius, was moſt prevalent in thoſe Elections, having little skill in the Canons of the Church applied it ignorantly to Atticus alone. Now whether any thing here concludeth, that the Biſhops of Conſtantinople pretended not to their Juriſdiction from any Canon of an Oecumenical Council, let the Reader judge, for Baronius would gladly have him ſo reaſon. Becauſe the People ſurmized that ſuch a Canon onely belonged to Atticus, he is ready to ſwear it, though had the Honour of Rome been concerned, the People and Laity muſt have been ſcorned and derided, as no Competent Judges in ſuch a caſe. If it was made for Atticus alone he it ſeems was not ambitious of ſuch a Privilege, old Canons being by the Emperour alledged; alledged, and as the Cardinal ſurmizeth at his Suggeſtion, for his Authority over Illyricum. And if we have more reaſon to believe ſolemn Laws, than hearken unto the Prejudicate Opinions, as certainly we have, and conſider what Juriſdiction was exerciſed by Chryſoſtome over the Biſhops of Aſia, we ſhall not doubt to extend it to Cyzicum and the other Cities of the Helleſpont.

St. Auguſtine chuſeth Eradius as his Coadjutor.

Ep. 110. 7. 2. & Poſſid. in vita.

102. This ſame year St. Auguſtine being in the ſeventy ſecond year of his Age, on the twenty ſixth of September the firſt Feria, in the preſence of his Clergy and People thereto conſenting, choſe Eradius one of his Prieſts, his Coadjutour in the Epiſcopal Function, and deſigned him his Succeſſour. And now, turning over the Books he had written, this year and the next he wrote his Retractations, beſides theſe, at the requeſt of divers, he undertook pieces of ſeveral Subjects, as about the Predeſtination of the Saints, the Good of Perſeverance, and others, neither had he yet fully completed his Books de Civitate Dei, which the year following were brought to a period after ſixteen years, being begun in the year 410. On the twenty fourth of December of the ſaid following year A. D. 427. died Siſinius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, a man of ſimple Sanctity and holy Simplicity, as Marcellinus calls him, after he had ſcarcely been Biſhop two years, after whoſe deceaſe it ſeemed good to the Emperour, becauſe of the ambition of certain Perſons to chuſe none of that Church (though many put in for Philip, and not a few for Proclus) but determined with himſelf to ſend for a Stranger from Antioch. And who ſhould this prove but Neſtorius, a Man too well known afterward, born at or near Germanicia a Town of Syria, whence coming to Antioch he applied himſelf to ſtudy, but never had any bottom nor laid any ſolid foundation, contenting himſelf with ſuperficial endeavours, and never applying himſelf to the ancient Fathers. But for his voluble Tongue and grave Demeanour he came in credit with the People, and his Name being up at Court, had the hap to be promoted to this high Dignity. Immediately after his Inſtalment, the Solemnity whereof was performed on the tenth day of April, and the Conſulſhip of Fœlix and Taurus, A. D. CCCCXXVIII. In the hearing of all the People he uſed ſuch words as theſe to the Emperour: Give me the Earth purged of Hereticks, and I will repay thee with Heaven in lieu thereof: Aſſiſt me in foiling the Hereticks, and I will aid thee in ſubduing thine Enemies. Though this pleaſed ſome Orthodox Perſons, yet others ſoon made a judgment of what he would ſpeedily prove. The Arians he perſecuted with too great violence, and the Novatians evil intreated, if we credit Socrates, for no other reaſon than becauſe Paul their Biſhop was in great repute for his Zeal and Piety. He much vexed and diſquieted ſuch as celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter on the fourteenth Moon throughout Aſia, Lydia and Caria. The great Zeal he pretended for the Orthodox Faith and ſuppreſſing of Hereticks was but to colour and ſweeten thoſe pernicious Doctrines which he himſelf intended ſhortly to broach.

Ut patet ex l. 18. c. 28.

Siſinius of Conſtantinople dies.

Socr. lib. 7. cc. 28, 29.

Neſtorius ſucceeds him.

Beda.
Acta Germani
Uſſerius de primord. Eccleſiæ Britanicæ.

103. About this time Germanus Biſhop of Auxerre in Gall (Epiſcopus Antiſiodorenſis, or Altiſiodorenſis in Latin) a Dioceſe of Lugdunenſis IV. and ſubject to the Archbiſhop of Sens at the ſolicitation of the Inhabitants, as is very probable, was ſent hither into Britain by the French Biſhops, to withſtand and eradicate (if poſſible) the Hereſie of Pelagius, which had taken here aſwell as in other places too much root. This Germanus was born in the ſaid Town of Auxerre, of Noble Parentage, and from the Schools of Gall was ſent to Rome to ſtudy, where after he had furniſhed himſelf with competent skill in the Laws, he returned and practiſed them in his own Countrey, where he was honoured with the Magiſtracy of his Native place, and afterward choſen for his Succeſſour by Amator the Biſhop. Being ſent on this errand into Britain, he had for Companion Lupus Biſhop of Troyes ſur Seine (a Biſhop of the ſame Province) the Brother of Vincentius Lirinenſis, and Husband to Pimeniola the Siſter of Hilary Biſhop of Arles, one of ſuch learning and ſanctity, that Sidonius Apollinaris calls him a Father of Fathers, a Biſhop of Biſhops, and another Janus of that Age; the moſt cried up Primipilaris of the Spiritual Camp, the Rule of Manners, a Pillar of Vertue, and Prince of the Gallican Biſhops. Arrived in Britain, they foiled the Pleagian Doctours in Diſputation at the Town now called St. Albans, where at this day is ſtanding a ſmall Chapel dedicated to the Honour of St. German. Hereby having ſetled the doubting, and reclaimed many whom the Pelagian Hereſie had drawn aſide, they converted alſo many Pagans to the Chriſtian Faith, whom they Baptized at the Solemnity of Eaſter Feſtival in the River Alen. Then did they turn from fighting againſt Satan to combat with ſuch as were yet enſlaved by him Epiſcopus Tricaſſenſis, & Tricaſſinus.

Lib. 6. Ep. 1.

Germanus comes over into Britain and confounds the Pelagians.

Beda l. 1. c. 20.

him in behalf of thoſe they had ſet at liberty, their aid having been implored againſt the Heatheniſh Picts and Saxons, towards whom they led their New Converts. German choſe, as a place of advantage, an hollow Dale, encompaſſed with Hills, near a Village called at this day Mold, by the Britiſh Guiderue in Flintſhire, where (as a very Learned perſon tells us) the Field at this preſent time retains the Name of Maes Garmon, or German's Field. Germanus having placed his Men in Ambuſh, commanded them upon a ſignal given to ſhout Hallelujah three times, which being echoed on all ſides from the hills made their Enemies believe them twice as many as they really were, with apprehenſion whereof their Courages fell, and without ſtriking one ſtroke they betook themſelves to their Heels. Of this Victory Gregory the Great makes mention in his Comment upon Job, upon theſe words, Can any underſtand the noiſe of his Tabernacle? Having performed all this, he is ſaid to have depoſited in the Grave of St. Alban ſeveral Reliques he had brought over with him, and taking along with him ſome of that Martyr's Duſt, returned into Gall. Some have reported that he carried over St. Alban's Body to Rome, whence ſome hundred of years after Otho the Second's Empreſs brought it to Colen, where yet they ſay it lyes uncorrupted. Yet the Monks of Ely have pretended to it, as alſo thoſe of Ottonium or Oſell in Danemark.

Uſſerius ubi ſuprà, p. 333.

Cha. 36. v. 29, 30.

Surius Tom. 3. vit. Sanct. Junii 22.

104. About this time lived Faſtidius ſirnamed Priſcus, born in this Iſland of Britain, who being very learned in the Chriſtian Doctrine was made Biſhop of the Metropolitical Church of London, and preached the Goſpel throughout the Iſland. For the clearneſs of his wit, the excellency of his memory, and integrity of his life he is ſaid to have excelled all the Clergy of this Countrey, and to have written certain Pieces, of which voracious time has deprived us. And about this ſame time or not long after lived Nynias or Nynna, by ſome called Nynianus Venedota, born of the Britiſh Bloud Royal, who when young went to Rome to ſtudy, and there being inſtructed by the Clergy of that Church in the Chriſtian Religion, returned into his own Countrey, and ſpent all his life in painfull Preaching to the Britains and Picts. Beda writes, that the Southern Picts were by this moſt Reverend Biſhop and Holy Man converted to the Faith, whoſe Epiſcopal Seat famous for the Name and Church of St. Martin the Biſhop (where he with other Saints reſteth) the Engliſh Nation now obtaineth in the Place, which belonging to the Province of the Bernicii, is commonly called, At White Houſe, or Ad Candidam Caſam, becauſe he there built a Church of Stone, contrary to the Britiſh Cuſtome. He wrote Meditations on the Pſalms, a Book of Sentences of Holy Men, yet extant; the reſt of his Works being loſt. He is commended for his aſſiduity in reading the Scriptures, for his ſingular Charity to the Poor Fatherleſs and Widows. Some ſay he was famous for Miracles; he died in a good Old Age. That we may joyn theſe matters of Britain together, we ſhall here tell the Reader that Germanus had not been long in his own Countrey when the Pelagian root of Hereſie again beginning to repullulate, the Pious and Orthodox Clergy again deſired his return to them, who would not be wanting to ſo good a work, but croſſed the Seas again in company of Severus the Scholar of Lupus, who Preached to the inhabitants of Germania Prima, and was ordained Biſhop of Triers. Having repreſſed the Inſolence of the Hereticks, and wrought a Miracle (as Beda tells us) upon the Lame Son of Eluſius, he returned into Gall and died not long after.

Gennadius, Trithemius, Balæus.

Nynianus Venedota a famous Churchman of Britain.

Lib. 3. c. 4. Chronologia Saxonica ad A. D. 559. Hiſtor. Magdeburg. Cent. 5. c. 10.

Beda. l. 1. c. 21.

105. After the firſt Journey of Germanus into Britain, the Year of our Lord CCCCXXIX. was Palladius a Deacon of the Roman Church ſent by Celeſtine the Biſhop to Preach the Goſpel to the Scots, who proſpering ſo much in his work that this Nation began to ſhake off that Pagan and Idolatrous Superſtition wherewith it had formerly been blinded; he had the Honour to be called the Apoſtle of the Scots. He ſtrenuouſly alſo oppoſed Pelagianiſm in the Iſland, againſt which he wrote a Book, beſides other Works. Aſſiſtant to him in this Pious Work was Servanus, born in Scotland of Scotiſh Parents, who was afterward ſent to Preach the Goſpel to the Orchades, of whom he was alſo called the Apoſtle. Now he being born of Scotiſh Parents, the Reader muſt know that many of that Nation had long before this embraced the Chriſtian Faith, the Goſpel having been preached and received there in the time of Victor Biſhop of Rome. Whilſt the Goſpel thus flouriſhed in the Northern Parts, and the errours of Pelagius met with ſuch as diſcovered their rottenneſs and danger, the Devil was ready to begin another aſſault upon the Church, and had already furniſhed himſelf with a freſh Champion, for Neſtorius by this time, warm in his Patriarchal See, began now to vent thoſe Doctrines which for want of fit advantages he had hitherto concealed.

Palladius Preaches the Goſpel to the Scots.

Servanus to the Orchades.

Idem ib. c. 13. Chronol. Saxon. ad A. D. CCCCXXIX. Proſper. Sozom. l. 8. c. 26. Niceph. l. 13. c. 32. Trithemius, Balæus. Balæus Hiſt. Magdib. Cent. 5. c. 10.

Evagrius lib. 1.*cap.*2. *Cyril de Incar. Virg. Suidas. Socrates, lib.*7. cap. 32.

The Hereſie of Neſtorius Biſhop of Conſtantinople.

Being of old principled by Theodorus Biſhop of Mopſueſtia and Diodorus of Tarſus he had the luck alſo to be Nephew of Paulus Samoſatenus, whoſe opinions did him no good, though he pretended to be a great Enemy to them, and an earneſt Maintainer of the Nicene Faith. He broached not his Hereſie firſt himſelf, but Anaſtaſius a Prieſt whom he had brought with him from Antioch, whom he highly eſteemed, and uſed as a Councillour in all his matters. This Prieſt on a certain time taught publickly in the Church, that none ought to call the Virgin Mary Theotocos, or the Mother of God, becauſe ſhe was but a Woman, and of a Woman God could not be born. This raiſed a marvellous diſorder amongſt both Laity and Clergy, who had had it of a long time inculcated into them, that Chriſt was true God, but when they blamed Anaſtaſius, and expected he ſhould be called to an account for ſuch Language, Neſtorius became his Patron, and not onely his but the Patron of his Opinion, not mincing at all the matter, but in his Sermons maintaining what he had aſſerted, that the Bleſſed Virgin could not be the Mother of God. This put the People beſides their Wits. Some ſaid one thing ſome another, many thought he was of opinion that Chriſt was but a mere Man, and that he went about to revive the Hereſie of Samoſatenus and Photinus. Not onely diſputing there was, as happeneth upon ſuch occaſion, but ſo great were the heats and diſſentions, and the Schiſms came to ſuch an height, that the ſummoning of a general Council ſeemed needfull for deciding the Controverſie, and appeaſing the minds of Men.

Is anathematiz'd in a Provincial Synod at Alexandria.

106. But Neſtorius not contenting himſelf with publiſhing his opinions in his own Dioceſe, divulged them by Books ſent into all Places, and Ægypt amongſt others, where ſome Monks were intoxicated with this new Doctrine. Hereupon Cyril the Alexandrian Patriarch beſtired himſelf, as appears by this Epiſtle. Yet with caution, for knowing that Theodoſius the Emperour had been the Promoter of Neſtorius to that See, at firſt he ſent to Conſtantinople onely a Confutation of ſuch Opinions, not naming the broacher of them; at length when all the World began to take notice of them he wrote to himſelf the Heretick ſeveral times, deſiring him to beware of ſuch aſſertions, to which he anſwered with very great ſcorn and ſtomach. Cyril ſeeing there was no good to be done, and having by Letters conſulted with Cæleſtinus the Biſhop of Rome, and others, he reſolved to call a Provincial Synod of Biſhops to Alexandria, wherein the opinion of Neſtorius was condemned as Heretical, and twelve Anathematiſms formed, which were afterwards ſent to Neſtorius, therewith if poſſible to reclame him from his Errours. Theſe becauſe directed againſt his Tenents, diſcover what they were to us, and therefore we ſhall ſummarily repeat them. 1. “He that ſhall not confeſs God to be Immanuel, and therefore the Bleſſed Virgin to be Theotocos, Deipara, or Mother of God, according to the Fleſh let him be Anathema. 2. As alſo ſuch as ſhall not confeſs, that the word of God the Father was hypoſtatically united to the Fleſh, and Chriſt to be one with his own Fleſh, viz. both God and Man. 3. And ſuch as after union diſtinguiſh the Hypoſtaſes, and conjoin them onely in reſpect of Dignity, Authority or Power, not according to natural Union. 4. And ſuch as attribute to two Perſons or two Hypoſtaſes, thoſe words which occur in Evangelical and Apoſtolical Writings being ſpoken either by the Holy men concerning Chriſt, or by Chriſt concerning himſelf; and ſometimes aſcribe them to a Man, conſidered a part from the Eternal word of God; otherwhiles as appropriate to God and the word of the Father. 5. Such alſo as ſhould call the Man Chriſt Deifer or Theophorus, and not true God as the onely and natural Son of God, inaſmuch as the Word being made Fleſh, communicates as with Fleſh and Bloud. 6. And thoſe who ſhould call the Word of the Father, the God or the Lord of Chriſt, and not rather confeſs the ſame to be God and Man, foraſmuch as the word was made Fleſh according to the Scriptures. 7. If any affirmed that Jeſus Chriſt being a mere Man was acted or aſſiſted by God the Word, and ſhould fanſie the Glory of the onely begotten, to belong to the Man as another beſide the word. 8. In like manner, if any ſhould affirm that the Man aſſumed ought to be adored with the word of God himſelf, to be glorified with him, and to be called God as one Perſon with another (for this Particle with neceſſarily hinteth ſo much) and with the ſame adoration, Worſhip not Emanuel, and give one Glory to him, according to that ſaying that the Word was made Fleſh. 9. Such as ſhould ſay, that our one Lord Jeſus Chriſt was glorified by the Holy Ghoſt, as by a Power aliene from himſelf, and the Virtue he uſed “ againſt unclean Spirits, and in working Divine Miracles he had it from him,

“ and that the Spirit was not his own by which he wrought ſuch Miracles.
“ 10. Seeing we are taught by Scripture, that Chriſt was the High Prieſt and “ Apoſtle of our Profeſſion, and offered himſelf for us a ſweet Savour, to God
“ the Father, If any ſhall ſay that the Word of God himſelf was not our High “ Prieſt and Apoſtle after he was made Fleſh and Man like unto us, but that “ Man which was born of a Woman, as ſome other divers from him ; Or who “ ſhall affirm that he offered a Sacrifice for himſelf and not for us onely, he ha“ ving no need of an oblation who was void of Sin. 11. If any confeſs that “ the Fleſh of our Lord was not quickning, or the proper Fleſh of the Word of “ God himſelf,but of ſome other beſides him joyned with him in Dignity, having “ Divine Inhabitation alone and not rather quickning, as being made the proper “ Fleſh of the Word, able to quicken all things. 12. Laſtly, if any deny the “ Word of God to have ſuffered in the Fleſh, been Crucified in the Fleſh, taſted “ of Death in the Fleſh, and to have become the Firſt-born from the Dead, in “ that he is Life, and enlivens all things as God,let him be accurſed.

Neſtorius accuſeth Cyril as an Heretick to the Emperour.

Tom. 1. Concil.

107. Theſe Anathematiſms being brought to Neſtorius, that he might ſubſcribe them he was ſo far from doing this,that he not onely defended the Doctrine by them condemned, but accuſed Cyril as an Heretick of the Sect of Apollinaris, and afterwards drew up twelve Anathematiſms againſt him, to which he ſufficiently anſwered. At preſent he could not be condemned, foraſmuch as he impeached his grand Accuſer of the ſame Crime, nay it was ſo far from that that vehemently accuſing Cyril to the Emperour, as a turbulent and ambitious Perſon, he procured Letters to be written to him, wherein he was chidden and threatned, except he would ſtudy Peace and Union with Neſtorius. Cyril nothing herewith terrified,ſet himſelf with all Alacrity to write to the Emperour, and his Siſters,and laying before them the dangerous Principles of their Patriarch, deſired an univerſal Council might be called,for the full and clear examining of the Truth. Theodoſius perceiving matters come to that paſs, that no Peace could be elſe expected, by his Imperial Letters dated November 20, ſummons an univerſal Synod, to meet at Epheſus againſt Whitſontide, adding after the Precept that he ſhould not excuſe any that failed to be there by that time either to God or Man, foraſmuch as ſuch as refuſed to be preſent at the ſacred Meeting of Biſhops could not poſſibly bear any good Conſcience : Not onely were the Biſhops of the Eaſt ſummoned,but ſuch of the Weſt alſo as were moſt eminent,amongſt whom St. Auguſtine, who yet e'er the Meſſenger arrived at Carthage,was departed to a place void of all diſſention and errour. For God had removed this moſt Reverend and Learned Biſhop, this moſt eminent orthodox Chriſtian, out of the way, leſt he ſhould either ſee or feel the Cruelty of the Arian Vandals, who had now beſieged Hippo above two Months. He lived 76 years, whereof 36 he ſpent in the Epiſcopal Function. He preached to his laſt, and prayed in his Church beſeeching God either to remove the Siege, give his Flock patience to endure it, and ſubmit to his good pleaſure, or take him out of the World to himſelf. Falling ſick of a Fever, he ſhut himſelf up, permitting none to come to him, but at ſuch time as the Phyſicians viſited him, or when he muſt neceſſarily take ſome refreſhment, ſpending ten Days in continual Prayers and Tears; for his Judgment was that a good Chriſtian, eſpecially a Prieſt, ought not to die without ſome remarkable ſigns of Repentance and Humiliation.

Who ſummons an univerſal Synod at Epheſus.

St. Auguſtine dies.

Vide Baron. ad An. 430.

Poſſidius in vita.

His Works.

108. As for a Teſtament he made none, having nothing to diſpoſe or bequeath thereby, nor ever had any intention to inrich his Kindred. His Books and Library he had committed to the Church, there to be preſerved for the benefit of Poſterity, and concerning his own Works this is very remarkable, that about a year after when the City was taken and ſet on fire, yet they were wonderfully preſerved. Thoſe that were written againſt Pelagius and his Tenents had various reception, not onely as the World were inclined to, and againſt that Heretick ; But they were maligned and oppoſed by ſeveral in Gall, who pretended to abhor thoſe Errours againſt which he wrote, and they were as earneſtly defended by Hilary Biſhop of Arles and Proſper of Aquitain. To his Works which are very many, are added many ſpurious and ſome doubtfull, which have been detected, and branded by Eraſmus and others. Amongſt the former ſort is the 14 Homily, de Nat. Domini, of which he was not the Authour, the Learned Molanus with the Divines of Lovain, having rejected and cenſured it to be as it is the Work of an unlearned Novice, yet Baronius cites it to prove that Joſeph was unacquainted with any Matrimonial Act, which is now brought to be the Common Tenent of the Roman Schools. Amongſt the Books which he wrote himſelf, there is one which is not to be read without caution; and that is his Book de ordine, from the Authority of which ſome Romaniſts will prove Stews to be tolerated in a Chriſtian State. But when Auguſtine wrote that Book as our Jewel obſerves, he was not St. Auguſtine. He was yet a very young Man, and but a Novice in the Faith, not yet well inſtructed, not yet baptized in the Name of Chriſt, himſelf as yet keeping a Concubine, and living in Whoredom. What matter then if he ſay in it, take Harlots away from among Men, and ye fill all the Countrey with Ribaldry and Villany. Afterwards fully inſtructed, Chriſtened and grown older and wiſer, he was of another mind as appears from a place in his Book De Civitate Dei, * which Work he finiſhed but four years before his Death. As all his Works are large Teſtimonies of his Learning, Ingenuity and Piety, ſo that of his Retractations of his Candour and Humility in an eſpecial manner, wherein of his own accord he confeſſeth and revoketh his former ſlips, faults and errours. Long before him Hippocrates had done the ſame. After him Cardan and many other great Perſons, yet few in compariſon of thoſe, who rather againſt their Conſciences plead for, than own and retract their Errours. The Example of thoſe Worthies, every one knows, every one commends rather than Opiniaſtrity; but when it comes to the effect not many practiſe. The day of the Death of St. Auguſtine, and the Anniverſary appointed to be obſerved to his Memory, was the 28*th.* of Auguſt.

Bp. Mountague.

* L. 14. c. 18. Iſtam in uſu Scortatorum terrena civitas licitam fecit turpitudinem.

CHAP. VI.

From the third Oecumenical Council ſummoned by Theodoſius the Second to the City of Epheſus, to the fourth Oecumenical Council ſummoned by the Emperour Martianus to the City of Chalcedon.

The Space of Twenty Years and about Four Months.

The third Oecumenical Council ſummoned at Epheſus.

1. THE third Oecumenical Council ſummoned by Theodoſius the Second to the City of Epheſus, aſſembled at Whitſontide or Pentecoſt, in the 24 year of the Reign of that Emperour, the 7 of Valentinian the Third, his Collegue, of Old Rome the 1184, of the New 101, the third year of the 302 Olympiad, the 14 Indiction, 107 years after the firſt Nicene Synod, 50 after the ſecond Oecumenical Council ſummoned to Conſtantinople, A.D. 431 Anicius Baſſus and Flavius Antiochus being Conſuls.

2. In obedience to the Imperial Edict, the Biſhops aſſembled from their ſeveral Churches. Neſtorius with a great Multitude of People, took his Journey preſently after the Eaſter Holy-days. Cyril the Patriarch of Alexandria came to Epheſus about Whitſontide, and the fifth Day after Pentecoſt, Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem. Theſe with others coming in good time, ſtaid for John the Patriarch of Antioch, who with his ſuffragan Biſhops loitered out of deſign, leſt he ſhould be compelled either to condemn Neſtorius, or with him to undergo the ſame cenſure; after fifteeen Days expectation, the Metropolitans that were with him came to Epheſus, and ſignified to the Fathers, that his preſence was not to be expected. Above two hundred Biſhops are ſaid to have convened, and all as well Occidentals as Orientals, either themſelves or by their Legates, to have been preſent at this Aſſembly. Yet the Prelates of Africk, hindred by the dreadfull devaſtation made at this time by the Wandals, could not be there; neither were in any any Capacity to ſend any conſiderable Legation: onely Capreolus Primate of Carthage, doing aſmuch as in him lay, ſent Baſſulas a Deacon of his Church with Letters of excuſe to the Synod. Very many Biſhops indeed were perſonally abſent, and preſent onely by their Legates or Agents, as almoſt all the Weſtern Biſhops, and by Name Cœleſtine Patriarch of Rome, whoſe Legates came not till the 10*th.* of July, and the Council had done moſt of their Work. Some its probable upon other occaſions neglected this buſineſs, as the Biſhops of Gangra and Heraclea in Macedonia, who were not at this Synod. Divers others wilfully and obſtinately refuſed to be preſent at this Holy Synod, as Neſtorius himſelf the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, John Patriarch of Antioch and ſome forty Biſhops, who at the ſame time while the Holy Council was held in the Church of the Bleſſed Virgin at Epheſus, held a Conventicle by themſelves in an Inn in the ſame City, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Yet, notwithſtanding the perſonal abſence of the firſt, the negligent of the ſecond, and wilfull abſence of the laſt, and although no Preſbyters at all were therein, not in their own right, this Holy General Council ſaith of its Synodical Judgment given by thoſe that were preſent, that it *was nothing elſe but * the common and conſenting Judgment of the whole World.* For the Council was lawfully called, all were ſummoned univerſally, it was free for all to be preſent, and therefore all the Biſhops in the World did either perſonally, by their Agents expreſs, or elſe in a tacit and implicit manner, wrap up their Judgment in the ſynodal Decree made by the Biſhops preſent in the Council, of which Cyril was Patron or chief, aſwell after as before the coming of Cœleſtine his Legates to the Synod.

Socrates lib. 7. cap. 33. Acta Concilii.

* Nihil aliud quam communis & concors terrarum orbis ſenſus & conſenſus.

Epiſt. Concil. Epheſ. ad Imp. Tom. 2. Act. Conc. Epheſ. Ep. 17.

Wherein Cyril Biſhop of Alexandria preſides.

3. For prevention of Tumults the Emperour ſent thither Candidianus a Count, and to keep diſorderly Perſons from the Council, to ſee that no diſſention and private Quarrels might hinder their grave Conſultations, with the free and exact diſcuſſion of the Cauſes propoſed, and to provide, that every one might freely and with leiſure propound what was needfull, and to have ſcope to refute all doubts propoſed by others. At the firſt opening of the Synod Neſtorius was preſent, whom Cyril when they came to fall upon the buſineſs in hand, did vehemently tax, and with other Biſhops contended earneſtly for Chriſt's Divinity, affirming him one and the ſame Son of God, begotten of his Father before all Ages, and in the laſt times made Man of a Virgin, that he was not one and another, and that the Bleſſed Virgin ought properly and truely to be called Θεοτόκος, or the Mother of God. Hereat Neſtorius roſe up, told them plainly he would not own a God, that grew to Man's Eſtate by two and three Months and ſo forth, and that therefore he waſhed his Hands of their Bloud, and thenceforth would come no more into their Company. With ſix other Biſhops he ſtreight departed out of the Aſſembly, and kept himſelf afterward private with thoſe Men and others, he thought fit for his purpoſe. And when the Day after, three Biſhops were ſent by the Council to cite him to appear, and he was called once and again afterward, yet he flatly refuſed to come to them, uſing the Meſſengers contumeliouſly, and frighting them by the armed Guards he had got about him by his great Intereſt in Irenæus a Count he had brought with him, and Candidianus, both whom he had infected with his Hereſie. The Synod perceiving how contumaciouſly he bore himſelf, reſolved to proceed to the Merits of the Cauſe. They cauſed to be read the Nicene Faith, the Epiſtles of Cyril and Neſtorius, written upon the Controverſie, with another ſent from Cœleſtine the Roman Patriarch. Theodotus Biſhop of Ancyra and Acacius of Melita, depoſed on the blaſphemous words they had heard him utter publickly at Epheſus. Other Speeches were alledged, the Teſtimonies of Scriptures and Fathers for Incarnation of the word, and the Divinity of Chriſt were cited, all which being done after adviſed and mature deliberation, the Fathers thereto compelled by the Canons, and an Epiſtle received from the moſt Holy Father, and their Collegue the Biſhop of the Roman Church, with many Tears they came to this Reſolution and ſentence. He who by him therefore hath been blaſphemed, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt hath decreed by the preſent Holy Synod, that Neſtorius be depoſed from his Epiſcopal Dignity, and baniſhed from all Society of Prieſts.

Tom. 1. Act. Concil. Epheſ. cap. 32. Ut diligenter proſpiciat, &c.

Neceſſitate nobis à Canonibus & ſanctiſ. Patris collegæq; noſtri Romanæ Eccleſiæ Epiſcopi, Epiſtola impoſita diu multúmque lachrymantes, &c.

And Neſtorius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, is depoſed and baniſhed the Society of Prieſts.

4. After the Condemnation of Neſtorius, about four or five Days, on the 27 of June, came John the Patriarch of Antioch to Epheſus, with a Company of Biſhops and Prieſts, and railing againſt Cyril for making ſuch haſte in cenſuring Neſtorius, immediately aſſociated himſelf with him and his Partiſans. Now at the ſelf ſame time in one and the ſame City of Epheſus, as one obſerves were held two ſeveral Councils, and Altar erected againſt Altar, Council againſt Council,

He with other Heretical Biſhops joins in a Conventicle at Epheſus.

Dr. Crackanthorp.

Patriarch againſt Patriarch, Biſhops againſt Biſhops, and Synodal ſentence againſt Synodal ſentence. The one conſiſted of Holy, Orthodox, and Catholick Biſhops, whoſe Preſident was Cyril: the other of Heretical, Factious, and ſeveral (a) depoſed Biſhops whoſe Preſident was John. The former was held in the Church of the Bleſſed Virgin, the latter in an (b) Inn or Tavern, a fit place for ſuch as denied Chriſt to be God. The former proceeded in all Reſpects orderly and ſynodically, the latter did all things tumultuouſly, preſumptuouſly, and againſt the Canons, ſupporting themſelves by Lies, Calumnies and Slanders. In ſumm the one was truely an holy, a general, an Oecumenical Council, wherein was the Conſent of the whole Catholick Church, the other was nothing elſe but an heretical, ſchiſmatical Conventicle, a Faction or Conſpiracy of ſome thirty or forty Perſons unworthy the Name of Biſhops, inſolently oppoſing the Holy Council, and the whole Catholick Church, in which Number and Faction beſides others, were John Biſhop of Antioch, the Ringleader of the Rout, Paul Biſhop of Emeſa, Theodoret the Biſhop of Cyrus, and Ibas ſome three or four years after Biſhop of Edeſſa.

Oppoſing the Canonical Synod.

And anathematizing them.

Acta Concilii.

5. This notwithſtanding, as the Holy Council depoſed Neſtorius for an Heretick, the Conventicle depoſed Cyril for an Archheretick alſo, condemning his twelve Chapters as Heretical, which the Council had approved as Orthodox. As the Council excommunicated and anathematized John, Paul, Theodoret, Ibas, and all the reſt of their Factious Adherents, the Conventicle anathematized Cyril and all his Adherents, arrogating to themſelves the glorious Name of the Holy Epheſine Council, and ſlandering them that held with Cyril as a Conventicle, an unlawfull and diſorderly Aſſembly, terming them Arians, Apollinarians and Cyrillians, aſwell as thoſe with Cyril called themſelves, as indeed they were the Holy and Oecumenical Council, and termed John, with his Adherents a Faction and heretical Conventicle of Neſtorians. In fine, as the Council conſtantly refuſed to communicate with them, till they conſented to the depoſing of Neſtorius, and anathematizing his Hereſie, the Conventicle not onely refuſed Communion with Cyril and other Catholicks, but bound themſelves by many ſolemn Oaths, and that afterward in the preſence of the Emperour, that they would never communicate with the Cyrillians, except they would condemn the twelve Chapters of Cyril, adding that they would rather die than conſent to any one of the twelve Chapters. But though the Fathers of the true and genuine Council, wrote their Encyclical Epiſtle to all Chriſtians, and continually upon urgent occaſion humbly informed the Emperours of their proceedings, ſending Letters after Letters, yet either were the Meſſengers ſtopt or their Letters intercepted, ſo that not the leaſt notice of them came to their Majeſties, whereas on the other ſide the frequent Letters of the Conventicle fraught with Lies and Slanders, had every day acceſs and great applauſe at Court; for Count Candidianus, whom the Emperours made their Deputy and Preſident of the Council, to ſee all good and Canonical Orders therein obſerved, ſo far was faulty to his truſt, as being moſt partial to Neſtorius and his Hereſie, he not onely was Privy and aſſiſtant to the ſtopping of the Councils Letters, but by his own diſpatches, ſeconded and confirmed all the Lies which the Conventicle had writ unto the Emperours. Hence it came to paſs that the Emperours miſinformed, commanded all things done againſt Neſtorius and others, as done againſt Reaſon and their Command to be revoked, and a new Courſe taken, telling them that their Majeſty could not hold or eſteem thoſe things done ſo diſorderly for firm and ſynodal, nay decreeing, that all thitherto done ſhould be accounted of no force, but utterly void and fruſtrate.

Sending their Calumnies to the Emperours.

Who being miſinformed order that whatever was done againſt Neſtorius ſhould be utterly void.

Majeſtas noſtra ea quæ acta ſunt pro ratis & legitimis habere non poteſt, pro irritis & nullis habenda eſſe. Imp. ad Synod. cap. 17.

Et Neſtorii & Cyrilli & Memnonis exauctorationem à Sanctitate veſtra nobis inſinuatam calculo noſtro approbavimus.

6. By this means alſo it came to paſs, that the Emperours knowing nothing of the Diviſions amongſt the Biſhops, and how beſide the Holy Council there was a factious and ſchiſmatical Conventicle of Neſtorians held in the City, thought whatever was done aſwell againſt Cyril and Memnon in depoſing them, as againſt Neſtorius, had been the Act, Judgment and Sentence of one and the ſame Council, upon which miſinformation they confirmed at firſt the condemnation of all three. This put the Fathers upon ſuch a ſhift as this, to ſend a Letter to Conſtantinople by a faithfull Meſſenger, who to avoid ſuſpicion put on the Habit of a Beggar, and carried the Letter in the hollow of a Cane, which as a ſtaff he had provided for his Journey. As ſoon as, by this means, the Report of the late diſorders came to Conſtantinople, the City was much moved, and Theodoſius at the ſolicitation of his Siſter and other Catholicks, commanded certain Biſhops of either ther ſide to appear before him at Conſtantinople, fully to inform him of the truth of all the proceedings; and the truth being accordingly found out after diligent Examination, the Emperours by their Imperial Authority nulled all the Acts of the Conventicle, reſtored Cyril (who at this time wrote a full anſwer to all that had been objected againſt him) and Memnon, approved the Judgment of the Council againſt Neſtorius, adding to his depoſition baniſhment from Conſtantinople. But the ſynodal Sentence of depoſition againſt John, and the reſt of his Aſſociates they ſuſpended for a while, partly to prevent a greater Schiſm, which John by his great intereſt might procure, but eſpecially in hope that as well he as the Eaſtern Biſhops might in time be brought off, and reduced to Unity with Cyril and the Catholick Church, which in the height of their preſent heat and ſtomach could not be expected. And thus was the Council at Epheſus diſſolved, a far greater Rent being by this means left at the end, than had been at the beginning thereof, and ſo that Malady for which it was called not preſently cured but increaſed. Neſtorius was permitted to ſtay as yet in the Monaſtery of St. Euprepius at Antioch, to ſee if he would recant his opinions, but growing more obſtinate, was at length after ſome three or four years baniſhed into the Wilderneſs of Oaſis. The Emperour alſo animadverted upon his Courtiers who had been falſe to their truſt, and done ſo ill Offices for the Epheſine Fathers.

---

(a) Ex quibus alii erant extorres vagi propriis ſedibus deſtituti, &c. Synod. Epiſt. ad Cæleſtinum. Tom. 4. Act. Epheſ. Cap. 17.

(b) Johanne in diverſorio manente, ſacráque illius Synodo præſente.

But after a full underſtanding how matters went the Emperours null the Acts of the Conventicle, and add Baniſhment to the depoſing of Neſtorius.

Evagr. l.1.c.7.

7. But beſides what theſe Fathers did directly againſt Neſtorianiſm we muſt not omit certain Canons of this Synod of Epheſus, mentioned after a Preface, wherein they ſignifie, that being called together by the Emperour's Edict, above thirty of their Number had ſeparated themſelves in behalf of Neſtorius, and therefore remained excommunicate and depoſed. Then follow ſeven Canons of which this is the Summ, that if any Metropolitan Biſhop or Clerk imbraced the Hereſie of Neſtorius or Cæleſtius, he ſhould be excommunicated and degraded; if a Lay-perſon he ſhould be excommunicated; And the ſame to extend againſt ſuch as produced, wrote or compoſed any form of Faith, beſides that of the Nicene Council; As alſo ſuch Perſons as ſhould appear of Chariſius his opinion who thought not aright of the Humanity of Chriſt. The eighth Canon was made upon occaſion, that the Patriarch of Antioch, took upon him to ordain in the Churches of Cyprus, which thing being an innovation contrary to Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions, and the Canons of Holy Fathers, and for that Epidemical Diſeaſes require a greater Remedy, becauſe they are more dangerous than others, therefore the Fathers decree that it be taken for a Rule in all Dioceſes and Provinces whatſoever, that no Biſhop invade or occupy any Province, which and from the beginning hath not been under his Juriſdiction or that of his Predeceſſours. If any hath already invaded any ſuch Province and by force made it his own, the Holy Synod commands he do reſtore it, leſt the Canons of the Holy Fathers be neglected, and leſt under pretence of Adminiſtration of Holy things, the Arrogance of ſecular Power creep in, and by degrees we imprudently loſe that Liberty which our Lord Jeſus Chriſt the Saviour of all Men, by the price of his own Bloud hath beſtowed upon us. Therefore it pleaſeth the Holy Synod, that the Rights of every Province, which according to the Ancient Cuſtome it hath had from the beginning, be preſerved to it pure and inviolable, every Metropolitan having liberty to take Copies of thoſe Acts for his Security. And if any Perſon ſhall produce any Sanction contrary to what is here defined, it is the pleaſure of all the holy and univerſal Synod, that it be void and of none effect. That this Canon was made tacitely againſt the Incroachments of the Roman Patriarch, ſome do gather not obſcurely from the Acts of this Council, it evidently from them appearing, that this Canon prevailed and was of force, notwithſtanding the Epiſtle of Innocent the Firſt to Alexander, whereby he declared that the Cyprians did not carry themſelves like faithfull Men, except they ſubjected themſelves to the Patriarch of Antioch. Yet we ſee this Canon of this Oecumenical Council, is quite contrary to the Sentence of the Roman Biſhop, for it decrees that attempt to have been made upon Cyprus by him of Antioch, againſt Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions and Decrees of the Fathers, and therefore all Sanctions or Epiſtles in this Caſe to be utterly null. But beſides thoſe Canons (that we may conclude with this Synod) the Fathers made another Conſtitution againſt the Maſſalian Hereticks, Euchytæ and Enthuſiaſts (having in the ninth Seſſion condemned the Pelagians) and anathematized a Book of thoſe Hereticks, going under the Name of Aſceticon, which ſome think near a-kin to the Aſcetica, reckoned amongſt the Works of Baſil.

Several other Canons.

Tom. 2. Epheſ. Synod. append. 1. c. 4. Ep. 18.

8. Neſtorius being depoſed by the Council, that Decree was ratified (a) and eſtabliſhed by the Emperour, aſwell as other matters according (b) to his Promiſe and their Petition, whereby they (c) earneſtly deſired his Piety, that he would command that all which was done by this Holy and Oecumenical Council againſt that Heretick, might ſtand in force being confirmed by his Royal Aſſent. For in their proceedings, the Emperour's (d) Letters were their Direction, and as they themſelves profeſs, a Torch to all their Actions, and in all the Affronts and Contumelies they endured from the Conventicle, they betook themſelves to him, beſeeching him to be Judge betwixt them, and examine their doings. The See of Conſtantinople being therefore void, there (e) aroſe a difference about the Election of a new Biſhop. Proclus had in all probability been the Man, but that ſome in power were his back friends, and pretended that the Canons of the Church forbad any Biſhop to be tranſlated from one See to another, which though either ignorantly or malitiouſly ſpoken (the Canons for the better Edification of the Church allowing it, and many Examples of theſe ancient times approving it) yet was of ſuch force, that the People was therewith ſatisfied and appeaſed. Maximianus then, three Months after the Depoſition of Neſtorius was choſen Patriarch, by function a Prieſt, who led a Monaſtical Life, one that of late had purchaſed a good Name by building at his own Charge Sepulchres, where Godly Men ſhould be interred, but altogether unlearned, and who had determined to lead a quiet Life, free from all Care and Moleſtation. Thus was the Place of Neſtorius filled, but the rent and diviſion he had made in the Eaſtern parts of the World, not yet made up and conjoyned. This diſturbance of the Church, much diſquieted the mind of the Religious Emperour Theodoſius, who the very next year after the ſhutting up of the Council, when he thought time and better conſideration, to have alleyed the heat of the Eaſtern Biſhops, began to ſolicite that Union which before he had purpoſed to effect, profeſſing his reſolution to be not to deſiſt from this ſo good a Work, till God ſhould vouchſafe to reſtore Unity and Peace to his People. To this end he wrote a very religious and pathetical Letter to John Patriarch of Antioch, by many reaſons perſwading, and by his Imperial Authority requiring him, and with him the reſt of the faction to ſubſcribe to the depoſition of Neſtorius, the anathematizing of his Hereſie, and ſo to imbrace Holy Communion with Cyril, and the Catholick Church.

Maximianus choſen Patriarch of Conſtantinople, in the room of Neſtorius.

Ep. Imp. ad Acatium Beræenſ. Epiſc. Johanni mandavit, &c.

9. John and the other Eaſtern Biſhops, upon the Emperour's motion ſought to make an Union with Cyril, but laboured to effect it by drawing him over to them, and their Hereſies, not by paſſing over to him, and cloſing with him according to the Decrees of the late Council. They cauſed Acatius, Biſhop of Beræa, to write to him in all their Names, offering Unity and Concord, but on this condition that he ſhould aboliſh and condemn whatever he had written againſt Neſtorianiſm, and conſequently both his twelve Chapters, the Epheſine Decree, and all of that nature. Cyril anſwered with Reſolution and Courage, that what he had written was in defence of the Catholick Faith, and therefore he ſhould never recant it, ſo that this Art failing they attempted to effect the Union by Paul Biſhop of Emiſa, whom they ſent to Alexandria to agitate by word of Mouth, and another Letter, wherein though they were not ſo violent as in the former, yet they found fault with the Epheſine Council. Cyril ſeeing they added as he ſaid Contumelies, who ſhould have asked pardon and recanted, would neither admit of their ſecond Epiſtle, but when Paul earneſtly endeavoured to excuſe them, affirming upon his Oath, that their purpoſe was not to exaſperate, but cloſe with him in Charity, he was content to admit this excuſe, Paul having in Commiſſion to work him off as much as could be, but however to make an Agreement with him conſented to anathematize Neſtorius and his Hereſies, to the depoſing of him and the Election of Maximianus into his place, which when he had ſubſcribed with his own hand, Cyril received him into Communion. Now he would have perſwaded Cyril, that ſeeing he came in the name of the reſt, and had ſubſcribed for them all, and as in the common Perſon of all the Orientals, that this his ſubſcription might ſerve for thoſe that were abſent, and that requiring no more of them, he would be content with their Letters he brought with him. Cyril would by no means hear of this, telling Paul his ſubſcription could ſatisfie onely for himſelf, as for the reſt,

Union in the Church promoted by the Emperour Theodoſius.

Epp. Cyrilli ad Acatium & Dignatum. Tom. 5. cc. 7. 16.

(a) Imperator ſententia Synodi publicè approbata, Neſtorio exilium indicit. Act. Conc. Tom. 5. cap. 11. & C. Th. de Hæret lib. ult.

(b) Ac tum demum à noſtra Pietate confirmationem expectate. Tom. 3. c. 17.

(c) Ut jubeat ea omnia per veſtræ pietatis nutum & conſenſum confirmata. Act. Conc. Epheſ. Tom. 4. c. 8.

(d) Primo omnium Actorum monumentis reverendas pietatis veſtræ literas quaſi facem quandam præmiſimus. Ep. Synod. ad Imp. Tom. 2. Act. Conc. Eph. c. 22.

(e) Socrat. l. 7. c. 34. lat. vel 35. gr.

reſt they muſt perſonally and for themſelves ſubſcribe before they could be received into Communion. Hereupon he wrote an orthodox Confeſſion of Faith to the ſame effect as Paul had ſubſcribed, and ſent it to John, requiring his perſonal ſubſcription to it.

10. Paul returning to Antioch, brought this reſolute Anſwer of Cyril to John and his Biſhops there aſſembled in Synod, who perceiving there was no other way to make an Union, and that Paul had both ſubſcribed himſelf, and promiſed for them that they ſhould doe the like, at length yielded to all Cyril's Demands, and for an aſſurance of their ſincerity herein, wrote a Synodal and Encyclical Epiſtle to Cyril, which they likewiſe ſent to Sixtus Biſhop of Rome (for Cæleſtine was e'er this time dead) to Maximianus and other Principal Biſhops, wherein having firſt made a ſound and orthodox confeſſion of their Faith, they give their willing aſſent and ſubſcription to the depoſing of Neſtorius, and anathematizing of his Hereſies. This Letter they prevailed with Paul to carry and make a ſecond Journey to Alexandria, to conclude a final Peace and Union. At whoſe coming thither this ſecond time, and bringing with him the undoubted teſtimony of the orthodox belief of John, and the chief of the Eaſtern Biſhops, and that they had now done all which the Emperour and Cyril had required, they were welcomly received, and the union being perfectly concluded, Peace was reſtored to the Church. In token whereof Paul preached at Alexandria in December, and made before Cyril and all the People ſo orthodox a Profeſſion of his Faith, that his Auditours for joy interrupting him four or five times, cryed out Orthodox Paul thou art welcome to us; Cyril is Orthodox, Paul is Orthodox. And in Congratulation with John the Antiochian Patriarch and the reſt, Cyril wrote a notable Epiſtle, which begins, Let the Heavens rejoyce, and let the Earth be glad: and publiſhing this as an Hymn of Joy and Thankſgiving for the Union ſo happily effected, ſung, Glory to God, and peace amongſt Men. This is the ſum of the whole proceedings betwixt Cyril and the Eaſtern Biſhops, touching the matter of the union, as to any one who conſults the Epiſtles of Cyril to Acatius Biſhop of Melitene, to Dynatus and John, and compares them with the Epiſtle of John, and that of the Synod of Antioch ſent to Cyril and Xiſtus, will clearly perceive. Yet ſo impudent were the Neſtorians as to ſlander Cyril to have at the time of the union conſented in all points to them and their Hereſie, and to have condemned his former Doctrine with the Epheſine Council. For knowing that John and the Eaſtern Biſhops had written to Cyril ſo reſolutely, that unleſs he condemned his own Chapters they would not conſent to any Peace or Union; and ſeeing that Cyril afterwards and in the ſame year conſented with John, and made an union with him; thereupon they took occaſion to boaſt that Cyril did it upon the condition required by John at the firſt, which was the condemning of his former Doctrine, wilfully and maliciouſly concealing both how Cyril utterly denied to yield unto them, or to that condition required by them, and how at length John and ſo many of them as were received to Communion conſented wholly unto him, and ſubſcribed to the Catholick Faith. All this they not onely ſuppreſſed, but to colour the matter, forged alſo a Letter under Cyril's name, whom therein they made to conſent to the condemnation of his own Doctrine; which Letter Ibas in his Epiſtle incloſed and ſent unto Maris the Heretick. All theſe things our Learned Doctour Crackanthorp had detected, evinced and confuted, and hath moreover diſcovered how Baronius hath perverted the narration of this union, and ſtrengthned the calumny of the Neſtorians by his miſreporting of the ſame, and all to ſerve the great deſigns of his Pope Vigilius his infallibility, and to make him appear orthodox and right in the Faith, but to how little purpoſe in due time will be diſcovered.

Which is effected, John complying with Cyril and the true Orthodox.

St. Patrick by Cæleſtine Biſhop of Rome ſent into Ireland to convert the Iriſh.

11. About the time of the celebration of this Epheſine Synod, was Patricius ſent by Cæleſtine Biſhop of Rome into Ireland, to convert that Iſland to the Chriſtian Faith. This Patricius, it's ſaid, was a Britain by Birth, ſome ſay, a Scot, the Son of Calphurnius a Noble Deacon, and of Couche the Siſter of famous St. Martin. At his Baptiſm he was called Suchar, or (as Bale will have it) Succet. Germanus the Gallick Biſhop changed it into Mangonius; and Cæleſtine Biſhop of Rome altered this into Patricius. Being inſtructed by his Uncle St. Martin and St German, he went to Rome, where for his eminent worth he came to be known to the Biſhop, by whom he was ſent with ſome other Aſſiſtants to convert the Nation of the Iriſh. Being a Man of great Zeal, Piety and Induſtry, famous alſo for Miracles, as thoſe who write his Life too laviſhly talk, he brought the whole Iſland to embrace the Chriſtian Faith, and overſaw the Flock which he had converted, ſome ſay, about ſixty years. This is the famous St. Patrick the Apoſtle, and Tutelary Saint of

Bal. Sigebert, Uſſerius de prim. Eccleſ. Britan. & Of the Religion profeſſed by the ancient Iriſh.

of the Iriſh, who had him in ſo great eſteem whilſt yet living, that they compared him with St. Peter himſelf, as appears by what Secundinus, or (as they call him in that Countrey) St. Scachlin, about the year CCCCXLVIII. wrote of him in a certain Hymn: He is conſtant in the fear of God, and unmoveable in the Faith, upon whom the Church is builded, as upon Peter; whoſe Apoſtleſhip alſo he hath obtained from God, and the gates of Hell ſhall not prevail againſt him. Chriſt is there ſaid to have choſen him for his Vicar. And his See of Armagh is by one Calvus Perennis, in the days of Brian King of Ireland, who was ſlain in the year of Our Lord M.XIV. termed the See Apoſtolick; as Deſiderius Biſhop of Cahors in France is by their Countreyman Gallus ſaluted both Papa and Apoſtolicus; and the Biſhop of Kildare in Ireland honoured by Cogitoſus, with the ſtyle of Summus Sacerdos, and Summus Pontifex, the Higheſt Prieſt, and Higheſt Biſhop; theſe Titles and Prerogatives which the Pope now peculiarly challengeth as Enſigns of his Monarchy, being heretofore uſually communicated to other Biſhops, when the univerſal Church was governed in an Ariſtocratical way.

Who compare him with St. Peter.

And ſtyle him Summus Pontifex, &c.

Uſſerius ibid. ex vet. Cod. Eccleſ. Armach. c. 7. Idem ibid.

12. Now a Countreyman of our own would make us believe, that When Ireland firſt received Chriſtendom, they gave themſelves into the Juriſdiction both Spiritual and Temporal of the See of Rome. But in this reſpect is told that he ſpeaks without Book, by as Learned a Perſon in theſe matters as ever that Countrey bred, of the Spiritual Juriſdiction untruly, of the Temporal abſurdly. For from this firſt Legation of Palladius and Patricius (ſome ſay Palladius firſt Preached in Ireland) who were firſt ſent to plant the Faith in this Countrey, it cannot be ſhewed (ſaith he) out of any monument of Antiquity, that the Biſhop of Rome did ever ſend any Legates to exerciſe Spiritual Juriſdiction here (much leſs any of his Deputies to exerciſe Temporal Power) before Gillebertus, Who firſt (they ſay) exerciſed the Legantine Function of the Apoſtolick See, as a Contemporary of his words it, even Bernard himſelf in the Life of Malachias. We reade, moreover (ſaith he) of ſundry Archbiſhops that have been in this Land betwixt the days of St. Patrick and of Malachias, What one of them can be named that ever ſought for a Pall from Rome? Joceline indeed, a late Monk of the Abbey of Furneſs writes of St. Patrick, that the Biſhop of Rome conferred the Pall upon him, together with the exerciſe of Legantine Power. But he is well known to be a moſt fabulous Authour, and for this particular, Bernard who was more Ancient, informeth us far otherwiſe, that from the very Beginning till his time the Metropolitical See of Armagh wanted the uſe of the Pall, with whom the Authours of the Annals of Mailroſs doth fully accord, noting that in the year M.CLI. Pope Eugenius (to whom Bernard wrote his Books de Conſideratione) did by his Legate John Papiron tranſmit four Palls into Ireland; whither a Pall had never been brought. Hereupon Giraldus Cambrenſis, though he acknowledgeth that St. Patrick Did chuſe Armagh for his Seat, and appointed it to be, as it were, a Metropolitical See, and the Proper place of the Primacy of Ireland; yet withall affirms, that indeed there were no Archbiſhops in Ireland, but that Biſhops conſecrated one another till the bringing of four Palls by the ſaid Papiro, or Paparo, the Pope's Legate. And ſome of the Chroniclers after him note concerning Galaſius, then Archbiſhop of Armagh, that He is ſaid to have been the firſt Archbiſhop, becauſe he uſed the firſt Pall, and that others before him were Archbiſhops in Name onely, for reverence of St. Patrick as Apoſtle of that Nation.

Ireland not under the Juriſdiction of the See of Rome.

Campion Hiſt. of Ireland l. 2. c. 2. Uſher. quo ſuprà. c. 8.

Metropoliticæ ſedi deerat adhuc & defuerat ab initio pallii uſus. Bernard. vita Malachiæ

13. The complaint made by Anſelm in his Letters to Muriardach King of Ireland, that Biſhops there were conſecrated by Biſhops alone, might ſeem ſomewhat to juſtify Giraldus his Relation; if we did not find a farther complaint there alſo, that they were often ordained by one Biſhop onely. But as this later argueth not the want of a competent number of Biſhops in the Land (for they had more than a ſufficient number of ſuch) but a neglect of the obſervance of the Nicene Canon, ſo can it not rightly be inferred out of the former that they had no Archbiſhops there at that time, but that rather the Biſhops failed much in the reſpect they ought to their Metropolitan. For that the Iriſh had their Archbiſhops, beſide many other pregnant teſtimonies that might be produced, Pope Hildebrand's own Brief ſufficiently manifeſts, directed to Terdeluachus (or Tirlagh) the Illuſtrious King of Ireland, the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbats, Nobles, and all Chriſtians inhabiting Ireland. And for the Archbiſhops of Armagh, it appears moſt evidently from Bernard in the Life of Malachias, that they were ſo far from being Metropolitans and Primates in Name onely, that they exerciſed much greater Authority before they were put to the charge of fetching Palls from Rome, than ever they did afterward, and that they not onely conſecrated Biſhops, but erected Anſelm. l. 3. Ep. 142.

Greg. 7. Ep. ad Hib. MS. in Biblioth. Cotton alſo new Biſhopricks and Archbiſhopricks too ſometimes, according as they ſaw convenient. Nennius writes, that St. Patrick founded in Ireland three hundred ſixty five Churches, conſecrated three hundred ſixty five Biſhops, and ordained three thouſand Presbyters. In proceſs of time, the number of Biſhops was dayly multiplied, at the pleaſure of the Metropolitan (whereof Bernard complains) and that not onely ſo far that almoſt every Church had a ſeveral Biſhop, but that alſo in ſome Towns or Cities were ordained more than one, nay ſometimes made without any certain place aſſigned to them. As for the erecting of New Archbiſhopricks, if the Legends may be credited, King Eugus and St. Patrick, with all the People did ordain, that in the City and See of Albeus (now Emelye, annexed to Caſhell) ſhould be the Archbiſhoprick of the whole Province of Munſter. In like manner Brandubh King of the Lagenians, with the conſent aſwell of the Laity as of the Clergy, appointed that in the City of Fernes (the See of Moedoy, otherwiſe called Edanus) ſhould be the Archbiſhoprick of all the Province of Leinſter. But Bernard's teſtimony we have no reaſon not to believe, relating what was known to be done in his own time: that Celſus the Archbiſhop of Armagh had of new conſtituted another Metropolitical See, but ſubject to the firſt See, and the Archbiſhop thereof. Whereby we may ſee, ſaith Archbiſhop Vſher, that in the erection of New Archbiſhopricks and Biſhopricks all things were here done at home, without conſulting with the See of Rome in the matter.

Having Archbiſhops and Biſhops ordering all things at home.

Edm. Camp. Hiſt. Hibern. l. 1. c. ult. ad Ann. 948.

14. Our ſaid Countreyman confeſſeth, that To the Monarch was granted a Negative in the nomination of Biſhops at every Vacation: the Clergy and Laity of the Dioceſe recommending him to the King, the King to the Monarch, the Monarch to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; which laſt clauſe is erroneouſly by him extended to the Biſhops of the whole Nation, which properly belonged to the Oſtman Strangers that poſſeſſed the three Cities of Dublin, Waterford and Limrick. But as the Kings and People of this Land (our Authour proceeds) in thoſe Elder times kept the nomination of their Archbiſhops and Biſhops in their own Hands, not depending on the Pope's proviſion that way, ſo do we not find by any approved Record of Antiquity, that any viſitations of the Clergy were held here in the Pope's name, much leſs that any Indulgences were ſought for by our People at his Hands. For as for the Charter of St. Patrick (by ſome intituled, de Antiquitate Avalonica) wherein Phaganus and Dervoianus are ſaid to have purchaſed ten or thirty years of Indulgence from Pope Eleutherius, and St. Patrick himſelf to have procured twelve years in his time, from Celeſtine it might juſtly be demonſtrated were this a fit place, a mere figment deviſed by the Monks of Glaſtenbury. Neither do I well know what credit is to be given to that ſtragling ſentence which I find aſcribed to the ſame Authour: If any Queſtions ariſe in this Iſland, let them be referred to the See Apoſtolick; or to that other Decree attributed to Auxilius, Patricius, Secundinus and Benignus. When any difficult Cauſe, and unknown to all the Judges of the Scotiſh Nation ſhall ariſe, it is rightly to be referred to the See of the Archbiſhop of the Iriſh (viz. to Patrick) and to the examination of the Prelate thereof. But if by him and his Wiſe Men a Cauſe of this nature cannot eaſily be made up: we have decreed, it ſhall be ſent to the See Apoſtolick; that is to ſay, to the Chair of the Apoſtle Peter, which hath the authority of the City of Rome. Onely this I will ſay, that as it is moſt likely that St. Patrick had a ſpecial regard unto the Church of Rome, from whence he was ſent for converſion of this Iſland; ſo if I my ſelf had lived in his days, for the reſolution of a doubtfull Queſtion, I ſhould as willingly have liſtned to the Judgment of the Church of Rome as to the determination of any Church in the whole World, ſo reverend an eſtimation have I of the Integrity of that Church as it ſtood in thoſe good days. But that St. Patrick was of opinion that the Church of Rome was ſure ever afterward to continue in that good eſtate, and that there was a perpetual privilege annexed unto that See, that it ſhould never err in Judgment, or that the Pope's Sentences were always to be held as infallible Oracles; that will I never believe: ſure I am that my Countreymen after him were of another Belief, who were ſo far from ſubmitting themſelves in this ſort to whatſoever ſhould proceed from the See of Rome, that they oftentimes ſtood out againſt it, when they had little cauſe ſo to doe. For proof whereof I need to ſeek no farther than to thoſe very allegations which have been lately urged for maintenance of the ſupremacy of the Pope and Church of Rome in this Countrey. Thus much of St. Patrick.

Without any Viſitations from thence, or Indulgences ſought for by any of the Iriſh from Rome.

Chart. St. Patric. in Gulielm. Malmesb. libello de Antiq. Claſton. Eccleſiæ M. S. Vet. Collect. Canon. Biblioth. Cotton. Vet. Codex. Eccleſ. Armagh.

15. About the time of this Epheſine Synod, died Paulinus the famous Biſhop of Nola. And the year following, April the 6*th*. Cæleſtine the Patriarch of Rome, after he had born that Office eight years, five months, and three days, and was Paulinus Biſhop of Nola dies.

Baron. ad An. CCCCXXXII.

Celeſtine Patriarch of Rome dies.

Who does many good things.

And is ſucceeded by Sixtus.

Platina.

Urſpergenſis.

Lib. 7. c. 11.

buried in the Cemetery of Priſcilla, in the Via Salaria. He ordained, that the Pſalms of David ſhould be ſung by way of Antiphony before the Communion, which formerly had not been done, the Epiſtle of St. Paul and the Goſpel being onely read; as alſo that the Prieſt at the beginning of the adminiſtration of that Sacrament ſhould recite the forty ſecond Pſalm, Judica me Deus, in which Pſalm you muſt know David prays againſt his Enemies that perſecuted him. The Gradual alſo, as it's called, which they ſing in the Maſs, is attributed to him. Some add, that he cauſed alſo to be chanted in the Liturgy or Maſs, Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus. He dedicated the beautifull Church of Julius, and to it gave ſeveral pieces of Plate, the Catalogue of which, if the Reader think it worth his while, he may find in Platina. This Biſhop is very much to be commended for his zeal againſt Pelagianiſm, and Neſtorianiſm, for ſuppreſſing of which he took great pains and care, for ſending Palladius and Patricius to convert the Northern Nations, as alſo for the ſuppreſſing the Novatians at Rome, from whom he took their Churches, and conſtrained Ruſticula their Biſhop to hold private Conventicles. For unto that time (ſaith Socrates) the Novatians flouriſhed at Rome, enjoyed there many Churches, and had under them great Congregations. To this he adds this note: But then they began to be hated out of meaſure, whenas the Biſhop of Rome (no otherwiſe than the Biſhop of Alexandria) paſſing the Bounds of his Prieſtly Order, preſumed now to challenge to himſelf Secular Power and Authority. Beſides his Epiſtles and the Decrees therein contained, Gratian hath four which are hardly worth relating, onely one of them inflicts puniſhment upon the Biſhop or Prieſt that ſhould lye with the Woman whoſe Confeſſion they heard, which Cuſtome, to prevent the like villany, had been formerly abrogated by Nectarius of Conſtantinople. There are extant of his two Epiſtles to the Biſhops of Gall; one to them of Apulia and Calabria, and the fragment of another to the Epheſine Council. To him ſucceeded Xiſtus or Sixtus of that Name, the third Son of Sixtus a Roman, April the twenty ſixth, the See having been vacant twenty days.

Several Jews deceived by an Impoſtour.

A Synod held at Rome.

Polychronius Biſhop of Jeruſalem ſuſpended.

Socrat. lib. 7. c. 37.

Tom. Concil.

Platina Hiſt. Magdeb. Cent. 5. c. 10.

16. About this time many Jews in Crete being deceived by an Impoſtour, who told them he was Moſes, and was come the ſecond time to conduct them through the Sea to the Land of Promiſe, caſt themſelves into the Water. Some periſhed, others were ſaved by Fiſhermen, and the reſt convinced of their credulity by the ſad example of their Fellows, kept themſelves on dry land, and all that remained alive, convinced by ſuch a calamity, renounced Judaiſm, and imbraced the Chriſtian Faith. The year following, a Synod of fifty ſix Biſhops was held in Rome; the occaſion was, Sixtus the Biſhop his being accuſed by Baſſus and Marinianus of having defiled Chryſogenites a Nun: but he was abſolved in the preſence of Valentinian the Emperour, and Placidia his Mother. The cauſe of his abſolution ſome make the ſpeech of an Exconſul, who ſaid, that Sentence ought not to be paſſed againſt the Biſhop of Rome; which words Sixtus catching at, ſaid, It was indeed in his Power whether or no he would be Judged, yet would he not but that the truth ſhould be brought to light. By this ſeeming Piety and Humility the Emperour was ſo moved, that he referred the buſineſs wholly to Sixtus, who now become both Judge and Party, condemned both his Accuſers, neither upon their repentance to receive them to favour, when one of them pleaded that Chriſt teacheth us thus to pray, Forgive us our treſpaſſes as we forgive them that treſpaſs againſt us; he replying, that it was alſo written that the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt ſhould neither be forgiven in this World, nor that which is to come. Baſſus, as Principal in the ſlander was Baniſhed, and his eſtate ſeized to the uſe of the Church, three months after which he died, and then the Biſhop, as it ſeems, relenting, cauſed him to be Imbalmed, and (as Platina tells us) with his own hands Buried him near to St. Peter in the Sepulchre of his Anceſtours. At this ſame time Sixtus accuſed Polychronius the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, as having for a Reward in Money ordained ſeveral Biſhops and Miniſters, and cauſed him for ſome time to be ſuſpended from his Function, being condemned by this Roman Synod. It's reported he was angry with him for having once ſaid that it was more fitting the City of Jeruſalem ſhould obtain the preeminence than Rome, being the place where Chriſt taught and ſuffered, and where the Holy Ghoſt was ſent down firſt upon the Diſciples. But in a time when Jeruſalem was Beſieged, this Biſhop ſelling his Lands, and diſtributing the price amongſt the Poor, Sixtus procured the Emperour to reſtore him to his Biſhoprick.

Maximianus Biſhop of Conſtantinople dies.

Socrat. lib. 7. cap. 39.

17. The year following being the Four Hundred Thirty Fourth of Our Lord, the twenty ſeventh of Theodoſius II. and the tenth of Valentinian III. Maximianus the Patriarch of Conſtantinople deceaſed, after he had peaceably governed the Church the ſpace of two years and five months, in the Conſulſhip of Arebindus and Aſpares on Good-Friday, being the twelfth of April. At that time (they are the words of Socrates) Theodoſius the Emperour plaid a very wiſe part. For leſt tumult and diſſenſion ſhould again be raiſed in the Church, without any delay, whilſt the Corpſe of Maximianus was above ground, he procured the Biſhops then preſent to enſtall Proclus in the Biſhop's See. To this end the Letters of Cœleſtinus Biſhop of Rome were brought unto Cyril Biſhop of Alexandria, unto John Biſhop of Antioch, and Ruffus Biſhop of Theſſalonica, certifying them that there was no cauſe to the contrary: but that one either already nominated Biſhop of ſome certain City, or inſtalled in ſome proper See, might be tranſlated to another Biſhoprick. Theſe be the words of Socrates, who ſpends a whole Chapter upon occaſion of the repulſe formerly given to Proclus, on purpoſe to prove that it was neither againſt the Canons, nor example of ancient times, for a Biſhop to be tranſlated from one See to another, and reciting the pretended Canon, plainly ſhews it meant no ſuch thing as to inhibit ſuch a removal. Let the Reader then conſider how truly Baronius affirms that Socrates ſaith this Tranſlation of Proclus was made by diſpenſation of the Biſhop of Rome, becauſe the Canons forbad ſuch Tranſlations, and concludes from Sixtus his interpoſing his Judgment and Advice to a Right and Juriſdiction. This ſame year Vincentius a Gall by birth, who having paſt over the prime of his Youth in Secular warfare and buſineſs relating to the World, afterwards had betaken himſelf to a Monaſtical kind of life in Leria, an Iſland of the Icarian Sea, whence he had the Sirname of Lerinenſis, wrote a notable Commentary againſt all Hereticks, for the antiquity and univerſality of the Catholick Faith, which Baronius ſaith was very accommodate to theſe times whereof we write, and will be profitable againſt Innovatours in all Ages. This we moſt readily muſt admit, out of reſpect to his great κριτήριον of Catholick Doctrine, that famous ſaying of his, that We ought to hold faſt that which by all, always and in all places hath been believed, this being truly and properly Catholick, as the force of the word and reaſon it ſelf doth declare, all which it truly and univerſally comprehendeth. Obſervable alſo is his Opinion, that The Canon of the Scriptures is over and above ſufficient in all reſpects. By theſe Rules let all Innovatours be Tried, Abſolved or Condemned.

Proclus is tranſlated thither.

Cap. 35.

Vincentius Lerinenſis in Præf. Anno 30. ab Epheſina Synodo.

In ipſa Catholica Eccleſiâ magnopere curandum eſt, ut id teneamus quod Ubique, quod Semper, quod ab Omnibus, creditum: hoc eſt enim verè proprièque Catholicum, quod ipſa vis nominis, ratióque declarat, quæ omnia verè univerſaliter comprehendit. cap. 3. * Scripturarum Canon. ſolus ſufficit ad omnia ſatis ſuperque. c. 41.

The Books of Neſtorius burnt.

Cod. Th. de Hæret. l. ult. & Acta Conc. Epheſ.

18. The next year, or the Four Hundred Thirty Fifth of Our Lord, were the Books of Neſtorius, which he had written in exile, condemned to be burnt by an Edict of Theodoſius. And when he himſelf was ſo far from amendment, that by his tenacious principles he infuſed venome, and raiſed commotions whereever he came; the year following he was removed from the Monaſtery of Euprepius, two Furlongs diſtant from Antioch, to Petræ, a place in the Wilderneſs of Oaſis. Being afterward (as Euagrius tells us) ſet at liberty by the People called Blemmyes in Libya, and Theodoſius having by his Edicts ordained he ſhould return, as he wandred from place to place about the fartheſt Part of Thebais, bruiſing and beating himſelf to the ground, he had ſuch an end as was agreeable to the life he had formerly led, and thereby ſhewed himſelf a ſecond Arius. For, as this Authour relates, (after a recitation of his complaining Letters to the Governour of Thebais) from his Amanuenſis, when he could not be brought to any reaſon or humility by all his miſeries, but rather ſpurned againſt the Authority of the Emperour and his Magiſtrates, his Tongue was eaten off by Worms, and ſo by the juſt Judgment of God he paſſed, ſaith he, from bodily to ſpiritual, from thoſe temporal to eternal puniſhments. The enſuing year was a great Perſecution raiſed againſt Orthodox Chriſtians in Afriek by Genſerick the Arian King of the Wandals, wherein Arcadius, Probus, Paſcheſius and Eutychus, Noble Spaniards, received the Crown of Martyrdom. The next after this being the Four Hundred Thirty Eighth of Our Lord, and the ſixteenth Conſulſhip of Theodoſius, January the twenty eighth, the Corpſe of St. John Chryſoſtome was tranſlated from Comanum to Conſtantinople five and thirty years after his depoſition. The occaſion, as Socrates tells the ſtory, was a great deſire that Proclus the Patriarch had to reconcile to the Church ſuch as upon the ſcandal of his ſufferings had ſeparated themſelves, whom to oblige he perſwaded the Emperour to tranſlate his Body, and with great Pomp and Reverence to place it in the Apoſtles Church; by which means thoſe that

Lib. 1. c. 7.

His miſerable death.

A Perſecution in Africk.

Proſper. in Chron.

The Corpſe of Chryſoſtome tranſlated to Conſtantinople.

formerly had ſeparated themſelves were reduced to order, and became conformable. Thus is the naked ſtory told by him, to whom do aſſent * Theodoret, † Marcellinus the great ‖ Menology, their * Roman Martyrology, and others.

* Lib. 5. c. 36.
† In Chron.
‖ Die 27. Jan.
* Die 27. Jan.

19. But his Body being (a) tranſlated from Conſtantinople to Rome, to make his Reliques of more value, they have made the manner of his Tranſlation very miraculous. Nicephorus relates the Summ of it, borrowing it, as Baronius (b) doth not obſcurely hint, from the Luculent Oration of one Coſmas Veſtiarius, Whether a Vatican or Baronian Authour, ſo ignoble and unworthy, that Poſſevine judged him not worthy to be named in his Bibliotheca, or reckoned amongſt his Teſtes Veritatis. Yet out of this Tailor's Oration (ſaith our Great Crackanthorp) hath the Cardinal ſticht a very pretty Anile, whereof the Summ is this: Proclus making a Panegyrical Oration in praiſe of Chryſoſtome, the People were ſo inflamed with a longing deſire after him, that they interrupted the Biſhop, and not ſuffering him to make an end of his Sermon, cried out with many Vociferations, that they would have Chryſoſtome and his Reliques. Proclus herewith ſore moved, prevailed with the Emperour to ſend divers Senatours, nay ſome ſay an Army with Clerks and Monks to fetch his Body from Comana, where it was kept in a ſilver Coffin. Once and again, nay very often they labour and ſtrive with their whole might and skill to lift up the Coffin, but all in vain, the ſacred Body being no more moveable than a Rock. Of this therefore they certifie the Emperour, who calling Proclus and other holy Men ſeriouſly to adviſe about the matter, they counſel him to write a Letter to Chryſoſtome, in way of a Petition, asking him forgiveneſs for the Sins which Arcadius his Father had committed againſt him, and moſt humbly to beſeech him that he would return to Conſtantinople, and re-aſſume his See, praying him withall no longer to afflict them by his abſence, being not onely deſirous of his Body, but of his Aſhes, yea of his ſhadow. This the Emperour religiouſly performed, writing a Letter or Petition expreſſed both by Nicephorus and Baronius, though both the Cardinal and the Tailour Coſmas be unwilling to give to Chryſoſtome the Title of Patriarch and Pater Patrum, which Nicephorus as his due aſcribes unto him. The Emperour's Letters were brought to the dead Corpſe, and with great Reverence laid upon the Breaſt of Chryſoſtome, which done the next day with eaſe the Prieſts took up the Body, and bringing it to Conſtantinople, placed it in the Church of the Holy Apoſtles.

(a) Martyrolog. Rom. Inde poſtea Romam tranſlata eſt.
(b) Ad An. 438. & in Annot. ad Martyrol. Rom.

The miraculous manner of its Tranſlation.

20. Here firſt, as the Cardinal relateth from Nicephorus, the Emperour with the People made an humble Prayer for his Parents, and more eſpecially intreated for his Mother, that her Grave which had ſhaken and been ſick of a Palſie, and made a noiſe and ratling for thirty five years, might now at length ceaſe; and the Holy man heard the requeſt and granted it; the Graves Palſie was cured, ſo that it ſhaked no more. After this did Proclus place dead Chryſoſtome in the ſame See and Epiſcopal Seat with himſelf, all the People applauding and crying, O Father Chryſoſtome receive thy See; then by a Miracle beyond the Degree of Admiration, the Lips of Chryſoſtome (five and thirty years after he was laid in his Grave) opened and bleſſed all the People, ſaying Peace be unto you; and thus both the Patriarch Proclus, and the People ſtanding by teſtified that they heard. Such is the Relation of Baronius from Nicephorus and Coſmas his Tailour, a ſtory which puts down Heliodorus, Orlando, and all the Fictions of the Poets. Not to ſtand to refute ſuch a lying legend, the Cardinal's Friends may conſult Tilmannus their Carthuſian Monk, and ſee the Cenſure he gives of it, and of Nicephorus the onely Authour he knew, till Baronius pull'd this blind Tailour out of a Corner. Though I believe, ſaith he, God to be omnipotent, yet I believe not all which is here written of Chryſoſtome. Let the Reader chuſe whether he will believe it or not, for the Writers of Mens Lives who lived before Nicephorus (and he writ not till about the year 1328) would not have concealed or ſmothered in ſilence a matter of ſo great moment. This his Judgment is the more weighty becauſe there is no Ancient Father (I ſpeak it confidently ſaith our Dr. Crackanthorp) that hath had more fabulous Writers than are Palladius (as he is called) Leo and George the Writers, or rather Deviſers of Chryſoſtom's Acts, his Life and Death. Any one of them doting after ſuch miraculous Reports, would have painted out this Miracle of Miracles with all the wit and words they had. That which I onely obſerve is, the ſtrange, and if you pleaſe, miraculous lewd dealing of Baronius. This Epiſtle of Theodoſius, though it was written to Chryſoſtome more than thirty years after his Death, the Cardinal approves, applauds, and for a rare Monument commends it, and all that appendant Ipſe Chryſoſtomus labiis rurſum apertis ad Populum dixiſſe fertur Pax vobis, Coſmas apud Bar. ubi ſuprà.

Parænеſis Carthuſiani poſt vitam Chryſoſtomi.

dant fable to all Poſterity. Why? It is an excellent ſtory, indeed to perſwade the Adoration of Reliques, Innovation of Saints, Prayers for the Dead and ſuch like. Had the Epiſtle of Theodoret (hereafter to be mentioned) contained ſuch ſtuff, it ſhould have had every way the like applauſe from his Cardinalſhip, becauſe it wants ſuch matters, and croſſeth in very many things the Cardinal's Annals; oh! it is nothing but a Fiction, and a very forgery of ſome naughty Varlet. Thus Dr. Crackanthorp, upon occaſion of Tranſlation of St. Chryſoſtome's Bones.

On the fifth Council.

21. We have not for many years heard any thing of the Pagans, and their Superſtition, which it might be expected before this time ſhould have dwindled into nothing, Chriſtianity having ſo long been the owned and legal Religion. But notwithſtanding all former Laws, and the Example aſwell as incouragement of the Emperours, yet did Satan find ſome holes wherein to creep, and upon occaſion ſhew himſelf more publickly, as the Comportment of Affairs would permit. At this time when the diſtreſſes of the Weſtern Empire muſt neceſſarily afford greater Liberty to Souldiers, we find that Cyrus the Commander of the Roman Army, now when Carthage was beſieged, was of that ſuperſtitious perſwaſion, being afterward honoured with the Prefectſhip of the Prætorium and the Conſulſhip. Littorius alſo who commanded the Hunns, was addicted to the predictions of the Aruſpices, and more than this the Pagans were ſo bold, as publickly to offer Sacrifice. As this practice grieved the Fathers of the Church, and drew forth ſeveral Pieces declaming againſt ſuch impious practices from Cyril, Salvian, Chryſologus and others, ſo Theodoſius in the year 439 on the laſt Day of January, publiſhed an Edict againſt Pagans, Samaritans, Jews and Hereticks, which ſubjects them to divers pains and forfeitures. And not onely did Paganiſm recover in ſome meaſure its dying ſtrength at this time, but the Arian Hereſie again became rampant in Africk, where a very great Perſecution was raiſed againſt the Orthodox Chriſtians, after the taking of Carthage by the Wandals, who were infected with that Venome. Quod vult Deus, the Biſhop of that City preſently after it was taken, and a great Company of his Clerks were put into leaking Ships and committed to the Mercy of the Sea, which yet by God's mercy tranſmitted them to Naples in Campania. The ordinary Rule was, either to quit the Countrey or remain in perpetual ſlavery; yet this good came of ſo great an evil, that Paganiſm which had endured the ſhocks of ſo many Edicts was quite caſt down, and pulled up by the roots at Carthage, where they utterly defaced the Temple of Memory, and the Via Cæleſtis.

An Edict againſt Pagans, &c.

Theod. Nov. Tit. 3.

Victor de perſec. Vandal.

The Temple of Memory, and the Via Cæleſtis at Carthage demoliſhed.

22. About this time died Folinus Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, into whoſe room the Citizens deſiring Proclus the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, that another might be elected, when he muſed with himſelf, whom he ſhould aſſign them for their Biſhop, and on Saturday was in the Church for that purpoſe, all the Senatours came thither to ſee whom he would elect, and amongſt the reſt Thalaſſius the Præfectus Præterio of Illyricum, on whom he pitched, and ordained him Biſhop of that See, whereat though the Emperour at firſt fretted, yet afterward as Nicephorus writes, he confirmed the Election. Here Socrates tells us he will cut off and make an end of his Hiſtory, conſiſting of ſeven Books, of which the laſt contains the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of two and thirty years, the whole work compriſing thoſe of an hundred and forty, beginning at the firſt year of the 271. Olympiad, when Conſtantine was proclaimed Emperour, and ending the ſecond of the three hundred and fifth (more rightly the third of the three hundreth and fourth) and the 17 Conſulſhip of Theodoſius Auguſtus. In his Collections he was not Indiligent, though Euagrius accuſeth him of Oſcitancy, very partial toward the Novatians, a Greek by Birth, and born at Conſtantinople. To this ſame year alſo being the 439 year of our Lord, Hermias Sozomenus of Salamina continued his Hiſtory, as himſelf affirmeth in his Preface, which plainly ſhews much of the latter end of that work to be loſt. Gregory the Great Biſhop of Rome tells us, that his See received not his Hiſtory, becauſe in many things he lies, and he too much commends Theodorus the Biſhop of Mopſueſtia. Melchior Canus tells him his Memory failed him, for they are Theodoret's words which he cites for Sozomen's, and Baronius anſwers in his behalf, that though in ſuch matters as Gregory excepts againſt, he be not to be received, yet neither to be rejected in other matters, the Cardinal being the rather of this opinion, becauſe Pope Gelaſius receiveth him, and accounts him more worthy of credit than Euſebius, as Photius values him above Socrates. To this may be added from Canus, that his Teſtimony was both cited and approved Folinus Biſhop of Cæſarea dies.

Thalaſſius ſucceeds him.

L. 14. c. 4. 2

Lib. 6. Ep. 31.

proved in the Florentine Council at which Palæologus was preſent. To theſe times alſo Theodoret (of whom we ſhall have too much occaſion to ſpeak more hereafter) continued his Hiſtory conſiſting of five Books, the Style of which is more Hiſtorical than either that of Socrates, Sozomen or Euagrius in the opinion both of Photius and Voſſius. Theſe Greek Authours were firſt Tranſlated into Latin by Epiphanius an eloquent Man, and the friend of Caſſiodorus, who having procured this to be done, of them three he compoſed the Tripartite Hiſtory, leſt eloquent Greece, as he ſaith, ſhould inſult above thoſe of the Weſt, injoying thoſe neceſſaries which they wanted.

Divin. Lect. c.5 & 17. quos à viro Epiphanio diſertiſſimo in uno corpore 12 Libris fecimus Deo auxiliante transferri: ne inſultet habere ſe facunda Græcia neceſſarium quod vobis indicet eſſe ſubtractum. pag. 901. Edit. Genevæ. 1622.

A Synod held at Rhegium in the Province of Narbone.

23. This ſame year or that following was a Provincial Synod of thirteen Biſhops held at Rhegium in the Province of Narbone. Of which are 7 obſcure Canons extant. The fifth of them ordains that upon the death of a Biſhop, the Neighbour Biſhop at the time of the Funeral ſhall come and take care of the Church, till the place be legally fitted. The laſt commands that Biſhops, all excuſe ſet apart, fail not to meet twice in the year. The enſuing year being the 440 of our Lord, on the 28*th.* of March died Sixtus the Roman Biſhop, when he had governed that Church eight years wanting 30 days. He built a ſtately Church to the honour of the Bleſſed Virgin called Maria Major, as appeared to Platina by an Inſcription upon an Arch. How he furniſhed it at his great Coſt, the Reader if he pleaſe may find in that Writer, as that he ſpent all he had either this way, or in his Liberality to the Poor, making his own Eyes his Executours, and having ordained 28 Prieſts, 12 Deacons and 52 Biſhops was buried in a Vault in the via Tiburtina, by the Body of St. Laurence. This being vacant more than forty days, at length, on the 10*th.* of May was Leo a Deacon of the Roman Church, choſen for Biſhop and Paſtour of it. He was a Tuſcan born and the Son of Quintianus. Having very good natural parts he adorned them in his Youth by good Literature: uſing himſelf to declaiming, by that conſtant exerciſe he became very eloquent, being alſo ſtudied in Divinity above moſt of his time. Under Sixtus who made good uſe of his Abilities in his defence againſt Baſſus, he was ſent upon ſeveral meſſages of importance, and was now abſent having been diſpatched into Gall, to compoſe the difference betwixt Aetius and Albinus two eminent Roman Captains. The year following had for Conſul alone Cyras the Pagan of whom we lately ſpake, who at length being diſgraced by Theodoſius the Emperour turned Chriſtian, took Orders, and as Nicephorus tells us was made Biſhop of Smyrna. He was an excellent Poet, and pleaſed thereby Eudocia the Empreſs to ſuch a degree (for this Lady was a great Friend and Servant of the Muſes) that thinking him worthy of the greateſt countenance. She brought him in, and gave occaſion to his Advancement to ſo great Honours.

Tom. 2. Conc.

Proſper.

Sixtus Biſhop of Rome dies.

Leo Succeeds him.

Another Synod held at Orange.

24. This ſame year which was the 441 of our Lord, was another Provincial Synod held at Orange, or Aranſio in Gall, in the Province of Narbone, called Concilium Aranſicanum, whereof are extant 29 Canons of no great importance, beſides a form of Excommunication, and another of Abſolution, aſcribed by Gratian to this Synod. The form of Excommunication is this: (a) Following the Canonical Inſtitutions and Examples of the Holy Fathers, by the Authority of God and Judgment of the Holy Ghoſt, we baniſh from the Boſome of our Holy Mother, the Church, and the ſociety of all Chriſtians the violaters or Robbers of God's Churches. Till they repent and give ſatisfaction to the Church of God. Here the Gloſs moves the Queſtion whether all Sacrilegious Perſons be excommunicate ipſo Jure, and reſolves it in the affirmative onely as to thoſe violatours. As for the manner of Reconciliation. (b) When any Excommunicated or Anathematized Perſon asketh pardon and promiſeth amendment: the Biſhop that Excommunicated him ought to come to the Church Door, and twelve Prieſts to ſtand about him, as alſo thoſe againſt whom the offence was committed, and now are to be repaired, who if they have been already ſatisfied and thereof to give Teſtimonial; Then let the Biſhop demand of him if he be willing to undergoe ſuch penance as the Canons do enjoyn to his offences. And if he being proſtrate on the ground do ask pardon, confeſs

(a) Canonica inſtituta & Sanctorum Patrum exempla ſequentes, Eccleſiarum Dei violatores auctoritate Dei & ſtudio ſancti Spiritus à gremio ſanctæ matris Eccleſiæ & à conſortio totius Chriſtianitatis eliminamus quoad uſq; reſipiſcant & Eccleſiæ Dei ſatisfaciant. Can. 11. Qu. III. c. CVII.

(b) Cùm aliquis Excommunicatus, &c. c. CVIII.

feſs his fault, deſire penance and give caution for the future, then let the Biſhop lead him by the right hand into the Church, and reſtore him to Chriſtian Communion and Society, then ſing the ſeven Penitential Pſalms with theſe Prayers, Kyrie Eleiſon, Pater noſter, ſalvum fac ſervum tuum : then this Prayer grant Lord we beſeech thee to this thy Servant fruit worthy of Repentance, that obtaining Remiſſion of ſins he may be reſtored guiltleſs to thy Church from the integrity of which by ſinning he had deviated. Through, &c. Upon this the Gloſs notes that an Heretick is alſo to give Oath that he will no more tranſgreſs, as alſo all guilty of ſo grievous Crimes. And foraſmuch as at this day by virtue of later Laws, Excommunication may be pronounced in one ſimple word, ſo alſo Abſolution, it being a Rule that every thing may be diſſolved or ended by the ſame cauſes by which it was made or received its being. After this in the collection of Councils follows how the Biſhop is to make publick his Reconciliation.

Extran. de Reg. Juris Omnis res.

Another at Vaiſon.

25. The next year, or the 442 of our Lord, was another Provincial Synod of the Province of Narbone held at Vaſio a Town of the Vocontii Salyones, at this day Vaiſon, the Canons whereof, as Baronius obſerves, being altogether uncertain are confounded with thoſe of another Council held at this place in the days of Conſtantius, a Third in the Reign of Decius Junior in the year 463. About this time (ſome two years after) died Cyril the Patriarch of Alexandria, having governed that See 32 years leaving a good name behind him to all poſterity. For his manifold Learning as well Divine, as Humane, his painfulneſs in Preaching and Writing againſt all Hereticks and Pagans, and his great zeal in governing his flock. After his death Theodoret the Biſhop of Cyrus is ſaid to have written an Epiſtle to John Biſhop of Antioch wherein he exceedingly rejoyceth for the death of Cyril, and prates in ſuch a manner that it may more truly be called a Satyr or an infamous Libel than a Letter. This Epiſtle is inſerted near the laſt end of the fifth Collation of the fifth Synod ; yet Binius eſteems it no better than the forgery of ſome wicked and obſcure Heretical Eutychian, and by fraud and ſurreption thruſt into the Acts of that Council. Baronius more than once paſſeth upon it the ſame cenſure, avowing it to be the figment of ſome Neſtorian Heretick and giving him the Lye that ſhould ſay it was Theodoret's. The reaſon is, for that John the Patriarch of Antioch to whom this Epiſtle is directed, was dead ſeveral years before Cyril, Baronius demanding how Theodoret could write to John about the death of Cyril ſeeing John was dead ſeven years before him, which, ſaith the Cardinal, is ſure and certain both by Nicephorus and others, who write the ſucceſſion of Biſhops, as alſo by an Epiſtle which Cyril writ to Domnus the Succeſſour of John, both which proofs Binius alſo alledgeth. With both theſe Champions, our as Learned Dr. Crackanthorp grapleth, and with what ſucceſs (for nothing can be added to the ſtrength of his Arguments) the impartial Reader ſhall be Judge.

Cyril Patriarch of Alexandria dyes.

Liberatus. Nicephorus.

Theodoret's Epiſtle to John of Antioch urged by Binius and Baronius as a Figment.

Bin. in 5 Concil.

Which is anſwered by Dr. Crackanthorp.

26. His firſt anſwer is that if this be a Demonſtration of forgery becauſe an Epiſtle is written to one that is dead, the Papiſts themſelves and not we ſhall be the greateſt loſers thereby. For, firſt there is a Decretal Epiſtle written by Clement Biſhop of Rome, to James Biſhop of Jeruſalem, the Brother of our Lord, wherein he tells him that “ Peter being ready to be Martyred took Clement, ordain- “ ed him Biſhop, gave him the Keys, and ſeating him in his own Chair ſaid unto “ him, O Clemens, I beſeech thee before all that are here preſent that thou write “ unto James the Brother of our Lord, how thou haſt been my Companion in “ my Travels and Actions from the firſt beginning, write alſo what thou haſt “ heard me Preach in every City, what order I have uſed in my Preaching, “ and how I end my life in this City. And fear not that he will be ſorry for “ my death, for he will not at all doubt but I die for Pieties ſake, nay it will “ be a great comfort to him to hear that I leave not my charge to one that “ is ignorant or unlearned. This and much more wrote Clement to James, after his death, and of the life and death of Peter. Now James to whom he wrote was dead, ſix or ſeven years before Peter, James being ſlain in the ſeventh, and Peter in the thirteenth year of Nero, as out of St. Jerome, Euſebius, Joſephus and others is evident, and Baronius and Binius not onely profeſs but rightly prove ; nay more, becauſe this Decretal Epiſtle and Apoſtolical writing, as Turrian calls it was not ſent from Pope Clement till the tenth year of Domitian as is proved by Baronius, it followeth that it was not writ to James till thirty years after his death. Yet notwithſtanding muſt not this Epiſtle be rejected as a forgery. Binius calls it the Epiſtle of Pope Clement, Baronius affirms that it is not onely Pope Clement's, but that this and the other written to the ſame James the dead Biſhop of Jeruſalem are his intire and incorrupted writings. In their Canon its vouched for no

Epiſt. 1. Clem. tom. 1. conc. p. 25. &c.

Ad A. D. 93. num. 2.

Ep. 1. Clem. Pap.

leſs, and that what is there related muſt ſtand for the words and Doctrine of St. Peter, yea the Authority of it as of other Decretal Epiſtles is affirmed every way equal to the Canons of Nice, of Chalcedon, and other holy Councils; nay farther what St. Auſtin ſaith of the very ſacred and Canonical Scriptures indited certainly by the Spirit of God himſelf, that doth Gratian (wretchedly abuſing his words) apply to this and the reſt of the Popes Decretal Epiſtles ſaying that They are to be reckoned amongſt the Canonical Scriptures, which Bellarmine not onely defends in general, but by the Authority of Ruffinus defends this to be the true Epiſtle of Clement to St. James. More particularly the Jeſuite Turrian to whom Baronius, Binius, Gretzor and others refer us for the credit of theſe Epiſtles, has writ a whole Book in defence of them all, wherein he calls them moſt holy, moſt true Epiſtles, moſt worthy of their Authours (in particular mentioning and defending this of Clement to James) that is Men Apoſtolick, conſecrated by the Reverence of the whole World, full of all Gravity, Learning and Sanctity, confirmed by the Teſtimony and uſe of all Ages: and which is moſt pertinent to our preſent purpoſe, the Jeſuite words it thus: What if in theſe Epiſtles ſometimes we meet with ſuch matters as are not eaſie to all? muſt we therefore doubt of their Authority? by no means.

Diſt. 80. c. 2. & 6. qu. 1. c. 5.

11. Qu. 3. c. 12. 6. qu. 1. c. 5. Diſt. 20. Can. Decretales

Lib. 2. de Doctr. Chriſtiana c. 8.

Pro epiſt. Pontificum. lib. 2. præf. p. 152. &c.

27. If any Man therefore underſtand not how the Epiſtle of Clement could be written to St. James who was dead ſo long before, ſuch an one according to his Doctrine, if a learned, modeſt and temperate Man muſt ask of others, and in the mean time contain himſelf within his own bounds, that is, he muſt as the Jeſuit explaineth it, ſo firmly believe it to be written by Clement that he eſteems it a great ſin to doubt thereof. But beſides this Turrian hath writ a large Chapter on purpoſe to defend this Epiſtle to be truly Clement's though written to James long after his death, whereas ſome there were (followed by Baronius, Poſſenine and Binius) who thought it to be written indeed by Clement not unto James but to Simeon his Succeſſour. Againſt thoſe, he held that it was writ to none but James, and whereas ſome would think it madneſs to write to one that was dead (for who ſhould be carrier of the Letter) eſpecially to write to him as a Governour in the Church militant and to adviſe him what he ſhould doe. Turrian tells you of divers great and weighty reaſons why St. Peter commanded Clement, and why Clement wrote to a dead Man, and having given very wiſe and worthy reaſons thereof, one taken from Transfiguration, another from imitation, a third from voiding hatred; which he would have incurred had he writ to any alive, a fourth to be a Teſtimony of the Reſurrection; and ſuch like; at length he concludes that no Catholicks muſt doubt of the truth of this Epiſtle though they ſee no reaſon why it ſhould be written to a dead Man; and withall that with Men who have reaſon and Judgment, ſuch muſt aſſure themſelves both that St. Peter and Clement knew reaſons for writing to a dead Man. Both the Cardinal therefore and Binius, had they been Men of reaſon and Judgment, and conſidered this tract of Turrian to which they refer us, might therein have ſeen divers reaſons why Theodoret might write to John though he was dead, they being as forcible to defend this Epiſtle of Theodoret as to excuſe Clement for writing to St. James. But the cauſe is now altered, the Cardinals Demonſtration holding in thoſe things alone which diſtaſte him, or make for us and againſt their cauſe. But if any ſuch writing bring, as all the Decretals do, either honour to the Roman See, or gain to that Court, though they were writ to one that was dead, not ſeven onely but ſeven times ſeven years before, they ſhall be honoured as the true and undoubted threatnings of the Authours. If any one ſcruple to yield his aſſent to this truth let him but add to this the other Example about Chryſoſtome's bones, the writing of a Letter to that Patriarch thirty five years after his death by the Emperour Theodoſius, and he will find it ſuch an one as cuts all the Sinews, yea the hartſtrings of the Cardinals Demonſtration. He muſt confeſs it either to be fallacious or proclaim the Epiſtle of Pope Clement and the other of Theodoſius with that whole narration to be fictitious, and the Cardinals Annals a Fabulous Legend.

28. The Doctours ſecond anſwer is that though John was dead to whom the Epiſtle was directed, yet that onely proves the Title or inſcription to be amiſs, or that Theodoret wrote not this Epiſtle to John; it cannot prove (which the Cardinal undertook to doe) that the Epiſtle is forged and not written by Theodoret. For that it was truly Theodoret's own Sermon publickly preached at Antioch before Domnus after the death of Cyril, and mentioned in the Synodal Acts next after this Epiſtle, doth clearly manifeſt the very ſcope and purpoſe of that Sermon being the ſame which is expreſſed in the Epiſtle. As in the

Col. 5. p. 559.

Epiſtle Theodoret declareth his eagerneſs for defending the Doctrine of Neſtorius, and inſulteth over dead Cyril as the chief Oppugner of that Hereſie, the very ſame eagerneſs for Neſtorianiſm, and love to his Hereſies, as alſo the like joy for Cyril's death, doth his Sermon expreſs, and that more fully with ſuch Expreſſions as theſe: None doth now compell any man to blaſpheme, ſeeing Cyril is dead, Where are thoſe who teach that God was Crucified. It was the man Chriſt and not God who was crucified. It was the man Jeſus that died, and it was God the Word who raiſed him from the dead. Now there is no contention (ſeeing Cyril is dead) the Eaſt and Ægypt (that is, aſwell thoſe who are under the Patriarch of Alexandria, as ſuch as are ſubject to the Patriarch of Antioch) are all under one Yoke, or all ſubmit themſelves to one Faith, viz. Neſtorianiſm. Envy is now dead and all Contention dead and buried with him. Let now the Theopaſchites (that is the Catholicks who taught God to have ſuffered and died) let them now be quiet. Now who can imagine but that the Epiſtle which maintains the ſame Hereſie, and inſults in the ſame triumphing manner at the death of Cyril was written by Theodoret when he publickly in a Sermon before a Patriarch uttered the ſame Matter? Would he forbear to write that in a Letter which he neither did fear nor forbear to profeſs openly in a Sermon, and that in ſo ſolemn a place and Aſſembly? Or was Theodoret Orthodox, and a lover of Cyril in his Writings before his death (as Baronius alledgeth) who was Heretical and ſo big with Neſtorianiſm after his death, that he muſt vent them, and with them diſgorge his malice and ſpite in an open Pulpit, and ſuch an Audience? It is not the Inſcription or Title of the Epiſtle, but the Epiſtle it ſelf, which the Fifth Council and we after it ſtand upon. But that they knew the Epiſtle to be Theodoret's, they needed not by it to have proved that he after the Union, yea, after the death of Cyril, was eager, violent, yea, virulent in defence of the Hereſies of Neſtorius, his Sermon had been a ſufficient demonſtration of that: But becauſe they were ſure this was the true Epiſtle of Theodoret, they thought good to teſtifie that he was the ſelf ſame man in writing that he was in preaching, and in both a malitious Neſtorian; that long after the Union made betwixt John and Cyril, yea after Cyril's death he continued both to write and ſpeak the ſame.

29. Next the Doctour obſerveth the fraudulent dealing of Baronius and Binius in this Cauſe, who though they carp not at the Sermon, yet deny the Epiſtle, whereas though the Epiſtle had never been extant, yet the Cardinal's Poſition for Theodoret's Orthodoxy and Catholick Faith ever after the Union betwixt John and Cyril is clearly and certainly refuted by his Sermon made twelve years after the Union. Then whereas the Cardinal ſtrongly urgeth the Epiſtles, which in their Vaticane or Minthouſe, are ſtamped with the Name of Theodoret, to prove his Orthodoxy for ſix and twenty years, this Sermon alone convicts them of falſehood, wherein he Vomits out in a moſt Solemn Aſſembly, together with the Blaſphemies of Neſtorius, moſt ſlanderous Revilings, not onely againſt Cyril, at whoſe death he inſulteth, but againſt all Catholicks, whom after the Neſtorian Language he ſtiles Theopaſchites and Hereticks: With ſuch falſe, feigned and lying Writings doth the Cardinal fight againſt the Fifth Synod and the Acts thereof. After this to meet with the Objection which Baronius might make againſt the Epiſtle from the falſeneſs of its Superſcription, by many Inſtances our Authour proveth an Epiſtle may be true, when yet the Title is falſe and erroneous. As 1ſt. in the Epiſtle of Clement to James, the Inſcription whereof, though both he and Binius confeſs to be falſe, yet held the Letter it ſelf to be Clement's. Excuſing it they ſay it was onely an errour in writing James inſtead of Simeon, and had they not been too malitious againſt the Fifth Synod, they would as eaſily have ſaid the Epiſtle is truly his but in the Inſcription, in the Acts, the Name of John is by the Writers miſtaken for that of Domnus. 2. In Theodoret's Hiſtory and the Venice Edition of the Councils by Nicholinus Pope Damaſus is ſaid to have writ an Epiſtle to Paulinus Biſhop of Theſſalonica, whereas it ought to be read, as Baronius and Binius confeſs, Biſhop of Antioch. 3. The ſixteenth Novel of Juſtinian is directed to Anthimus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, whereas Mennas at that time governed that See. 4. The Epiſtle of Fœlix the fourth to Sabina, was dated on the twelfth of the Calends of November, at which time Fœlix was dead, whoſe Name as the Cardinal ſaith might eaſily creep in for that of Boniface his Succeſſour. By ſeveral other inſtances not neceſſary here to be expreſſed, doth he make the Cardinal's Exception againſt this Epiſtle of Theodoret very ridiculous.

*Ad An.D.*318.
Ad Concil. ſub Damaſo.

Ad An. 530.

30. And no leſs ridiculous doth he ſhew the Cardinal's reaſons to be why John died before Cyril. He confeſſeth it true that John did die before him, becauſe of many undoubted teſtimonies of the Council of Chalcedon, not one of which the Cardinal had the grace to alledge, but his reaſons are ſo weak, and withall ſo full of fraud and untruth, that the Doctour counts it worthy of conſideration to ſee his blindneſs and perverſeneſs, even in proving that which is true. He firſt tells us: I have ſhewed this moſt manifeſtly that John died ſeven years before Cyril, by the Epiſtle which Theodoret wrote to Domnus four years ſince (that is four before this year 444) in the behalf of one Fælicianus, whoſe eſtate Theodoret recommends to Domnus. Ad Ann. 444. num. 16. The Doctour obſerves how egregious a trifler the Cardinal hath ſhewed himſelf hereby. For neither in the four hundred and fortieth, nor in any four years either before or after that doth he ſet down any Epiſtle of Theodoret's to Domnus in behalf of Fælicianus. The Epiſtle which the Cardinal dreameth of, is in behalf of Cœleſtianus, and that is indeed expreſſed Ann. 440. where note, I pray, that the Cardinal by a ſlip either of his own Pen or Memory (as I verily ſuppoſe) or of his Scribe, names Fælicianus inſtead of Cœleſtianus. God even by this demonſtrating how unjuſtly he carps at the Synodal Acts, for that very errour or ſlip of a Pen, which the Cardinal himſelf falls into, even while he for the like ſlip declaimeth againſt theſe Holy Synodical Acts. And yet there's a worſe fault in this Reaſon. For it is no more ſhewed that John died before Cyril by that Epiſtle than by Tully's ad Atticum. That Epiſtle having neither date nor any Circumſtance to induce that, and may aſwell be written *Ann.*448. as 440. His ſecond Reaſon is: There are Letters extant of Theodoret to Domnus the year following (Ann. 437.) and that Epiſtle I will ſet down in its due place, the next year. Now in the next year, viz. Ann. 437. there is no Epiſtle of Theodoret ſet down by the Cardinal, nor is either Domnus or Theodoret ſo much as named in all his diſcourſe of that year. Is not this now ſhewed moſt manifeſtly; you may be ſure he would not have feared to perform his promiſe, but that there was ſomewhat in that Epiſtle which would have bewrayed his lewd dealing in this Cauſe. His third Reaſon is drawn from the Teſtimony of Nicephorus, from whom he ſaith it is certain. No it is ſure and certain by Nicephorus that Baronius is erronious in this matter, for he accounteth John to have been Biſhop of Antioch 18 years, and the Cardinal will allow him no more than 13, now the firſt year of John cannot poſſibly be before the year 427, for in that year Theodotus his next Predeceſſour died, as Baronius himſelf proveth. Add now unto theſe 17 more, and then the death of John will be Ann. 444. which is the ſelf ſame year wherein Cyril died.

31. But ſee farther, how the Cardinal is infatuated in this Cauſe. John (ſaith he) died Ann. 436. having been Biſhop 13 years. John ſucceeded to Theodotus who died Ann. 427. Say now in truth is not the Cardinal a worthy Arithmetician, who of 427 and 13 can make no more than 436? And is not this a worthy reaſon to refuſe Nicephorus? But this is not all, for Baronius gloſſing upon Theodoret's Letter to Dioſcorus, which, as he ſaith, was written Ann. 444, there obſerves with a Memorandum, that by this Paſſage of Theodoret, you may ſee how long Theodotus, John and Domnus, had ſitten in the See of Antioch, viz. 26 years in all, from that time that Theodotus was made Biſhop unto that year 444, viz. Theodotus 6, John 13, and Domnus 7, untill that year. Theodotus, as Baronius will aſſure you was made Biſhop Ann. 423. Add now unto theſe 6 of Theodotus, 13 of John, and 7 of Domnus, and tell me, whither you think the Cardinal had ſent his Wits when he could ſum thoſe to be juſt 444. Or will you ſee the very quinteſſence of the Cardinal's Wiſedom? I will (ſaith he) ſet down the next year (viz. Ann. 437.) the very Epiſtle of Theodoret to Domnus, which was then written unto him, and I will ſet down in his due place (viz. Ann. 444.) that Epiſtle of Theodoret to Dioſcorus, whereby is ſhewed, that John was Biſhop of Antioch juſt 13 years. Thus the Cardinal, who by theſe two Epiſtles of Theodoret will prove both theſe. As much in effect as if he had ſaid, I have already proved that John began to be Biſhop of Antioch Ann. 427. and this being ſet down for a certainty; I will now prove by Theodoret's Epiſtle to Domnus, that John died Ann. 436, that is, in his ninth year; and then I will prove again by Theodoret's Epiſtle to Dioſcorus, that he died in his thirteenth year, and ſo died not till the year 440. Or, as if he had thus ſaid, I will firſt prove that mine own Annals are untrue, wherein it is ſaid, that John died in the year 436, which is but the ninth year of John, becauſe he died not, as Theodoret in one Epiſtle witneſſeth, untill his thirteenth year, which is Ann. 440. And then I will prove unto you, that mine own Annals are again untrue, wherein it is ſaid that John was Biſhop 13 years, and ſo died not till Ann. 440. (beginning the firſt Ann. 427.) becauſe Theodoret in another Epiſtle witneſſeth, that John died Ann. 436. Or thus, I will firſt prove that John was dead Ann. 436, though he was alive Ann. 440, and then I will prove unto you that John was alive Ann. 440, though he was dead Ann. 436. Is not this brave dealing in the Cardinal? Is he not worthy of a Cap and Feather too, that can prove all theſe, and prove them by Theodoret's Epiſtles? Or do you not think theſe to be worthy Epiſtles of Theodoret, by which ſuch Abſurdities, ſuch Impoſſibilities may be proved?

32. Doth not this alone if there were no other evidence, demonſtrate theſe Epiſtles of Theodoret to be Counterfeits? If that to Domnus be truely his as Baronius aſſures you, whereby John is ſaid to have died Ann. 436, then certainly the other to Dioſcorus muſt needs be a forgery, whereby John is ſhewed to live Ann. 440. Again if that to Dioſcorus be truely his as Baronius aſſures you, wherein John is ſaid to live 440, then certainly the other to Domnus muſt of neceſſity be a forgery, wherein John is ſaid to be dead Ann. 436. And as either of theſe two Epiſtles demonſtrates the untruth and forgery of the other, ſo they both demonſtrate the great Vanity of Baronius, who applauds them both, and who will make good what they both affirm; that is the ſame Man to be both dead and alive, a Biſhop and no Biſhop at the ſelf ſame time; and by theſe worthy Reaſons doth the Cardinal refute his own witneſs, Nicephorus, who by giving eighteen years to John, ſhews plainly that John and Cyril died within one year, which account perhaps gave occaſion to the Exſcriber of the Synodal Acts to thruſt in the Name of John, whom upon Nicephorus his account he thought to live after Cyril, whereas in very deed he died ſomething before Cyril. His fourth and laſt Reaſon is drawn from a Canonical Epiſtle of Cyril to Domnus, ſet down in the additions to Theodore Balſamon, where he concludes it out of doubt that John died, ſeeing one Cyril writ to his Succeſſour Domnus, yet are there two great doubts in it. The firſt whether that Epiſtle be truely Cyril's, what the Cardinal brings being much againſt it, the Epiſtle aſcribing ſo great Anthority to Domnus, as to put out Biſhops and reſtore them at his pleaſure, quite contrary to the Canon of the Council of Antioch, which requires that the Metropolitan doe nothing in ſuch Cauſes without the advice and conſent of the other Biſhops of that Province. The other doubt is whether Domnus, to whom this Epiſtle is written be Domnus Biſhop of Antioch, and Succeſſour to John. In removing hereof the Cardinal is much troubled, winding himſelf divers ways, and concluding that He who had ſuch Authority muſt needs be ſome eminent Biſhop, and not one of an inferiour See, although he might be a Metropolitan, though no Patriarch, and ſo have inferiour Biſhops under him.

Concil. Antioch.ſub Julio 1. Can. 9.

33. But he adds that, There is no Domnus elſe, but this Domnus Biſhop of Antioch, mentioned either in the Council of Epheſus or Chalcedon, who had ſuch Authority as to depoſe and reſtore Biſhops ad libitum. But in ſuch lawfull manner as Domnus of Antioch might doe it, there were others called by the Name of Domnus mentioned in thoſe very Councils, who might upon juſt cauſe, and by due and Canonical proceeding, depoſe and reſtore their inferiour Biſhops. Look but into theſe Councils, and you will admire both the ſupine Negligence of the Cardinal in this point, and his moſt audacious down-facing of the truth; for, to omit others both in the Conventicle of Epheſus, and the Council of Chalcedon, there is often mention of Domnus Biſhop of Apamea, a Metropolitan Biſhop. And that you may ſee how fraudulently the Cardinal dealt in this very point, he neither would ſet down that Epiſtle, nor acquaint you with that which in Balſamon is expreſly noted; that Peter the Biſhop, whom that Domnus, to whom Cyril writeth, had depoſed, was Alexandrinus Sacerdos, a Biſhop of the Patriarchate of Alexandria. Now what had Domnus of Antioch to doe with the Alexandrian Biſhops? So clear it is by Balſamon, that this Domnus, to whom Cyril wrote, was not Domnus of Antioch, as the Cardinal I fear againſt his Knowledge avoucheth. But thus you ſee all the Reaſons the Cardinal bringeth to prove John to be dead ſeven years before Cyril, not onely to be weak and unable to enforce that Concluſion, but alſo to be full fraught with frauds and untruths. So that if I had not found more ſound and certain Reaſons to perſwade this, I could never by the Cardinal's proofs have been induced to think that an Errour in the Inſcription of Theodoret's Epiſtle. But ſeeing upon the undoubted Teſtimonies in the Council of Chalcedon, it is certain that John died before Cyril, I willingly acknowledge a ſlip of ſome Writer in that Inſcription, but yet the Epiſtle it ſelf muſt be acknowledged to be truely Theodoret's, which is all that the Synod avoucheth, and that which the Cardinal undertook to diſprove, but by no one Reaſon doth offer to prove the ſame. And even for that Errour alſo in the Inſcription, ſcription, I doubt not but thoſe who can have a ſight of the Greek and Original, nay perhaps ſome ancient Copies of the Acts of the fifth Council, ſhall find either no Name at all, or which I rather ſuppoſe, that of Domnus expreſſed therein; inſtead of which, though ſome ignorant audacious Exſcriber hath thruſt in the Name of John; it is not nor ought not to be any Impeachment at all to the Synodal Acts, unleſs the Cardinal will acknowledge his own Annals to be of no credit, becauſe in them Paſchalis is written by ſome ſuch errour for Pelagius, John for Vigilius, Juſtinus for Juſtinianus, Theodorus for Theodoſius, Sexta for Quinta, Fœlicianus for Cœleſtianus, and a Number the like in other Cauſes, moſt of theſe ſlips pertaining to this very Cauſe of the three Chapters of which we do entreat. Thus Dr. Crackanthorp the Baroniomaſtix, to whoſe Arguments nothing can be added, it's pity any thing ſhould be detracted, but that we onely write an Inſtitution. In due place we ſhall again hear of him.

Act. 3. Conc. Chalc. p. 75. 6.

To Cyril of Alexandria ſucceeded Dioſcorus.

Proclus of Conſtantinople dies. Flavianus ſucceeds.

Eutyches and his Hereſie.

34. Cyril the Patriarch of Alexandria was ſucceeded by Dioſcorus, of whom we may hear too much hereafter. Leo Biſhop of Rome, in the mean time vigorouſly proſecuted the Manichees, as alſo Valentinian the Emperour, who by an Edict commanded them to be puniſhed as ſacrilegious Perſons. At this ſame time Leo interpoſing himſelf into the Eccleſiaſtick Affair of Gall, was earneſtly oppoſed by Hilary the Biſhop of Arles, a Man very famous in this Generation, who being a Monk of the Lerinenſian Monaſtery had for his Merit been promoted to the Archbiſhoprick of Arles. All he could get together he diſtributed to the Poor, and the better to inable himſelf to be charitable toiled much at Huſbandry and Countrey-work, yet without neglect of his particular Calling. A year or two following died Proclus, Biſhop of Conſtantinople, when he had governed that Church ſomething above twelve years, and was ſucceeded by Flavianus a Prieſt of the ſame Church. Much about this time were held ſeveral Synods in Spain againſt the Priſcillianiſts, of which one held at Toledo firſt added that Paſſage concerning the Holy Ghoſt to the Creed, Proceeding from the Father and the Son, which was not for a long time after received by the Church of Rome. The year following Theodoſius the Emperour to appeaſe the Wrath of God which much appeared at this time in the Deſolations and Waſtings of ſeveral Countries by the Invaſion of the barbarous Nations as otherwiſe, publiſhed Laws againſt Heathens and Neſtorians commanding the Books of Porphyry, and others made againſt the Writings of Cyril to be ſought out and burned. But the Devil being driven out of this hold betook himſelf ſtreight to another Device, and made uſe herein of the Zeal wherewith Catholicks were inflamed againſt Neſtorianiſm, turning it ſo far into the other Extreme, as out of an extravagant deſire to ſhun Charybdis they ſtruck upon Scylla and made a change from one Hereſie to another. The Ringleader of this Party was one Eutyches an Abbat or Archimandrita, as the Greeks called it, of Conſtantinople, who ſo far contended againſt two Perſons in Chriſt, that he alſo denied two Natures. At firſt he ſaid Chriſt was not Conſubſtantial with us according to the Fleſh, but brought his Body with him from Heaven, afterward he held that the Natures which were before the Union two, and diſtinct each from other, after the Union became one and the ſame. According to the former Aſſertion Theodoret tells us he revived the Hereſie of Valentinus, who imagined that the Son of God took nothing from the Virgin, but being made fleſh paſſed onely through her Body, Eutyches began to publiſh this his Opinion to the World in or about the year of our Lord 448, the Conſulſhip of Flavius Poſthumianus and Flavius Zeno.

Novel. Valen. Tit. 2. de Manich.

Proſper. Gennadius. alii.

Niceph. in Chron. & Niceph. Caliſtus. lib. 14. cap. 47.

Concil. Tolet. in fine.

Acta Concil. Epheſ.

Liberatus Breviar. c. 11. Theod. in hæreticis fabulis. Flavian. Ep. inter Leonis. Leo variis ut 11. 19. Euagrius libb. 1. 2. 3. 4.

Is condemned in a Synod held at Conſtantinople.

35. Eutyches his Doctrine being early diſcovered at Conſtantinople, was condemned by a Synod aſſembled there by Flavianus for that purpoſe. This ſame year were two Synods held at Tyre and Berytus about Ibas Biſhop of Edeſſa in Syria, who was accuſed of Neſtorianiſm, and as Baronius tells us, was thereof acquitted, not onely at Berytus but alſo afterward in the General Council of Chalcedon, how truly we ſhall hereafter declare. In the mean time the Friends of Eutyches knowing what diſreputation the late Synod at Conſtantinople had procured him, laboured by all means to null the Decrees thereof, eſpecially Chryſaphius the Eunuch out of a particular Grudge to Flavianus, upon whom he ſtudied how to devolve all the Odium and Infamy. This Chryſaphius at firſt was much diſpleaſed with his advancement to the See of Conſtantinople, and to pick ſome Quarrel ſent to him to tell him it was fitting he ſhould preſent the Emperour with ſome gift at his promotion. He ſent him accordingly ſome White-Loaves, whereat the Eunuch being diſpleaſed, and pleading for Gold as moſt worthy of the Prince, the Biſhop affirmed he had none but what belonged to the Church, and dedicated to the Acta Conc. Chalc.

Niceph. lib. 14. cap. 47.

Service of God, and uſe of the Poor. Chryſaphius rather irritated by this his reſolute Anſwer ſtudies all ways how to out him of his See, and perceiving he ſhould profit nothing in any ſuch attempt as long as Pulcheria Auguſta the Siſter of Theodoſius ſate at the Helm, by falſe Suggeſtions he brings her into diſcredit with Eudocia the Empreſs firſt, and then with the Emperour himſelf, and contrives how to deveſt her of her Imperial Power, and reduce her into a condition no better than that of the Deaconeſſes of the Church, which being made known to her by Flavianus, ſhe of her own accord quitted the Government and retired to a private life. Chryſaphius therefore joyns himſelf with Eutyches and Dioſcorus Biſhop of Alexandria, the great Patron of this Heretick. Eutyches incouraged by his aſſiſtence complains that he had not been fairly dealt with in the late Synod of Conſtantinople, that the Acts of it were changed and altered at the pleaſure of his Enemies, and all things falſly and diſadvantageouſly recorded and repreſented on his ſide. He petitions the Emperour that the Records might be diligently ſearched and examined.

But appealing to the Emperour.

36. His ſuit was very eaſily granted through the intereſt of Chryſaphius, who ſo far alſo prevailed in his behalf, that though the Fathers of this new Synod called for examination of this matter oppoſed it, he procured him a diſpenſation as to appearance, and the matter to be examined in the preſence of his Proctours, which favour yet could not be granted to Euſebius Biſhop of Dorylæum his Accuſer. But by this Aſſembly of thirty Biſhops, who as Evagrius writes ſifted out the doings of Flavianus, were the Records found true and confirmed. Eutyches to bring Flavianus into greater diſcredit with the Emperour, and all good Men, accuſed him as a Fautor of Neſtorianiſm, whereupon Theodoſius demanded of him a Confeſſion of his Faith, which inveighing againſt and anathematizing as well the one as the other Hereſie, perceiving he nothing profited by any of theſe ſhifts, being adviſed and governed by Dioſcorus and Chryſaphius, he deſires a general Council ſhould be called, whereof Dioſcorus ſhould be Preſident or Moderatour. Chryſaphius by the Mediation of the Empreſs eaſily obtaineth his ſuit, openly pretending to clear the difficulty in the Cauſe of Eutyches, but in his mind deſigning aſwell the advancement of his opinions, as the depoſiting and Ruine of Flavianus. By his means the Emperour appointed a Council to be held at Epheſus by the firſt of Auguſt (A. D. 449) over which he commanded Dioſcorus to preſide, and bring with him ſeveral Biſhops, but Theodoret of Cyrus and Ibas Biſhop of Edeſſa were forbidden to be preſent. Leo Biſhop of Rome was alſo ſummoned, but not finding it convenient to come himſelf ſent his Legates, who brought with them an Epiſtle to Flavianus, wherein the Hereſie of Eutyches was condemned, and which Dioſcorus the Preſident ſuppreſſed, not willing it ſhould be read. On the tenth of Auguſt the Biſhops met, to the Number of about 128, beſides ſome that were onely preſent by their Legates. Beſides Dioſcorus the Head of the Faction appeared Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem, Domnus of Antioch, Stephen of Epheſus, Flavianus of Conſtantinople. Dioſcorus brought a rout of his own Egyptian Biſhops, and procured a Military Guard under Command of Elpidius and Eulogius, moreover a great Company of Eutychian Monks, Men clamorous, importune and audacious, gave their attendance at this Synod, which becauſe all things were carried irregularly, unjuſtly, and by force and violence in latter Ages, hath obtained the Name of the Epheſine Latrociny.

Lib. 1. c. 9.

*Liberatus in Breviario.c.*11.

Obtains a Council to be call'd to Epheſus.

37. Dioſcorus the Moderatour would permit no Clerk to take the Acts of the Synod but one of his own making, yet permitted thoſe of his own faction to take what notes they pleaſed. At the opening of the Aſſembly was read the Emperour's Letters, wherein he permitted ſuch as had formerly condemned Eutyches in the Synod of Conſtantinople to be preſent, but with injunction of ſilence, becauſe their Acts were now to be examined, he alſo commanded all things to be done according to the preſcript of the Nicene Faith, and that they would doe their utmoſt to extirpate all Hereſie. They confirmed the Nicene Creed, and receiving a Paper from Eutyches, wherein he had written his opinion, after it was read, up ſtands Dioſcorus, and cries out Eutyches his Faith is very good, agreeable to that of the 318 Fathers. Eutyches believeth aright, and we profeſs the ſame opinion. Eutyches incouraged by this Patrociny, makes a long invective againſt Flavianus, and the late Synod of Conſtantinople, and complains he was much injured by them. The leſſer part moved that the Acts of that Synod might be read, but the Legates of Leo firſt required they would hear his Letters, which yet at the inſtance of Eutyches was denied, he being jealous of the Legates, becauſe they had been entertained by Flavianus. In ſhort, Eutyches was reſtored, Acta Concil. Chalced. Evagrius lib. 1. cap. 10.

Wherein Eutyches is reſtored, but Flavianus and the Orthodox are excommunicated.

Which is confirmed by Theodoſius the Emperour.

reſtored, with the Monks of his faction excommunicated juſtly by Flavianus. Flavianus and Euſebius of Dorylæum were excommunicated, and the former ſo cruelly handled, that he died ſhortly after. The Biſhops by Threats and Terrour of Death and Tortures, were forced to ſubſcribe to this Sentence. Domnus Patriarch of Antioch having ſubſcribed, afterward recanted, and for that was condemned and depoſed. The ſame meaſure had Ibas Biſhop of Edeſſa, Daniel of Carræ, Irenæus of Tyre, and Aquilinus of Biblus, and Theodoret of Cyrus, for they raged aſwell againſt thoſe that held the other Extreme, as the Orthodox Biſhops. The worſt was, Theodoſius the Emperour was ſo overreached by Chryſaphius and others, that he confirmed the Acts of this Pradatorian Aſſembly by his Imperial Authority, and ſo this ſecond Oecumenical Epheſine Council, as Baronius ſtyles it, had an end.

Theodoſius dies.

Martianus choſen Emperour, who puniſheth the Sect of Eutychians.

Summons a General Council at Nice in Bithinia.

But removes it to Chalcedon.

38. Leo the Roman Patriarch certified how things were carried in this Aſſembly ſummoned a Provincial Synod, wherein was condemned the Hereſie of Eutyches, which notwithſtanding, Dioſcorus the Patriarch of Alexandria, gathering together ſome of his own Faction and Dependants thundred out the Sentence of Excommunication againſt Leo himſelf. Not long after Theodoſius the Emperour died, having as Nicephorus writes, given ample Teſtimony of his Repentance for what he had done in behalf of Eutyches, being convinced and perſwaded to abandon that Cauſe by Pulcheria Auguſta his Siſter, who moved with Indignation to ſee how things were carried, returned from her retirement to the care of the publick, and after her Brother's death procured the Empire to be conferred on Martianus. The new Emperour following either his own inclination or the Dictates of his Wife, preſently publiſheth * an Edict againſt the Eutychians, on whom he commands the puniſhments to be inflicted which by former Laws had been decreed againſt other Hereticks, adding baniſhment out of the Roman Territories. He recalls the Biſhops Confeſſours out of Exile, and cauſeth the body of Flavianus dead in Baniſhment to be tranſlated to Conſtantinople. Then doth he conſult with Leo Biſhop of Rome eminent for his Orthodox Faith as much as the dignity of his See, and at length reſolves to call another General Council, at which he intended to be perſonally preſent. Leo both in the time of Theodoſius and now, had a great deſire to have ſuch a Synod called in Italy as appears by ſeveral of his Letters to theſe two Princes, in which he alſo deſires to be excuſed that he came not himſelf, and prays them not to take it ill that he ſends his Legates. But that Requeſt being judged unreaſonable, Martianus by a publick Sanction dated June 22, commands all Biſhops to meet at Nice in Bithynia by the firſt of September next following. Many Prelates came thither accordingly, and expecting his coming, ſome days petitioned him, that out of reſpect to their Age and Infirmities he would give order for opening the Council. He ſtill deferred to doe it, out of the great deſire he had to be preſent himſelf, for the Invaſion made by Attila into Illyricum gave him work at Conſtantinople, from which City at length perceiving that he could not be far abſent becauſe of this War, he gave order to the Fathers to remove themſelves to Chalcedon.

Acta Conc. Chalced.

Lib. 14. *c.*49.

Tom. 2. Conc. p. 40. 32. 44. &c. Epp. 23. 24, &c.

* Cod. lib. 1. tit. 7. leg. ult. & extat in Actis Conc. Chalc. Eos qui Catholicarum Eccleſiarum clerici vel Orthodoxæ fidei monachi, relicto vero Religionis cultu, Apollinaris vel Eutychetis hæreſim & dogmata abhominanda ſequuti fuerint, omnibus pœnis quæ prioribus legibus adverſus hæreticos conſtitutæ ſunt, jubemus teneri & extra ipſum quoque Romani Imperii ſolum repelli ſicut de Manichæis precedentium legum ſtatuta ſanxerunt. Dat. Cal. Aug. Valentiniano A. vii. & Aviano Coſſ.

CHAP. VII.

From the Fourth Oecumenical Council ſummoned by Martianus the Emperour to the City of Chalcedon, to the Depoſing of Auguſtulus, and the Ruine of the Weſtern Empire.

The ſpace of Twenty five Years.

A General Council held at Chalcedon.

1. THE Fourth General Council ſummoned by the Emperour Martianus to Chalcedon a City of Bithynia, aſſembled in the Month of October in the ſecond year of the Reign of that Prince, the 27 of Valentinian the Third, of Old Rome the 1024, of New Rome the 122, the fourth Indiction, 127 years after the firſt Nicene Synod, 70 after the ſecond General Council called to Conſtantinople, 20 after the Celebration of the third Oecumenical Synod at Epheſus, of the ordinary Æra of Chriſt the 451, Martianus Auguſtus and Adelphius being Conſuls.

The Perſons who met there.

2. From all parts the Biſhops aſſembled to the number of 630, as generally Writers do agree. Here were preſent as Legates from Leo the Roman Patriarch Paſchaſinus Biſhop of Lilybæum in Sicily, Lucentius of Aſculum, with Boniface and Baſilius Prieſts, and Julianus Biſhop of Coa. Anatolius Patriarch of Conſtantinople, who had ſucceeded Flavianus, here alſo appeared, as alſo Dioſcorus the Alexandrian Patriarch, Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem, Domnus the late Patriarch of Antioch, and Maximus who enjoyed his place. The African Church and that of the Saracens were not wanting to ſend their Repreſentatives, Zachary Rhetor reported that Neſtorius was ſummoned to appear, but Euagrius contradicteth him, telling us it was plain it could not be ſo, for that Neſtorius was commanded under pein of being accurſed, not to ſhew his face in the Council, which Euſtathius Biſhop of Berytus wrote plainly in his Letters to John the Biſhop and John a Prieſt, touching the Canons of this Council, wherein he uſeth theſe words: There came to the Council ſuch as diligently ſearched for the Relicks of Neſtorius, and with open mouths they exclaimed againſt the Council. What Reaſon or Conſcience is there that holy men ſhould be accurſed? So that the Emperour was greatly incenſed againſt them, and commanded his Guard to ſet them packing. Wherefore I cannot ſee (ſaith Euagrius) how Neſtorius being dead ſhould be called to the Council. Sometimes Martianus the Emperour himſelf with Pulcheria Auguſta was alſo preſent; but becauſe he could not always be preſent in perſon, he deputed certain Secular Judges to execute the uſual Imperial Preſidency, to ſee that all things ſhould be done lawfully without Force, Fraud or Tumult. Theſe were Anatolius a Magiſter Militum, Palladius a Præfectus Sacrorum, Tatianus the Prefect of the City, Vincemalus the Magiſter Sacrorum Officiorum, Count Martialis, Genethlius the Comes Rerum Privatarum, Florentius the Præfectus Prætorio, Senator Patricius, Patricius Nonius, Protogenes the Prefect, the Prefect Zoilus, Theodorus, Apollonius, Romanus Præfectus Sacri Cubiculi, Theodorus Prefect of Illyricum, Conſtantinus the Præfectus Prætoriorum, Artaxerxes the Præpoſitus Sacri Cubiculi, and Eulogius Prefect of Illyricum.

Lib. 2. c. 2.

3. On the eighth of October the Biſhops met in the Church of St. Euphemia the Martyr, where being placed before the Cancelli Altaris (which place Liberatus calls the Secretarium, and thence the ſeveral Seſſions therein held Secretaria) the Emperour Martianus together with Pulcheria his Empreſs came into the Synod. He told them he could ingenuouſly proteſt that he no ſooner came to the Government, but his mind was fully bent to eſtabliſh the true Religion in the purity and ſincerity thereof. That this was the cauſe of their meeting at this time, from which he promi-

Cap. 13.

The deſign of their Meeting.

ſed himſelf all good and juſt things reaſonably to be expected, as from thoſe who would act to the utmoſt of their duty for purging and clearing the truth of Chriſtian Religion from thoſe Miſts and Errours which either the Avarice or Ambition of ſome light Perſons had brought upon it. That they might with more Facility obtain this end he would impoſe this as a Law upon them that now ſhould dare to diſpute or argue concerning the Perſon of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt contrary to the Faith of the three hundred Fathers laid down in the Nicene Synod. As for himſelf he aſſured them he came not thither for the Oſtentation of his Power or Authority, but to confirm the Faith, and ſuppreſs all ſtrife and diſſention that might ariſe. Having ſpoken to this purpoſe the Fathers ſet about their Synodical Work. At the beginning the Legates of Leo Patriarch of Rome began much to take upon them, willing that Dioſcorus the Alexandrian Patriarch might be put out of the Aſſembly, and ſaid, Either let Dioſcorus depart, or we will be gone. The Judges gravely reproved this their unreaſonable humour, telling them, If they would be Judges, they muſt not proſecute as Accuſers; neither did they ſuffer Dioſcorus to depart, but commanded him, as was fitteſt, to ſit in the Place of the Rei, or accuſed Perſons. Then did Euſebius of Dorylæum ſtep forth and accuſe him of Injury done to himſelf aſwell as the Death of Flavianus, giving into the Synod the Petition he had put up to the Emperour, which being read, together with the Acts of the Epheſine Latrociny, by all which Dioſcorus appeared aſwell guilty of the Blaſphemous opinion of Eutyches as of what Euſebius had laid to his charge. The Synod therefore condemned him, with his principal Aſſiſtants: Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem, Thalaſſius of Cæſarea, Euſebius of Ancyra, Euſtathius of Berytus, and Baſilius of Seleucia. To the condemnation of Dioſcorus, who had been the Ring-leader, the Eaſtern Biſhops moſt willingly aſſented, but interceded for ſuch as had been by threats drawn to joyn with him, that their depoſition might be ſuſpended. The Synod commands, that the ſeveral Biſhops ſhould ſeverally and apart make Confeſſions of their Faith, according to the preſcript of the Nicene Synod, and the writings of Baſil, Gregory, Hilary, Athanaſius, Ambroſe, and the two Epiſtles of Cyril publiſhed in the Council of Epheſus. The Action was furniſhed with Acclamations of the Triſagion to Almighty God, Well-wiſhes to the Emperour, and Curſes againſt Dioſcorus.

Aut ille Egrediatur aut nos Eximus, Act. 1. p. 4. B.

Dioſcorus Biſhop of Alexandria and his Adherents condemned.

Acclamations uſed at the end of General Councils.

4. This Cuſtome of Acclamations in Council at the end of the ſeveral Seſſions or Concluſion of the Synod ſeems taken from the practice of the Senate and People, in which Aſſemblies after the Debate and Conſultation ended, extraordinary Acclamations were wont to be made to the Honour of the Emperours. For though the word doth ſignifie a vocal aſſent given by any one to what is ſaid by another, yet there were Acclamations extraordinary and ſolemn made upon certain Occaſions, a Cryer or Officer dictating to the Multitude. So Trebellius Pollio tells us in the Life of the Emperour Claudius, that after the reading of his Letters in the Temple of Apollo, it being ſaid, Claudius Auguſtus, The Gods keep thee, the Aſſembly acclaimed it ſixty times. Claudius Auguſtus We have ever wiſht for thee, or ſuch an one as thou art to be our Prince; this was reiterated forty times. Claudius Auguſtus the Commonwealth ſought after thee; this was repeated forty times. Claudius Auguſtus thou haſt been a good Brother, Father, Friend and Senatour, thou art truly a Prince; this was acclaimed eighty times. Claudius Auguſtus avenge us of Aureolus; five times. Claudius Auguſtus avenge us of the Palmyrenians, five times. Claudius Auguſtus deliver us from Zenobia and Victoria; ſeven times. Claudius Auguſtus, Tetricus did nothing; ſeven times. In like manner when Tacitus the Emperour by a Speech in Anſwer to the Senate, had excuſed himſelf by his Old Age from taking upon him the Government, the Senate made theſe Acclamations: Trajan alſo came Old to the Imperial Dignity; this they ſpoke ten times. Adrian in like manner came Old to the Government; this they pronounced ten times. In like manner did Antoninus; ten times. Thou alſo haſt read (viz. Virgil Æneid. 6) Incanaque menta Regis Romani; ten times. And who Rules better than an Old Man? ten times. We make thee an Emperour, not a Souldier; twenty times. Do thou give orders, let the Souldiers fight; thirty times. Thou art prudent, and haſt a good Brother; ten times. Severus ſaid, The Head ought to Govern, and not the Feet; thirty times. And we make choice of thee for thy Mind, not thy Body; to which they acclaimed twenty times. Theſe forms of Acclamations being Recorded, Hiſtorians copied them out of the Rolls, and ſome Coins have been ſtamped with a Memorial of them, ſo much did Princes think they tended to their Fame and Reputation, as in a medal of the Emperour Conſtantius, wherein is read, Gaudium Populi Romani, or The Joy of the Roman People; being words of Acclamations whereby the People teſtified the publick

What they were.

Flavius Vopiſcus Syracuſ. in Tacito.

Joy, and within a laurel Crown, ſic V. ſic X. or ſic Quinquies, ſic Sexies, that ſo ſix, or ſeven times the People acclaimed. Triſtanus mentions a medal of Conſtans the Emperour with the ſame notes, which he interprets, ſic Quinquennalia, ſic Decennalia, and indeed Antiquaries took no notice of theſe Acclamations expreſſed upon Coins, till Jacobus Chiffletius began to obſerve them, as appears in his Book called Anaſtaſis Childerici.

Tom. 3. p. 607.

Cap. 19.

The deſign of them.

5. No wonder then that in ſo Solemn and Holy Aſſemblies, wherein the Prayers of the Faithfull availed much, ſuch Religious Acclamations ſhould be made, expreſſing praiſe and glory to Almighty God, and prayers for the welfare of the Emperours, the nurſing Fathers of his Church. It was the ancient Cuſtome of the Eaſtern Churches to handle matters in Councils in a publick meeting of all, and upon occaſion popular Acclamations did often happen, and ſometimes tumultuous, which notwithſtanding did conclude in concord, and in the end the Biſhops tranſported with Joy, for the uniform Determinations, did paſs to Acclamations, in praiſe of the Emperours, who had aſſembled and favoured the Council, in commendation of the Doctrine declared by it, in prayers to God for his continual aid and aſſiſtence afforded to his Church, for the welfare of the Emperours, and the health and proſperity of the Biſhops, which were not premeditated, but as the Spirit did excite ſome Biſhops more zealous to break out fitly into ſome of theſe Expreſſions, ſo the multitude acclaimed or cried with him. This was imitated of late in Trent, yet not giving place to the extemporary Spirit of any, but meditating what ſhould be propoſed and anſwered, and repeating it out of a Paper, the Cardinal of Lorain took upon him to be the Præco or Cryer, not onely being chief in compoſing the Acclamations, but thundering them out alſo, which was generally accounted lightneſs and vanity, not beſeeming ſuch a Prelate and Prince to doe an Office belonging rather to the Deacons of the Council, than to ſo principal an Archbiſhop and Cardinal. But the Cardinal roared, and the Tridentine Fathers anſwered ſuch things as will not edify the Reader toknow, and if he pleaſe he may find them in the excellent Hiſtory of that pretended General Council. Thus much by the way concerning Acclamations, once for all, and perhaps not unprofitably.

In the ſecond Meeting Dioſcorus is Baniſhed to Gangrena.

In the third the Biſhops give an account of their Faith.

6. At the ſecond Meeting, Euſebius Biſhop of Dorylæum renewed his complaint aſwell in behalf of Flavianus as himſelf, and after ſeveral things petitioned, deſired that Dioſcorus might be ſummoned to anſwer for himſelf, for, this ſecond time, he had not appeared. Three ſeveral times was he ſummoned by three Biſhops and a Notary, but as often excuſed himſelf, and in the mean time came certain Prieſts and Deacons of his own Church, accuſing him aſwell of Blaſphemy as Robbing them of their Goods. Upon this occaſion being ſummoned again, and refuſing to appear, he was condemned as Contumacious, and depoſed; the Legates of Leo by the conſent of the Synod pronouncing the Sentence, wherein they attributed enough to his Authority that ſent them. With theſe things the Emperour was made acquainted, and under his Authority the form of Depoſition was ſent to Dioſcorus who was Baniſhed to Gangrena a City of Paphlagonia, and his Sentence being written to the ſeveral Churches, was confirmed by Imperial Authority. On the thirteenth of October was the third Seſſion held, wherein moſt of what had formerly paſſed being repeated, the ſeveral Biſhops were commanded to give an account of their Faith. Florentius Biſhop of Sardis as wavering, deſired reſpite, but Cecropius Biſhop of Sebaſtopolis publickly declared his Faith to the Fathers, aſſerting that of the Nicene Council confirmed by the Fathers, and lately by Leo the Roman Patriarch. After this were read and approved the Nicene Creed; the Decree of the Synod of Conſtantinople, wherein the Hereſie of Eutyches had been condemned, the Faith of the Firſt Epheſine Council held againſt Neſtorius, the two Epiſtles written by Cyril to Neſtorius and John Patriarch of Antioch, with the Confeſſion of the ſaid John approved by Cyril, in which writings the middle and ſafe way betwixt the errours of Neſtorius and Eutyches was pointed out. Next was read and approved the Epiſtle of Leo to Flavianus. Then whereas ſome Biſhops doubted concerning ſome expreſſions in Cyril's Letters, by the advice of Anatolius certain Biſhops who had already ſubſcribed were appointed to explain and give ſatisfaction to ſuch as ſtaggered.

In the fourth Seſſion the Biſhops are required to ſubſcribe the Epiſtle of Leo.

7. The Fourth Seſſion was held on the ſeventeenth of October, wherein firſt it was demanded by the Secular Judges, Whether the Nicene Faith, and the Decree of the Synod of Conſtantinople were agreeable to the Epiſtle of Leo, to which an Anſwer being given in the affirmative, the Biſhops were required to ſubſcribe it, for therein being plainly and expreſly condemned the Hereſie of Eutyches this was judged a more certain expedient to try the minds of the Fathers; foraſmuch as ſuch as are content to cloſe with the more general expreſſions of a Council and wreſt them to their own ſenſe cannot ſo eaſily evade the drift of a particular Paper deſtined to the Condemnation of an Heterodox opinion. Then were admitted into the Synod, ten Ægyptian Biſhops, and the Confeſſion of Faith which they had written to the Emperour was read, wherein they profeſſed to imbrace the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, the Nicene Creed, with the Faith of Athanaſius, Theophilus and Cyril. Condemning all Hereſies, particularly thoſe of Arius, Eunomius, the Manichees, Neſtorius and ſuch as affirmed the fleſh of Chriſt to have come from Heaven, not to have been truly Born of the Virgin Mary, which was indeed the Doctrine of Eutyches. The Synod command them to ſubſcribe the Epiſtle of Leo, but they refuſed it, denying that they repreſented all the Ægyptian Biſhops, wherefore they would not preſcribe to them, nor could they doe it legally having no Archbiſhop ſince the depoſing of Dioſcorus. The Synod had well nigh pronounced a raſh ſentence againſt the Biſhops, crying out that they were Heretical. But the Judges knowing well that they forbore to ſubſcribe becauſe of a Cuſtome they had that they might doe nothing without their Patriarch not then choſen, and not as thinking Heretically in the Faith, moderated the Synod, telling the Fathers that to them it ſeemed reaſonable and agreeable to good nature not to condemn them but ſtay till their Patriarch be choſen, to whoſe grave and ſober ſentence the Synod conſented, making a Canon for this ſame purpoſe, and ordaining that in caſe they would give ſecurity not to depart out of the City, or that as ſoon as they had a Patriarch choſen, they would ſubſcribe, they ſhould be diſpenced with as to preſent ſubſcription. At the end of this Seſſion ſeveral Eutychean Monks petitioned the Synod and made great ſtir about Dioſcorus, their Patriarch, being Headed by Barſumas the principal Archimandrita. But the Fathers after much contention found reaſon ſtill to Anathematize Dioſcorus and caſt out their Petition, giving the Monks three days time to conſider and revoke their Heretical Tenents.

The Eutychean Monks Petition for Dioſcorus rejected.

8. In the fifth Seſſion more contention happened about the Perſon of Dioſcorus whom Anatolius if poſſible would have cleared as to the Crime of Hereſie. The Emperour perceiving there was no end to be expected in thoſe perſonal cauſes, and that the Biſhops ſpent all there time therein, ordained that ſix Eaſtern Biſhops, three of Pontus, three of Aſia, three of Thrace, and as many of Illyricum, together with Anatolius and the Legates of Leo ſhould conſult together and lay down ſuch a form of Faith as the reſt ſhould own and ſubſcribe. A form of Faith they accordingly compoſed in writing, whereof the firſt part contained a cenſure of the Hereſies of Neſtorius, Eutyches and the Macedonians. To the Condemnation of their opinions was added a confeſſion of Faith to this purpoſe: according to the example of the Holy Fathers, We confeſs one and the ſame Son of God, Chriſt our Lord, and unanimouſly affirm him perfect in the Divinity, and perfect in Humanity: true God and true Man, having both a rational Soul and Body: Coeſſential with the Father according to Divinity, and Coeſſential to us according to Humanity, in all things like to us, ſin excepted: begot of his Father before all Ages, as to his Divinity: in theſe laſt times for us and for our Salvation manifeſted, being born of the Virgin Mary the Mother of God according to Humanity, one and the ſame Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God, the Lord and onely begotten, in two Natures, without confuſion, converſion, divulſion or ſeparation: the difference of Natures being no wiſe taken away by unity, but rather the propriety of both Natures concurring to one Perſon, and one Subſiſtence being preſerved, not that he is parted or divided into two Perſons, but is one and the ſame onely begotten Son, God the word, and our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and in old time the Prophets foretold, Chriſt himſelf hath taught us and the Fathers have delivered to us. This being read, the whole Synod Acclamed: This is the Faith of all the Fathers, let the Metropolitans ſubſcribe it, this is the Faith of the Apoſtles, let us all follow this: we are all of this Judgment. Then did the Synod decree that what had ſo univerſally paſſed and pleaſed the Fathers ſhould be reported to the Emperour Martianus. Notwithſtanding this final Accord, in making the Definition of Faith, a great diſſention there was in the Synod, ſome would have it one way, ſome another way ſet down, inſomuch that the Legates of Leo were ready to make a Schiſm, to depart from the Council and hold another Synod by themſelves. The glorious Judges then (as they are ſtiled) propoſed this proper expedient to have the matter peaceably delated and concluded. But outcryes and Tumults prevailing, the Judges complained of theſe diſorders to the Emperour, and Martianus injoyned them to follow the direction rection of the Judges, wherein they obeyed him, and ſo at length came to a full concluſion and definition of Faith.

In the fifth Seſſion a Confeſſion of Faith compoſed.

Suggerentur Imperatori Clamores iſti.

In the ſixth Meeting it is confirmed by the Edicts of the Emperour.

9. At their ſixth meeting came Martianus with the Empreſs into the Synod where he ſpoke to the Fathers firſt in Latin (according to the Cuſtome of preſerving the repute and grandeur of Old Rome, and then in Greek to the ſame purpoſe as formerly. After he had made an end, Aetius the Archdeacon of Conſtantinople, in the name of the Synod briefly recounted what had been hitherto done, and then read a writing which declared the Faith of the Fathers to be agreeable to that form we lately mentioned. The Emperour demanded if that was the Act and Judgment of the whole Synod, and upon anſwer that it was, and that they all believed accordingly, he publiſhed his Edict importing that whereas the Catholick Faith was now explained, and defined by the holy and univerſal Synod, according to what had been deliver'd by the Apoſtles and Fathers, he thought it neceſſary to cut off for the future all occaſions of diſputes in matters of Religion. Therefore he commanded and declared that no Perſon whatſoever whether Clerk, Souldier or others (called Idiotæ, Plebeians or private Perſons) ſhould move any queſtion publickly concerning the Faith, under Pein of Baniſhment to a private Perſon, to Clerks and Military Men or of the Senatorian rank loſs of their Degree and Dignity, with other penalties. This was applauded by ſeveral Acclamations of Many years to the Emperour, Many years to the pious and Chriſtian Auguſtus, Many years to the Orthodox Empreſs, and Anathema to Dioſcorus, and the like. After this he told them there were certain things which he thought fit to propound to them as for their nature being proper for their Cogniſance, which reſpecting Clerks and Religious Perſons we ſhall mention when we come to ſpeak of the third, fourth and fifth Canons of this Council. Euagrius writes that the Emperour now commanded the Biſhops to continue there three or four days more, and prepare more matter ſuch as they ſhould think to be expedient. And they ſtaid not onely three or four days but many more, new matter ſtill ariſing before them.

Lib. 2. c. ult.

In the ſeventh Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem hath Patriarchal power confirmed to that See.

10. In the ſeventh Seſſion an Agreement betwixt Maximus Biſhop of Antioch and Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem, was propounded to the Fathers and ratified. The Reader muſt know the Biſhop of Jeruſalem had long before this time the mere Name and Title of a Patriarch as both Bellarmine and Binius acknowledge, and though his See was but a ſingle Biſhoprick, Subject, as both St. Jerome and the Nicene Council declare, to the Biſhop of Antioch as Patriarch, and to the Biſhop of Cæſarea Paleſtina as Metropolitan, yet out of reſpect to our Saviour he had the name of a Patriarch, and place in Councils above the Biſhop of Cæſarea. But the Authority and power of a Patriarch he had now by Decree and Judgment of this Council of Chalcedon. Juvenalis had moved about it in the Epheſine Council; but the Patriarch of Antioch as it ſeemeth, ſaith our Dr. Crackanthorp, being unwilling to manumit him, and as it were free him from his ſubjection, Cyril reſiſted it, and wrote to Pope Leo to doe the like. But after long contention both parties being ſatisfied, the matter was in this Seſſion brought to this Council before which Maximus and Juvenalis profeſſed they were both willing that the Biſhop of Antioch ſhould hold the two Phœnicia's and Arabia, and the Biſhop of Jeruſalem the three Paleſtina's, and they both deſired the Synod to decree, confirm and ratifie their Agreement. The whole Council upon their Petition ratified it, all the Biſhops crying, We all ſay the ſame and conſent thereunto. And after them the moſt glorious Judges in the Emperour's name added the imperial Authority and Royal aſſent to their Decree, ſaying, This by our Decree and Judgment of the Council ſhall abide firm for ever, that the Church of Antioch have under it the two Phœnicia's with Arabia, and the Church of Jeruſalem have under it the three Paleſtina's. Euagrius witneſſeth that this Agreement betwixt Juvenalis and Maximus after Conſultation had both by the Judges and Biſhops was confirmed. Nicephorus teſtifieth the ſame. So untrue it is that William of Tyre and from him Baronius avoucheth that the Church of Jeruſalem was firſt made a Patriarchal See or had the Provinces and Metropolitans of Cæſarea and Scythopolis annexed unto it by the fifth Council, that it is undoubtedly certain, that it had together with the Title and Dignity, true Patriarchal Authority and power over divers Provinces with their inferiour Biſhops conferred upon it, by a plenary conſent of the whole Church in this Council of Chalcedon.

Lib. de Pontif. Rom. l. 1. c. 24.
Ad Epiſt. Anacleti 3. tom. 1. Conc. & ad Conc. Nic. c. 7.
Ep. ad Pammachium.
Conc. Nic. c. 7.
Of the fifth Council, ch. 31.
Leonis Ep. 62.
Act. 7. p. 105.
Lib. 3. c. ult. verſus finem.
Nic. Calliſtus lib. 15. c. 30.

11. That

Which is falſly objected againſt by Baronius and Binius.

11. That you may ſee the ſhamefull dealing both of Baronius and Binius in another place (Reader they are Crackanthorp's words) where their Choler againſt the fifth Council was not moved they acknowledge that truth, for intreating of the Council at Chalcedon, In this ſeventh Seſſion, ſaith Baronius, and the like doth Binius, was the controverſie compoſed betwixt the Biſhops of Antioch and Jeruſalem, and the cauſe being judged, the two Phœnicia*'s and* Arabia, were given to the Biſhop of Antioch, and the three Paleſtines were adjudged to the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, whence it doth evidently appear that the right of the Metropolis which before belonged to the Biſhop of Cæſarea was tranſlated to the Biſhop of Jeruſalem. So they, who yet in hatred againſt the Acts of the fifth Council (the reaſons of their hatred ſhall be declared in due place) with Faces of Adamant deny that truth which here upon this occaſion they confeſs to be clear and conſpicuous. But the Cardinal objecteth that this Decree of Chalcedon was made Poſt abſentiam Legatorum, when the Popes Legates were now gone, and ſo they being abſent, is to be held invalid. O the forehead of the Cardinal! were the Pope's Legates abſent? were they gone? Truly they were not onely preſent at this Decree and conſenting to it, but after it was propoſed by Maximus and Juvenalis, they were the very firſt that gave ſentence therein, the Council following their ſentence. For thus runs the ſtory, Paſchaſinus and Lucentius the moſt Reverend Biſhops, and Boniface the Preſbyter holding the place of the Apoſtolick See, ſaid by Paſchaſinus; Thoſe things betwixt Maximus and Juvenalis are known to be done for their good and peace, & noſtræ humilitatis interloquutione firmantur, and are confirmed by the Interloquution of our humility, ut nulla in poſterum in hac cauſa ſit contentio, that never hereafter there ſhould be any contention about this matter between theſe Churches. Is it credible that the Cardinal ſhould be ſo audacious and impudent as to utter ſuch palpable untruths? unleſs he had quite put off, I ſay not Modeſty, but Reaſon, Senſe, and almoſt Humane Nature.

Ad An. 451. num. 124. Nich. ad hoc Conc. p. 184. Vide etiam Baron. ad An. 451. num. 26.

Ad An. 553. num. 246.

Act. 7. p. 105.

12. Baronius following on his charge, in the ſecond place objecteth that Pope Leo himſelf withſtood this Decree of this Council of Chalcedon, becauſe it was prejudicial to the Rights of other Churches, and by reaſon of his Averſeneſs, it was not put in Execution as it was after the Decree of the fifth Synod, Dr. Crackanthorp coming in here alſo to the relief of the Council, affirmeth that had the Cardinal and his Friends been well adviſed they would have been afraid and much aſhamed once to mention the reſiſtence of Pope Leo, to the Council of Chalcedon, either in theſe Patriarchs or the other of Conſtantinople: for firſt, the reſiſtence of Leo which was merely ineffectual, demonſtrates that the Popes contradiction, with all his might and power, can neither diſanull nor infringe the Judgment of a general Council, which is no ſmall prejudice to his principality or Princely Supremacy. Again it convinceth Leo of a very foul and inexcuſable Errour, judging the Nicene Canons concerning matters of Order, Polity, and Government of the Church (ſuch are theſe concerning the extent of Sees or Superiority of one Biſhop above another) to be unalterable and Eternal, no leſs than the Decrees of Faith. The condition, ſaith he, of the Nicene Canons (pointing in the margent to the ſixth and ſeventh both which concern the Limits of Sees) being ordained by the Spirit of God, is in no part ſoluble; and whatſoever is divers from their conſtitution, omni penitus authoritate vacuum eſt, is utterly void of all Authority by whom ſoever it be Decreed. Much more in this and the following Epiſtle he addeth to the ſame purpoſe. Particularly concerning Juvenalis who was truly at this time made a Patriarch, for keeping the Statutes of the Holy Fathers, which in the Nicene Synod are confirmed inviolabilibus decretis by Inviolable Decrees, I admoniſh your Holineſs ſaith he, that the Laws of the Churches may continue, let no Man's Ambition covet what's another Man's, let no Man ſeek by impairing another to advance himſelf, for though they ſeek Aſſiſtence from Councils, Infirmum atq; Irritum erit quicquid à prædictorum Patrum Canonibus diſcreparit; whatſoever differs from theſe Nicene Canons ſhall be void. And to Maximus Biſhop of Antioch; Let it ſuffice that I pronounce this in general, ad omnia, as to all matters, concerning Limits of Sees and the like, that, If any thing be attempted by any Man, in any Synod againſt the Statutes of the Nicene Canons, nihil præjudicii poteſt inviolabilibus inferre decretis, It can bring no prejudice to theſe unalterable and inviolable Decrees. Thus Leo erroniouſly judging the order preſcribed in the Nicene Canons for the bounds and pre-eminence of Biſhops to be Eternal, and not to be altered by any Council whatſoever.

Quo priùs.

Leo Epiſt. 53.

54

Ep. 61.

Ep. 62.

13. Behold the wiſedom of the Cardinal in alledging Pope Leo. If the Decree of Chalcedon was not of force becauſe Leo contradicted it, then neither can that other Decree, ſuppoſed to be made in the fifth Council, be effectual, becauſe Leo contradicteth it alſo, ſeeing that by the Judgment of Leo, at no time, by no Perſon, by no Council, by no Authority can the order of Nice be changed. If this at Chalcedon was not in force, to which the Pope's Legates conſented, how can the Cardinal think that of the fifth Council to be of force, to which neither Pope nor Legate conſented, nor was ſo much as preſent in the Council? If the Judgment of Leo ſtand for good, then neither is, nor ever was either Conſtantinople or Jeruſalem Patriarchal Sees; and then the Decree of the eighth Council and the Lateran, and I know not how many more muſt be rejected as unlawfull and Impious. If the Judgment of Leo be (as by their eighth Council and the Lateran it is adjudged) Erroneous, then was Jeruſalem a Patriarchal See, notwithſtanding the contradiction of Leo to that Decree. In a word, if Leo his Judgment be of force, it repeals the Decree of the fifth, eighth, and all other General Councils decreeing this; if it be not of force, it neither did nor could infringe the Decree of Chalcedon. But to ſatisfie the Cardinal yet a little more fully, it is an untruth which he ſaith, that the Decree of Chalcedon was not put in Execution, before the time of the fifth Synod and the ſuppoſed Decree thereof. For this Council of Chalcedon decreed that their ſentence in advancing Jeruſalem to a Patriarchal See, ſhould ſtand in force in omni tempore, and therefore doubtleſs even then, and from that very time it was truly a Patriarchal See, the contradiction of Leo no more hindering it the very next or ſecond year, than it did two Hundred or two Thouſand years after that Decree made. Again, as it is certain that the See of Conſtantinople both before and after the Decree of Chalcedon (which was not introductive but confirmative in that point) exerciſed Patriarchal Authority, Juſtinian alſo by his Imperial Law made ſome twelve years before the fifth Council confirming the ſame; ſo it is not to be doubted but the Church of Jeruſalem did the very like in it's own Patriarchal Dioceſe, eſpecially conſidering that Juſtinian's Imperial Law is as forcible for the one as the other. So that for any one to have denied, or ſought then to have infringed the Patriarchal Authority confirmed to Conſtantinople, conferred to Jeruſalem by this Council of Chalcedon, had brought him into danger, not onely of the Eccleſiaſtical cenſure; but of civil puniſhment with the Emperours high indignation.

Novel. 131. c. 1, 2.

14. But if the Cardinal will not be ſatisfied, unleſs he ſee the practice of that Patriarchal Authority, let him look into the General Council under Mennas, and there he ſhall ſee John Biſhop of Jeruſalem, hold a Provincial Synod of the Biſhops of the three Paleſtines, qui ſub eo ſunt, who were under him, two whereof as by their ſubſcriptions appear, were the Metropolitan Biſhops of Cæſarea and Scythopolis, with thirty more; ſo many were then ſubject to the Patriarch of Jeruſalem. Again in another Provincial Synod held at Jeruſalem in the tenth year of Juſtinian, Peter Patriarch of Jeruſalem, was Preſident over all the Biſhops of the three Paleſtines there aſſembled with him, two of which were the aforeſaid Metropolitans. So untrue it is, which Baronius to maintain the falſe Teſtimony of Guil. Tyrius avoucheth, that this Decree of Chalcedon was not put in Execution, before the fifth Council. Another untruth is, that which he pretends in his Fragments of the Fifth Council, that it had no other means to erect this Patriarchſhip of Jeruſalem, but by taking part from both thoſe of Antioch and Alexandria; for there was another means as both the Decree of Chalcedon, and the Event did ſhew, and nothing at all was taken from that of Alexandria. That is alſo as falſe as the reſt, that the Fathers took from Alexandria the Metropolitan Sees and Provinces of Ruba and Berithus, for neither of theſe Sees belonged to the Patriarch of Alexandria, but of Antioch. Of them both Berterius (refuting this Fragment, at which the Cardinal and Binius ſo gladly ſnatcht) ſaith, Certainly Ruba is placed by Ptolemy in Syria, and it's manifeſt that Berithus is the Metropolis of Phœnice near Libanus: Syria autem & Phœnicia orientis Provinciæ omnibus notæ ſunt: Now that Syria and Phœnicia were Provinces of the Eaſt (and conſequently belonging to the See of Antioch) all do know. For Berithus the matter is certain that it is not near the Limits of Alexandria; for that it is in the Province of Phœnicia, not onely Ptolemy ſhews, but the Subſcriptions of the Biſhops, both in the * Nicene, the firſt Conſtantinopolitan † and Chalcedon ‖ Councils, in all which the Biſhop of Berithus is ſet in the Province of Phœnicia; whence another untruth is to be obſerved in that Fragment of Tyrius, which ſaith that Berithus was granted to the new Patriarch of Jeruſalem; whereas

Act. 5. p. 455. &c.

Contra Severum & alios. Tom. 2 Conc. p. 472. Præſidente ſanctiſſimo Patriarcha Petro aſſiſtentibus Epiſcopis trium Paleſtinarum.

Pith. Diatrib. 2. c. 2.

* Lib. 5. c. 15.
† P. 310.
‖ P. 513.

whereas it is clear, that it was in Phœnicia, and that the two Phœnicia's, both by the Agreement of Maximus and Juvenalis, and by this Decree of this Council of Chalcedon, did belong to the See and Biſhop of Antioch, and not of Jeruſalem.

In the 8*th*. Theodoret Biſhop of Cyrus anathematizing Neſtorianiſm is reſtored.

15. In the eighth Seſſion Theodoret, the Biſhop of Cyrus came to clear himſelf, and to be reconciled to the Church. Hitherto he had been received and admitted by the Synod no otherwiſe than as Plaintiff, accuſing Dioſcorus, for injuriouſly outing him of his See, and placing another in it. For when he firſt came into the Council the Biſhops of Egypt, Illyricum and Paleſtine exclaimed againſt him, crying The Canons exclude this Man, out with him, thruſt out the Maſter of Neſtorius, the Orthodox Council doth not receive Theodoret, call him not a Biſhop, he is no Biſhop, he is a Fighter againſt God, he is a Jew, out with him; he accuſed, he anathematized Cyril; If we admit him we reject Cyril. The Canons exclude him, God deteſteth him. Knowing him to have formerly imbraced and defended the Neſtorian Hereſie, they would not be ſatisfied otherwiſe than by the appointment of the Judges, he ſhould ſit onely as an Accuſer of Dioſcorus, not as one having Judicatory Power, or a deciſive Voice, till his own cauſe ſhould come to be heard and thoroughly examined. Now in this eighth Seſſion when he appeared for this purpoſe, no ſooner was he eſpied but the Biſhops cried out again, Let Theodoret forthwith anathematize Neſtorius, let him do it ſpeedily and without delay. He offered to them a Paper containing a Confeſſion of his Faith, but they refuſed to hear it. Then began he at large to clear himſelf, telling them he came thither out of a ſenſe he had, that he was calumniated as if he had taught Hereſie, that as he had been bred and educated amongſt the Orthodox, ſo he had ever taught, being averſe to Neſtorius, Eutyches and all others who held falſe and heterodox Opinions. But as he was proceeding, the Synod ſuſpecting that he uſed theſe delays as unwilling to anathematize Neſtorius, cried out, He is an Heretick, He is a Neſtorian, put out the Heretick, and out they had put him, but that leaving all Circuition and delay, he preſently cried out Anathema to Neſtorius, and to them that either do not confeſs Mary the Virgin to be the Mother of God, or divide the one onely begotten Son into two. He told them alſo, that he ſubſcribed to the Definition of Faith, and the Epiſtle of Leo the moſt Holy Archbiſhop. With this the Synod was fully ſatisfied, the glorious Judges ſaying, Now all doubt is quite removed concerning Theodoret, and receiving him into Communion as Orthodox reſtored him to his See, of which in the Epheſine Latrociny he had been outed, all crying out, Theodoret is worthy of his See, let the Church receive their Orthodox Paſtour, To Theodoret a Catholick Doctour, let the Church be reſtored.

Act. 1. p. 6.

Act 8. Nihil relegi volumus, anathematizet Neſtorium.

In the Ninth Ibas Biſhop of Edeſſa renouncing his Hereſie,

16. In the Ninth Seſſion was examined the Cauſe of Ibas Biſhop of Edeſſa, who had alſo been depoſed by Dioſcorus and his Epheſine Juncto. He had formerly held the Hereſie of Neſtorius, and after the Union betwixt Cyril and John, had written a Letter full fraught of Hereſie and Blaſphemy, to Maris a Perſian. About this his Hereſie a Synod was held at Berithus, before Photius, Euſtathius and Uranius, where the Epiſtle and Contents thereof were condemned. But being commanded to imbrace the firſt Epheſine Synod, which that impious Epiſtle rejecteth, and to condemn and accurſe Neſtorius with his Followers commanded by that Epiſtle, he conformed himſelf to their order, profeſſing that he believed as the Letters of Cyril unto John did teach, and that he conſented to all things done by the firſt Epheſine Synod, accounting their Judgment as inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt. Moreover, at the Inſtance of Photius and Euſtathius he publiſhed in Writing, what he now profeſſed for full ſatisfaction of ſuch as had been ſcandalized by his former Doctrine. And on his own accord he promiſed before theſe Judges, that he would in his own Church at Edeſſa, and that publickly accurſe Neſtorius as the Ringleader in that Impious Hereſie, and thoſe alſo who were of his Judgment, or who uſed his Books or Writings. The Acts of theſe matters being read in Councill, Eunomius told the Fathers that ſeeing in poſterioribus or in poſtremis, Ibas had made a right Confeſſion, (though he did formerly write againſt Cyril and the Faith) he judged him worthy of his Biſhoprick, provided he accurſed Neſtorius, Eutyches with their wicked Hereſies, and conſented to the Writings of Leo, and this General Council. Now the Orthodox Confeſſion of Ibas made before Photius and Euſtathius, the accurſing of Neſtorius and his Hereſie, and the imbracing of the Epheſine Council is that which Eunomius calleth poſteriora or poſtrema, as following by many years, not onely that which Ibas did or ſaid before the Union made between John and Cyril, but even that impious Epiſtle written written after the Union. By this Confeſſion being poſterius, or later, than the Epiſtle, Ibas had refuted all for which he was formerly blamed, in effect refuting, condemning and accurſing that whole Epiſtle with all the Hereſies and Blaſphemies in all parts thereof. For this Cauſe, and in regard of this Holy Confeſſion, the fifth Council afterwards ſaid, that thereby Ibas had anathematized his own Epiſtle, being in every part of it contrary to the Faith, both in the beginning and the end.

*Apud Act. Conc. Chalced. Act.*9.*p.*108.A.

Coll. 6. p. 564.

Is reſtored in the tenth by the Fathers.

17. That this was the meaning of Eunomius, the Interlocution of Euſebius, Biſhop of Angra, in this ſame Council of Chalcedon doth make apparent, who expreſly mentioning theſe Acts before Photius and Euſtathius, and the Confeſſion of Ibas then made (called by Eunomius Poſteriora) ſaid thus in the following Seſſion, to which the Concluſion of this matter was adjourned: The reading of that Judgment before Photius and Euſtathius doth ſhew, that Ibas in that Judgment accurſed Neſtorius with his impious Doctrines, and conſented to the true Faith. Wherefore I receive him for a Biſhop, if he do now condemn Neſtorius. This was applauded by Diogenes Biſhop of Cyzicus, Thalaſſius of Cæſarea, John of Sebaſtia, to which all acclaimed, We all ſay the ſame. So clear it is, that upon this Confeſſion of Ibas made firſt before Photius and Euſtathius, and after that by this whole Council of Chalcedon, and not upon his Epiſtle nor any part firſt or laſt thereof, Ibas was acknowledged and received as a Catholick. Whereby appeareth not onely the Errour, but extreme fraud of Baronius, who in excuſe of Vigilius, not onely affirmeth an heretical Untruth, that the latter part of the Epiſtle is Orthodox, but labours to uphold that untruth by malitious perverting and falſifying, both the words and meaning of Eunomius, as if he had ſaid or meant by the Poſteriora, the latter end of that Epiſtle. This and more in Confutation of the Cardinal about that Epiſtle, and in defence of the Fifth Council, and the Acts thereof the Reader may ſee in the Book of Dr. Crackanthorp formerly mentioned, and we ſhall have too much occaſion again to ſpeak of this Subject. As for Nonnus who had been put into Ibas's place, the Synod referred it to the Biſhop of Antioch to take care of him. The moſt glorious Judges confirmed what the Synod had done, ſaying, that what the Holy Council had judged concerning the Reverend Biſhop Ibas, ſhould retain its own Strength. And ſo ended the Tenth Seſſion.

In the eleventh the Epheſine Latrocine Orders are made void.

At the twelfth the Conteſt 'twixt Stephen and Baſſianus decided.

18. At the Eleventh Meeting the Synod decreed all things, which had been done in the Epheſine Latrociny under Dioſcorus, ſhould be void and of no effect, the Ordination of Maximus Biſhop of Antioch excepted, and they petitioned the Emperour, that ſuch things as there had paſſed ſhould not be taken for Authentical. At this Seſſion alſo contended Stephen and Baſſianus, about the Biſhoprick of Antioch, both challenging it as his due, and recriminating each other. The Emperour upon the earneſt Petition of Baſſianus, commanded the Synod to examine the Cauſe. The Fathers were ſo much divided in their opinions, that they were forced to put it off till their next Meeting. Yet would they generally have given Sentence for Baſſianus, ſaying that Equity and Right called for him to be Biſhop of the place; but the glorious Judges conſidering more ſeriouſly, and ſeeing farther into the matter, thought that neither of them both could indeed be Biſhop, and the whole Council directed by them altered their Opinion, and ſaid, This is a juſt ſentence, this is the very Judgment of God It was therefore reſolved that both of them ſhould be removed from the See of Epheſus, yet ſo that they ſtill retained the Epiſcopal Dignity, and to each ſhould be paid out of that Church, the Annual ſtipend of 200 Solidi for their maintenance. Now a Solidus after the time of Conſtantine, as our Learned Brierwood hath obſerved, was worth of our Money Eight Shillings Six-pence Halfpenny Farthing, and Six parts of a Farthing, till the time of Valentinian, who increaſed it to the Value of juſt ten Shillings. At the thirteenth Seſſion was compoſed, the difference betwixt Eunomius Biſhop of Nicomedia and Anaſtaſius of Nice, by a Decree, that foraſmuch as Nicomedia had ever been the Metropolis, and Nice had onely obtained that Title by favour of Princes, the Metropolitan Rights ſhould be, and continue in the See of Nicomedia, according to the Ancient Canons. The fourteenth Meeting was employed in the Cauſe of Athanaſius Biſhop of Paros, who being accuſed of ſundry Crimes, had been ſummoned before a Provincial Synod called to Antioch by Domnus, Biſhop of that See, to whoſe Patriarchal Authority the Biſhoprick of Paros was ſubject. Refuſing to come though thrice cited to appear, he was depoſed by that Synod, and Sabinianus put into his place. In this Seſſion he complained of wrongfull Extruſion, and petitioned the

In Greek Νόμισμα. De Antiq. Nummis Roman. c. 15.

At the thirteenth the difference 'twixt Eunomius Biſhop of Nicomedia, and Anaſtaſius of Nice compoſed.

In the fourteenth the Cauſe of Athanaſius Biſhop of Paros diſcuſſed.

Council, that his See might be reſtored to him, excuſing himſelf that he appeared not at the Synod of Antioch according to ſummons, becauſe Domnus the chief Judge therein was his Enemy, and thereupon he could not eſteem him an equal and indifferent Judge, though he could not but acknowledge him his Patriarch. The Glorious Judges that the matters laid to the charge of Athanaſius, ſhould be examined in Synod by Maximus then Patriarch of Antioch; and in caſe he were found guilty of theſe Crimes, he ſhould for ever ſtand debarred from his Biſhoprick. But if either in that ſpace of time they examined not the Merit of his Cauſe, or upon Examination found him innocent, he ſhould then as unjuſtly depoſed be reſtored to his See of Paros, and Sabinianus ſhould remain his Subſtitute till Maximus could provide him of another Biſhoprick. This Sentence of the ſecular Judges, the whole Council approved, crying out, Nothing is more juſt, nothing is more equal, this is a juſt Sentence, you judge according to the Mind of God.

At the fifteenth Meeting were made 27 Canons.

19. At their fifteenth Meeting were twenty ſeven Canons made, of which we ſhall in ſhort deliver the ſubſtance. “ The Firſt confirms ſuch as had been by the “ Fathers ordained in former Synods. The Second cenſureth that Biſhop that ſhould “ ordain for Money, depoſing him and nulling the Orders to him, on whom
1. “ they are conferred. In the Third the Synod taking notice at the inſtance of the
2. “ Emperour, how ſeveral in Orders hired Lands for Lucres ſake, undertook ſe-
3. “ cular employments, and through lazineſs neglected Divine Service, betook “ themſelves to ſecular Perſons, and for profit became their Steward, and over“ ſaw their buſineſs, decreed that thenceforth it ſhould be unlawfull for any Bi“ ſhop, Clerk or Monk to hire any Poſſeſſions, or meddle with any ſecular E“ ſtates, excepted ſuch as the Laws did not excuſe from the Charge of Tutours “ or Curatours, or the Biſhop of the City ſhould entruſt with the Adminiſtra“ tion of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, the overſight of Widows or Orphans, or ſuch “ Perſons that ſtood in need of the aſſiſtence of the Church in the fear of “ God. If any acted contrary to this Canon, he ſhould be liable to Eccleſiaſti“ cal Cenſures, by which the Gloſs in the Decree tells us, that Excommunication
4. “ and Suſpenſion is underſtood. The Fourth Confeſſeth that ſuch as chuſe true-
“ and purely a ſolitary Life are worthy of convenient honour. But certain “ Perſons in the Habit of Monks, careleſly and preſumptuouſly paſſing from “ City to City, and Monaſtery to Monaſtery, and thereby condemning them“ ſelves, it pleaſeth the Synod that no Monaſteries or Oratories be builded “ or made without the Knowledge of the Biſhop of the City, as alſo that ſuch as “ in Cities or Villages live in Monaſteries ought to be ſubject to the Biſhop, “ be quiet and continuing in theſe places where firſt they devoted themſelves
“ to God, be conſtant in Faſting and Prayer, not medling either with Eccleſiaſti“ cal or Secular Affairs, or forſaking their Monaſteries, except thereto injoy-“ ned for urgent Reaſons by the Biſhop of the Dioceſe. Alſo that no Slave be “ taken in to be a Monk, without conſent of his Lord. Such as act contrary “ to theſe things they excommunicate, that the Name of the Lord be not blaſ-“ phemed, and reſolve that the Biſhop take care, and have inſpection over the “ Monaſteries.

Act. Conc. & 25.91. A ſanctis Patribus, 19. 1. ſi quis Epiſcopus. Diſt. 86. c. 26. Pervenit ad ſanctam Synodum.

16. q. c. 12. Qui verè & purè & 18. q. 2. c. 10. Quidam Monachorum.

Μήτε δὲ ἐκκλησιαστικοῖς μήτε βιωτικοῖς παρενοχλεῖν πράγμασιν ἢ ἐπικοινωνεῖν.

20. “ In their fifth Canon the Fathers Decree by reaſon of thoſe Biſhops and
5. “ Clerks that paſſed from City to City, that the Canons made by the Holy Sy“ nods retain their ancient force and vigour; which former Synods, as we have “ ſeen before, ordained, that No Eccleſiaſtical Perſon without ſome lawfull and “ weighty cauſe ſhould forſake his Calling and Station in
6. “ one place, to remove into another. The Sixth enjoyns, “ that No Presbyter or Deacon be ordained abſolutely or “ without a Title, nor out of a publick place, as a Church “ or a Monaſtery. Such as are ordained without Title,
“ it pleaſeth the Holy Synod that the Impoſition of Hands “ upon them be void and null, to the reprehenſion of thoſe
7. “ who ſo ordain them. The Seventh Forbids Clerks or “ Monks to turn Souldiers, or aſpire to Secular Honours, Anathematizing ſuch
“ as having ſo done ſhould not return to their former ſtation. As to the latter Part concerning Honours, the Gloſs tells us here is meant onely ſuch places of Honour wherein Juriſdiction of Bloud is exerciſed, or filthy lucre, or perſonal ſervice is required; elſe it appears by other Laws that a Biſhop or Clerk may enjoy Secular Dominion, ſo he exerciſe what belongs to Bloud by his Deputy. The
8. Eighth Canon declares, that “ Clerks whether in Hoſpitals, Churches dedicated “ to

7. q. 1. Propter eos Epiſcopos. c. 26.

Diſt. 70.

Εἰ μὴ ἰδικῶς ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ πόλεως ἢ κώμης ἢ μαρτυρίῳ ὁ χειροτονούμενος, &c.

20. q. 3. Eos qui Semel. c. 3.

Ut 88. Diſt. Epiſcopus gubernationem & 5. q. 4. quia Johannes.

“ to Martyrs, or Monaſteries, are according to the tradition of the Holy Fathers “ under the Power of the Biſhop of the City, from which they ought not pre- “ ſumptuouſly to withdraw themſelves. Therefore ſuch as ſhall reſcind this “ order, and refuſe to be ſubject to their own Biſhop; if Clerks, it ſubjects “ them to the puniſhments inflicted by the Canons, according to their quality; “ if Monks or Lay-perſons, it deprives them of Communion. 9. The Ninth decrees, that One Clerk having a quarrel againſt another, the matter ſhall be decided by their Biſhop. If a Clerk have a Controverſie with his own Biſhop or another, it ſhall be judged by the Provincial Synod, or (as Theodore Balſamon expounds it) by the Metropolitan of the Province. But if any Biſhop or Clerk have any Controverſie with the Metropolitan, let him betake himſelf to the Primate of the Dioceſe, or to the See of the Royal City of Conſtantinople, and there be Judged. That this is a true and genuine Canon Nicholas the firſt of that Name Biſhop of Rome confeſſeth, but both he and the later Romaniſts miſerably torment themſelves in expounding it, as not knowing how to evade the ſtroke which it gives to their pretended Supremacy.

Ep. 1.

The ninth whereof giving appeals to Conſtantinople very much perplexeth the Baronians and the Romaniſts to expound for their turn.

21. They are forced ſo to expound the word Dioceſe, as meant of the whole word it ſelf, as if any one meanly converſant in Church Antiquities knew not there were many Dioceſes of old. And by the Primate they will mean none other than him of Rome, though the Sun be not clearer than this, that there were ſeveral other Primates beſides him, and they ſo ridiculouſly expound this Canon, as commanding all Appeals to be made from the Metropolitans to the Pope in all places of the World, and permitting onely the ſame to be done to the Patriarch of Conſtantinople by thoſe who inhabited near to that City. Now can it be imagined that theſe Fathers ſhould forbid Appeals from the Metropolitan to the Patriarch of the Dioceſe, whenas by a Decree of thoſe of Nice Appeals lye to him? In no caſe but by the ambiguous titles given to Primates, theſe Romaniſts impoſe upon unwary Readers. For as we ſaid formerly, there being fourteen Dioceſes in the Church, over each of them one Biſhop preſided with Patriarchal power, under ſeveral Names and Titles, as ſometimes of Patriarch, ſometimes of Metropolitan, otherwhiles of Primate, Exarch or Prince, which laſt is given to John the Patriarch of Antioch in this very Council of Chalcedon. All theſe fourteen Primacy Biſhops had the ſame equal Patriarchal power, although at firſt three and afterwards ſix of them were eſpecially and by way of eminence called Patriarchs. So inſulſe and ſilly is that plea that the Roman Biſhop is here meant, becauſe the word Exarch is uſed, that (as Berterius himſelf obſerveth) in this very Council this ſame word is uſed to ſignifie the (a) Primate of the Eaſt or him of Antioch, and for proof that the Primates had this title he alledgeth (b) this very ninth Canon upon which we inſiſt, withall proving, that even the Byſhop of (c) Tyre in the eighth Synod hath given him the Title of Exarch, who yet was not reckoned in the number of Patriarchs or Primates.

Act. 1. p. 22.

Pithan. Diatrib. 2. c. 1.

(a) Rurſus ab Exarcho Orientis Diœceſis evocatus eſt.

(b) Καταλαμβανέτω τὸν Ἔξαρχον τῆς διοικήσεως.

(c) Ὅρος Θωμᾶ μητροπολίτου Τύρου πρωτοθρόνου καὶ Ἐξάρχου, καὶ τοποτηρητοῦ τῆς Θεουπόλεως.

22. The meaning therefore of theſe Chalcedonian Fathers was this, that ſeeing (as appears from * a conſtitution of Juſtinian de foro Clerici & Epiſcopi accuſati) the Council of Nice or ſome other had preſcribed the form and method of Appeals to be, that firſt they ſhould lye from the Biſhop to the Metropolitan, from him to the Primate, the Prince, Exarch or Metropolitan of the Dioceſe, and to no others, a General Council onely excepted; out of reſpect to the Dignity of the Imperial Seat they conferred this Honour on the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, that it ſhould be lawfull for any Biſhop in any Dioceſe whatſoever at his choice, if he thought he ſhould not be indifferently heard, to appeal from the Metropolitan of the Province or the Provincial Synod, to the ſaid Biſhop inſtead of the Exarch or Primate of the Dioceſe. Another meaning of theſe Fathers ſeems to have been this: that whereas formerly it was unlawfull to appeal from the Definitive Sentence of the Primate or Patriarch to the Tribunal of any other Patriarch or Biſhop, to doe Honour to this Imperial Seat, they gave leave to appeal to the Biſhop thereof from any Sentence of Primates or Patriarchs, which the words themſelves, Let him repair to the Exarch of the Dioceſe, or the Seat or Biſhop of the Royal City, ſeem, though obſcurely to hint, but practice and the Imperial Law formerly mentioned plainly declareth, wherein is enjoyned that If after appeal to Patriarchs or Metropolitans, or any other Biſhop ſentence be pronounced which diſpleaſeth any party, if this party appeal, the appeal muſt lye to the See of Conſtantinople, wherein, as the Cuſtome was, the matter is to be determined. To the Patriarch of Conſtantinple therefore from the ſentence of any other Patriarch or Dioceſan Primate Appeal was granted, and from him none, except to a General Council, to which, as the African Fathers, in their Letters to * Cœleſtine, affirm it lawfull to appeal, ſo theſe of Chalcedon never intended to barr any one concerned of that liberty. And particularly as a † Learned Proteſtant obſerveth, as from any Province, ſo alſo from that of the Roman Patriarch himſelf Appeal is allowed by this Holy and Oecumenical Council, to the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, but on the contrary from him of Conſtantinople or a Primate of any other Dioceſe to the Roman Biſhop the liberty of appeal is granted in no cauſe whatſoever.

* L. Sancimus ut nemo de Epiſcopali Audientia. L. 29. Cod. Juſtin.

10. 23. The Tenth Canon * prohibits " Clerks to paſs from " a Church in one City to one in another; or if a Clerk
" be tranſlated to another, to have to doe with the former " upon pein of Depoſition. How the Gloſs endeavours to reconcile this Canon with later Laws and Practice is too long here to be ſhewn, and therefore the 11. Reader may at his leiſure conſult it. The Eleventh " † Forbids a Clerk or Rea" der to Miniſter in any ſtrange place whatſoever without Letters commenda-12. " tory from his own Biſhop. In the Twelfth the Synod taking notice that certain
" Perſons had procured Pragmaticks or Reſcripts from Princes, for dividing one " Province into two, ſo that two Metropolitans happened to be in one and the " ſame Province, forbad any Biſhop to attempt the like for the time to come, under pein of Depoſition. This Canon the Gloſs reſtraineth and limiteth, in 13. * caſe the multitude of People encreaſeth in the Province. The Thirteenth, or rather the Eleventh, ordains, that " All Indigent Perſons ſhall have E- 14. " piſtolia or Pacifick Letters, and not Commendatory. The Fourteenth for" bids Pſalmiſts and Readers to take Wives of another Sect. If any hath " already ſo done, the Synod commands, that Their Children Baptized by
" Hereticks be preſented to the Catholick Church, therein to communicate.
" If they be not yet Baptized, they are in no wiſe to be Baptized by Hereticks,
" neither to be Married to any Heretick, Jew or Pagan, except ſuch Perſon 15. " to whom they are Married engage to conform to the Orthodox Faith. The " Fifteenth declares, that A Deaconeſs ought not to be ordained till forty years " of Age, and then not without diligent examination. If being ordained ſhe had " ſerved at all in this Miniſtry and married afterward, the Canon anathematizeth
" her, and him that married her. At this Age indeed a Woman might know " whether ſhe could bear the condition of Cælibate, and conſequently thoſe great
" diſorders would be prevented, which have been too common amongſt Girls
" inſnared in this courſe of life. But foraſmuch as Chaſtity is the gift of God, and in the power of none perfect in either Sex, the humour of this Age is hereby diſ-16. covered too much admiring and doting on forced Virginity. This the next or Sixteenth Canon farther evinceth, which "Commands that no Virgin which had dedica" ted herſelf to God, or Monk, ſhould Marry, under pein of Excommunication; yet
" they decree that they be gently dealt with if the Biſhop of the place think fit.

17. 24. " The ſeventeenth enacts that Biſhops retain thoſe Countrey Pariſh Church" es whereof they are in Poſſeſſion, eſpecially if they have kept them without " violence the ſpace of thirty years. But if within this term of years there " hath been or ſhall happen to ariſe any controverſie about them, it ſhall be law-
" full for ſuch as think themſelves aggrieved to traverſe their cauſe in a Pro" vincial Synod. And if any think himſelf injured by his own Metropolitan, he " may either betake himſelf to the Primate of the Dioceſe, or to the See of *Con-
" ſtantinople*, as was ſaid before, viz. in the 9th. Canon. But if any City be al" tered by the Authority Imperial or ſhall be altered for the time to come, the " order of Pariſh Churches ſhall be conformable as to Civil and Publick Orders.
18. " The eighteenth forbids upon pein of Depoſition all Aſſo" ciations and Conſpiracies amongſt Clerks or Monks a-" gainſt Biſhops, made it ſeems in behalf of Eutyches and 19. " his Doctrine. The ninteenth commands the Biſhops to " hold Provincial Synods twice a year, according to Anci-20. " ent Canons. The twentieth commands a Clerk ordained " in one Church there to ſtay, and not betake himſelf to " another, except out of Neceſſity when they loſe their " former places. If any Biſhop hereafter receives any ſuch Clerk belonging to " another Biſhop it pleaſeth the Holy Synod that both the Clerk and the Recei" ver remain ſo long Excommunicated till the Man return to his former Church,

---

* Conc. Afric. Can. ult. vel 105.

† Crackanthorp. Defenſ. Eccleſiæ Angl. contra Spalat. c. 31.

* 21. q. 1. c. 2. Clericum in duarum Eccleſiis civitatum eodem tempore conſcribi non oportet.

† Ibid. 2. c. 3. Signis jam.

Diſt. 17.

Diſt. 110. c. 1.

* Ut 16. q. 1. Præcipimus, & Diſt. 99. Nulli.

Diſt. 32. quoniam in quibuſdam.

27. q. 1. Diaconiſſam non debere c. 23.

27. q. 1. ſiqua virgo. c. 22.

16. q. 3. c. 1. Per ſingulas Eccleſias.

11. q. 1. c. 1. Conjurationum & conſpirationum quod apud Græcos, φρατεία dicitur, &c.
Diſt. 18. *c.*6. Pervenit ad noſtras aures.
Diſt. 11. Clericos. c. 4.
Cauſ. 2. q. 7. c. 49. Clericos aut Laicos.
12. q. 2. c. 43. Non liceat Clericis.

“ agreeable to what the Nicene Fathers had formerly decreed in their 16 Canon.
21. “ The one and twentieth requires that ſuch as accuſe Eccleſiaſtical Perſons be not
22. “ lightly admitted except they be Men of known repute. The twenty ſecond forbids “ Clerks to rifle the goods of their deceaſed Biſhop (which it ſeems was at this “ time practiſed and had been prohibited by former Canons) under Pein of incurring “ Depoſition. This Canon was long after reinforced by the Laterane
23. “ Council (Cap. 4.) under Innocent the ſecond. In the twenty third the Holy Synod “ taking notice that certain Monks without any order from their Biſhop and “ ſometimes by him Excommunicated, repair to the Royal City of Conſtantinople, “ where they diſturb the Peace of the Church, and corrupt ſeveral Houſes, ordaineth
“ that they firſt be admoniſhed to depart the Town, if they refuſe,
“ to be forced out and compelled to return to their own places by the Defenſor.

16. q. 1. c. 17. Quidam Monachi nihil habentes.

24. “ The twenty fourth Canon commands that ſuch Monaſteries as had been ſo “ made by conſent of the Biſhops continue ſuch and be not again changed to ſecular
25. “ uſes. By the twenty fifth notice being taken how certain Metropolitans neglected
“ their Flocks, and deferred the Ordination of Biſhops, it therefore ordains “ that Conſecration of Biſhops be made within three Months except there be “ abſolute Neceſſity of protracting the time, under pein of heavy cenſure. As “ alſo that the whole Revenue of the vacant Church be collected and laid up by the
26. “ Stewards thereof. In their twenty ſixth the Fathers ſignifie
“ how they are informed that in certain Churches, Biſhops “ manage the Revenues thereof without any Oeconomus
“ or Steward, therefore they reſolve that every Church
“ having a Biſhop have alſo its Steward, or Diſpenſator, “ one of its own Clerks who by the conſent of the Biſhop ſhall Adminiſter the “ Income thereof that there may be witneſs how it is managed, leſt waſte be
27. “ made of its ſubſtance and the Prieſtly dignity be ill ſpoken off. The twenty “ ſeventh cenſureth ſuch as commit Rapes and thereby get themſelves Wives, as “ alſo ſuch as aſſiſt them if Clerks with Depoſition, if lay Perſons, with the Anathema.
“ Beſides theſe 27 Canons are three more extant in the Tome of the Councils whereof the firſt confirms the former Decree of the Epheſine Synod about the Privileges of the See of Conſtantinople. For, following in all things, as the Canon runs, The Decrees of the Holy Fathers and acknowledging that lately read, of the 150 Biſhops lovers of God, we alſo decree and ordain the ſame things concerning the Privileges of the moſt holy Church of Conſtantinople being New Rome.
For on the throne of Ancient Rome, becauſe that City was the ſeat of the Empire, the Fathers deſervedly beſtowed Privileges. And the 150 Biſhops moved by the ſame conſideration gave equal Privileges to the moſt holy Throne of New Rome, rightly judging that the City which was honoured with Empire and a Senate and enjoyed equal Privileges with the Ancient Lady Rome, ought to be extolled and magnified no loſs than ſhe alſo in Eccleſiaſtick matters, being the next to her, and that the Metropolitans onely of the Dioceſes of Pontica Aſiana and Thracia, as alſo, the Biſhops of the ſaid Dioceſes amongſt the Barbarians ſhould be ordained by the foreſaid Throne of the moſt holy Church of Conſtantinople, each Metropolitan of the ſaid Dioceſes together with the Biſhops of the Province ordaining the Provincial Biſhops, as it is delivered in the Divine Canons. But as is ſaid the Metropolitans of the forenamed Dioceſes are to be ordained by the Archbiſhop of Conſtantinople convenient Elections being made according to Cuſtome, and thereof Notice being given to him.

19. q. 3. Quæ ſemel ſunt c. 4.

Diſt. 75. c. 2. Quoniam quidam Metropolitanorum.

Diſt. 89. c. 3.

Quia in quibuſdam. & cauſ. 16. q. 7. c. 21. Quoniam in quibuſdam ubi vide quæ notantur in gloſſa de Epiſcoporum & aliorum Oeconomis.

Cauſ. 36. q. 2. c. 1. Eos qui rapiunt.

Three Canons more.

The firſt concerning the privileges of the See of Conſtantinople.

Can. 206. Eccleſiæ univerſalis.

Πανταχοῦ τοῖς τῶν ἁγίων πατέρων ὅροις ἕπεσθαι.

Οἱ πατέρες ἀποδεδώκασι τὰ πρεσβεῖα διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην.

Ἴσα πρεσβεῖα ἀπονεῖμαι τῷ τῆς νέας Ῥώμης ἁγιοτάτῳ θρόνῳ.

26. By this Canon the firſt dignity and Precedence was confirmed to the Roman Patriarch as beſtowed on it by the Ancient Fathers, not out of any conſideration that his Church was founded by St. Peter or any other, but out of a ſecular reſpect to the Dominion and Sovereignty of that City, as Miſtreſs or Sovereign of the Empire; the Polity of the Church correſponding as near as poſſible with that of the State. Now that Conſtantinople was put into the ſame Capacity with Old Rome as to Majeſty, Sovereignty and Dominion, the Fathers found the ſame reaſon for conferring the ſame Privileges upon her, though much to the regret and ſtomach of Leo his Legates, who not being preſent when the thing paſſed, came into the Council the next meeting and proteſted againſt it. But this would not doe, their alledging the Nicene Canons ſignified little, the Fathers having in their Memory what had paſſed between the Biſhops of Africk and the former Roman Prelates. They urged that the ſubſcriptions to this Canon were forced and wreſted from the Biſhop by plain conſtraint which was flatly denied by ſuch as had ſubſcribed. Then did the glorious Judges interpoſe and gave ſentence that the chief Honour was to be given to the See of Old Rome, yet Primacy and the like Privileges to that of the New, which now as well as the other was ordained with the Faſces of the Empire, ſo that the Biſhop thereof ſhould have power to ordain Metropolitans in Aſiana, Pontica and Thrace, leaving the Authority to the Metropolitan of each Province to conſecrate Biſhops. Yet would not the Legates be ſatisfied, but required that the Decree might be ſuſpended till the Judgment of Leo might be had about it, to which it's ſaid the Synod Aſſented. But Liberatus affirms that the contradiction and Proteſtation of the Legates was rejected, and how little account was made of it, or of the oppoſition of Leo himſelf appears by the practice of following times, as well as what formerly has been ſaid of this Subject. As for this Canon none either have called in queſtion the truth or the force and validity of it, except thoſe concerned in behalf of Rome. Its found in all Greek Copies, beſides ſeveral Latin ones, as one above a thouſand years Old in Juſtellus his Library, another in that of Monſieur de Thou, which abundantly diſcovers to us the truth and ſincerity of thoſe Roman Copies wherein it is wanting. " There are " beſides thoſe 28 Canons two other mentioned, whereof the firſt forbids a Biſhop " to be reduced to the Decree of a Prieſt making it Sacrilege and requiring that " if any Biſhop be for juſt cauſe degraded, he loſe alſo the Prieſtly Office. The " laſt contemns what the Fathers reſolved concerning the Ægyptian Biſhops who " deſired their ſubſcription to the Epiſtle of Leo might be reſpited till their Me" tropolitan was choſen.

Quod vidiſſe teſtatur Dr. Baſier.

All which are confirmed by the Emperour's Edict.

An Epiſtle ſent to Leo to ſubſcribe to what had been done at this Seſſion.

27. All buſineſs being now diſpatched, the Synod deſired of the Emperour that he would confirm what they had done. He accordingly gave his Royal Aſſent which was followed by Acclamations often ingeminating Thou haſt confirmed the Orthodox Faith. The Fathers alſo cauſed their Synodical Epiſtle full of reſpect to be written to Leo the Roman Patriarch wherein letting him know that they were aſſembled by the Sanction and Decree of the Emperour, they tell him what they had done and deſire him to honour * them with his Approbation. For it was requiſite for the Peace of the Church that ſuch Biſhops as could not be preſent in theſe Oecumenical Councils ſhould approve and confirm what had been done therein. Not that there was any need of judicially determining and defining any controverſie or giving the Deciſion full and perfect Authority, for that had been already done in the General Aſſembly wherein all Biſhops were either perſonally preſent or implicity and juſtly ſuppoſed to be there. But when they ſhould give their expreſs conſent to what they had formerly ratified but implicitly, this would ſtop their mouth for the time to come, remove or prevent all objections ariſing from difference and oppoſition, and whereas we are apt to be drawn more by Example than precept, gain greater repute and conformity to the Decrees. Therefore did this Council ſeek the Approbation of Leo, who being moſt eminent for the dignity of his See, and very conſiderable for his perſonal Qualifications, might be more capable through his Example of doing good or hurt; after by conſenting to procure Peace and Conformity, or by diſſenting to make a rent and ſchiſm in the Church. On this ſame account did Theodoſius the Emperour and Cyril labour ſo much to have John the Patriarch to conſent to the Decrees of the Epheſine Synod againſt Neſtorius, for they knew it would be a great means to draw in the reſt of the diſſenters, as indeed it proved. The truth was, all the Fathers could doe was little enough to preſerve the Church in quiet, and prevent that extravagance both in opinion and practice which the luſts and paſſions of Men ſo frequently procured. Therefore to revive the Memory of former Decrees did each Council, as it were, preſent a new Table of what had paſſed in ſuch as had been before it. So did the Council of Conſtantinople confirm that of Nice with the Faith decreed therein, and this of Chalcedon all three preceding Oecumenical Synods, and the ſecond Nicene Synod or Conventicle all the ſix which had been before it, although each of them was of as great Authority before, and as to their intrinſick value needed not the Confirmation of the ſubſequent eſpecially of the later Sancto.

In perpetuum quæ à vobis terminata ſunt ſerventur. Orthodoxam fidem confirmaſti.

* Rogamus tuis decretis noſtrum honora judicium, Ep. Synod. ad Leonem, poſt Act. 16.

Can. 1.

28. Farther, the Ancient Chriſtian prudence of theſe Fathers, for theſe very reaſons, directed them to make uſe not onely of General Councils but of Provincial Synods, not onely of Patriarchs but particular Biſhops to confirm their General Synods, and the Decrees thereof. Thus the great Nicene Council was confirmed, as they themſelves phraſe it, by Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nice two exiled Biſhops for the cauſe of Hereſie in token of their repentance and converſion. So the Synod Aſſembled at Milan confirmed the Acts of the Firſt Epheſine Council, as Binius himſelf obſerveth. And this very Council of Chalcedon Confirmare decrevimus, apud Socr. l. 1. c. 10.

Not. in Conc. Rom. 3. ſub Sylveſtro.

Chalcedon at the inſtance of Pope Leo, when ſome began to carp at its Decrees, was confirmed by an Edict of the Emperour Leo, who commanded alſo the ſeveral Biſhops to declare their Judgments concerning its Doctrine, that the Council of Chalcedon might be again confirmed, ſaith Binius, by the Conſent and Confeſſion of all theſe Biſhops. In obedience to his Command ſome did it of themſelves, as Anatolius, Lucianus, Sebaſtianus and Agapetus, beſides ſeveral others, ſome jointly as the Biſhops of Egypt and Europe in their Synodal Epiſtles, which are joyned to the Acts of this Council. It is not to be imagined, that the Teſtimony of ſingle Biſhops could give any Authority to an Oecumenical Synod, nor yet Provincial Councils which conſiſted but of 19 Biſhops as that of Milan, or but of ſeven as that of Syria, or ſix as that of Mœſia, five as that of Syria Secunda, or no more than four as that of Oſroena. But much advantage was gained by theſe Teſtimonies, and this may be added to what we have formerly mentioned out of Dr. Crackanthorp, that every one hereby either approved himſelf to be Orthodox in Judgment, or upon refuſal appeared to be heretical in Doctrine, and ſtood ſufficiently convicted, ſo that ſuch a Wolf could not doe miſchief in Sheeps cloathing, the Church having ſufficient notice and warning of him. But thus as the forementioned Learned Perſon obſerveth, Confirmation of Synods by Biſhops was twofold. The Confirmation of thoſe preſent in Council is Judicial, the latter Confirmation by the Abſent is Pacifical. The former Authoritative, ſuch as gives the whole Authority to any Decree, the latter whether by ſucceeding Councils, or abſent Biſhops is Teſtificative witneſſing them to be Orthodox in that Decree. The former joyned to the Imperial Confirmation (which is neceſſary to the making of a Lawfull Council) is Eſſential, eſſentially making both the Council an approved Council, and all the Decrees thereof approved Synodal and Oecumenical Decrees: the latter is Accidental which graceth a Biſhop, but little or nothing the Synod, and being denied doth neither diſgrace the Council, nor impair the Dignity or Authority thereof, but extremely diſgracing the party that denies it, pulls down upon him both the juſt Cenſures of the Church, and the Civil Puniſhments due to Hereticks and Contumacious Perſons.

A twofold Confirmation of Synods by Biſhops.

29. So ſmall reaſon is there for Baronius to infer, that becauſe the Fathers deſire the Aſſent of Leo, therefore they thought their Acts invalid without his Confirmation. But thus ended this famous Chalcedonian Synod, which our Learned Crackanthorp tells us he never read or almoſt remembred, but with a kind of Amazement; he admired the rare Piety, Prudence, Integrity, Moderation and Gravity of thoſe moſt Glorious Judges, who ſupplying the Emperour's place in his Abſence were the Imperial Preſidents in this Council. Had they or ſuch been wanting at this time it may juſtly be feared, conſidering the eagerneſs and temerity, not to ſay the inſolency of the Pope's Legates in this Synod, that this Council of Chalcedon had proved a worſe Latrociny, than was that ſecond of Epheſus. All being diſpatched, the Fathers returned to their ſeveral Churches. Dioſcorus was baniſhed to Gangra, a City of Paphlagonia where he died. In memory of the Condemnation of the Eutychian Hereſie, the Greeks ordained an Anniverſary ſolemnity on the 16*th.* of July, as appears by their Menology. And Martianus the Emperour to follow on the ſtroke, and add the ſecular Arm to the Spiritual ſword, publiſhed an Edict directed to Palladius the Præfectus Prætorio, bearing date on the 26 of January, or the 6*th.* of February next following. For it is extant at large in the Acts of the Council, and part of it in Juſtinian's Code, being there falſly aſcribed to Valentinian and Marcian together, and here falſly dated with the Conſulſhip of Patricius and Richimeres, whereas it appears by the Faſti Conſulares, that in the ſecond year of Marcian, Heraclianus and Aſporatius, bore the Conſular Office. This Law, ſeveral expreſſions whereof are taken out of the Synodal Acts, forbids all Perſons whatſoever to diſpute of Chriſtian Religion in Aſſemblies, ſeeking thereby occaſion of tumult and perfidiouſneſs. He adds a reaſon that this would offer manifeſt Injury to the Judgment of the moſt Reverend Synod aſſembled lately at Chalcedon by his (a) Command, which followed therein the Apoſtolical Doctrine according to former Decrees of the Nicene and Conſtantinopolitan Councils. The Offenders both as Factious and (b) Prophaning the venerable Myſteries before Jews and Pagans, if Clerks ſhould be depoſed, if Souldiers de-

An Edict condemning the Eutychian Hereſie.

Act. 3. Cod. de ſumma Trinit l. 4. & in Synop. ſi Baſilicon. 1. Tit. 1. c. 4. Adde huic legi titulum integrum, Cod. Theod. de his qui Religione contendunt, lib. 16. Tit. 4.

(a) Qui Chalcedone convenerunt per noſtra præcepta.

(b) Sed etiam Judæis & Paganis ex hujuſmodi certamine prophanant veneranda Myſteria.

prived of the Military girdle; Others if Free ſhould be baniſhed from Conſtantinople, and otherwiſe puniſhed, if Slaves chaſtized with the greateſt Severities. Thus much of the Fourth Oecumenical Council, concerning the Integrity of the Acts whereof let the Reader Examine what Dr. Crackanthop applieth to the frivolous objections of Baronius. This and the three former, as made in the pureſt Ages have been deſervedly had in greateſt eſteem, and of ſtrongeſt Authority by all ſober Chriſtians. The Pope of Rome at his promotion (as appears from what Deusdedit, the Cardinal noteth in his Collection of Canons) of old time ſwore, according to a former, exemplified by Gratian in his Decree out of his Day-book, To obſerve theſe four Councils to a Tittle, profeſſing to follow and preach what they held and decreed, and both with Heart and Mouth, to condemn what they condemned. This ancient Oath as our Divines obſerve, badly agreeeth with the late Bulla lænæ, wherein the Roman Patriarch forbids Appeals from himſelf to a General Council. So doth the Profeſſion of Zozimus, formerly mentioned. But from that ancient Oath, a Learned Man inferreth that the Roman Biſhop cannot juſtly plead that he is ſuperiour to theſe Councils, except he arrogate to himſelf Power over the four Goſpels Canones 4 Concil. pro legibus habeantur, vide c. de ſacroſanctis Eccleſiis. l. 4. l. 12. §. 1. Novel. 131. c. 2.

Diſt. 16. c. 8.
Ex diurno Libro Profeſſio Romani Pontificis.

Seſchaſſerius in Conſult. Venet.

Another to the ſame purpoſe, but ordering the Writings of Eutychius to be burnt.

30. The Imperial Edict of Martianus againſt the Eutychian Errours did ſo little good, that he was conſtrained to enforce it by another, bearing date on the 13*th.* of March following, wherein he ſubjects them to the ſame Pains and Penalties as formerly. Yet would not all this doe, for ſuch Tumults were made in Egypt, and the Eaſtern Parts, that he was forced afterwards in this ſame year to add greater Puniſhments, and command the Books and Writings of the Eutychians to be burnt. By a particular Reſcript alſo, he aſmuch as in him lay aboliſhed the Memory of the Arch Heretick, and revived that of Flavianus, becauſe honoured as he ſaith by ſuch, and ſo great a Teſtimony of almoſt innumerable Prieſts, in the Synod of Chalcedon. Into the Seat of Dioſcorus, baniſhed by the Emperour's Command, was elected Proterius by the General conſent of the Council, as Evagrius writes, about which great Tumults and Bloud-ſhed happened at Alexandria, ſome of the People cloſing with his promotion, and others being for the recalling of Dioſcorus. The Commander of Thebais placed his Guards to keep the Peace, but the Inhabitants ſet upon the Magiſtrates, and drove the Souldiers into the old Temple of Serapis, where they burnt them alive. The Report hereof coming to Court, the Emperour ſent down to Alexandria three thouſand diſciplin'd Souldiers, who ſetting upon the Townſmen, and raviſhing their Wives and Daughters, a more fierce and cruel Uproar happened than the former. At length Florus the Governour of the Garriſon, gratifying the Multitude in the Reſtitution of the Corn he had taken from them, their Baths and ſolemn Shews for which they moved, quieted their Minds, and reſtored Peace for a certain time. But whilſt matters thus were ordered at Alexandria, the Monks of Paleſtine inhabiting the Deſarts near to Jeruſalem, who had been at the Council and diſſented from it, returning home and complaining of the form of Faith laid down by the Synod, by their ſtories exaſperated thoſe of their Profeſſion, perſwading them that the Fathers who had made the Decrees were all Neſtorians. Juvenalis the Biſhop of Jeruſalem they expelled, and in his room elected Theodoſius the Captain of the Rout, a cunning and reſolute Fellow, who had drawn Eudoxia the Empreſs Dowager to the Hereſie of Eutyches, whilſt ſhe recided in that City. Having invaded the Chair, he took upon him to place new Biſhops in the Sees of thoſe who were not yet returned from the Council, and viſiting the Cities of Paleſtine, as Metropolitan, compelled them to receive other Paſtours addicted to his Hereſie and Faction, uſing ſuch with great Cruelty as reſiſted his proceedings.

Act. Conc. Chalc. Act. 3.

Cod. lib. 1. Tit. 3. de Epiſcop. & Clericis. l. 23.

Proterius elected in the Seat of Dioſcorus, upon which a Tumult ariſes at Alexandria.

Lib. 2. c. 4. ex Priſco Rhetore.
Liberatus in Breviar. c. 15.
Niceph. lib. 5. c. 19.

Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem, depoſed by the Monks, who ſet up Theodoſius.

Who commits ſeveral Outrages there.

31. Severianus Biſhop of Scythopolis, for ſo doing he drove out of the City, and then procured him to be ſlain. Athanaſius a Prieſt after various Tortures he cauſed to be beheaded, his Body to be dragged up and down the Streets of Jeruſalem, and at laſt caſt to the Dogs. Some he killed, others he plundered or burnt their Houſes, ſo that Jeruſalem repreſented a Town lately taken by an Enemy. When Martianus heard of theſe diſorders, he commanded this Villain to be apprehended and brought to his preſence, and ſending down Juvenalis with a ſufficient Power to redreſs the former Abuſes, commanded him to depoſe as many as Theodoſius had advanced to the Prieſtly Order. But the Bird was flown flown e'er the Souldiers could lay hands on him, and though he was gone, yet the effects of heretical and cruel demeanour ſtill continued, as in other places the ſame furious humour raged amongſt the Eutychian Hereticks, where they could get advantage. This ſame year being the 454 of our Lord, Valentinian and Martian, the Emperours publiſhed an Edict, whereby They decreed that the Privileges granted to all Churches by their Predeceſſours, ſhould remain firm and inviolable. All pragmatick Sanctions, which through Favour or Ambition had been procured againſt the Eccleſiaſtical Canons, they command to be void, and of no effect. And becauſe it concerned them in point of Humanity, to have a care of thoſe that ſtand in need, and take order they want not maintenance, the Salaries which divers ways had been formerly paid to the Churches out of the publick ſtock, they command ſtill to be continued and diſcharged without any failing or defalcation whatſoever.

By the Emperour's Protection and Power Juvenalis is reſtored to his See.

Privilegia quæ generalibus conſtitutionibus univerſis ſacroſanctis Eccleſiis orthodoxæ religionis retro Principes præſtiterant firma & illibata in perpetuum decernimuscuſtodiri.

Omnes ſane pragmaticas ſanctiones quæ contra Canones Eccleſiaſticos interventu gratiæ vel ambitionis elicitæ ſunt, robore ſuo & firmitate vacuatas ceſſare præcipimus, &c. Cod. lib. 1. Tit. 2. l. 12. inſcript. Palladio Pp. Dat. Aetio & Studio Coſſ.

By this Edict it appears, that all Privileges granted by Emperours which were agreeable to the Senſe of the Church, conducing to Order and Government, and not contrary to the Canons were ſo far from being nulled and revoked, that they were ſtrengthened and confirmed, onely thoſe which had clandeſtinely and ſurreptitiouſly contrary to Eccleſiaſtical Decrees, been as were wreſted from Imperial Powers. What reaſon then Baronius hath to conclude that this Reſcript was purpoſely, and at the Requeſt of Leo Biſhop of Rome granted againſt Anatolius and the See of Conſtantinople, the Reader will eaſily apprehend, ſeeing that the Primacy and Juriſdiction thereof, was ſo far from being procured Contra Eccleſiaſticos Canones, that it was founded upon the Canons of two ſeveral Oecumenical Synods, neither ought the Cardinal to object the Decrees of the Nicene Council, except he will plead that the ſame Power that makes a Law cannot reſcind it, or that the Church Univerſal ſuppoſed it to be in the Synods of Conſtantinople and Chalcedon, aſwell as that of Nice cannot according to the Exigency of times, and Comportment of Affairs, bind and looſe and change its own poſitive Laws in things indifferent. The Canons of Nice, whatever Leo or thoſe of his party pretend, were of force to bind any particular Biſhop or Patriarch whatſoever, but not a Council as General, as Lawfull, and conſequently as Authoritative as it ſelf.

An Edict concerning the Ancient privileges to Churches.

32. But becauſe there is nothing in this Edict which can poſſibly perſwade the Reader to be of the Cardinal's opinion, he tells him that this which we find now in the Code he conjectures to be but a parcel of that which the Emperours publiſhed this year, meaning indeed that though there be no mention of Conſtantinople in this, yet in the other Part there was, and Juſtinian ſeems to have left it out at the publiſhing of his Code, becauſe he intended to make a new Law contrary to it, which is that of his thirteenth Novel, the ſecond Chapter. From this muſt neceſſarily follow then that Juſtinian, contrary to former Canons, and conſequently contrary to the four firſt Councils, and the practice before his own time, gave Prerogative and Precedence to the See of Conſtantinople after that of Old Rome; for if this fragment (as he would have it) which is left contradicted not that which is loſt, then nothing was therein forbidden but what was contrary to the Eccleſiaſtical Canons; and Juſtinian again recalling what Baronius will have Martian to have diſanulled, muſt have acted contrary to the ſaid Canons, Councils and, as we may conclude, former practice. See therefore how bravely the forementioned Novel cited by the Annaliſt makes this out. In the firſt Chapter of that Novel the Emperour decrees, that * The Holy Eccleſiaſtical Canons have the force or nature of Laws, he means thoſe which had been made or confirmed by the four Holy Councils, viz. that of the three hundred and eighteen Fathers aſſembled at Nice, the hundred and fifty at Conſtantinople, in the firſt Epheſine wherein Neſtorius was condemned, and at Chalcedon where Eutyches, together with Neſtorius, was anathematized. For the Doctrines of theſe four Synods we receive as the Holy Scriptures, and their Rules (or Canons) we obſerve as Laws: this is the firſt Chapter of the Novel. Then follows the ſecond in theſe words: † Therefore according to their Definitions we decree, that the moſt Holy Pope of the Elder Rome be the firſt of all Prieſts: and the moſt Bleſſed Archbiſhop of Conſtantinople [*] Sancimus igitur vicem legum obtinere Sanctas Eccleſiaſticas Regulas quæ à ſanctis 4 conciliis expoſita ſunt aut firmata, hoc eſt in Nicæna 318, & in Conſtantinopolitana Sanctorum 150 patrum, & in Epheſina prima in quâ Neſtorius eſt damnatus, & in Chalcedonia in quâ Eutyches cum Neſtorio anathematizatus eſt. Prædictatum enim 4 Synodorum dogmata ſicut Sanctas Scripturas accipimus, & regulas ſicut leges obſervamus.

[†] Ideóque ſancimus ſecundum earum definitiones ſanctiſſimum ſenioris Romæ Papam primum eſſe omnium ſacerdotum: beatiſſimum autem Archiepiſcopum Conſtanti- being New Rome, have the Second Place after the Holy Apoſtolick See of Old Rome; but be placed before all other Sees. Theſe words, Therefore according to their Definitions, manifeſtly ſhew that what the Emperour Juſtinian did, was not contrary to the four Councils, but agreeable to, and founded upon their Decrees, and what the Emperour Martian prohibits being onely contrary to them, the Primacy of Conſtantinople could not be meant by that Part of the Edict. Then for the practice before Juſtinian's time, let the Reader conſider what we have formerly ſaid of that ſubject, and how Appeals lay to the ſee of Conſtantinople, from another Novel of that Emperour.

nopoleos novæ Romæ ſecundum habere locum poſt ſanctam Apoſtolicam ſenioris Romæ ſedem: aliis autem omnibus ſedibus præponatur. Auth. Collat. IX. tit. XIV. Novel. CXXXI. p. 184. Cod Juſtin.

33. In the latter Part of that Edict of Valentinian and Martian, they take care that the Accuſtomed Salaries be paid to Churches, and that || out of conſideration that it became them as an Act of Humanity to provide for thoſe in diſtreſs, and doe their endeavour that maintenance may not be wanting to the Poor. Seeing therefore that Churches were long before this time endowed not onely with Titles, but with good Laws and Revenues; this Law ſeems eſpecially to provide for the Inferiour ſort of Clerks or Miniſters in the Churches, ſuch as the Clerici copiatæ formerly mentioned. That ſuch proviſion had been formerly made by Chriſtian Princes out of their Cuſtoms or Tributes throughout the Cities, which being taken away by Julian were reſtored by Jovian the Emperour, the * Hiſtory of thoſe Times bear mention. So Numa, as † Livy tells us, aſſigned Penſions to the Veſtal Virgins out of the publick Revenues, and the Kings of Ægypt paid the third part of their Tributes to the maintenance of the Prieſts, as we have in the Hiſtory of that Ancient Kingdom obſerved out of || Diodorus: Plato thinks fit and juſt that thoſe who ſerve the Publick, ſhould be maintained at the Publick charge. But thus much did Martianus the moſt Religious Emperour for preſervation of the Doctrine of the Church in its purity, the diſcipline thereof in its true decorum and vigour, as alſo for the comfortable ſubſiſtence of the Miniſters thereof. And all this was in Relation to the Church it ſelf, in things Intrinſical and Domeſtick. Here it's convenient alſo to take notice what he did for her relating ad extrà, or reſpecting the old Pagan Superſtition, of which we have not heard a long time. The very ſame year therefore that he aſſembled the Council at Chalcedon, for the rooting out of Hereſie, he publiſhed an Edict for the utter deſtruction of Paganiſm, its Rites, Temples, Images and Sacrifices, commanding in the name of his Collegue and of himſelf, that None ſhould dare to open thoſe Chapels which had now been long ſhut up, with an intention to pay there any Worſhip or Adoration. Let it be far from us in this Age (ſay they) *to give the ancient Honour to infandous and execrable. Images, to have the impious poſts of Temples trimmed with Garlands, profane Fires kindled on Altars, Incenſe to be burned thereon, Beaſts to be killed for Sacrifice, Wines to be offered, and Sacrilege to be accounted Religion. But if any one contrary to this Sanction of our Serenity, and the Interdicts of moſt Holy and Ancient Conſtitutions ſhall offer to Sacrifice, let ſuch an one be legally indicted before the publick Judge, and being convicted, forfeit both his Eſtate and Life. Let ſuch alſo as are Acceſſories or Miniſters in Sacrificing undergo the ſame penalties, that being deterred by the Severity of this our Law, they may forbear to Sacrifice for fear of puniſhment. And if the Rector of the Province after legal Accuſation and Conviction forbear to puniſh ſo great a Crime, let the Judge himſelf be fined * fifty Pounds of Gold, and as much his Office to the Exchequer. Given on the twelfth of* November, Martianus Auguſtus and Adelphius being Conſuls. Directed to Palladius the Præfectus Prætorio.

|| §. 2. Et quia humanitatis noſtræ eſt egenis proſpicere, ac dare operam, ut pauperibus alimenta non deſint: ſalaria etiam quæ ſacroſanctis Eccleſiis in diverſis ſpeciebus de publico hactenus miniſtrata ſunt jubemus nunc quoque inconcuſſa & à nullo prorſus imminuta præſtari: liberalitatíque huic promptiſſimæ perpetuam tribuimus firmitatem.

* Theod. 4. 4. vide quæ annotantur ad hanc legem per Interp.

† Lib. 1.

|| Lib. 2.

An Edict against Paganiſm.

Setting forth the Ceremonies thereof.

Nemo venerandi adorandíque animo delubra, &c. Cod. Juſtin. l. 1. tit. 11. l. 7. De. Paganis.

* Libra Argenti valet 3 l. Auri 36 l: obrizi 37 l. 10 s. continet libra 12 uncias ponderat grana 6012. Budæus de Aſſe lib. 5. & Brierwoodus noſtras de Nummorum pretiis c. 21.

34. From the wording of this Law the Reader may obſerve, as to the ſtate and condition of the times, that the Old Pagan Superſtitions were not quite defunct, elſe there had not needed any ſuch Edict againſt the Superſtitious Ceremonies thereof. Yet that it was at the laſt gaſp appears by the long time the Chapels had been ſhut up, expreſſed by the word Olim, and eſpecially from the ſevere remedy provided by this Reſcript againſt the evil. For in this caſe there is ſome conformity betwixt the ordering of the Body Natural, and the Body Civil. In both, deſperate, acute and ſudden diſtempers muſt have deſperate remedies, quick and active applications, ſuch as ſearch, and either kill or cure. But in diſtempers of a ſtate which have been long and general, which uſe and cuſtome have rendred ſeemingly legal, as well as habitual, the Phyſician muſt proceed as in inveterate Diſeaſes which are founded in the Bloud, and radicated in the complexion of the Parts, in the curing of which he muſt proceed pedetentim, and Purge gently, leſt by evacuating the bad he drive out alſo the good humours, and practiſe rather an altering than a purging courſe, leſt in a very foul and plethorick Body the humours being ſet afloat and driven into a firmentation, prove too head-ſtrong and turbulent for nature to govern. This appears from what Conſtantine the Great preſcribed in this caſe, who at the beginning of the Reformation ordained the terrour of death as a Medicine againſt this Sacrificing Evil, puniſhing in like manner the Governours of the Provinces if they neglected to apply this Cautery to that Cancrous diſtemper. But his Succeſſours who had time and opportunity to ſee the opperation found it too violent and therefore laid it aſide till by applying of more gentle and altering Medicines the whole body was able to bear it, and therefore now did Marcian renew (rather than make any new Law) when the ill humours were ſo diminiſhed that by putting them into a motion and diſturbance no dangerous fever or other Symptome could be feared. But neither did this ſuddenly effect the cure without ſome other Applications as we ſhall ſee hereafter. In the mean time from this Law, the Reader may obſerve what were the Ceremonies of Paganiſm and the Worſhip of Idols in their Temples, and Chapels.

Placuit omnibus locis atque urbibus univerſis claudi protinus templa, &c. Dat. Cal. Decembris. Conſtantio IV. & Conſtante, A.A.Coſſ. viz.A. D. 342. Cod. Juſtin. lib.1. tit. 11. l. 1.

Proſper concludes his Chronicon.

35. About this time Proſper a Prieſt of Aquitain in imitation of Euſebius compoſed his Chronicon wherein he briefly notes what paſſed from the beginning of the World to the eighth Conſulſhip of Valentinian (which was the laſt year of his Life) and that of Anthemius or the 455*th.* year of the ordinary Æra of our Lord. The third Edition as Bucherius and Miræus obſerve reached to this year. For there had been two former whereof the firſt ended at the 14 Conſulſhip of Theodoſius which he bore with Maximus or the year 433, as appears from his ſumming up the Epocha's of all the former years, which is not uſually done but at the end of Books. The ſecond Edition contained the ſpace of 12 years more reaching as far as the 6 Conſulſhip of Valentinian and that of Nonius or the year 445, at which his ordinary Chronicon wont to be joyned with thoſe of Euſebius and Jerome receiveth its period. The third Edition reaching as low as the year above mentioned, of which Miræus mentions three ſeveral Manuſcripts, is much better than the two former, containing beſides a ſhort and pithy account of things from the beginning of the World the Faſti of the Conſuls from the 15*th.* year of Tiberius downward. But in this Age flouriſhed three or four ſeveral Perſons bearing the name of Proſper, concerning whom Bucherius diſputeth at large.

In Chron. Belg. ad Ann. 455.

Ad Victorii canonem 6. vide Miræum.

Several Edicts of the Emperours concerning Teſtaments.

36. This ſame year, viz. 455 before the Death of Valentinian did he and Martianus publiſh an Edict or a General Law as they call it whereby they reſtore Eccleſiaſtical Perſons to their Ancient Liberty of having and enjoying what ſhould be left by the Teſtaments of Women, which as we have formerly ſeen had been taken away by former Emperours. This Law directed to Palladius the Præfectus Prætorio, Juſtinian hath put into his Code, but the Note upon the Text tells us that at this day the Caſe is altered by two Authenticks immediately following which the Reader may conſult at his leiſure: The year following Martianus made another Edict, whereby he gave (a) liberty to the Actour or Plaintiff to implead the Clerks of Conſtantinople either before the Patriarch or the Secular Judge, for where the Reus or Defendant hath ſeveral Courts not privileged jure Communi or by Common Law the Election is in the power and diſcretion of the Plaintiff. The next year by a conſtitution in Greek, (b) he declares that thinking it to be a point both of Humanity and Piety he permits Hereticks to be buried in the Sepulchres of their Anceſtours. There's yet another Edict of this good Emperour which becauſe it reſpects pious uſes and is very ſhort, though it bear no date, we ſhall add to the former. This ordains that what is left to the Poor either by Teſtaments or Codicils ſhall not come to nothing as left to uncertain Perſons, but remain good and firm to all intents and purpoſes. For though their Perſons be uncertain yet the Poor never failing there are always certain objects of charity, and as Baldus noteth upon the place, the Poor are like a College, which repreſents a certain Perſon. The Legacy Generali lege Sancimus ſine vidua, &c. Cod. lib. 1. tit. 2. l. 13.

(a) Cod. lib. 1. tit. 3. c. 25.

Dat. 8. April. Varari & Joanne Coſſ.

(b) Ἀνθρώπινον καὶ ὅσιον εἶναι λογισάμενοι, τοὺς αἱρετικοὺς ἐπιτρέπομεν θάπτεσθαι ταῖς νενομισμέναις ταφαῖς. Lib. 1. tit. 5. l. 9. Vide tamen C. Sacris. 12. extra, de ſepultura.

Id quod pauperibus Teſtamento vel codicillis relinquitur, non ut incertis perſonis relictum evaneſcat, ſed omnibus modis ratum firmúmq; conſiſtat. Cod. lib. 1. Tit. 3. l. 24.

gacy may be ſaid to be certain as left to God himſelf: it may be done alſo by privilege; or the Teſtamentary Executour, or the Executour by Law, viz. the Biſhop, may eaſily find out certain poor Perſons on whom to confer the deſigned Legacy.

37. Thus went matters in the Eaſtern parts under the care and Inſpection of Martianus the Emperour. In the Weſtern and Southern there was no ſuch ſerenity, a diſmal Cloud of perſecution having overſpread Africk, ſince the invaſion of that Countrey by Genſericus that Arian Captain. Moſt glorious were the confeſſions and ſufferings of many Martyrs as well here as in other places, as Italy, Sardinia, Greece, Epirus, Illyricum and Spain, or wherever the foreſaid Rover touched. Deogratias the Biſhop of Carthage removing in this direfull perſecution to a place of more repoſe and ſecurity, after he had ſteered that weather-beaten Church ſome three years, the Tyrant would ſuffer none to be choſen in his place, who having driven the Prieſts and other Miniſters of the Church ſeveral ways as they ſhifted for themſelves, commanded the Doors of the Church to be ſhut, and plainly forbade any Biſhops to be ordained in other Provinces, ſo that when Victor wrote the ſtory the number of 164 was reduced to three. But this good came of ſo great an evil, that theſe Orthodox Confeſſours retiring farther into the Inland Countries there preached the Goſpel, and though they became Martyrs many of them for ſo doing yet their Bloud as in other caſes proved the ſeed of the Church, many Barbarians who had never formerly heard of Chriſt being converted to the Faith and incouraged by the conſtancy of their Teachers. At ſuch time as this mighty Tempeſt raged in Africk a ſtorm was alſo raiſed in Ægypt by another and contrary ſort of Hereticks who, as Genſericus denied the Divinity of Chriſt, would not acknowledge his Humanity. Theſe were of the faction of Dioſcorus whoſe Depoſition as they extremely grudged, ſo they ſought all ways to be revenged on Proterius his Succeſſour. At length they underſtood that Martian the Emperour was dead, through whoſe incouragement they had been condemned in a Synod by Proterius, they came down to Alexandria headed by one Timotheus Ælurus formerly a Monk, ſince that a Prieſt of Alexandria, whom they Create Biſhop of that See though Proterius was yet living. But long they intended he ſhould not be, for ſetting upon him in the Church being then in the Baptiſtory on the high Feaſt of Eaſter, and the day whereon the Supper of the Lord was to be ſolemnized, they there Cruelly murthered him, dragged his dead body through the ſtreets, tore it in peices, taſted of his Intrails, and burning at laſt what remained ſcattered the aſhes in the Wind. The Villain Timothy to bring about theſe deſigns putting on black Clothes wandered up and down by night in the Cells of the Monks, and calling each of them by their names through an hollow Cane that his voice might not be diſcerned, told them he was one of the Miniſtring Spirits ſent expreſly to tell them all that they ſhould not Communicate with Proterius but make Timotheus Ælurus Biſhop of Alexandria.

A Perſecution in the Weſt.

De Perſecut. Vandal. lib. 1. & Procopius de bello Vandal. lib. 1.

And ſtirs at Alexandria by the faction of Dioſcorus.

Euagrius lib. 2. c. 1. Liberatus in Breviar. c. 15. Theodorus lector collectan. l. 2. Epp. viror. ill. pro conc. Chalced.

Proterius Biſhop thereof murthered by Timotheus Ælurus who ſeiſes on the See.

38. Being thus proſperouſly though wickedly ſeated in the Chair, out of fear of a Competitour, and leſt he ſhould receive the ſame meaſure he had given to others, he ſought to prevent his own ruine by the deſtruction of thoſe whom he had ſufficient cauſe to believe incenſed againſt him. Therefore did he rage in Alexandria, and all Ægypt with a cruel Perſecution againſt the Orthodox of all Ages, Sexes and Conditions, baniſhing ſuch Biſhops as he could not otherwiſe Maſter. On the dead Emperour he railed exceeedingly, reviled the Chalcedonian Council, and vilified the ſeveral Fathers aſſembled therein. The Orthodox Chriſtians herewith acquainted the new Emperour Leo, giving him a perfect account of what had paſſed. But thoſe Eutychian Hereticks were as buſie as they, writing Letters to the Emperour by Meſſengers of their own, wherein taking no notice at all of the Murther of Proterius they magnifie that peace and ſettlement which the Government of Timotheus had brought to the Church of Alexandria. And whereas the Emperour required that all Metropolitans ſhould give him an account of their Faith, to ſee how they ſtood affected to the Council of Chalcedon, they gave him boldly an account both of their own belief and that of Timotheus, profeſſing to receive the Nicene Creed and the Epheſine Synods (as well the ſecond or Predatory as the firſt) but abſolutely rejecting the Chalcedonian. Leo the Emperour not knowing how in this caſe to ſteer his courſe, by his Encyclical or Circular Letters conſulted not onely all the Biſhops (whereof Anatolius eſpecially) but other Perſons eminent for learning or Godlineſs at this time. Leo the Roman Patriarch blaſted their project of having another Council aſſembled, by ſhewing that there would be no end in gratifying Hereticks by thoſe very things wherewith the univerſal Church had been once ſatisfied, and whereas they ſo much much talked of the Council of Nice, he proved that this Synod defining onely the Controverſies at that time, relating to the Divinity of Chriſt, when his Humanity was not once queſtioned, it was not ſufficient to own its Creed, but the Profeſſion of the Fathers of Chalcedon alſo, wherein matters relating to his humane Nature were determined. Not onely Leo, but all the reſt diſallowed of the Election of Timothy, as contrary to the Canons of the Church, and approved the Decrees of the Council of Chalcedon. Onely Amphilochius Biſhop of Sida wrote an Epiſtle to the Emperour, wherein he inveighed againſt the Election of Timothy, yet approved not the Council of Chalcedon, which things (ſaith Euagrius) are written by Zachary Rhetor, together with the Epiſtle of Amphilochius. Simeon alſo (he meaneth Simeon Stylita, who at this time lived in a Pillar) a Man of worthy Memory wrote concerning the aforeſaid Controverſies, two Letters, one to Leo the Emperour, another to Baſilius Biſhop of Antioch, whereof that to Baſilius, being but ſhort, he reciteth.

Vide epiſt. apud Euagrium lib. 2. c. 8.

Leo Epp. 73, &c.

Lib. 2. c. 10.

39. This year being the 457 of our Lord upon occaſion of the Controverſie about Eaſter two years before, Victorius or Victorinus of Limoſin in Aquitain (both which at this time were held by the Wiſegoths) being then at Rome, as he himſelf witneſſeth in the Preface, publiſhed his Paſchal Canon, which Bucherius a Jeſuit cauſed to be printed at Plantin's Printing-preſs in Antwerp, with a Commentary thereto adjoined of his own Labour and Study, in the year 1633. This year died Baſilius the lately mentioned Patriarch of Antioch, in his ſecond year, to whom ſucceeded Acacius: As alſo Anatolius Patriarch of Conſtantinople, after he had governed that See almoſt Nine years, into whoſe place was promoted Gennadius an eminent Prieſt of that Church, not the Eccleſiaſtical Writer, but a Man very Witty, Eloquent and Learned. The year following his Election was held at his City of Conſtantinople, a Synod of 73 Biſhops ſummoned out of the neighbouring Provinces, wherein the Legates of Leo being preſent, the late Chalcedonian Council was confirmed. The Acts of it are all loſt, one Canon made againſt Simoniacal Perſons excepted. This ſame year died Acacius the newly ordained Biſhop of Antioch, and was ſucceeded by Martyrius. And the next after when Leo the Emperour was now fully ſatisfied concerning the Chalcedonian Synod, and the Hereſie aſwell as other Villanies of Timotheus Ælurus, he commanded him by a Reſcript directed to the Præfectus Auguſtalis to be baniſhed (ſeveral mention ſeveral places) and then was choſen into his place, another Timothy ſirnamed Baſilius Solifaciolus or Albus. At this time died Simeon called Stylita from his having lived in a Pillar about 80 years, who by Theodoret and others is celebrated as the wonder of the World, for his extraordinary Sanctity. To him ſucceeded in the like ſtrictneſs of Monaſtical Life, Daniel, who not far from the Borders of Conſtantinople, aſcended the Pillar. The year following was the laſt of Leo Biſhop of Rome, who died on the Eleventh of April, a Man of unblameable Life, excellent Endowments of Mind and indefatigable Induſtry, not onely for the Primacy of his See (wherein he ſhewed himſelf zealous far above reaſon) but the good of Chriſtian Religion. Out of his Epiſtles the Centuriatours of Magdeburg have collected many Decrees, which the Reader if he pleaſe may conſult, there being nothing in them ſo highly material as to bring them into our Inſtitution. His eminent Parts, and his great diligence have got him in later Ages, both the Name and Reputation of the Great.

Baſilius Patriarch of Antioch dies, Acacius ſucceeds.

Anatolius Patriarch of Conſtantinople dies, to whom Gennadius ſucceeds.

A Synod held there.

Niceph. l. 15. cap. 22. Euagrius lib. 2. cap. 11.

Apud Balſam.

Acacius of Antioch dies, Martyrius ſucceeds him.

Timotheus Ælurus baniſhed and Timothy Solifaciolus is made Biſhop of Alexandria.

Conſulas Surium ſi placet & Baronium ad hunc Ann.

Leo Biſhop of Rome dies.

40. After the Death of Leo, the See was vacant ſeven days, ſaith Platina, but rather ſo many Months as Baronius gathereth both from Marianus Scotus, and a Roman Council aſſembled under his Succeſſour, from which it appears that the Chair was not filled by another Biſhop, till November following. This was Hilarus the Son of Criſpinus a Sardinian by Birth, whom when yet a Deacon, Leo ſent one of his Legates to the Synod of Epheſus, being the 48*th.* Biſhop of Rome according to Platina, the 45*th.* according to Panvinius, and as Marianus reckons the 46*th.* This Biſhop is very much commended, for vigorouſly executing his Paſtoral Office amidſt all the great Troubles, wherewith Italy in his time was imbroiled. For repairing the Churches which the Barbarous Hunns had defaced when they took the City. In his expences he was rather profuſe than ſparing. He built ſome Monaſteries, and added to certain Churches the Chapels which he called Oratories. He alſo as Sabellicus will have it collected the Pontifical Decrees into one Body, and diſperſed them into all Countries. To him certain Epiſtles are attributed, wherein he confirms the three General Synods of Nice, Epheſus and Chalcedon, condemns the Hereſies of Neſtorius, Eutyches and all others, and according to the Cuſtome of his Predeceſſours deceſſours lately taken up, aſſerts the Primacy of his own See. In his fifth year he held a Synod in the Church of St. Mary, about ſome queſtions propounded to him out of Spain, concerning the Ordination of Clerks, and againſt Biſhops their deſigning of their Succeſſours. To the Decrees next after him ſubſcribed Maximus Biſhop of Turin, not that he was next in Dignity, there deing ſome Metropolitans alſo preſent, but the Cuſtome generally was, that the Fathers took place according to their Seniority, not in Age, but Conſecration, yet ſo as the Principal Patriarchs were excepted. Hilarus (for ſo he is to be read, and not Hilarius) died on the tenth of September, when he had governed the Roman See five years and ten Months all but two days. Much about the ſame time died Proſper, having been Biſhop of the Rhegienſes, Reienſes or Retenſes in Provincia Narbonenſi ſecunda about 24 years, to whom ſucceeded Maximus Abbat of the Monaſtery of Lerinum. The ſame year alſo departed this Life Criſpinus Biſhop of Pavia in Inſubria, into whoſe place was elected Epiphanius, one equal to him in Sanctity, and his Superiour in Learning, in the Judgment of Baronius. To Hilarus the Roman Patriarch ſucceeded Simplicius the Son of Caſtinus a Citizen of Tibur.

Hilarus ſucceeds him.

Who holds a Synod at Rome.

Tom. 2. Conc.

Dies.

Proſper Biſhop of Rhegienſis dies, Maximus ſucceeds him.

Papienſis aut Ticinenſis Notit. Eccleſ. univerſalis Dioceſ.

To Hilarus ſucceeds Simplicius.

41. In the laſt year of Hilarus Biſhop of Rome, and the tenth of his own Reign, A. D. 466 did Leo the Emperour publiſh a large Edict, concerning the Privileges of Churches, granting them ſuch as had been taken away by former Emperours, and conſtituting them Aſylums or Sanctuaries as formerly, to all out of Conſtantinople, Slaves excepted, and giving Rules to the Oeconomi of the ſaid Churches, how they ſhould order thoſe that fled to them, in reference to the ſatisfaction of their Creditours. Three years after, in the Conſulſhip of Martianus and Zeno, he publiſhed another Edict concerning the Election of Biſhops, making therein what Proviſion he could againſt Simoniacal Intruſion. This ſame year on the 13*th.* of December, he publiſhed another Law enjoyning the obſervation of Holy-days in general, but eſpecially of the Lord's Day, as to which he doth very much inlarge himſelf, in the particulars he forbids to be practiſed on it. The Emperour Conſtantine, as we have formerly obſerved in its due place, had commanded all Judicial proceedings and Servile works to ceaſe on this day, tilling of the ground excepted, by reaſon of the uncertainty of weather. Afterwards Gratian, Valentinian and Theodoſius, prohibited all publick Shews upon this day, and added to what Conſtantine had commanded concerning Judges, that none ſhould arbitrate any litigious Cauſe, or take Cognizance of any pecuniary matters on this day. Five years after this, Valentinian, Theodoſius and Arcadius publiſhing a Law concerning Holy-days, and reckoning up the Calends of January, the Birth-days of the greateſt Cities, viz. the Old and New Rome, ſeven Days before and as many after Eaſter, Chriſtmaſ-day, that of the Epiphany, the days of the Martyrdom of the Apoſtles, and their own Birth-days with the days of their coming to the Empire, reckon amongſt them Sundays, or rather, as their Anceſtours rightly called them the Lord's Days, wherein they forbid Arbitrations to be practiſed. Theodoſius Junior five and thirty years after, as the Carthaginian Fathers had deſired, ordained by another Edict, that aſwell upon the Lord's Day as on Chriſtmaſ-day, the Epiphany, Eaſter-day, and from thence to Whitſuntide, the Theatres and Cirques ſhould every where be ſhut up, that the Minds of Chriſtians might be wholly intent on the Service of God.

Præſenti lege decernimus, &c. Cod. lib. 1. Tit. 12. l. 6.

Several Edicts of the Emperour concerning the Lord's Day, and Holy-days.

Lib. 1. Tit. 3. l. 31.

Cod. l. 3. Tit. 12. l. 3. A. D. 321.

Cod. Theod. lib. 8. Tit. 8. A. D. 384.

Cod. l. 3. Tit. 12. l. 7. A. D. 389.

In eadem obſervatione numeramus Dies Solis quos Dominicos ritè dixere majores.

Cod. Theod. lib. 15. Tit. 5. A. D. 425.

42. So ſtood the Lord's Day in reference to Imperial Laws, till this Edict of Leo, wherein confirming what had been done as to Holy-days in general, he commands all Judiciary proceedings to be ſtopt on this day, wherein he will have Adverſaries meet without fear. Neither forbidding buſineſs doth he give way, as he ſaith, thereby to obſerve pleaſures, prohibiting the Theatre and Cirque to be opened, and the Spectacula of wild Beaſts. Nay if a Solemnity happen upon his Birth-day, or of his Promotion it muſt be deferred. If any ſhould be preſent at the Spectacula on this day, or any Apparitor Act contrary to what he had ordained either upon account of publick or private buſineſs, he puniſheth him with loſs of his Employment, and Proſcription of his Patrimony. Beſides theſe Laws reſpecting Religion made by this Emperour Leo, there are ſeveral others without date, which the Reader if he pleaſe may find in the Code of Juſtinian de Sacroſanctis Eccleſiis, & de Epoſcopis & Clericis, concerning Churches, Eccleſiaſtical Perſons and their Profeſſions, which to relate would be too tedious for our preſent

Nec hujus tamen Religioſi diei otia relaxantes, obſcœnis quenquam patimur voluptatibus detineri. Nihil eodem die ſibi vindicet. Scena theatralis, aut Circenſe certamen, aut ferarum lachrymoſa ſpectacula, & vide quod notant Interp. ad hanc legem quæ eſt ult. Tit. 12. Lib. 3. Cod. Juſtin. de feriis.

Lib. 1. Tit. 2. 3.

The Acts of Baſiliſcus the Tyrant made void.

preſent deſign, and make not ſo much for our purpoſe. Onely one we cannot but mention, and that is a Conſtitution whereby the extravagances committed during the Tyranny of Baſiliſcus were reſcinded, and thoſe things recalled which had been in uſe before his flight into Iſauria for fear of the ſaid Tyrant. For this Baſiliſcus ruling, as we have formerly written, matters in the Eaſt according to his will and pleaſure, rejected the Council of Chalcedon, and what Leo the Biſhop had written in defence thereof by his circular Letter written to all Biſhops, which Euagrius and Nicephorus call συλλαβαὶ ἐγκυκλίους. From Acacius the Patriarch of Conſtantinople the Succeſſour of Gennadius who oppoſed his doings, he took ſeveral Provinces, formerly ſubject to him, and had almoſt driven him from his See, as he had dealt with many Biſhops, as of Antioch, Alexandria, Epheſus, Tarſus and others. Therefore by this Edict doth he antiquate and make null, as we ſaid, all things done under the Tyranny againſt the God of the Orthodox Religion, againſt Churches, particularly thoſe under the government of the moſt Bleſſed and Religious Patriarch his Father Acacius, all Innovations in the Rights of Creation, expulſion of Biſhops, their Prerogative in Councils and out of Councils of Place, or as Metropolitans or Patriarchs. As for the Sacroſanct Church of that moſt Religious City (theſe are the Phraſes of the Edict) both his Mother and of all Chriſtians of the Orthodox Religion, with the moſt Holy See of that Royal City he adjudgeth and decreeth in contemplation of the ſaid Royal City that it enjoy for ever all Privileges and Honours aſwell in Creation of Biſhops, as ſitting above others; and all other Rights which it was known to have either before or under his Reign.

Suidas in voce Βασιλίσκος & vide quæ notantur per Interp. ad hanc legem quæ eſt 16. tit. 2. libri, 1. de Sacroſanct. Eccleſiis.

Decernimus ut antiquatis ac infirmatis funditus his quæ contra ipſum orthodoxæ Religionis Deum quodammodo facta ſunt, &c.

And precedence given to Conſtantinople.

Sacroſanctam quoq; hujus Religioſiſſimæ civitatis Eccleſiam & matrem noſtræ pietatis & Chriſtianorum orthodoxæ Religionis omnium & ejuſdem Regiæ urbis Sanctiſſimam ſedem, &c.

43. This Conſtitution is dated on the 17*th* of December, in the Conſulſhip of Armatius alone, who bore that Office with Baſiliſcus the Tyrant, who yet is not mentioned here, nor named in the Faſti, becauſe he was an Uſurper, and was condemned by Zeno. This Conſulſhip fell in the 476 Year of our Lord, and conſequently the third after the Death of Leo the Elder, ſo that it muſt belong to his Grand-Son the Young Leo, and made by his Father Zeno, though Baronius place it at the 472, and the 16*th* of the Old Emperour. However, it being made (as the Cardinal ſaith) in behalf of the See of Conſtantinople, and the precedence of all others next after the Patriarch of Rome, it is manifeſt that by the antiquating of Innovations, and reſtoring the ancient Rights of this Church, it had and enjoyed this precedence before the making of this Law. If it was procured through the ſolicitation of Acacius, and that Simplicius the Roman Biſhop was much concerned about it, be it ſo, If it was Acacius his due, as it verily ſeems to have been, he had more right to ſeek it than the other to grudge it. But this is certain aſwell from this Law as others, that this Privilege was granted in conſideration of the Royal, and if that was the Reaſon why the See of Old Rome obtained the Firſt Dignity, as we have ſeen it was from good teſtimony, certainly there was no reaſon they ſhould quarrel. But ſuch are the humours and paſſions of Men otherwiſe good: and as here we leave them, ſo we ſhall find them again engaged in this quarrel about the Primacy. About this time was Sidonius Apollinaris, that Man ſo famous for his nobility and excellent wit, made Biſhop of the Arverni or Auvergnais in Gallia Celtica. He had Married Papianilla the Daughter of Avitus the Emperour, and ſhe was ſtill living. Though in mighty eſteem, yet he thought ſo meanly of himſelf, that in his Epiſtles he often complains of his unworthineſs for ſuch a Calling, and betook himſelf from his wonted Feſtivity to a more ſober Converſation. Much about the ſame time alſo died Gennadius Biſhop of the Rhemeſes or Soiſſons, to whom ſucceeded Remigius, afterward called the Apoſtle of the Franks; neither this Gennadius, nor he of Conſtantinople was he whoſe Book is extant concerning Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and was of Marſeilles in Provence. As the Death of Leo the Elder wrought a great change in the State, ſo alſo in the Church, by reaſon that Zeno his Son-in-Law too much favoured if not the Doctrine, yet the Perſons of Hereticks.

Sidonius Apolinaris Bi- of Arverni in Gallia Celtica.

Gennadius Biſhop of Rhemeſis dies. Remigius ſucceeds.

Zeno the Emperour recalls Fullo a heretick, expelling Martyrius Biſhop of Antioch placeth him in the See. And alſo Timotheus Ælurus into Alexandria expelling Timotheus Solifaciolus the Orthodox Biſhop.

44. He recalled Fullo an Apollinarian and Eutychian Heretick, who had been Baniſhed by Leo, and expelling Martyrius, who was formerly driven away by the ſaid Fullo, and again reſtored, placed him in the See of Antioch. Timothy Ælurus alſo that villanous Uſurper, and Baniſhed in like manner by Leo, he ſent back to the Church of Alexandria, whence he expelled Timotheus Solifaciolus the Orthodox Biſhop, and committed many outrages againſt ſuch as had owned and received him. At this time the condition of the Churches in Gall was very ſad, the Arian Goths making havock of all things. And not onely there, but in the Weſt, generally things both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil had a very bad face, the Barbarous Nations overturning all, and filling all places with their Cruelties and Hereſies. Theſe diſaſters put an end to the Roman Empire in the Weſt, Auguſtulus being depoſed by Odoacer, and confined to a Caſtle near to Naples. The Church, bleſſed be God, had not juſt the like meaſure; but Church and State are ſo nearly allied, and ſo much ſympathize, that if the one languiſh, the other can ſcarcely be in an healthy condition. As the ſame cauſes produce the ſame effects in both, ſo aſwell the remedies are alike, as ſuch preſervatives as keep both in life and vigour. Therefore did Ancient and Primitive prudence as Twins cloth them with the like forms and faſhions of Government, which dayly experience applauds as moſt agreeable. And becauſe ſuch is their Alliance and agreement we ſhall limit and terminate our obſervations of both with the ſame Periods, thoſe matters laſt mentioned falling out the year preceding the depoſing of Auguſtulus.

Auguſtulus and the Empire in the Weſt overthrown by Odoacer.

FINIS.

THE TABLE.

A

Acacius Biſhop of Antioch 135, dies, ibid.

Aetius and his Hereſie Condemned 71.

Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria 39, baniſheth Arius 40, ordains Athanaſius and upon his death appoints him his Succeſſour 47.

Alexander Biſhop of Conſtantinople refuſeth to admit Arius 43, dies 56.

Ambroſe Biſhop of Milain is preſent at the Council held at Aquileia 111, oppoſes the Petition of the Pagans for reſtoring their Idolatry 114, forbids it in his Dioceſe 120, Baptizes Auguſtine 124, makes Theodoſius ſuffer for his cruelty 131, makes the Funeral Sermon of Valentinian the Second, 134, dies 135.

Anaſtaſius Biſhop of Rome 134, dies 139.

Anatolius Biſhop of Conſtantinople 185, dies 205.

Ancyra a Synod held there 74.

Andæus, and his Hereſie Condemned 6.

Anthropomorphites who 50.

Antioch a Synod held there 57, its Canons and Decrees 58, 59, another 61, a third 77, the Inhabitants and Julian quarrel 87.

Apollinarius and his Hereſie condemned 77.

Apollo his Temple at Daphne burnt 87.

Arcadius Roman Emperour 114, forbids Chriſtians to uſe Pagan Superſtition 119, demoliſhes the Pagan Temples 137, and puniſheth ſeveral Hereticks 138, baniſheth Chryſoſtome Biſhop of Conſtantinople 141, but ſoon after dies 143.

Archieroſyna what 119.

Arius and his heretical Tenets 39, condemned by the Alexandrian Council 40, and that of Nice 42, rejected by Athanaſius 48, raiſes Tumults at Alexandria and Conſtantinople 153, and dies, ibid.

Arſacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople 141, dies 142.

Athanaſius his Birth-place 46, his Education and Preferment 47, ſeveral falſe Accuſations againſt him 49, which cauſeth him to be baniſhed 52, is ſent home 56, but condemned by the Arians, and baniſhed 58, received into Communion by the Synod and Orthodox Biſhops at Rome 61, cleared by the Council at Sardica 62, protected by Conſtans the Emperour 65, admitted to return 66, accuſed again by the Arians 67, ſummoned to Rome, and excommunicated at Arles 68, condemned by Conſtantius 69, writes two Apologies for himſelf 70, returns 83, is baniſhed, but returns the third time 91, is forced to ſhift for himſelf 97, returns 98, his Character and Death 99.

Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople 142, dies 159.

Audientes who 124.

Auguſtine his Birth-place and Touth 102, is reformed from his looſe courſe of life 124, ordained Prieſt 134, made Biſhop of Hippo, ibid. converts Fœlix the Manichee 142, dies 163, his Works 164.

Auguſtulus Roman Emperour in the Weſt depoſed 208.

Auruſpicina prohibited by the Emperour's Edict 4.

B.

Baptiſm how uſed in the Primitive times 127.

Baſil Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia 95, ſuffers under Valens his Perſecution 96, comforts the Orthodox Biſhops 97, dies 102, his Works 103.

Baſilius Biſhop of Antioch 205.

Biſhops what 24, the manner of Electing them 25, of Poſtulating them 26, their power in the Church 33, and other privileges 34, 35.

Boniface Biſhop of Rome pretends to the Title of receiving Appeals from the African Churches 151, which is rejected 152, &c. Preaches contrary to his own practice 157, his Works and Death 158.

Bourdeaux a Synod held there 115.

Briccius Biſhop of Tours 135.

Burying the manner of it, and place where 89.

C.

CArthage a Council held there 135, the Canons thereof 136, two more 137.

Catechumeni who 125.

Cœleſtinus Biſhop of Rome claims the right of Appeals from the African Churches 151, which is rejected 152, &c. ſends St. Patrick to convert the Iriſh 169, dies 172.

Cœlicolæ who 143.

Cæſarea a Synod held there 51.

Chalcedon a General Council ſummoned there 185, the ſeveral Seſſions, Acts and Decrees thereof 186,&c. and all confirmed by Martianus the Emperour 198.

Choropiſcopi who 35.

Chryſoſtome Biſhop of Conſtantinople 135, is depoſed 140, recalled, but was after baniſhed 141, his Character and Death 142, his Corps tranſlated to Conſtantinople 174.

Church, its Polity, Government and Governours 21, &c. its diviſion 29, and 65, its maintenance 37, and juriſdiction 38.

Churches when firſt in uſe, with the method of placing the Congregation 132.

Colleign a Synod held there 62.

Competentes who 125.

Confirmation what and how uſed 127.

Conſtans Roman Emperour 56, calls a Council at Sardica 62, writes to Conſtantius concerning Athanaſius his return 65, is murthered 67, his Eccleſiaſtical Laws 80.

Conſtantine Roman Emperour 1, converted to the Faith 2, provides for the well being of Chriſtians 3, prefers them to places of Honour 4, forbids their partaking in the Sacrifices of the Luſtra 6, regulates ſwearing 11, reſides at Bizantium, alias Conſtantinople 12, adorns it with Churches 13, provides for the Inhabitants 14, his farther care of the Church 15, an account of his pretended donation to the See of Rome 16, &c. he confirms the Canons of the Council of Nice 46, is baptized and dies at Nicomedia 53, cleared from the aſperſion of Arianiſm 54.

Conſtantius Roman Emperour 56, favours the Arians, and perſecutes the Orthodox 57, baniſheth Andæas the Heretick 60, and diſplaceth Paul Biſhop of Conſtantinople, ibid. calls a Council at Sardica 62, admits Athanaſius to return 66, baniſheth Paul from Conſtantinople 67, ſummons a Council at Arles, and at Milain 68, condemns Athanaſius 69, calls a Synod at Sirmium 72, another at Ancyra 74, another at Seleucia 75, another at Conſtantinople 76, is baptized 78, and dies, ib. his Laws Eccleſiaſtical 79.

Councils Oecumenical the firſt ſummoned to Nice in Bithynia 41, the ſecond to Conſtantinople 107, the third to Epheſus 164, the fourth to Chalcedon 185, &c.

Creeds, the Nicene Creed made 43, four made by the Arians at Antioch 58, one more at another held there 61, another at Sardica 63, another at Syrmium 72, another at Nice in Thrace 74, another at Seleucia 75, another at Conſtantinople 76, how many in all, ibid.

Curatas whence ſo called 36.

Cyril Biſhop of Jeruſalem 89, is preſent at the ſecond General Council 107, dies 121.

Cyril Biſhop of Alexandria 146, quarrels with the Prefect of the City 148, calls a Provincial Synod there againſt Neſtorius 162, is accuſed as an Heretick by him 163, preſides at the third General Council at Epheſus 165, receives the Eaſtern Biſhops into Communion 169, Dies 177.

D.

DAmaſus Biſhop of Rome 94, dies 115.

Daphne the Grove deſtroyed 80.

Deacon his Office 37.

Diœceſis what 36.

Dioſcorus Biſhop of Alexandria 182, preſides at the Council of Epheſus 113, is condemned by the Council of Chalcedon 186, baniſhed 187.

Domnus Biſhop of Antioch 177, appears at the Council of Epheſus 183, is condemned and depoſed 184.

E.

EPiſcopal Juriſdiction promoted 95.

Evagrius Biſhop of Conſtantinople outed by Damophilus the Arian 86.

Eudoxius Biſhop of Germanicia in Syria is tranſlated to Antioch 71, depoſed 75, ſucceeds Macedonius in Conſtantinople 76, is condemned by the Macedonian Sect in a Synod at Lampſacus 92, dies 96.

Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea furniſheth Conſtantinople with Church Books 13, vindicated from the calumny of Baronius 55, dies 57.

Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia ſides with Arius 40, ſlanders Athanaſius 48, is baniſhed 50, but recalled, he adds new Forgery, ibid. is tranſlated to Conſtantinople 56, dies 60.

Eutyches and his Hereſie condemned at Conſtantinople 182, quitted at a Synod held at Epheſus 184, condemned by the Emperour's Edict 199, by another his Works ordered to be burnt 200.

F.

FAſtidius Priſcus Biſhop of London his Character and Death 161.

Fideles who 128.

Flavianus Biſhop of Conſtantinople 182, is baniſhed and dies 184.

G.

GEnnadius Biſhop of Conſtantin. 205.

Germanus Biſhop of Auxerre in Gall confounds the Pelagians in Britain 160.

Gladiatours their combating prohibited 12.

George intrudes into the See of Alexandria 69, his Character 70, Death 83.

Government paternal firſt inſtituted 21, that of the Jewiſh Church 22, that of the Chriſtian Church 23.

Gratian Roman Emperour 102, reſtores the baniſhed Orthodox 103, his Laws 105, calls a Synod at Aquileia 111, another at Saragoſſa in Spain 112, forbids Pagans to ſacrifice 113, takes away the Allowance for it, which cauſed them to murther him 114.

Gregory Biſhop of Nazianzum 98, is tranſlated to Conſtantinople 103, quits his See 109, his Character and Death 128.

H.

HEreſie and its firſt promoters 77.

St. Hierome 104, dies 155, his Works 156.

Hillary Biſhop of Poictiers is baniſhed by Conſtantius 70, writes againſt him, and is recalled 76, dies 95, an account of his Cradle, ibid.

Hillary Biſhop of Rome 205, dies 206.

Honorius Roman Emperour 135, forbids Pagan Superſtition and Worſhip in the Temples 137, condemns ſeveral Hereſies 138, but permits the ſecular Games and Spectacula to be celebrated 142, makes an Edict againſt the Jews and Pagans 143, another 144, a third 149, ſummons a Synod at Ravenna 154, dies 158.

Hypoſtaſis what 104.

I.

IBerians converted to the Faith 48.

John Biſhop of Jeruſalem 121, is of Origen's Opinion 133, dies 149.

Indians-lower converted to the Faith 48.

Innocent Biſhop of Rome 141, dies 149.

Inſtructi who 128.

John Biſhop of Antioch 165, is reconcil'd to Cyril, and the Orthodox 169, dies 177.

Jovian Roman Emperour 91, his management of Affairs and Death 92.

Ireland its Eccleſiaſtical Government what 170.

Julian Roman Emperour 82, his Polity and practice againſt Chriſtians 85, his care for the Temple of Apollo at Daphne 86, his Cruelty 88, he endeavours to rebuild the Temple of Jeruſalem 89, his Death and Character 90.

Julius Biſhop of Rome 52, calls a Synod there 57, receives Athanaſius into Communion 61, joyns with the Arians in making a new Creed 63, aſſiſts Athanaſius in his return 66, dies 68.

Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem 183, hath Patriarchal power confirmed to his See by the Council of Chalcedon 189, is outed by the Monks, but reſtored by the Emperour 200.

L.

LAmpſacus a Synod held there 92.

Leo Biſhop of Rome 176, dies 205.

Leo Roman Emperour 205, his Eccleſiaſtical Laws 206, and Death 207.

Liberius Biſhop of Rome 68, ſubſcribes to the Arian Creed 73, but declaring againſt the Arians is afterwards received by his Flock 93, dies 94.

Luciferians who 84.

Lucius the Arian Biſhop of Alexandria 99, is expelled 102.

Luſtra what 7.

M.

MAcarius Biſhop of Jeruſalem 46, dies 50.

Marcus Biſhop of Rome 52.

Martianus Roman Emperour puniſheth the Sect of Eutychians 184, ſummons the fourth General Council 185, condemns Dioſcorus Biſhop of Alexandria 186, baniſhes him 187, confirms the Confeſſion of Faith made by the Council 189, and all its Canons and Decrees 198, puts forth an Edict againſt the Eutychian Hereſie 199, another ordering the Books of Eutyches to be burnt 200, confirms the privileges of the Church 201, puts forth an Edict againſt Paganiſm 202, is farther kind to Churchmen 203, dies 204.

Martin Biſhop of Tours 115, is perſecuted by the Hereticks 117, dies 135.

Martyrius Biſhop of Antioch 205.

Maximianus Biſhop of Conſtantinople 168, dies 178.

Maximus Biſhop of Antioch 185, his Patriarchal Juriſdiction 189, concludes the Diſpute concerning Athanaſius Biſhop of Paros 194, dies 205.

Maximus Biſhop of Jeruſalem 50, refuſes to come to the Council at Antioch 57, dies 67.

N.

NEctarius Biſhop of Conſtantinop. 109.

Neophyti who 128.

Neſtorius Biſhop of Conſtantinople 160, his Hereſie condemned at a Synod held at Alexandria 162, he accuſes Cyril to the Emperour 163, is depoſed by the third General Council at Epheſus 165, and baniſhed 167, his Works burnt, and his miſerable Death 173.

Nice in Bithynia, a General Council held there 41.

Nice in Thrace a Synod held there by the Arians 74.

Nynnianus Venedota a famous Clergyman of Britain 161.

P.

PAgani who 80.
Parœcia what 36.
Paul Elect of Conſtantinople 61, is baniſhed and murthered by the Arians 67.
St. Patrick converts the Iriſh to the Faith 169.
Patriarchs who 28, their Power and Titles of Honour the ſame 30, with other qualifications 31.
Pelagius his Hereſie what 146.
Peter Biſhop of Alexandria is driven out by the Arians 99, reſtored and dies 102.
Philippi, the Arians meet there 62.
Photinus and his Hereſie condemned 71.
Præcatores their Tenets 78.
Presbyters who 24, their Office in the Church 33, their Original and ſeveral Names 36.
Primates who 27, their privileges and power 32.
Priſcillianus and his Hereſie condemned 112, he is executed 115.
Proclus Biſhop of Conſtantinople 173, dies 182.
Proterius Biſhop of Alexandria 200, murthered 204.

R.

RHegium a Synod held there 176.
Rome, Conſtantine's donation to that See 16, a Synod held there 57, which receives Athanaſius into Communion 61, another 172.

S.

SAbellius and his Hereſie condemned 40.
Sardica a Council held there 62.
Secular Games omitted 3.
Seleucia a Synod held there 74.
Semiarians who 67.
Serapis at Alexandria demoliſhed 129.
Shriving Prieſt what, laid down 131.
Simplicius Biſhop of Rome 206.
Siricius Biſhop of Rome 115, dies 135.
Siſinius Biſhop of Conſtantinople 159, dies 160.
Sixtus Biſhop of Rome 172, dies 176.
Sylveſter Biſhop of Rome 52.
Synarchia what 8.
Syneſius Biſhop of Ptolemais his Works and Character 145.

T.

THeodoſius Roman Emperour is baptized 105, calls the ſecond General Council to Conſtantinople 106, and a Synod there 109, which places the Biſhop thereof next to him of Rome 111, he forbids the Pagans to ſacrifice 113, calls another Synod to Conſtantinople 114, ſuppreſſeth the Arians, and forbids Chriſtians to uſe any Pagan ceremony 119, endeavours to ſuppreſs Paganiſm by demoliſhing their Temples 129, is cruel, and for it undergoes Eccleſiaſtical cenſure 130, dies 134.
Theodoſius Roman Emperour 140, puts forth an Edict againſt the Jews 142, and againſt Hereticks 144, baniſheth the Jews from Alexandria 147, other Edicts againſt them 149, ſtops a Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians in Perſia 155, by an Edict ſets forth the prerogative of Conſtantinople 157, ſeveral other Edicts 158, makes Neſtorius Biſhop thereof 160, ſummons the third General Council 164, baniſheth Neſtorius 167, promotes Union in the Church 168, commands the Books of Neſtorius to be burnt 173, ſets forth an Edict againſt Paganiſm 175, calls a Synod at Epheſus 183, dies 184.
Theopaſchite what 55.
Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria 117, expoſeth the ridiculouſneſs of Paganiſm 130, baniſheth the Origeniſts 138, makes a breach 'twixt Chryſoſtome and Epiphanius 139, farther proſecutes Chryſoſtome 141, dies of a Lethargy 146.
Tirones who 128.
Toledo a Synod held there 138.
Timothy Biſhop of Alexandria 102, comes to the ſecond General Council 107, dies 117.
Timotheus Ælurus Biſhop of Alexandria 204, baniſhed 205. recall'd 207.
Timotheus Solifaciolus Biſhop of Alexandria 205 baniſhed 207.
Tyre a Synod held there 51.

V.

VAiſon a Synod held there 177.
Valens Roman Emperour 92, calls a Synod at Lampſacus, ibid. makes ſeveral Laws 93, is baptized 94, perſecutes the Orthodox 96, deſigns to maſſacre them 97, is ſevere toward Monks 101, burnt alive by the Goths 103.
Valentinian the firſt, Roman Emperour 92, makes divers Laws 93, dies 100, more of his Laws 101.
Valentinian the ſecond, Roman Emperour 101, his Laws 102, his farther care of the Church 105, prohibits Pagan Sacrifices 113, favours the Arians 118, forbids Pagan Superſtition 119, is murthered 134.
Valentinian the third, Roman Emperour 159, confirms the privileges of the Church 201, puts forth an Edict againſt Paganiſm 202, is farther kind to Churchmen 203, dies 204.

Z.

ZEno Roman Emperour 207.
Zozimus Biſhop of Rome 150, pretends to the right of receiving Appeals from the African Churches 151, which is rejected 153, dies 154.

FINIS.

UMI

AN INSTITUTION OF General Hiſtory: OR THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD.

The FOURTH PART. pt. 4

CONTAINING

The Original and Kingdoms of the Heruli, Goths, Lombards and Franks in Italy; the Affairs of Britain; the Original of the Saxons, Angles and Jutes, their Heptarchy; the Monarchy of the Engliſh Saxons, that of the Danes, with its end in reſtoring of the Engliſh Saxon Line down to that of William the Norman, with the Polity, Cuſtoms, Laws and Language then in uſe.

AND ALSO

That of the Conſtantinopolitan Roman Empire, from the Promotion of Nicephorus to the Death of Conſtantine Ducas XII. A. D. MLXVII. being the Year after the Conqueſt of this Nation by Duke William the Norman.

By WILLIAM HOWEL, LL. D. ſometime
Fellow of Magdalen College in Cambridge.

LONDON,
Printed for the Author's Widow by Miles Fleſher. MDCLXXXV.

UMI

TO

The High and Mighty PRINCE

JAMES II.

KING of Great Britain, France and Ireland,
Defender of the Faith, &c.

GREAT SIR,

AMONG the Crowds of Loyal Counties and Corporations that Addreſs themſelves unto Your MAJESTY, vouchſafe to permit a deſolate Widow to approach into Your Sacred Preſence to Congratulate Your Happy and moſt Juſt Poſſeſſion of the Throne of theſe Kingdoms, by laying a ſmall Preſent at Your Royal Feet.

Which is due to Your MAJESTY by a double Title, both by right of Succeſſion to our late Gracious Sovereign, by whoſe Royal Bounty this Work was encouraged; and alſo by deſignment of the Authour, who intended, had not his Death prevented it, to have Dedicated this Book To His Royal Highneſs JAMES the Duke of York, which I now moſt humbly offer To the Sacred Majeſty of King JAMES the Second.

Whom I beſeech the King of Kings long to preſerve beloved of all his Subjects, dreaded by all his Enemies, and renowned to all Poſterity in the Hiſtory of Future Ages.

So prayeth with due Reverence

Your Majeſty's moſt Loyal Subject

Mary Howel.

THE PREFACE TO THE READER

Giving an Account of this VOLUME.

WHICH contains the Hiſtory of the Kingdom of the Heruli in Italy to the Conquering thereof by the Goths, then their Original and Kingdom to the Deſtruction and Ruine thereof by Narſes the Roman General and the coming in of the Lombards, with the Original and Kingdom of them down to the Conquering of it by Charles King of the Franks, who Governed there, and was Crowned Emperour by Leo Biſhop of Rome: Next the Affairs of Britain from the departure of the Romans out of the Iſland to the Deſtruction thereof, and forcing the Inhabitants into the Mountainous places by the Picts, Scots and Saxons: the Original of the Saxons, Angles and Jutes that ſeized on this Land, their Heptarchy, which was united in the Monarchy of the Engliſh Saxons, and carried on till Conquered by the Danes, their Original and Kingdom here to its end, in reſtoring of the Engliſh Saxon Line to the end thereof, being Conquered by Duke William the Norman, giving an Account of the Polity, Cuſtoms, Laws and Language then in uſe, taken from the Original Tongue, with other critical Remarks ſuitable to the nature and uſefulneſs of ſuch an Undertaking.

With the Conſtantinopolitan Roman Affairs from the Depoſing of Irene and Promotion of Nicephorus (where the Third Part ends) to the Death of Conſtantine Ducas XII. Ann. Dom. MLXVII. being the year after the Conqueſt of Duke William the Norman, ſetting forth the ſeveral Actions, Polities, Laws and things of Moment during ring the Reign of each Emperour, with ſuch Kingdoms as fell off from the Roman power and protection, and thoſe that ſtarted up to the terrour of it and all its Neighbours, all linked together in ſuch manner and method as never was yet Extant, being the Labour and Study left under his own hand in Writing by the Authour, whereof we have been Eye-witneſſes,

H. London.
Tho. Roffen.
Sy. Patrick, D. D.
Will. Denton, M. D.
Rich. Aſhfeild, Gent.

A N

AN INSTITUTION OF General Hiſtory:

OR

The Hiſtory of the World.

The Fourth Part.

BOOK I.

Of ſuch Kingdoms and Principalities as were Founded by Barbarous Nations in the Late Roman Provinces now contemporary with the Conſtantinopolitan Roman Empire.

CHAP. I.

Of the Kingdoms of the Heruli, Goths, Lombards and Franks Erected in Italy.

SECT. I.

The Kingdom of the Heruli in Italy,

The ſpace of Eighteen years.

Sect. I.

Odoacer King of Italy and Rome.

1. ODOACER King of the Heruli and Turcilingi having, as we have formerly ſhewn, Conquered and deſtroyed Oreſtes, and depoſed Auguſtulus his Son, became Maſter of Italy, and of Rome, formerly the Miſtreſs of the World, which hereby was alſo degraded, together with Auguſtulus, the Imperial Diadem being plucked from her Head, and the Robe torn from about her Shoulders. The Conquerour viewing the Remains of her Ancient Majeſty, and contemplating the Lines of that Beauty wherein ſhe had ſurpaſſed all Rivals, as much as the Light of the Moon doth that of the obſcure and twinkling Stars, was confounded and amazed, could ſcarcely believe what he had done, or where he was; and conſcious of the Extravagancy of his own Fortune, as well as of the viciſſitude of humane Affairs in general, durſt not, it ſeems, be ſo bold as to take up and aſſume the Imperial Enſigns which now lay at his Feet, but contented himſelf with an Inferiour Dignity. Thinking the Imperial Robe now to be threadbare or infected with ſome deleterious Quality, which of late had ſuffered none to wear it long, though he might have choſen another, which by its newneſs might have been both warm and ſafe, yet he onely changed the Imperial for Royal, the Title of Emperour for the more modeſt and leſs envied one of King of Italy, refuſing utterly all Enſigns of Royal Majeſty. The Ancient Lady in her great affliction was pleaſed to ſee this humility in a barbarous Robber, comforted her ſelf with the good Fortune of her Daughter, which ſtill in the Eaſt retained her Imperial Dignity; ſhe purpoſed to remove lower down towards the River, and quit thoſe ſeven Hills on which ſhe had been ſo much and ſo often expoſed to Northern Blaſts, and ſhe had thoughts of taking another Courſe, which ſhould be honourable as well as the former, gain her more applauſe and more ſuitable to her Age, and the Gravity of her preſent Aſpect, to change the Title of Prince for that of Prieſt, and the Imperial Diadem for a Pontifical Miter.

2. Our new King of Italy as he thought to eſtabliſh a new Kingdom, which ſhould call him Founder, ſo of fixing the Seat thereof at ſome new Place, and of building a new City which he intended to call after his own Name Odoacria. But either finding the Vanity of this Project, or being diverted from it by greater Cares, he took other Courſes, for ſecuring his Intereſt. The Goths which had been called into Italy by Valentinian, to defend the Countrey againſt the Hunnes, he endeavoured to oblige by beſtowing on them thoſe Lands which formerly, but ineffectually, had been promiſed them. He granted to Eurich, King of the Viſegoths, that part of Gall lying betwixt the Alpes and the River Rhodanus, and onely remaining under the Authority of the Romans. With Gundobade King of the Burgundians he made a League and Alliance. On the Italians he laid Taxes and Impoſitions ſufficient to maintain an Army againſt foreign Invaſions. Then to prevent inteſtine broils, he deprived the Roman Senate of its ancient Authority, and took away at firſt the uſe of Conſuls, that he might diminiſh the Roman Spirit and Courage, by aboliſhing ſuch Rites as put them in mind of the great Performances of their Anceſtours. As to other matters, he retained the old Names and Offices of Magiſtracy, and maintained the Church in its ancient Rights and Immunities. When he had done theſe things, and as he thought laid laſting Foundations of his new Dominion, he left Rome to the Government of Baſilius the Prefect and Patritian, and removed his Court to Ravenna. There he had not been long ſetled, when Zeno the Emperour, hearing how his matters ſucceeded, envied his good Fortune, grudged him his new Poſſeſſions, and utterly refuſed to own, acknowledge or ratifie his Kingly Title to Italy. Such therefore was the Reverence as yet born to the Imperial Name, that this got him the Repute of an Uſurper, a Tyrant and an unlawfull Prince; which made him enter into new Councils for ſtrengthning himſelf, and add Fear and Awe to that Love which hitherto he had eſpecially deſired to gain from his Subjects. For an Example of terrour he put to death at Ravenna Brachilus a Comes, who ſome ſay ſpurned againſt his Government. Hereby it was perceived that he knew his meaſures, and underſtood how to manage his Affairs, and thereupon he began both to be feared and reſpected at home and abroad; inſomuch that Genſerich King of the Vandals in Africk deſired his Friendſhip, and to obtain it granted Sicily to him to be held in Tribute.

Takes Courſes to ſecure his intereſt.

Vide Sigonium de Occidentali Imperio.

He fixes his Seat at Ravenna.

He puts to death Brachilus.

3. Odoacer, as we ſaid, refuſed to name any Conſul for the Weſt, and it happened for ſeveral years that ſometime one ſingle one was created in the Eaſt, and ſometime there was none at all. The Italians reſented it, that by the wilfulneſs of their preſent Maſter, they ſhould be deprived of that higheſt Office of Magiſtracy and Honour, and therefore to pleaſe them, he preferred Baſilius the Prefect to that Name and Dignity, which he alſo executed without a Collegue, in the year of our Lord CCCCLXXX, in the ſeventh of the Emperour Zeno, and the fifth of Odoacer. Now was it five years ſince Julius Nepos, being depoſed from the Empire of the Weſt, lived quietly in Dalmatia by the knowledge and approbation of Odoacer, who wiſhed him all repoſe and ſecurity imaginable. But at this time Viator and Ovida, who had the Title of Comites, bearing him malice, circumvented him at his Countrey-houſe, ſet upon him and murthered him. Odoacer whether acted by generoſity of Nature, or by Jealouſie, and apprehenſion of ſo evil an Example, took it in great Diſdain, and the year following, for which he named Placidius Conſul, ſent ſome Forces againſt them, and

He makes Baſilius Conſul.

having

He put Ovida to death for the Murther of Julius Nepos.

having eaſily overcome them put Ovida to death. This ſame year the Inhabitants of Liguria complained to him by Epiphanius Biſhop of Pavia, that Pelagius the Præfectus Prætorio had doubled the Impoſitions upon the Countrey. By the Interceſſion of the ſaid Biſhop they obtained a Relaxation, and this Prelate having beſtowed much coſt and pains in repairing the Churches formerly ruinated in his City by the Wars, obtained alſo of Odoacer a Remiſſion of Tributes for five years, as an incouragement to the Citizens to rebuild their Private-Houſes.

Odoacer conquers the Rugi.

Theodorich purpoſeth to conquer him.

Two ſeveral opinions as to the Inducement.

4. After this, Odoacer found an occaſion for employing his Arms, and it was againſt the Rugi a Northern People. He did it with ſuch ſucceſs, as we are told, that he took Priſoner Phœbas their King, together with his Wife, and led them in triumph to Rome; but Frederick their Son made his Eſcape, and went to Theodorich King of the Oſtrogoths, who then lay in Mœſia, and by this time had his thoughts ſo much upon Odoacer and Italy, that he preſently ſhewed they were very ſerious and active. This Theodorich had been ſome time in Zeno's Court at Conſtantinople, and was, it's ſaid, highly honoured by him, inſomuch that he made him Conſul, and not long after he took a reſolution to invade Italy. But as to the Inducement there are two different Aſſertions. The one is of thoſe who affirm that Zeno had always a great Kindneſs for Theodorich, and freely granted Italy to him to reign there, after he ſhould have driven out the Heruli with Odoacer their King. The other makes Theodorich to have been ingratefull towards the Emperour, from whom he endeavoured to wreſt the Empire of the Eaſt, to have brought into danger the City of Conſtantinople by Fire, and burnt many other Places. Having miſſed of his Aims there, he turned himſelf upon Italy, envying the proſperous Eſtate of Odoacer, who had lately overthrown the Rugi. From what Euagrius writes, one may gueſs that Zeno was not always his friend; but what ſhould be the occaſion is uncertain. Euſtathius an Hiſtorian it ſeems laid the blame upon the Emperour, and Marcellinus on Theodorich. The Writers that were his Countrymen will have him ſent by the liking, well wiſhes, and incouragement of Zeno: we ſhall preſent the Reader with the Story cloathed with ſuch Circumſtances as we find it.

His Army mutinies.

5. Whilſt Theodorich therefore ſolaced himſelf with the Pleaſures of Zeno's Court, his Oſtrogoths lived at a quite different Rate, being by a League tied up from making any Depredations in the Roman Dominions; and not ſufficiently provided for by the pay which the Emperour had agreed to give them, They curſe the League, cry out againſt their King's Alliance, and to Conſtantinople they ſend Meſſengers, who with tears in their Eyes complained to him of the Poverty and Neceſſities to which they were reduced, and deſire him to quit thoſe pleaſures wherein he had intangled himſelf, and, if he regarded his own Intereſt, and their Preſervation, to return to them with ſpeed; for elſe they muſt enter into ſome new Courſe, and ſeek out other Habitations. Now ſay the Gothick Hiſtorians, and thoſe that follow them, Theodorich moved herewith betook himſelf preſently to Zeno, to whom he laid open the ſad Eſtate of his Countrymen, and told him that ſeeing Italy was overrun by the Turcilingi and Rugi, and Rome the late Miſtreſs of the World, and ancient Seat of the Empire, was now inſlaved to the Heruli; if he pleaſed to give him order to redeem and recover it out of their Hands, he would doe his utmoſt endeavour, and therein employ his idle and indigent Oſtrogoths. If he ſhould accompliſh his Deſigns, the Honour and Renown would belong, as due, to his imperial Majeſty; and if he miſcarried, he would be rid of ſo many Stipendiaries, and ſave his money in his Coffers. This Zeno heard with Trouble, being very unwilling to part with him, but as well to give him content, as in Compliance with the publick Intereſt, he gave him leave, and diſmiſſed him with great preſents, to his deſigned Expedition.

6. Thus writes Jordanus the Goth from the relation of Caſſiodorus, or out of reſpect to his Countrymen, and ſuch as follow him. But Sigonius, all relations conſidered, cloſeth with that of Marcellinus, that Theodorich now ſatiated with the Honours and Favours heaped upon him, conſented to the Petition of his Countrymen, and returning into Mœſia made war upon the Emperour, whilſt his men were freſh, and their appetites were ſharpned by the prevalent Power of neceſſity, and expectation. He marched as far as Conſtantinople and Melanthias, and waſting the Countrey round about returned to Novæ a Town of Mœſia, from which he had ſet forth. At this time Odoacer, being told that Frederick the Son of Phœbas, or Feleteus, King of the Rugi, was after his flight returned home into his own Countrey, ſent Onulſus his Brother with a ſtrong party of men againſt him. Hereupon Frederick not able to endure the ſhock retired to Novæ, and made his appli-

Onulſus removes the Rugi into Italy.

application to Theodorich. Onulſus eaſily conquered the Rugi, whom he conſtrained to paſs into Italy, and then the Lombards under Conduct of Gudeach their King ſeized on their Countrey. Zeno all this while, as Sigonius tells you, was highly ſenſible of the Affront done him by Theodorich, but prudently conſidered there was no dealing roughly with ſuch a Spirit; and therefore in the year when Dinamius and Siphodius were Conſuls, or the CCCCLXXXVIII of Our Lord, he wrote to him moſt loving Letters, and kindly invited him to return to Court. Theodorich, if thou wilt look into it, Reader, notwithſtanding all the Miſchief he had done, cloſed with his invitation, went to Conſtantinople, and there excuſed his Miſdemeanours by that neceſſity to which his Goths had been reduced. Zeno was as ready to give as he was to ask Pardon, and to grant him any other thing for the employment of his Men, and the raiſing of his own Fortunes. Animated by this Reception, he moved the Conqueſt of Italy to him, uſing ſuch Arguments as we formerly mentioned, inculcating that it would be more ſeemly, that he his faithfull Servant, and his Son, ſhould poſſeſs that Countrey; than Odoacer keep the Senate and Common-wealth in ſlavery. Zeno to free Illyricum from the Goths was very willing he ſhould try his Fortune, and by an Authentick Writing paſſed Italy over to him, beſtowed on him a ſacred Cap, and recommending to him the Roman Senate and People gave him leave to depart and begin his Journey.

Theodorich overthrows the Gepidæ and Bulgari.

Invades Italy.

Beats back Odoacer.

7. Theodorich and his Goths were ready for their march, when an unexpected Accident diverted them, and for ſome time retarded their Expedition. Tranſilla King of the Gepidæ, and Buſa of the Bulgari either jealous of his growing greatneſs, or ſolicited by Odoacer, who deſired to remove the danger from his own Doors, indeavoured to cruſh his Deſign by falling upon him on a ſudden, when he little expected ſuch Treachery. Yet was he not at all daunted with the great danger which impended, but boldly attaching them when they were divided, in one ingagement overthrew Tranſilla, and in another battel defeated the Bulgari, a ſort of People newly come out of Scythia. Animated by his Succeſs as an Omen of his future Grandeur, with greater vigour he prepared for his Italian voiage, and when all things were ready, ſet forth from Mœſia in the middle of Winter, in the Conſulſhip of Probinus, and Euſebius in the CCCCLXXXIX year of Our Lord, as is evident from the Chronicon of Caſſiodorus who lived at this time, though Sigonius caſts this Expedition into the following year. From Mœſia the whole Multitude of Oſtrogoths removed with their Wives, Children and Baggage, and travelling through Syrmium and Pannonia, came by Land to the Borders of Italy, for they had no Ships to tranſport them in the neareſt paſſage. Proceeding as far as the River Sontius which runs not far from Aquileia, they there made a hault and incamped, becauſe of the convenience of paſture. Here Odoacer preſented himſelf on the farther ſide, reſolving to ſtop their progreſs, and for that purpoſe he ſecured the Bridge, where at this day is ſeen a Town called Goritia. But notwithſtanding all he could doe, Theodorich forced his way over, and preſently giving him battel drove him back into his Camp, which to ſtorm he made all Preparations. Odoacer perceiving his Intentions, and that he was unable to maintain it, quitted the place, and taking advantage retired to Verona, for there was no Fort nor Garriſon near at hand; the Devaſtations made by Attila not being yet repaired. Whilſt he was thus employed in defending his Borders againſt the Goths, Gundobade the King of the Burgundians, pretending he was circumvented in a League made with him, took the Advantage now offered, and invading Liguria and Æmilia, waſted and plundered the Countrey; then hearing of Theodorich his Succeſs and Progreſs, he haſtily retreated with his Booty into Burgundy.

Defeats him again, and takes Verona.

A third time.

8. Theodorich having taken order for ſecuring the Borders, as he ſaw agreeable to his own Intereſt, followed Odoacer, and ſate down before Verona. Odoacer had by this time rallied his diſperſed Forces, and recruited them ſo with new Levies, that ſeeming to himſelf as able to graple with him as before, he came out of the Town and gave him battel; wherein he was again overthrown with great ſlaughter of his Men, and forced to betake himſelf to his heels; and a great number of his Soldiers, which eſcaped the Fight, took the River Atheſis in deſperation and haſte, and were ſwallowed by the Floods. Verona was quickly delivered by the trembling Citizens to the Conquerour, who made no ſtay in the Town; but ſtill purſued Odoacer, and near the River Abdua forced him the third time to ingage, with the ſame Succeſs as formerly. Odoacer in ſo great Straits yet comforted himſelf a little in the City of Rome, of which if he continued Maſter, he hoped he might maintain his Reputation, and better endure the ſhock of Fortune, which he would fain believe could not be laſting, it was ſo violent and ſevere. He reſolved therefore to haſten thither, but when he came he found the Gates faſt locked and bolted, and the Walls manned againſt him, the Senate and People ſome think having intimation of the Emperour's pleaſure concerning Theodorich. Inraged at this Repulſe, he burnt and demoliſhed as much of the Suburbs as the time would give him leave, and then made for Ravenna as his laſt Refuge. This City alſo one Libitta kept for Theodorich, and lay incamped before it for that purpoſe. But Odoacer acted by the indignation as well as extreme Neceſſity of his Affairs, reſolved to drive him from his Poſt, and after a ſharp conflict, wherein many periſhed on both ſides, he ſlew Libitta, and took both his Camp and Ravenna, which he entred on the tenth of July. Here he labours to fortifie himſelf, when in the mean time Theodorich marches to Milan, which having got into his hands without much trouble, a great part of the Italian Soldiers there came to wait on him as the true and rightfull Lord of Italy. Amongſt others was Epiphanius Biſhop of Pavia, whom he received with great reſpect.

Odoacer kept out of Rome.

Theodorich takes Milan.

Odoacer beſieges him in Pavia, but riſes preſently.

Theodorich beſieges Odoacer in Ravenna.

Takes Ariminum and other Cities.

9. Here when he ſeemed to have conquered the greateſt Difficulties, and to have arrived almoſt at the pitch of his good Fortune, an untowardly Accident plucked him by the ſleeve, and put him in mind of the Inconſtancy of humane Affairs. For his Italians, who ſo lately came to acknowledge him for their Prince and Sovereign, perſwaded by one Tuffa a man of Conſular Dignity, revolted again to Odoacer; which ſtruck him with great terrour and amazement, and cauſed him to quit Milan, in the fidelity and ſtrength whereof he could not ſo much rely, and go to Pavia, where he thought he could better ſecure himſelf and his Friends. Odoacer takes the opportunity, and ſits down before the Town. Epiphanius the Biſhop labours all he can to compoſe the Difference, and procure ſuch Priſoners to be reſtored as were taken on both ſides, without Ranſome. Now whether by his Ghoſtly Counſel Odoacer was moved, or rather diſcouraged by the Valour and Succeſs of the Goths whom Heaven ſeemed to favour, he raiſed his Siege and marched back to Ravenna. Theodorich ſpirited afreſh by ſo unexpected a Retreat, reſolved not to trifle in that manner with his Fortune, and ſlight his opportunities, but leaving the Women and Baggage at Pavia followed the Enemy to Ravenna, which he blocked up in three ſeveral Places, not being well able for the ſituation to get up and ſtorm it. For the City lying two Furlongs diſtance from the Sea is hardly acceſſible on any part: the Haven full of Rocks and Shallows, the ground about it fenny and wateriſh, as well by the flowing in of the Sea, as Rivers taking their Courſe thorough it. Therefore Theodorich took up one Poſt at Pinetus three Miles from the Town, placed another Party at Palatiolum, and had a third Guard at the Bridge of Candidianus, waiting for ſuch opportunities as the Siege ſhould produce. Odoacer perceiving he was over matched in Valour and Conduct, if not in numbers, was unwilling to make any Sallies, yet conſtrained to doe ſomething for his Reputation, he iſſued out, and fell upon the Party lying at the Bridge, where he was ſo warmly received, that he found it expedient to make a quick retreat into the City. Theodorich foreſeeing, that the Siege was likely to be drawn out in length, would not ſpend all his time in ſo lazy an employment, but leaving ſufficient Guards to maintain his Poſts, marched to other Towns poſſeſſed by the Enemy, became Maſter of them, and having taken Ariminum, improved the Advantage offered him thereby of ſtopping all Proviſions from being carried by Sea to Ravenna. Theſe things got him ſuch Reputation, that Gundamund King of Africk, (the Succeſſour of Hunerich that Arian Perſecutour who was eaten up of worms) ſent Ambaſſadours, made peace with him, and left off waſting Sicily, which he had invaded.

10. The Siege was carried on very gently; few conſiderable Acts of Hoſtility intervening, onely light skirmiſhes which the Beſieged made to exerciſe his men, and tire out the Enemy, till Theodorich returned from his Expedition againſt the other Cities. Having taken them all, Cæſarea excepted, which Odoacer had furniſhed with a very ſtrong Garriſon, he returned to his former Poſt at Palatiolum, on the twenty ninth of Auguſt, and removing his Family thither from Ticinum or Pavia vigorouſly renewed the Siege. Hereby Odoacer was ſo ſtraitned for want of Proviſions, that having made many ineffectual Sallies, at laſt, armed by Neceſſity and Deſperation, in the ſilence of the Night he led out his whole Army, which Theodorich was not ſo negligent as not to perceive, and therefore drew his Forces together, and made himſelf ready to receive him. Here evidently appeared what influence Neceſſity and Paſſions have upon humane Actions. Such as formerly Driven to his Camp by Odoacer.

But he reinforces the Siege.

were not able to receive a charge from the Goths, now bow them all down before them, and compelled him who had been wont to give them the chaſe to take him to his heels, and fly amain towards his Camp. Hither when he came, his Mother preſented her ſelf in the Gate with intention to ſtop him, asked him whither he was going, and told him there was no place of ſafety for him, except ſhe ſhould take up her Clothes, and receive him into that part from whence he was brought forth into the World; with theſe words he was both aſhamed and irritated to ſuch a Degree, that rallying as many of his Men as he could get together, he charged the Enemy with ſuch violence, that he drove him back into the Town, and reinforced the Siege as ſtrong as ever.

An Agreement that they ſhall reign together.

Odoacer ſlain.

II. Now were all the Difficulties and Hardſhips, which uſually attend a tedious League, renewed both to thoſe without and them within: in the City great ſterility bordering upon extreme Famine, in the Camp wearineſs and Impatience contracted by ſo many fruitleſs labours and skirmiſhes. The Biſhops fail not to interpoſe their Indeavours for an amicable compoſure; through their Interceſſion Meſſages are ſent from both ſides, and at length, at the deſire of Theodorich, Odoacer conſents that he ſhall reign with him in equal Authority and Power as King alſo of Italy. Hereupon on the twenty ſeventh of February the Siege is raiſed, and Theodorich entring Ravenna lived friendly and peaceably with Odoacer his Collegue for ſome little time. But then he grew weary of that Fellowſhip, of which the Throne is wont to be impatient, and having invited him to a Feaſt, when he demanded his ſhare conſigned to him by the League, pretending ſome Conſpiracy againſt his own Perſon, he cauſed him to be ſlain together with his Son and the Principals of his Friends, about ſeventeen years after the Depoſing of Auguſtulus, A. D. CCCCXCIII. Procopius plainly writes that he was treacherouſly ſlain, but Caſſiodorus and Jordanus ſeem to make it more than a pretence of Theodorich. Nay the * former ſays that Odoacer did really plot againſt his life, and the † latter barely relates that he put him to death. But the one was in great favour with him, and executed the place of Secretary in his Court, though a ſober and grave Writer; and the other being a Goth, and his Countryman might be cautious of ſaying any thing which might reflect upon his Nation. But Odoacer ſo died, and Theodorich eaſily made himſelf Maſter of Italy, whoſe Government we are now to relate. But foraſmuch as the Goths made now, and had made ſuch a noiſe and buſtle in the World, had done ſuch things, made ſuch Conqueſts and founded ſeveral Kingdoms, its highly requiſite that we premiſe ſomething concerning the Original and firſt Motions of this People, taking in alſo thoſe of other Northern Nations in the way as they fitly preſent themſelves. For out of the North they ſwarmed like ſo many Vultures, Kites and other Birds of Prey, fell upon the Eagle, and after ſore bickering, having ſpoiled him of his Weſtern Plumes, at length outed him of the Neſt it ſelf, and ſo held it and the Regions about it, till a Cock of generous breed, though alſo of Northern extraction, cleared Italy and other Countries of them, and trimming himſelf with the Weſtern Plumes, ſet up, and was owned, for a Weſtern Eagle.

* Hoc Conſ. (i. e. Albino) Theodoricus Ravennam ingreſſus Odoacrem molientem ſibi inſidias interemit.

† Poſtmodum hac luce privavit.

SECT. II.

The Original of the Goths and other Barbarous Nations, that invaded and ſeized Italy.

Sect. II.

From Scandia the Goths and other Nations iſſued.

Vide Grotii Prolegomena in Hiſtor Gothorum, Vandalorum, &c.

1. THE Northern Clime out of which theſe Goths and others derived their Deſcent, who invaded the Southweſtern Parts of the Roman Empire, was that Tract of ground which the Ancients thought an Iſland, but ſince has been found to be a Peninſula, known by the Names of Scandinavia, Scandia, Scanza, Scanzia and Scantia, becauſe the Inhabitants made uſe of high and ſteep Rocks in the Room of Caſtles which they called Scanzen, to which the Word being added which ſignifies Land, thence came that of Scandinavia. The Greeks called it Baltia from the inward Sea, for an Irruption of the Sea it ſignifies; and Procopius thought it to be Thule. It's a great ſpace of ground compaſſed on the North, and the Eaſt by the Sea; and the Botnick Bay and the Baltick Sea fence it on the Weſt and South; as alſo by Rivers which pour themſelves out into the Botnick Bay, and the Ruſſian or white Sea.

Two Kingdoms therein of the Sueones and Sittones.

Oſtrogoths and Weſtrogoths.

2. Tacitus placeth two Kingdoms in this Tract, viz. of the Sueones and the Sittones. The former are alſo variouſly called Suiones, Suethani and Suethidi, by our Engliſh Writers Suedi and Suethedi, by others Suithonæ, homines Suetici, and Sueci worſt of all. The Sueones or Suethi were ſo called as laborious and getting their livings by the ſweat of their brows; and the Sittones, on the contrary, from a ſitting ſedentary or idle Courſe of Life. The Kingdoms were divided by the Mountain Seno ſo named from the ſeven Hills; and the Countrey of the Sittones was called Norwegia or Nordwege becauſe ſituate to the North. After Tacitus his time other Nations might peirce themſelves into Scanzia, as did the Heruli and Rugi, and afterwards the Dani who had been a Colony of the Suedi, but retained and poſſeſſed themſelves of part of the Countrey not long before Juſtinian's time, Procopius and Jornandes being the moſt ancient Writers that mention them, and the latter ſaying that they drove the Heruli out of the Seats which they had poſſeſſed in Scanzia. Now beſides the Sueones and Sittones, ſeveral other People are found to have been Inhabitants of Scanzia, as the Goths which from their Habitations Eaſtward and Weſtward, carried the Names of Oſtrogoths and Weſtrogoths, by the Latines corruptly called Viſigothi. They had the Name of Goten or Guten, which ſignifies Good, from Strangers for their great humanity to ſuch as they entertained. That the Goths inhabited Scanzia is evident from all ſorts of Writers and other Teſtimonies, and there had their Name, as other People for their inhumanity to Strangers received contrary appellations, as the Zuadi Witti and Thaifali. Of the Goths other Nations deſcended, or were the ſame with them, and from ſome Accidents received other Names as the Longobards, and Wandals. And theſe Names they took after the Migrations of thoſe Scanzian Nations which they made far and wide, and thereby made themſelves ſo conſiderable as to be known both by their old and new Names, and much more by the Effects of their victorious Arms.

Sheringham in Diſceptat. de Origine Gentis Anglorum.

3. For their firſt Motion or Expedition we are in the dark, and as in the Originals of all Nations, ſome truth is involved in many and great Fictions and Poetick Romances, ſo we may probably conjecture in this of theirs. One ſtory we are to mention, becauſe a late learned and ingenious Writer hath taken much pains to make it probable. And it hangs upon this hinge of Truth, that the Goths or Getes in moſt ancient times out of Scandia made Inroads not onely into the Cherſoneſus, the Iſlands of the Baltick Sea and the more Northern Parts of Germany, but into ſeveral Parts both of the Aſian and European Sarmatia and Scythia, whence driving out the Inhabitants they there ſeated themſelves, as well as in Thrace and ſeveral other Provinces. Upon this Foundation the Northern Writers raiſe particular ſtories, which we cannot tell how to call falſe as to the main of them, but are very Romantick in their Circumſtances. As into other Regions, they ſay the Goths pierced (in very old time it muſt be) into that Part of the Aſian Scythia where there was a City afterward called by them Aſgard,

A Colony out of Scandia to Aſgardia.

the Inhabitants whereof Aſgardiani are by ſome thought the ſame with thoſe whom the Greeks knew by the Name of Aſpurgiani, both ſorts of Authours placing them near to the Lake Mœotis, where the River Tanais with great fury empties himſelf into it. Some think Ptolemy the Geographer called the City by the very Name of Aſcard or Aſgard. The Countrey in which it ſtood was in a peculiar way called Aſia by Strabo, and the People Aſæi and Aſiotæ by other Writers, being alſo called Turcæ whom Mela makes the ſame with the Tyrſagetæ, thoſe whom at preſent we call Turks, having long time after entered into thoſe quarters after they were deſerted by the Goths, upon their return back into Europe. Theſe Aſpurgiani had their Kings, the Dominions of whom extended to the farther Mountains of Scythia within Imaus, where the Auſones, Syebi and Iotæ inhabited, whom Strabo comprehends under the very Name of Aſpurgiani.

Woden.

Wonderfull things ſaid of him.

4. Of this Aſgardia or Aſpurgia in proceſs of time was King one Othin, who had many other Names, according to the ſeveral Gothick Dialects, but that whereby he is commonly known is Woden, from which the third day of the week is called Wodenſday. Now moſt wonderfull things are ſaid of this Woden, no more Famous and Romantick ſtories being told of any Heroe. What wonderfull Power he had in Magick in transforming himſelf and other things, is not fit here to be related; his ways of enchanting were peculiar. Of his Government fine things are told; as alſo his Acts and Conqueſts in the Eaſtern and Northern Parts are celebrated, he being ſaid to be Lord of that part of Scythia lying toward the South. At what time the Romans grew terrible to the World, by his Magick knowing that he and his Poſterity ſhould for a long time Reign in the Northern Parts of the World, he committed to his two Brothers Ve and Velir, the Government of Aſgardia, and went into Ruſſia, whence he proceeded into Saxony, and thence into Gothia Suetica or Suethland. The Prince of this Countrey was one Gyluo, by whoſe conſent he and his followers planted there. Here, by his Inchantments, Rhimes and Songs, he did ſuch incredible things, that his Name became famous and reached all Countries, and afterward the Suedi and other Northern Nations ſacrificed to him and his twelve Aſſiſtants, which he choſe to keep him in Magical Rites and Government, and wickedly paid to him their Duty and Devotion which was due to the Lord of Heaven and Earth alone.

What Judgment is to be made of his Story.

5. Now to make a Judgment of this Story, it is very probable that ſome famous Man or Men there was of this Name, which indeed became wonderfully revered by the Northern and other German Nations. Theſe Countries, as is obſerved and is ſufficiently evident, have been much given to Magick and Inchantments, Charms and Tricks, many Monuments of their ancient Places of Burial, with their Ruuick Inſcriptions ſufficiently teſtifying enough of this matter at this very day. That ſome of the Goths were called Turcæ we hear, and it is not improbable, that in this return out of thoſe Scythian Quarters ſome retained this Name, though the reaſon of it was in the dark. For in the County of Lincoln upon the River Trent, a few Miles from Gainsborough, there is a Town now called Torkſey, which the Saxons in their Language knew by the Name of Turkeſigga or the Iſland of Turks. In the Northern Countries many places bear the Name of Woden. It is not utterly to be neglected, that the Removals and Travels of the Goths, out of the more Northern Parts into Germany, and the adjacent Iſlands are ſaid farther to be made out, both by the Inſcriptions in Ruuich Characters, which are extant both in the ſaid Iſlands and in Sueden, as well as by the Annaliſts of theſe Quarters. Moreover great Pillars were in Sueden not long ſince to be ſeen, which the Inſcriptions upon them manifeſted to have been erected by them in Memory of their Worthies, which had loſt their Lives in Greece, Thrace or other places. It's believed by ſome that from Woden, and his Companions who were Scythians, Suedia came to be called Nova Scythia, and the Inhabitants of the Cherſoneſus or the Cimbri to be termed by the Greeks, Celtoſcythæ, being firſt known to them by the Name of Cimmerii, and why by this? but that becauſe they were firſt in Scythia called Cimmerii, and into Germany and thoſe parts travelled from the Boſphorus Cimmerius.

6. To be ſure the People inhabiting Scandia, had thoſe of the ſame Names with themſelves, living in the Scythian Regions, and which muſt neceſſarily be deduced from the ſame Original. That thoſe three ſeverally denominated People which invaded and conquered this our Iſland were of Scandian Original, none can doubt, viz. the Jutes, Gutes or Getes (the ſame with the Goths) the Angli and Saxons; and from Ptolemy the Geographer it appears, that in Scythia or Cimmeria there were three ſeveral People which were known by theſe very Names. He ſpeaks of Iotæ lying upon the Sea of the Rhiminii. Of the Saſones under the Maſſæan and Alan Mountains. And though by name he mentions not the Angles, yet the Suebi he doth, or Suevi, part of which Nation the Angli are rationally thought to have been, being ſo called from the Angle or Corner on which they ſeized in Germany. This is accounted no ſmall Argument, that theſe People came into the Northern Parts of Germany at no other time, nor under any other Conduct than that of Woden, that before the time of his Expedition no ſuch Names as theſe do occur in Northern Writers, but after they became famous, eſpecially the Saxons. In the Sacogothick Annals, thoſe of Norway and Denmark, the memory of them flouriſhes; but amongſt the ancient Greek and Roman Writers the Saxons are known, as alſo the Jutes by the Name of Cimbri, though the Suebi by that of their own. In Sarmatia, and eſpecially in Livonia are many Towns, the Names of which are Saxon. And for the Maritime Parts, they ſpeak the Language there at this very day; the ſame which about Pontus and thoſe Northern Quarters of Aſia, was ſpoken even in the time of Ovid, the Poet, who being baniſhed thither, became a Proficient in the Language of the Getes. Well, this might be when Strabo placeth the Macropogones or Longobards in Cimmeria, about Syndica, near to which Woden is ſaid to have reigned in Aſpurgia. In Germany there is Trier's, in Saxon Die Trier, and ſuch there were in Scythia alſo. The Chatti alſo lived in Germany, not far from the Suevi, Angli and Chamani, and Ptolemy placeth them alſo in Scythia next the Maſſagetes, without the Mountains Imai.

7. To theſe things might be added, that the Humours, Manners and Inclinations of the Gothick Nations or Cimbri, did much ſuit with thoſe of the Aſiatick Scythians. And all conſidered, that there were migrations there can be little doubt, the ſame People being found at ſo great diſtance. Now whether firſt theſe Nations paſſed from Scandia into Scythia, or out of Scythia into Scandia, may be ſome queſtion; but it ſeems not difficult to be reſolved, that ſetting aſide the firſt planting of the World, they firſt went from Scandia, becauſe the vaſt Tracts of that Countrey Germany, and the Iſlands ſpeaking that Language, challenge the other ſorts of People of the Aſiatick Scythia to have been their Colonies, for they were but few in number in compariſon of their Neighbours, who ſpake in Language and lived far differently from them. Admit it then as poſſible, that ſuch a man as Woden there might be, it would be of conſequence, if we had any light concerning his return into Scandia. A Tradition there was amongſt the Saxons, that they came by Sea into Germany, but it is urged that no Footſteps of any other Invaſion or Migration is to be found, but this of Woden. Some make it to have happened four and twenty Years before the Birth of Chriſt, about the time that Pompey waſted Syria; but if Woden delivered Denmark to his Son Skiold, whence the Kings of that Countrey were anciently called Skioldinger, this Skiold, according to the Daniſh Cronology, lived almoſt a thouſand Years before Pompey; and accordingly Woden with his Aſiaticks muſt have preceded the Daniſh Kingdom, and to Saxony, Suevia and Jutia have given their proper Names. By this account Woden muſt have been ancienter than Homer; but how will this conſiſt with the Genealogies of our own Engliſh Saxon Kings, the Founders of the ſeven Kingdoms here, all which are derived in deſcent from Woden? But Hengiſt, the firſt that came into Britain, arrived not till about CCCCL Years after Chriſt's Birth, and he is ſaid to have been but the Abnepos, or Great Grandchild of Woden, as Cerdic, the Founder of the Kingdom of the Weſtſaxons, the Tenth from him: Whereas by the former account, Woden muſt have preceded the Birth of our Saviour above a thouſand Years.

8. To diſpatch therefore this Story of him, let us cloſe with the opinion of them, who think that as amongſt the Greeks, there were ſeveral there bore the Name of Hercules, but were all confounded together, and what was done by all was aſcribed to one. It fell out in the ſame manner as to the matter of Woden. It's thought that there were three which bore this Name, all deified by Idolaters. The firſt, deſcended from Saturn and the Trojan Kings, called Aſianus, and Odin hiogainte or Woden the Ancient, who never came into Europe, but his Name and Rites were hither brought by others. The ſecond of Upſall, to whom in Swedeland was a Temple dedicated ſhining with Gold, who was alſo called Aſianus, but a ſtranger of the Scythians. The third was called Mathodin or Midlewoden, of whom Saxo Grammaticus maketh mention, who, the other Woden being abroad, play'd tricks, and took occaſion to feign himſelf a God, but after his return fled into Phaonia, and there was ſlain by the Inhabitants. Some produce a fourth Woden, who being beaten by Pompey out of Aſia into the Northern Parts, taught the People the Arts and Laws of the Aſiaticks, and was therefore had in eſpecial Honour. And yet this flight from the Romans is aſcribed to him of Vpſall, though they lived in far different Ages. Let us take then or leave this Story of Woden, with the Migrations into Aſia, and back again out of that Countrey, and returning alſo to Scandia, take notice of theſe Motions of the Gothick Nations, which are warranted by unqueſtionable Hiſtory, or probable at leaſt.

Wodens.

9. It is not amiſs to premiſe, that upon paſſing into other Countries, the ſame People got ſeveral Names; as either Strangers made terminations to their old ones, or as they obſerved ſomething they thought moſt remarkable in them: According to the way of ſeverally terminating words, and bringing them as near as can be to the Genius of a ſtrange Language, the ſame Goths are in ſeveral Writers called Gutæ, Gutones, Gothones, Gythones, Guttones and Guttonici, as the ſame Countrey is termed Gotthia and Gudlandia. And in like manner, the Franci and Francones, Vaſci and Vaſcones, Friſii and Friſones, Suedi and Sueones are the ſame. After the firſt migration of them North Eaſtward to the Lake of Mæotis, where even at this very day they retain both the Names, Manners and Language of Goths, as their Countrey that of Gotthia, they ſeem to have ſent out that Colony which planted it ſelf between the Rivers Albis (by thoſe Goths called Gotthelba) and Viſtula, where they preſerved their Countrey Name. Grotius gueſſeth that above three Hundred years before our Saviour, they firſt went out of Scanzia, Godonavia or Gothland; and coming into the Continent of Germany, drove out the Vlmirugi, and there left a Colony which Tacitus calleth Gotthones. That the Iſlands adjoining they very anciently Peopled, there is no doubt, as alſo the Sea coaſts, where the Æſtii inhabited, who had this Name, and their Countrey that of Æſtonia, from lying Eaſtward from them. Hence he believes they made Incurſions as far as Mæotis, and into Dacia, but when he cannot ſay; but that it was before the time of the Antonini. He ſaith he learns this from Spartianus, who in the Life of Caracalla writes that the Gotthi were called Getes, as many others alſo have hinted, becauſe the nearneſs of the Name deceived the Romans (though Gete be a Name of Thrace, and Goth a German word) and the Goths held thoſe places which anciently bore the Name of the Getes. Hence in the Reign of Philip, Jornandes brings them into Mæſia and Thrace, and it appears that from this time, Part of the Goths remained in Mæſia, who by Jornandes are called Gothi Minores, and who receiving Letters from the Greeks, delivered them to the other Gothick Nations.

The Migrations of the Goths.

Ex hac igitur Scanzia inſula quaſi officina Gentium, aut certè velut vagina nationum cum Rege ſuo nomine Berig, Gothi quondam memorantur egreſſi. Jornandes de Rebus Geticis. c. 4.

Capitaneatus Gothiæ dicitur in publicis monumentis, vide Grotium ubi prius ex relatu Joſophati Barbais nobilis Veneti, qui in illis vixit Regionibus.

10. Amongſt the Roman Writers, after Spartianus, he obſerves, that the firſt mention of the Goths is made by Aurelius Victor (publiſhed by Schottus,) in the Reign of Decius, at what time out of Dacia, they poured out themſelves into the neighbouring Thrace, being by Zoſimus and Zonares called Scythians, as by their Original they well might, and did paſs for ſuch. In the time of Aurelian and Gallienus they proceeded farther, and waſted Greece, Macedonia, Pontus and Aſia, ſeveral particulars being related by divers Authours. From others it appears that Claudius being Emperour they fell upon Marcianopolis in Mæſia, and then waſted both Macedonia and Illyricum, beſieging Caſſandria and Theſſalonica. Both Maximian and Conſtantine the Great received them into friendſhip and ſociety, and the latter made uſe of them againſt the Sarmatæ, and under Theodoſius the younger, part of Thrace fell to their ſhare. Procopius tells us that the Goths, called Tetraxitæ, lived near to the ſhore and ſtraits of Mæotis, and farther from them, the Goths and Viſigoths, and Vandals, and all the other Gothick Nations anciently named Scythians, as all the other Nations of thoſe Parts with ſome difference, in ſome of Sarmatians, Melanclænians and other Names. On the other ſide of the Lake lived the Cimmerians or Hunnes, who it's ſaid being perſwaded by two young Men, that purſued a Stag, that the water was fordable(which they had not thought before) inſtantly took Arms and paſſed over. He adds that the Vandals were gone before and ſeated in Africk, and the Viſigoths were in Spain. And ſo they fell upon the Goths, who dwelt in the Champian, killed many and chaſed away the reſt. Such as eſcaped paſſed the River Iſter, with their Wifes and Children into the Roman Territory, where they did much miſchief. Afterward the Emperour planted them in a Countrey of Thrace, and ſometimes they aided the Romans in quality of Confederates, receiving yearly Penſions, whereby it appears that the Goths (ſo Procopius obſerves) came not as Men conquered, but upon the Articles of a League. Sometimes alſo they made cauſeleſs War upon the Romans, till under Theodorich they removed into Italy.

Their Invaſions.

Hiſt. Gothic. lib. 4.

Sect. 2.

11. Great Miſchiefs did the Goths bring to the Roman Provinces by their Invaſions and Inroads; but the greateſt miſchief of all happened by the Empire, its opening it ſelf to receive them. I mean when Valens received them into Thrace, as we have at large related in our ſecond Part, in the year CCCLXXVI. Having by his leave paſſed the Danube, whither they were driven from their own Seats by the Hunnes, they preſently turned head againſt their Entertainer, and afterward proved ſo many Vipers in the Bowels of the Provinces, ſtill taking occaſion to ſtir, and could not be quieted by any Seats or Entertainment given them, no though the greateſt of them were preferred to the greateſt place of Magiſtracy and Dignity, till they made themſelves Leaders or Kings, and travelling Southweſtward, at length ſeized upon the Provinces as Lords and Maſters thereof. This the Reader may remember, from what hath been copiouſly related to him in this work, concerning their Motions in the time of Honorius, the Invaſion of Italy, and taking of Rome by Alarick, their Actions in Gall and in Spain. It is to be obſerved that the Story told by Procopius, concerning the Deer being purſued by the young men, and (what thereupon happened) the Invaſion of the Seats of the Goths by the Hunnes, and their flying to the Danube, is by Jornandes made the ſame with their flight thither in the Reign of Valens, whom they petitioned to be received within the Roman Pale, what ever Procopius talk of the Vandals being now ſeated in Africk, and the Viſegoths in Spain. It is alſo farther to be taken notice of, that the Migrations out of Scandia were in more ancient times, and that thoſe irruptions which brought ruine to the Roman Provinces, and gave beginnings to the Principalities erected by theſe Barbarous Nations therein, were from the Eaſtern quarters. Jornandes diſtinguiſheth thus of their Habitations: Thoſe that aboad in the firſt part of Scythia by Mæotis, are known to have had Filimer for their King; they that inhabited in the ſecond ſoil of Dacia, Thracia and Mœſia had Zamolxes, whom moſt Writers of Annals teſtifie to have been a wonderfully learned Philoſopher. Beſides this he had formerly ſpoken of their planting in that part of Scythia, which bordered on the Sea of Pontus. But now at the time that they grew ſo terrible to the Empire, after that of Valens, they began to be known to the World, by the afterward terrible Names of Viſegoths and Oſtrogoths.

C. c. 24, 25.

Whence came the Names of Oſtrogoths and Weſtrogoths.

12. They were known indeed more by theſe Names, after their parting into ſeveral Quarters of the Empire, but the Names were much ancienter. And that from their ſituation of Weſt and Eaſt, they were firſt called Weſtrogoths and Oſtrogoths in their own Countrey is moſt probable, and Grotius concludes it from Jornandes his Deſcription of Scandia (who therein indeed mentions the Oſtrogoths though not the other,) and from Vopiſcus, who about the time of Claudius makes mention of the Auſtrogoths, with whom the Oſtrogoths are the ſame. They were joined together till the Reign of Ermaurick, and that of Valens, the Emperour; but then the Viſegoths or Weſtern Goths departed from the Oſtrogoths, and frighted by the Hunnes, asked Valens leave to paſs the Danube. And the Weſterngoths (corruptly called Wiſeſigoths and Viſigoths) they were who being received, and treated ill as they pretended contrary to the Agreement defeated and killed Valens. After this they ſeized on Thrace and Dacia Ripenſis, not by a precarious Right, but by way of Dominion, and even in the time of Gratian. Afterward part of them under Conduct of Fridigern invaded Theſſaly and Achaia, and another part led by Alatheus, and Safrack fell into Pannonia, and compelled Theodoſius to make a Peace. This Peace being not laſting, Alarick their King having waſted Thrace and Greece, after Radagaiſus invaded Italy through Pannonia, as we have ſhewn at large, and firſt after the Galli Senones took Rome in the time of Honorius. He that ſucceeded Athaneſe did the like, and preſently invaded Gall, which was forſaken by the Wandals. There the Weſtern Goths ſetled a Dominion, and afterward transferred it over the Mountains into Spain, where they alſo erected a Kingdom. Of which Dominion and Kingdom we muſt treat particularly, and therefore here muſt leave the Weſtrogoths for a time.

Weſtrogothia confinis eſt Provinciæ Danorum quæ Sconia dicitur, à qua ferunt diebus ſeptem perveniri uſq; ad Civitatem Gothorum magnam Scaraxe. Deinde Oſtrogothia protenditur juxta mare quod Balthicum dicitur uſq; ad Byrkam. Adamus Bremenſis apud Grotium Prolegomenis.

The Progreſs of the Weſtrogoths.

The Kings and Progreſſes of the Oſtrogoths.

Amalus.
Iſarna.
Oſtrogotha.

13. The Oſtrogoths ſeem to have been the more conſiderable Party, the race of the ancient Kings, obeyed by both ſorts till this Deceſſion, proceeding from them, and namely the Family of the Amali, ſo much celebrated among them. Amalus (to paſs by ſome other Kings more ancient, the Names of whom are to be found in Jornandes) was the Son of Augis, and it ſeems ſo eminent as to give a Name to his Succeſſours. He was the Father of Iſarna, and Iſarna of Oſtrogotha, who in the Reign of Philip the Emperour with his Oſtrogoths (Jornandes yet knowing not, whether from him or their ſituation they received this Name,) for Amali Cœleſtes. Iſar-na, ferro propinquus. Ooſt, Angl. Eaſt, Latini hinc formarunt Auſtriam.

that

The Gepidæ of Gothick Nation.

Malè Gepanta pro Gepaita nunc legitur. Eſt enim Gepait Germanis is qui moram fecit. Grot.

Vandal. lib. 1. ad initium.

that being Confederates of the Empire their Stipends were not paid them, paſſed the Danube, waſted Mœſia and Thrace, and forced Marcianopolis to compound with him, and redeem it ſelf. The Nation of the Gepidæ ſeeing him thus victorious envied him this good Fortune, and made war upon their Kinſmen, as Jornandes, calls them, though by the word Patrules, and how they came to be their Kinſmen he tells you, he ſaith, in ſhort if you ask the queſtion. He puts his Reader in mind, that at the beginning of his Book, he ſhewed how the Goths proceeded out of the Iſland Scanzia with Berick their King, tranſported onely in three Ships to the Bank of the hither Ocean. Of theſe three Veſſels, one, as often happens, ſailing ſlower than the reſt, gave Name to the People; (which landed in an Iſland of the River Viſtula, and afterward proceeded farther) for in their Language Slow is ſignified by Gepanta. Hence came it to paſs that by little and little, and corruptly it came to ſtick to them by way of reproach. For the Gepidæ without doubt derive their Original from the Stock of the Goths; but becauſe, as was ſaid, Gepanta ſignifieth ſomething ſlow and ſluggiſh, the Nickname of the Gepidæ thence aroſe, which I dare not believe, ſaith he, to be the falſeſt thing that is. For they are of a ſlow humour and diſpoſition, and more heavy as to motion of the Body. Such is the Relation of Jornandes concerning the Name and Original of the Gepidæ. He agrees with Procopius herein, who declaring which were the greateſt and moſt famous of the Gothick Nations, reckons the Goths, Vandals, Viſegoths and Gepædes. He adds, that anciently they were called Sarmatians and Melanchlenians; that they varied all in Names, and nothing elſe, being all fair bodied with yellow hair, tall and with good faces; that they had the ſame Laws, Cuſtoms and Religion, being all Arians, and all ſpake the Gothick Language. He ſuppoſes them to have been anciently one Nation, and their Names to have been diſtinguiſhed afterward by their ſeveral Princes. Formerly, he ſaith, this People inhabited about the Danube; then the Gepædes held the Places about Singedon and Sirmium on both ſides the River, where they were when he wrote his Hiſtory.

Cniua.

14. There are other Teſtimonies ſufficient to prove, that the Gepidæ were a Gothoſcanzian Nation. They alſo as we have ſeen, invaded and waſted the Roman Empire. They were once Aſſociates with the Romans, but joined with the Lombards and broke Truces, after which they made great ſtirs in the World till they were overcome, and in a manner deſtroyed by the Lombards, in the time of Alboin, who married Roſamunda the Daughter of Cunimund their King. But to return to our former Story: Faſtida the King of the Gepidæ being puffed up with the good Succeſs he had againſt the Burgundians, whom he almoſt deſtroyed, broke the League with the Goths his Kinſmen. He ſent to Oſtrogotha, to whom both the Oſtrogoths and Viſegoths were ſubject, to tell him, that he was too much ſtraitned in room, and he muſt give the Gepidæ Land, or prepare for War. He anſwered he ſhould be ſorry to make War upon his Kindred, but he would part with no Land, and thereupon a bloudy Battel was fought, wherein the Gepidæ were ſhamefully beaten, and the Goths contenting themſelves with Victory, moved not during the Reign of Oſtrogotha. After his death, Cniua divided them into two Armies, and ſending one into Mœſia, with the other conſiſting of ſeventy thouſand Men, he himſelf fell on Euſteſium or Nonæ; whence being removed by Gallus, a Captain, he went to Nicopolis a City Trajan had built upon overthrowing the Sarmatæ, near the River Jater. But Decius the Emperour marching towards him, he removed into the Parts of Hæmonia near adjoining, purpoſing for Philippolis. Decius intended to purſue him, and reſting his Men at Berrhœa, Cniua with his Goths, fell like a Thunderbolt upon him, and forced him to fly into Mœſia. Cniua having long beſieged Philippolis, at length got the Governour Priſcus to join with him, and purſued Decius; where Gallus being Captain of the Limit had recruited his Army. And they came to an ingagement, wherein firſt the Son of Decius, and afterward the Emperour himſelf was ſlain, and ended his Life and Reign together.

Ararick.
Aurick.
Giberick.

Ara-rick, honore pollens. Aur-rick, vetuſtate pollens. Haiſt-Dingen, celer in

15. After this the Goths invaded Aſia, where having burnt the Temple of Diana at Epheſus, and demoliſhed Chalcedon; they retired into Thrace, and waſted that Countrey. They aſſiſted Maximian the Emperour againſt the Parthians, and Conſtantine the Great againſt Licinius, forty thouſand of them ſerving under him, who continued in the Roman Army by the Name of Fœderati. Theſe things they did under the Conduct of their Kings Ararick and Aurick, after whom came Giberick a notable Perſon. He overthrew the Wandals his Neighbours with Viſumar their King, who was deſcended of the Race of the Aſdingi, renowned amongſt them. Such of the Wandals as remained after the Overthrow, begged Pannonia of Conſtantine the Emperour, to whoſe Succeſſion they were obedient forty years, till being invited by Stilico they fell upon Gall, but ſetled not therein. Giberick being dead, after ſome time Hermanarick was King, one deſcended of the moſt noble Family of the Amali. He conquered ſo many Northern Nations, that by ſome he was compared to Alexander the Great. Having ſubdued many (the Names of whom Jornandes gives us, but might have as well ſuppreſſed them; ſo ſtrange they are) he could not omit the Heruli, but needs muſt fall on them alſo. The Hiſtorian tells us from a far better Authour, Ablanius whoſe work hath miſcarried, that this Nation of the Heruli, dwelling near the Fenns of Mæotis in wateriſh places, had its Name from them, which by the Greeks are called Hebe: a People, he adds, by how much more ſwift and agile, ſo much more abundantly proud; for there was then no Nation, which choſe not its light armed Soldiers out of them. But formerly in the ſame work Jornandes writes, that they were driven out of their Seats by the Dani, which Seats were in Scanzia, for of the Inhabitants thereof he ſpeaks in that Chapter. With him Procopius agrees, that they inhabited formerly beyond the River Iſter, ſerving many Gods, and holding it no impiety to appeaſe them with humane Sacrifices. He adds, that they had Laws different from other Men, when Men were grown aged or ſick, they were not to live; but intreat their Kindred to put them out of the World. The Kindred made a Pile of wood and ſet the Man on the Top, and ſent one who was a ſtranger to him in bloud to diſpatch him, then ſet they the Pile on fire, and the flame being done gathered up his bones and buried them. When one of the Heruli died, his Wife (if ſhe would be thought virtuous) was to ſtrangle her ſelf over her Husband's Tomb; otherwiſe ſhe was eſteemed infamous, and an Enemy to her Husband's Kindred.

Hermanarick.

Judicio publico. Gib-rick, Donis pollens. Here, exercitus. Hereman, miles. Hermanarick. Militibus pollens.

The Original of the Heruli.

C. 3.

De Bello Goth. lib. 2.

16. In time they over-topped the bordering Barbarians in Populouſneſs and Power, and vanquiſht them in fight one by one, foraged their Countries, and kept them under. They ſubdued the Lombards being Chriſtians, and made them pay Tribute either out of Covetouſneſs or Vainglory, it being a thing not uſed by the Barbarians in theſe Parts. In the Reign of Anaſtaſius, having none left to ſubdue, they remained quiet for three years, but for that reviling and provoking their King Rodulph, he made an unjuſt War upon the Lombards, not charging them with the breach of Treaties or any other Pretence. The iſſue was that many of the Heruli were ſlain with their King, and the reſt flying were almoſt all cut in pieces. Upon this they left their Countrey, and paſſing through all the Land beyond the River Iſter, ſate down in the Countrey of the Rugi who had left it, and were gone with the Goths into Italy. But the Land being waſte they removed to the Gepidæ, who at firſt permitted them to plant by them, but afterwards wronged and abuſed them, which moved them to paſs Iſter, to dwell by the Romans there. Anaſtatius received them, and afterward when they committed wicked Acts, he killed moſt of them, ſending an Army, and would have deſtroyed them all, but their Leaders begged their Lives, and to be taken for Auxiliaries and Servants of the Empire, and ſo ſome eſcaped alive; yet neither aided nor ſerved the Romans. Juſtinian coming to the Empire, gave them a fertile Countrey and Goods, made them alſo his Aſſociates, and perſwaded them to be Chriſtians; upon which they grew civiler, and applying themſelves to the Laws of Chriſtianity, ſerved the Romans as Auxiliaries. But ſtill, ſaith Procopius, they are falſe to us and covetous, not thinking it any ſhame to wrong their Neighbours. They uſe impious Mixtures with Men and Beaſts, being indeed the wickedeſt of all Men and Wretches, wretchedly to periſh: Some of them continued the League with us, and the reſt revolted upon this Occaſion. To ſhew the ſavageneſs of their Nature, they killed Ochon their King ſuddenly; without alledging any thing, but that they would no more be under a King.

Their Wickedneſs.

17. And indeed their King before had onely the Name, otherwiſe little advantage above a private Man. All ſate at meat with him, and put licentious Affronts upon him, the Heruli being the moſt indiſcreet and lighteſt Men alive. But this foul fact they inſtantly repented, finding no poſſibility to live without Governours and Generals. After much conſultation they reſolved to ſend for one of the Bloud Royal, from the Iſland of Thule. For the Heruli being overthrown by the Lombards, and leaving their Native ſoil, ſome dwelt in Illyricum, but others paſt not the River Iſter, but thought it better to plant in the uttermoſt borders of the habitable World. Theſe conducted by many of the Bloud Royal, paſſed through the Nations of the Slani, a large deſart Countrey, the Varni, and thoſe of the Danes (the Barbarians uſing no violence againſt them) and coming to the Sect. 2. the Ocean, and getting ſhipping arrived at the Iſland Thule, where they ſtaid. Thus writes Procopius of the Heruli, who by Thule means the Peninſula of Scandia, which he calls ten times bigger than Britain, ſaith moſt of it was waſte, but in that which was inhabited, were ſeated thirteen populous Nations, and over every Nation was a King. Amongſt them the Herulian wanderers planted themſelves; and thoſe who continued amongſt the Romans, having murthered their King, ſent ſome of their chief Men to the Iſland of Thule, to bring over one of the Bloud Royal if they could find any there. From amongſt many they brought one, who dying by the way of ſickneſs, they went back and brought another named Todaſius, accompanied with his Brother Aordas, and two hundred Heruli. They being long upon their Journey, the Heruli about Singedon, conceiving it might be inconvenient to introduce a King from Thule without Juſtinian's conſent, ſent to the Emperour to Conſtantinople to give them what King he pleaſed. He ſent them Suartuas one of their Nation, who had long lived at Conſtantinople, and him at firſt they received joyfully, adored him as King, and obeyed him in the uſual Directions. But within few days hearing of the coming of the Ambaſſadours from Thule, they revolted from Suartuas (who had commanded them to goe out and kill them) to the New Comers, and he was forced to fly back to Conſtantinople. The Emperour ſet himſelf to reſtore him, and thereupon the Heruli revolted to the Gepidæ. So much writes Procopius of this People, of whom we often ſpeak in the Courſe of our Hiſtory upon occaſion. It ſeems they lived beyond the River Iſter, and afterward ſome of them paſſed into Scandia, from which poſſibly alſo they deſcended amongſt other Gothick Nations; for amongſt Gothick Nations Procopius reckons alſo the Scirri and Alani, amongſt whom he puts Odoacer, as one of them, and ſaith he was of the Lifeguard to the Emperour; and him other Authours call King of the Heruli, who invading Italy were we ſuppoſe more Civiliz'd, than thoſe of whom Procopius writes. De Bello Goth. lib. 1. initio.

18. Well! upon the Heruli, Hermanarick King of the Oſtrogoths made war, and though their ſwiftneſs prevailed againſt other Nations; yet it ſubmitted to the ſlowneſs and ſtability of the Goths, and they ſerved Hermanarick amongſt other Nations. After them he ſubdued the Veneti who became his Servants, though afterward in the time of Jornandes, becauſe of the Sins of his Age they raged every where, being, though ſprung from one Root, germinated into three Names of Veneti, Aules and Sclani. By his prudential valour he conquered the Æſtri, who inhabited on the longeſt bank of the German Ocean, and as if it had been effected by his own Labours, he commanded all the Nations, both of Scythia and Germany. Not very long after, as he relates from Oroſius, the Nation of the Hunnes raged againſt the Goths with more than bitter fury; and to be revenged on them for that and their other Pranks, he gives you an account of their Original alſo, as he found it related by Antiquity. Filimer King of the Goths the Son of Gandarick the Great, being their fifth Prince after their going out from the Iſland of Scanzia, having with his People entred into the Scythian Territories, found amongſt them certain Witches, which in his Countrey Language he called Aliorumnæ, and having them ſuſpected he thruſt them away from his Company, and compelled them to depart into the Wilderneſs far from his Army. Unclean Spirits ſeeing theſe Women wandering in the Deſart lay with them, and procreated this moſt furious brood, which at firſt continued in the Fenns ſmall and inconſiderable, as it were a kind of Men, neither known by any other word than that which ſignified an Image of Mankind. From Priſcus the Hiſtorian, he adds, that in the Fenn of Mæotis, this Cruel Nation poſſeſſed the farther Bank being expert in hunting and no other labour, onely when it grew into Multitudes, with Frauds and Rapines it diſturbed the neighbouring Nations.

The Original of the Hunnes according to Jornandes.

19. Concerning the Original of the Hunnes we muſt leave Jornandes to himſelf, but concerning their Seats his Relation is confirmed by other Writers. Procopius tells us, that the two Straits of Mount Caucaſus, which let in the Hunniſh Nations upon the Romans and Perſians, were called the one Tzar, and the other the Caſpian Gates. That the Countrey extending from Mount Caucaſus to the Caſpian Gates the Alani held, ſubject to none, but as Confederates they ſerved the Perſians againſt the Romans and all the World. That under Mount Caucaſus dwelt the Gabrian Hunnes, and ſome other Hunniſh Nations; and hence they ſaid iſſued the Amazons, and made a Camp at Themiſcyrus by the River of Themidon, near where in his Days ſtood the City of Amiſus. But now ſaith he are left no Amazons in the Countries about Mount Caucaſus. Strabo, he adds, and ſome others have Hiſt. Goth. lib. 4.

made

The Occaſion of feigning Amazons.

made much diſcourſe about them, but they ſeem to ſpeak moſt truly, who think that there was never any ſuch Manniſh Race of Women; nor that Nature in Mount Caucaſus onely ſwerved from its ſacred Laws, but that the Barbarians of theſe Parts making an Expedition againſt Aſia, brought their Wives along with them, whom they left in a Camp near Thermedon. That they themſelves overrunning much of Aſia were ſo encountred and defeated, that none eſcaped to the Camp; and that there their Wifes being ſorely put to it by the fear of the People adjoining, and by want of Victuals, took on them Countenances of Men, and armed themſelves with the Furniture left by their Husbands, and with the ſame performed ſome commendable Actions, compelled by neceſſity, till they were all ſlain. This is his opinion, and that the Amazons were Wives that went to war with their Husbands, the Experiment whereof, he ſaith, happened in his own time. And commonly the addictions which deſcend to Poſterity, are the Images of thoſe which were before. For the Hunnes, in their Inroad upon the Romans, often coming to a Battel wherein ſome of them were ſlain, and the Romans ſearching the dead Bodies, have found Women among them. Other Armies of Women were never, neither infeſting Aſia nor Europe. Neither was it ever heard that the Caucaſian Mountains had all their Men waſted at any time. Afterward, ſpeaking of ſeveral other Nations, he ſubjoins that beyond the Sagini, were many Hunniſh People in a Countrey called Eulyſia, poſſeſſed by theſe Barbarians in the maritime and in-land Parts thereof to the Lake Mæotis, and the River Tanais, which diſembogues into the ſaid Lake, and the Lake into the Euxine Sea. Anciently the Inhabitants were called Cimmerii, but in his time Vturgurians. But the Reader may remember how we have already ſpoken much of the Vturgurian and Caturgurian Hunnes, from the ſame Procopius, who gives another Character of the Hunnes in general than Jornandes doth; for ſpeaking of the Autæ and Sclani amongſt other things, he ſaith that they were remote from knaviſh Craft and Malice, being like to the Hunnes in this very Innocence alſo. At length they drove out the Lombards, and planted themſelves in Pannonia. But let us hear what other dreadfull things Jornandes relates in his Account of the War betwixt them and the Goths.

Jornandes his Deſcription of an Hunn.

20. They being Hunters, ſome of them exerciſing themſelves this way on the farther Bank of Mæotis found a Deer, and purſued her, as was ſaid, before to the farther ſide; for here he brings in that Story. Having by this means diſcovered the way into Scythia, they fell like thunder upon ſeveral People he mentions, the Names of whom are hard to be underſtood, and amongſt others they ſubdued the Alani equal to them in Valour and Skill but unlike, as to Humanity, Courſe of Life and Shape. For whereas poſſibly they could not by force have maſtered them, having afrighted and aſtoniſhed them by the Terrour of their Countenances, they ſcared them into flight. They were fearfully black to look on, but carried upon their Shoulders a deformed Lump (if it be fit to call it ſo) and no face which had rather little pricks or holes than any Lights or Eyes. Their ugly aſpect betrayed the boldneſs of their minds, who were cruel againſt their own Children, the firſt day they came into the World. For they cut and mangled the Cheeks of their Sons, that before they ſhould receive the Nouriſhment of Milk, they might be conſtrained to endure the pain of a wound. Hence they grew old and beardleſs, and became youths without Comlineſs, their faces being ſo furrowed with the Knife, that the ſcars hindred the growth of Hairs. They were little in ſhape, but active and nimble, and Excellent Horſemen, broad ſhouldered and fit for ſhooting and caſting of darts; they had ſtrong Necks, and proudly they bore them. In humane ſhape they lived in beaſtly Cruelty.

21. The Getes at the ſight of a People the moſt active of all others, and the Controller of Nations were afraid, and conſulted with their King how to be freed from them. Hermanarick though Conquerour of many Nations, yet when he deliberated concerning the coming of the Hunnes, was deceived by the treacherous Roxolani, who took occaſion to ſhew their falſeneſs, though they ſerved him amongſt others. Puniſhing one Saniolk a Woman of that Nation, her two Brothers Sarus and Ammius, to revenge her death, gave him a wound in the ſide of which he languiſhed; and thereat Balamir King of the Hunnes taking advantage moved againſt him. With thought of this and the anguiſh of his wound, as alſo old Age, he was overcome, and died in the hundred and tenth Year of his Age. The Viſigoths now had left their fellows, though formerly they had been joined with the Oſtrogoths, and againſt them the Hunnes prevailed upon his death,

Winithar.

Wint-hari Venedorum Dominus.

Hunnimund.

Hundreda contracte Hun Centuria Hunnimund centuriæ os ſine Præpoſitus.

Thoriſmund.

Thoriſ-mund Ferox ore.

death, who were ſeated in the Eaſtern Coaſt and called Oſtrogoths, the Viſigoths being by the leave of Valens gone over the Danube, and received within the Roman Pale. The Oſtrogoths after their departure continued in the ſame place ſubject to the Hunnes, and were governed by Winithar of the Poſterity of Amalus, who imitating the Valour of his Grandfather Ataulf, though inferiour in felicity to Hermanarick, fought proſperouſly againſt the Autæ, and at firſt againſt the Hunnes, though Sigiſmund another great Man would not break his Faith, but joined with them. But in the third Ingagement Winithar was ſlain, and Balamber, King of the Hunnes, kept under the Goths in quietneſs, yet ſo as by his Conſent they had ſtill a Regulus of their own. After Winithar they were governed by Hunimund, the Son of the moſt potent Hermanarick, who fought proſperouſly againſt the Suevi, and was ſucceeded by his Son Thoriſmund. He obtained a great Victory againſt the Gepidæ, and is ſaid to have been killed by a fall of his Horſe. He died in the flour of his Age, and the Goths ſo lamented him, that for the ſpace of forty Years they had no King in his place, his Kinſman Wandalar the Brother's Son of Hermanarick was famous for his three Sons deſcended of the Race of the Amali, viz. Walamir, Theodemir and Widemir, who loved each other with Brotherly affection. But they were ſubject to the Commands of Attila King of the Hunnes, and neither they nor any Scythian Nation could be freed from his Dominion, but by his death ſo much deſired by all Nations in common, and by the Romans too, a death which was as profitable as his life, had been wonderfull.

22. After his Death his numerous, or as Jornandes calls them, innumerous Sons, fell out about his Conqueſts, and loſt them all, being overthrown by Ardarick the King of the Gepidæ in Pannonia. For Ellac the Eldeſt was ſlain, and the reſt after the Defeat fled to the ſhore of Pontus, where the Goths had formerly lived. Many Nations were joyſull to be freed from ſo grievous a Yoke, and ſeveral of them were kindly received by Marcian the Emperour, and had Countries diſtributed amongſt them. The Gepidæ had the Seats of the Hunnes, and being Maſters of all Dacia, required no more of the Empire but Peace and yearly Preſents, as valiant and deſerving Men; which he willingly granted, and which continued to be paid till the time of the Hiſtorian. The Goths ſeeing that the Gepidæ challenged the Territories of the Hunnes, and that the Hunnes alſo kept their ancient Seats, choſe rather to ask Territories of the Roman Empire, than to indanger themſelves by invading thoſe of others, and received Pannonia, which being ſtretched out in a long Champian had on the Eaſt Mœſia Superior, on the South Dalmatia, on the Weſt Noneum and the Danube on the North. The Countrey was adorned with many Cities, of which the Chief was Sirmis, and the laſt Vindomina. The Sauromatæ or Sarmatæ, the Cemandri and ſome of the Hunnes ſate down in grounds aſſigned them at the Caſtle Martena. The Sciri, Satagarii and others of the Alans with their Captain Candax received Scythia the leſs and the inferior Mœſia, the Notary of which Candax the Grandfather of Jornandes was; and Gunthages the Son of his Grandfather's Siſter was his Magiſter Militum, being deſcended alſo of the Amali. And he tells us that he himſelf though unlearned, had been a Notary before his Converſion. The Rugi obtained Scandiopolis. Of the Sons of Attila remaining, one planted in the utmoſt Part of the Leſſer Scythia, and two others in Dacia Ripenſis. And many of the Hunnes every where put themſelves into the Roman ſoil. There were other Goths, who, as he ſaith, were called Minores or the Leſſer, a vaſt People who had Vulſilas for their Biſhop and Primate, who was ſaid to inſtruct them in good Letters, and in this time of the Writer they were in Mœſia, inhabiting Eucopolitana.

The Oſtrogoths have Pannonia aſſigned them.

The Gothi Minores.

Their Brothers and Kings, Walemir, Theodemir, Widemir.

Wal-mir Benè Princeps, Theud-mir Populis ſuperans, Widemir latè Princeps.

23. We have now brought the Oſtrogoths into Pannonia, and there Jornandes tells us that ſuch as were ſubject to Walemir, and his two Brothers Theodemir and Widemir, though the Places of their Habitation were divided, yet their Councils were united. But the Sons of Attila now regarded them as ſo many Slaves run away, and came on purpoſe to look after them. They fell upon Walemir alone, his Brothers knowing nothing of it, but he gave them ſuch Entertainment that few of thoſe that attacqued him eſcaped with their lives, but Hunnimund Captain of the Suevi paſſing on to harraſs Dalmatia, made bold with ſome of the Herds of Cattel belonging to the Goths, Suevia being Neighbour to Dalmatia and not far from Pannonia, eſpecially that Part where the Goths then reſided. Theodemir, the Brother of Walemir, thought this was not to be endured, not ſo much for the Cattel, as leſt the Suevi ſhould thence take heart, and grow more inſolent; therefore he waylaid them by night, and taking them napping by ſo unexpected an Attacque ſo maſtered them, that Hunnimund he took Priſoner, and ſuch as eſcaped the Sword he made Servants to the Goths. Yet he was ſo mercifull as to pardon what was paſt, and being reconciled to the Suevi adopted their King for his Son, and ſent him home with them. But Hunnimund was ſo ungratefull, as forgetting the paternal obligation, he ſtirred up the Sciri who lived above the Danube to join with him, to take up Arms and invade the Goths, with whom they had lived in Peace. The Goths looking on both as Friends were ſurprized with the War, but compelled by neceſſity, betook themſelves to their Weapons and revenged the Injury. They had the miſhap to loſe Walemir their King, who in the Battel riding hard to animate his Men, his Horſe fell, and the Rider being caſt to the ground, was ſlain by the Lances of the Enemy. But to revenge his Death and themſelves, they managed the Fight with that earneſtneſs, that almoſt all the Sciri were cut off.

UMI

Walemir ſlain.

Theodorich doth wonders.

25. Hunnimund and Alarick Kings of the Suevi fearing what might be the effect of this Succeſs, rallied the remainders of the Sciri, and with the aſſiſtence of the Sarmatæ, Gepidæ and Rugi, made War upon the Goths. Walemir being dead they betook themſelves to his Brother Theodemir as their Head, who calling to his aſſiſtence his Brother Widemir, gave Battel to the Confederates and obtained a notable Victory, killing ten thouſand of them upon the place. To be revenged on the Suevi, in the Winter he paſſed a Foot Army over the Danube upon the Ice, and fell ſuddenly into their Territories, which on the Eaſt had for neareſt Neighbours the Barobari, on the Weſt the Franks, the Burgundians on the South, and the Thuringi on the North. With the Suevi the Alemanni were Confederate and joined, but Theodemir overthrew, waſted and almoſt ſubdued them both, and then he returned into Pannonia where he joyfully received his Son Theodorich, whom the Emperour Leo had ſent from Conſtantinople with great Gifts. This Theodorich, being now in the eighteenth year of his Age, got together of his Father's Guard and ſuch as loved him, almoſt ſix thouſand Men, and without his Father's knowledge, paſſing the Danube, fell upon Babai King of the Sarmatæ, who was grown proud for a Victory he had got over Camundus a Captain of the Romans, killed him, and plundering his Houſe, and getting what other booty he could, returned with Victory. Then fell he upon Singidonum, a City which the Sarmatæ had ſeized, and getting it into his hands, reſtored it not to the Romans, but kept it in his own Dominion.

Widemir dies.

Theodemir dies.

26. The neighbouring Nations were now ſo waſted that no more booty remained to be got, and the Goths being inured to War were ſo diſtreſſed in Peace, that they wanted both Cloaths and Victuals. With a great noiſe they all flocked to their King Theodemir, and prayed him to lead them out into what Quarter he pleaſed. He ſent for his Brother, and caſting lots appointed him to go into that part of Italy where Glycerius acted as Emperour, and he himſelf as the ſtronger would march againſt the ſtronger Empire, or that of the Eaſt. Widemir preſently invaded Italy and died, leaving for his Succeſſour Widemir his Son, whom with Gifts Glycerius perſwaded to quit that Countrey, and going into Gall there to join himſelf with the Viſigoths his Kinſmen; and with them he made up one Body, and ſo they held Gall and Spain that no other prevailed againſt them. Theodemir the elder Brother paſſed the River Saus, and threatened to make War upon the Sarmatæ and others if they moleſted him in his paſſage; aed none daring to oppoſe him, he took Naiſſus the chief City of Illyricum, and ſent his Son and other Captains to other places, who became Maſters of Vlprana, with Heraclia and Lariſſa. Theodemir yet was not content with this proſperous eſtate of himſelf and his Son, but leaving Naiſſus with a Garriſon went and laid Siege to Theſſalonica, wherein he incloſed Clarianus a Patritian ſent thither by the Emperour with an Army. Clarianus ſeeing himſelf unable to grapple with him, ſent to him, and by Gifts procured him to remove the Siege. Now was a League made betwixt the Romans and him, whereby he had given up to him places to plant his Goths in, of hard Names; as, Ceropellæ, Europa, Mediana, Petina, Bercum, and others called Siam. There the Goths with their King lived in quietneſs; but not long; for Theodemir fell deadly ſick in the City Cerræ, and having called to him the Goths, and appointed Theodorich his Son to ſucceed him, departed this world.

27. The Emperour Zeno underſtanding that Theodorich was King over his Nation was well pleaſed with it, and ſending for him to Conſtantinople, held him in great eſteem amongſt the chief Nobles of his Court. After ſome time Jornandes tells us farther, that he adopted him for his Son in way of Arms, or to increaſe his Martial honour, gave him a Triumph in the City at his own charge, and made him Ordinary Conſul, which was eſteemed the chiefeſt Good, and the firſt Dignity in the world; and not onely did he doe this, but erected alſo a Statue to the fame of ſo great a Man before his Palace. Theodorich thus enjoyed plenty and all good things, but knowing his Goths in Illyricum to be ill at eaſe, he choſe rather to get his Living by labour according to the cuſtome of his Nation, than to enjoy the good things of the Romans in idleneſs, when in the mean time his Countreymen fared meanly. He applied himſelf therefore to the Emperour, and humbly deſiring liberty to ſpeak, demanded what reaſon there was why the Weſtern Parts, which had been ſubject to his Predeceſſour, ſhould now lie under the tyranny of the King of the Turcilingi and Rugi. He prayed him to ſend him and his Nation thither, and thereby to rid himſelf of ſo great charge; and if by God's aſſiſtence he ſhould ſucceed in his Enterprize, the Glory would be his. He told him it was better that he being his Servant and his Son, if he overcame ſhould hold that Kingdom as by his Gift, than that one whom he knew not ſhould under the yoke of a Tyrant oppreſs his Senate and part of the Commonwealth with a ſlaviſh Captivity. If he overcame he would hold it as his Gift, and as by his Favour; and if he miſcarried, the Emperour ſhould loſe nothing but be a gainer by the bargain, being delivered from ſuch expence as he was at. The Emperour hearing this, though he was ſorry to part with him, yet would not diſpleaſe him but granted his Requeſt, commending to him the Roman Senate and People. Hereupon Theodorich departed to his Goths, and led them into Italy, as we have formerly ſhewn; where beſieging Odoacer in Ravenna, he ſo ſtraitned him, as this ſame Authour writes, that he begged pardon, which firſt he granted him, and afterward deprived him of Life. And in the third year after his Invaſion of Italy, having privately adviſed with the Emperour Zeno, laying off the Habit of his Nation, he took Regal Ornaments, as one who reigned over both Goths and Romans.

Theodorich becomes Maſter of Italy.

The Habit of a Goth.

The Wandals of the ſame original with the Goths.

28. Thus we have ſeen the Original of the Goths, and have drawn down their ſtory to their coming to found Kingdoms in the Roman Empire. Concerning their Manners and Diſpoſitions they had their Name from being Good as it imports, and Grotius hath taken ſome pains to prove that ſo they continued when in great power. Of this in the courſe of our Hiſtory we have ſeen ſomething, and more are to ſee e'er we have done with them. For their aukward Habit take it as Sidonius Apollinaris deſcribes it. “They are red with Saffron, they are ſhod with high Shoes made of Hair which reach up to their Ankle-bones: Their Knees, Thighs and Legs are without any covering: Their Garment high and ſtrait, of divers colours, ſcarcely reaching to the Hamm ſtretched out: Their Sleeves onely cover the tops of their Armes: Their Caſſocks green, with a red Welt: Their Belts hang on their Shoulders: Their Ears are covered with wreaths of Locks: they uſe hooked Lances and miſſile Hatchets. Here we cannot but take notice that the Wandals and Longobards, or Lombards, were of the ſame Original with the Goths. Procopius ſaith expreſly that they were Gothick Nations as well as the Gepidæ, and he had reaſon to be inſtructed in their deſcent, being acquainted with Gelomir their King, and the Nobles brought Priſoners to Conſtantinople. He tells us the Language of the Wandals was Gothick, and doubts not but that they were anciently one People, diſtinguiſhed in Names, but agreeing in Original and Manners. He relates that together with the Goths they came out of their ancient Countrey to the Fen of Mæotis. Jornandes reckoning up the People of Scandia mentions the Vinoniloth, which, as Grotius obſerves, ſignifies the Poſſeſſion of the Winoli, for ſo they are alſo called; and Winili, and Vinili by ſome Authours. Wandal ſignifies a Wanderer, who continues not in one place; and ſo they ſeem indeed for ſome reaſon to have had the Name: and not onely they, but other people in Germany and elſewhere might be ſo called alſo for the ſame reaſon: but no where means thoſe Wandals who for ſome time held Spain and Africk, as we have largely ſeen, and were ſubdued by Beliſarius.

29. Of thoſe that were originally of Scanzia, part as was ſaid in old time ſate down with the Goths at the Fen of Mæotis. Of them who invaded Spain and Africk the Anceſtours in the ſpace of a year came from the Ocean where they inhabited, into Dacia ſo much vexed by Incomers. Jornandes ſaith theſe Wandals were called Aſdingi. They came into Dacia in the Reign of Aurelius Antoninus the Emperour. In the time of Aurelian they inhabited at the Danube, and making a League with the Romans, promiſed them Succours. Conſtantine gave them part of Pannonia, and hence they poured out themſelves into Gall, when Honorius was Emperour. Thence they proceeded into Spain, ſuch of them as were called Silingi into Bætica, and the reſt into Gallæcia and the neighbouring Regions, Godigiſchis being their King. Gontharis ſucceeded him, who ſubdued the Alani that then were potent in Spain. To Gontharis ſucceeded Gowrick commonly called Genſerick the Conquerour of Africk, who confirmed his poſſeſſion thereof by a League with Valentinian the Emperour. What things he did, and how far he reigned, the Reader may remember, as alſo what was done by, and happened to, his Succeſſours out of that account we have given of them in our Second Part; for there being little of conſequence concerning them, but what alſo involved the Affairs of the Romans, we thought it not fit to make a particular Hiſtory of that their Kingdom in Africk, which was ſoon again reduced by Juſtinian. Now we ſhall onely add concerning them farther what Grotius hints, that ſome memory of the Dominion of the Wandals in Spain is ſtill preſerved in the Name of Andaluſia, which anciently was Wandaloſia, and in the Wandalick Tongue was Wandaloth.

And the Longobards.

30. As there might be ſeveral People which had the Name of Wandals, from their changing of Seats and Habitations, ſo alſo in Germany and elſewhere, others to whom that of Longobards was given, from the length of their Beards. But thoſe who made ſuch a noiſe in the Empire, and ſeated themſelves in Italy, from whom Lombardy ſtill is ſo called, were of Scandia alſo, deſcended from the Gepidæ, of whom, if Grotius obſerve right, firſt mention is made in the time of Theodoſius, by Proſper Aquitanus. From Procopius it appears, that with the Gepidæ their Parents, they had Seats on this ſide the Danube. Paulus Warnotridus writes that they were called firſt Winili before they had the Name of Longobardi. In the ſixth year of Juſtin the Emperour the Gepidæ were utterly cruſhed by them, and their Kingdom came to an end. By theſe ſame Longobards was the Son-in-law of Juſtin and Pandarius overthrown. After Tiberius had ſucceeded Juſtin they came into Italy and made Antarick King over them. What progreſs their Arms made there in the times of Tiberius and Mauritius we have ſeen already, and how they founded a Kingdom, and that they held all Italy, in a manner, except Rome and Ravenna, and continued their Dominion for two hundred years, God willing, we are to ſee in the particular Hiſtory of their Kingdom. But the Goths were their Predeceſſours therein, and their Kingdom firſt is to have place; for we have brought already Theodorich into Italy, and there placed him on the Throne of Odoacer.

SECT. III.

The Kingdom of the Oſtrogoths in Italy.

The ſpace of Sixty years.

Vide Sigonium de Occidentali Imperio. l. 16.

1. ODoacer being dead, Theodorich eaſily made himſelf Maſter of Italy; which done, Dalmatia and Rhœtia, formerly in the Hands of his Enemy, ſubmitted alſo themſelves to his Power. Sicily was ſomething ſtubborn and unwilling to acknowledge her new Lord; but by the means of Caſſiodorus his Lieutenant he brought her into ſubjection peaceably and without bloud-ſhed. There remained now onely one Rub to be removed, and that had been laid in his way by the raſhneſs and folly of his own Men, who being left in Pavia, upon notice of his Succeſs at Ravenna, tranſported with the News, flew out of that City to congratulate with him; which the Rugi, who had ſerved Odoacer perceiving, took the advantage, and ſeizing on the Town, plundered it with all the Countrey adjoining. But the Stars of Theodorich were too powerfull to ſuffer him to miſcarry in this adventure, and make ſhipwreck of his Fortunes in the very Haven; therefore leading his Army down to Pavia, within a few months he eaſily reduced it, uſed his Victory with moderation, and by the ſequel of his Actions ſhewed, that though War ſeemed to be his Maſterpiece, yet he delighted not in it for its ſelf, but uſed it as a means to procure a firm and laſting Peace. Sheathing then his Sword and taking the Sceptre, he firſt endeavoured to confirm his Eſtate, by Leagues and Alliances with his Neighbour Princes. In the firſt place with the Emperour, who readily admitted of his Friendſhip and Society; then with Clodonee King of the Franks, whoſe Daughter Andefleda he deſired and obtained in Marriage.

Theodorich reduceth Pavia.

Sect. 3.

Maketh Alliances.

age. His own two Daughters which he had by a Concubine he beſtowed, the one on Alarick King of the Weſtrogoths in Gall, and the other on Sigiſmund Son of Gundobald King of the Burgundians. When he had thus ſecured his Government, both within and without, he ſet about the modelling of his Polity, and herein he uſed the advice and diligence of Aurelius Caſſiodorus , a moſt learned man, whom he had made a Patritian, and adorned with the greateſt honours of Comes, Conſul, and Præfectus Prætorio. Him he retained by him as his Counſellour, both for modelling the State, and governing it when he reduced it into form and order. By his advice he made new Laws, it's ſaid, and reformed bad Cuſtoms, and by his direction, if not his Hand, were written his Letters and Commiſſions, the choiceſt of which he preſerved and publiſhed in twelve Books ſtill extant, being ſo many monuments, not onely of this new Gothick Model, but even of the ancient Roman Polity it ſelf.

He made very little alteration in the Government.

2. Indeed the greateſt alteration which Theodorich made in Italy ſeems the waving of the Imperial Title, and ſettling and continuing that which Odoacer had begun and aſſumed before him. Otherwiſe the ſame form of Government, and the ſeveral ſorts of Magiſtrates he left as he found them : viz. the Senate, Conſuls, Patritians, Præfecti Prætorio, Prefect of the City, Quæſtor, Comes Largitionum, Comes Rerum privatarum, Domeſticorum, the Magiſtri Militum, Equitum and others, as is evident from the forms of their Commiſſions, wherein the Nature of their Offices is expreſſed, and fuller and better than any other Authour now extant, (as the Reader may perceive by what he hath already peruſed in our Second Part,) to be ſeen amongſt the variæ Epiſtolæ of Caſſiodorus. Theſe Offices with others he ordinarily conferred on Romans. Suits and Controverſies ariſing in the Provinces, if amongſt Goths he would have determined by Goths, if amongſt Romans by Romans, and if betwixt a Goth and a Roman by thoſe of both Nations, ſent down into the Countrey for that purpoſe; all which he overſaw himſelf, and adminiſtred Juſtice with all Severity and Impartiality. To ſuch Heruli and other Barbarous People, as being brought in by Odoacer, deſired to continue in the Countrey he aſſigned new Seats and Poſſeſſions, giving thoſe they had formerly enjoyed to the Goths his Countreymen. Thoſe Italians who had kept their Faith once given to Odoacer immutable he not onely pardoned, but ſome of them he promoted to the greateſt Honours. Indeed ſuch as broke Faith to himſelf by revolting he abhorred, and according to the Roman Law took from them the Power of making Teſtaments. What Tributes Odoacer had impoſed he ſtill required, and laid a new Impoſition upon the People called As publicus, which yet he would remit to ſuch as any Calamity had rendred inſolvent, or as he ſaw occaſion. Following the Example of the late Emperours, and Odoacer, he made Ravenna the Seat of his Kingdom, to which having now a Title not onely by Conqueſt, but by the Gift of the Emperour, as is ſaid, and the Conſent and Choice of the Senate, he laid aſide his own Countrey Habit, and aſſumed the Purple with other Enſigns of Royalty; to accommodate himſelf to the Humour of the Italians, and remove that prejudice which different Habits and Faſhions might beget in the fancies of the People. And though in his Opinion he was an Arian, he not onely not troubled but favoured the Orthodox, ſtriving every way to gratifie them as he did indeed all his Subjects; as well by the former Methods of Conduct, as by releaſing Priſoners, redeeming Captives, and other Acts of Clemency and Bounty; whereby all manner of ways he obliged his People, and obtained their Love and hearty affection.

His way of governing excellent.

He obliges all his Subjects.

3. But as humane Councils are imperfect and uncertain, even as all ſublunary Affairs are ſubject to change and perpetual Inconſtancy, that he was deficient in his Meaſures, appeared quickly in one or two particulars. The Burgundians having invaded Liguria, had thence led away Captive all the Inhabitants, and thereupon the Countrey lay altogether waſte, and remained in a deſolate Condition. He had taken, as formerly was ſaid, the Benefit of the Law from ſuch as had revolted from him, who being very conſiderable not onely for their Number, but Intereſt and Relations, it made a great diſturbance, diſcompoſed the Affairs as well of his Friends as others, and much diſcouraged the People in all Places. At the Solicitation of Laurentius Biſhop of Milan, and Epiphanius of Pavia, he publiſhed a general Pardon, and thereby ſeaſonably applied a Remedy to one of the Diſtempers, and becauſe there was no Courſe to be taken, for replanting of Liguria out of Italy it ſelf, which the Wars had ſo much exhauſted, he reſolved rather to have empty Coffers than to ſuffer that Countrey to lye deſolate, to be both an Eye-ſore, and obnoxious to the Attempts of any Enemy. He ſent Epiphanius whoſe Vertues he knew to be much admired by the King of the Burgundians on an Embaſſy to him, furniſhed with money for redemption of the Captives, and he being very welcome improved the advantage afforded by his Reputation to ſuch an height, that by his Chriſtian Eloquence and Fatherly Exhortations, he perſwaded Gundobade to releaſe the Priſoners without Ranſome. The King alledged that it was quite contrary to his Intereſt, both as a Prince and as a Souldier, and granted his requeſt with this reſtriction, that ſuch as had been taken in Fight ſhould pay their Ranſome to thoſe that took them, leſt he ſhould diſoblige and utterly diſcourage his Souldiers, by remitting what was their due and not his, and taking from them the price of their Lives and Fortunes. Upon publication of the King's pleaſure, ſo great multitudes returned home, that the Towns of Gall ſeemed to be unpeopled. Out of the Territories of Lugdunum or Lyons alone in one day departed four hundred men, and out of thoſe of Saxony, and the places adjacent, ſo many in all as made up the number ſix thouſand. Toward the ſumm that was to be paid for the redemption of ſuch as had been taken by private Souldiers, Syagria a Woman of great ſanctity, and Avitus Biſhop of Vienna contributed: how many theſe were could not be computed, becauſe many of them fled away. Alſo in his way homeward, Epiphanius took the City of Geneva, whither Godegiſal, imitating the King his Brother, diſmiſſed ſuch as were in his power; with which ſtream as it were, the former great current being enlarged, filled all the ways leading into Italy. Epiphanius returned in the Head of them as in a glorious Triumph, and coming to Theodorich obtained a relief of the neceſſities of his Captives, eſpecially thoſe of the better ſort. All which Euodius, an eye witneſs and fellow Traveller, hath related in the Life of that Biſhop.

Some Errours.

Theodorich goes to Rome.

4. But long is it ſince we heard any thing of Rome, formerly the Stage of the greateſt Triumphs, as well as the Seat of Council, and the School of Policy. Now at length arriving at the D. year of our Lord, the Eighth of the Emperour Anaſtaſius, and the Eighth of Theodorich, an Idea and Reſemblance of the former Triumphs preſents it ſelf unto us; an Image of its ancient ſplendour, and that infinite concourſe of people which of old from every Nation flocked unto her, when yet all ſhe received were but her own Citizens and Domeſticks. The thing that draws us thither is a Journey of Theodorich himſelf, whom we cannot but follow in this kind of Pilgrimage undertaken to pay his Devoirs of Admiration to that Queen of Cities, of which he had often heard, read much, but had never had the contentment to ſee her. All Italy at the news of this Progreſs ſeemed to be moved, and ambitiouſly ready to encourage that zealous reſpect he bore to the ancient Seat of its Empire and Majeſty. There ſeemed to be a contention betwixt thoſe that inhabited in and about Ravenna and ſuch as lived at Rome, whether they ſhould bring, or theſe ſhould fetch their King to the City. With a moſt ſplendid Train, and ſuch an appearance as of a long time had not been ſeen, he made his Entry, and was received with incredible joy and applauſe of the Citizens, who omitted nothing wherein they could doe him honour. At the Court he was welcomed by an eloquent Oration, made by Boëtius the moſt eloquent Scholar and Oratour of this Age, to which he anſwered in a very obliging Speech, proteſting his ſtudy and endeavours for advancement of the Dignity and all poſſible advantages of the Senate. Thence proceeding into the Circus, as far as the place called Palma Aurea, he ſpake moſt lovingly to the People; which done, he entertained the Senatours at a triumphal kind of Feaſt, and gave a Largeſs of Corn to the Commoners. Several days he ſpent in viewing the Antiquities of the City, with which his eyes could not be ſatiated, profeſſing that the Forum of Trajan alone, though to one that ſaw it every day, could appear no leſs than a miracle, and that when he had mounted the Capitol, he ſaw all humane wit and policy ſurmounted. He took eſpecial notice of, and commended the admirable Fabrick of the Baths, and the wholeſomeneſs of the Waters. He grieved to ſee the ruines of the Buildings, but chiefly of the Walls, to the repairing of which he contributed great ſumms of money. Neither did his care extend to Rome alone; to all the Cities of Italy his munificence reached, wherein he took order for building ſtrong Caſtles, and ſtately Palaces; and to this end wrote his Letters to all his Subjects to ſuffer Stones to be gathered out of their Fields, and to preſerve old Marbles which had formerly been uſed in decayed Houſes. He ſeemed ſo far raviſhed with the remains of the Majeſty of old Rome, that he ſaid it was a piacular crime, for any one who could fix his habitation there, to be long abſent. Yet his Affairs calling him away he returned to Ravenna, having much quieted the ſtirs raiſed about the election of a Roman Biſhop, which, joyned with his great deſire to ſee the place, had called him thither.

Sect. 3.

Anaſtaſius the Emperour invades Italy by Sea.

5. In the mean time Anaſtaſius the Emperour, ordering his matters quite contrary to the Maxims of Theodorich, had the quite contrary fortune, being as much hated as the other was beloved by his Subjects. Whether out of envy to the King, or bearing him a grudge for holding from him Pannonia, which he claimed as belonging to the Eaſtern Empire, he took occaſion to quarrel with him; and as Marcellinus hints, in the Eighteenth Year of his Reign, ſent out a Fleet to Sea, with orders to waſte the coaſts of Italy. To balance his power the better, he encouraged Clodonee King of the Franks in his Attempts againſt the Goths, and the more to court him deſigned him Conſul for the ſaid year, of which honour it's ſaid he would not accept. As for Theodorich, not onely his demeanour towards his Subjects, but his rules and methods of waging War were diametrically oppoſite to thoſe of the Emperour. His cuſtome was to be preſent himſelf in Expeditions, except ſome notable matter hindered; and to purchaſe Peace not with Gold and Silver, but with Steel and Wood, his Sword and Bow. The Bulgari, whom Anaſtaſius had bought off from waſting his Dominions, having nothing elſe to doe, paſſed out of Thrace into Pannonia, which waſting and haraſſing at their pleaſure, they ſeized on the City Sirmium. Theodorich having notice could not goe in perſon againſt them, the Affairs of Italy and Gall requiring his ſtay at home, and his Eye to be upon the motions of the Franks and the Burgundians; but to preſerve the place of his Nativity, and keep the War from his own doors, rather than out of any reſpect to the Emperour, whoſe hands were now full with the Perſian War, he ſent Petza a Comes with conſiderable Forces, who the year following very happily finiſhed the War, recovering both Sirmium out of the hands of the Bulgari, and the whole Province. Having ſo happily diſpatched this War he relieved Mundas, whom Sabinianus had beſieged in a certain Caſtle in Illyricum. Theodorich gave the government of Pannonia to Coleſſeus a Comes, a Copy of whoſe Commiſſion Caſſiodorus preſerved, and is ſtill extant amongſt his various Epiſtles; from which the Reader may perceive what the power was which thoſe Governours exerciſed, extending both to matters of War and Peace, and that the girding with a Sword was the mark and badge of their Office. After this Commiſſion follows a Letter directed to all Barbarians and Romans inhabiting Pannonia, acquainting them that he had made Coloſſeus their Governour, and requiring them to take notice of and obey him as ſuch.

Theodorich reduceth Pannonia.

Makes Coloſſeus Governour.

Lib.3. Ep. 23. Commiſſam tibi provinciam armis protege, jure compone. Proſperis initiatus auſpiciis ad Sirmienſem Pannoniam quondam ſedem Gothorum proficiſcere Illuſtris Cinguli Dignitate præcinctus. Vid. Ep. Var. lib. 3. Ep. 1, 2, 3, 4.

6. There being a quarrel betwixt Alarick King of the Viſigoths in Gall, and Clodonee King of the Franks, and both of them being his near Allies, he omitted no arguments to perſwade them to take up the matter, denouncing War in a manner to the aggreſſour, and promiſing relief to the oppreſſed, as is to be ſeen in his Letters collected by Caſſiodorus. As it uſually happens in ſuch a caſe, he who was leaſt in fault, and moſt unfit to decide the controverſie by force of Arms gladly accepted the mediation, but he who had more reaſon to be confident, rather upon the ſtrength of his Sword than the goodneſs of his Cauſe, made Excuſes, framed Delays, and in concluſion utterly refuſed to be concluded by Arbitration. Theodorich addreſſes himſelf to the Burgundian King, as alſo to thoſe who commanded the Heruli and Thuringi then inhabiting near the Alpes, and invites them to join with him in the Mediation, uſing Arguments drawn from the Exigency of their own Affairs, which would not be a little indangered by ſuch Succeſs as the Frank promiſed to himſelf. But while theſe Neighbour Princes thus think of Mediation and Balancing, Clodonee reſolves not to looſe his opportunity but paſſing the Loire begins the War, and in a great and bloudy Battel deprives Alarick both of Life and Kingdom, whoſe Son Amalarick, things being in ſo deſperate a Condition, withdrew himſelf into Spain, there to expect when an opportunity of recovering his Eſtate ſhould be preſented by better Fortune. Theodorich pitying the Condition of the Youth ſent Theudas, an Officer of his own, to take care of him, and reſolved if he could not recover thoſe Cities of Gall, which were already loſt, to prevent the Progreſs of Clodonee, and ſecure the reſt which ſtill remained in the Power of the Goths.

Sends Theudas to protect Spain.

7. To this purpoſe he publiſhed his Proclamation, that the Oſtrogoths his Subjects ſhould be ready by the latter End of June to begin their Journey, clawing them with ſuch Expreſſions as theſe, There is no need of perſwading Goths to fight, onely of acquainting them with the thing, which is rather a Pleaſure to a warlike People. In the Conſulſhip of Venantius and Celer, or the DVIII. Year of our Lord, his Army, under Command of Hibba a Comes, paſſing the Alpes raiſed the Siege before Carcaſſon, relieved Arles, and taking in Tolouſe, Orange and Marſeilles, left that Part of the Countrey lying upon the Rhone in the Hands of Clodonee, from whom Theodorich was not able to recover it. Sending many Thouſands of Priſoners to Ravenna, he ſeized on ſuch as he recovered, to the uſe of Amalarick his Nephew, placing Governours where he ſaw occaſion as well in Gall as in Spain, which was divided betwixt the ſaid Amalarick and Giſalerick. But while he thus buſied himſelf in Gall, Romanus the Comes Domeſticorum, and Ruſticus a Comes Scholæ, with and hundred armed Ships and as many Flyboats, wherein were aboard Eight Thouſand Soldiers, invaded the Coaſts of Italy, as was formerly hinted, and having attacqued Tarentum to no purpoſe, got good booty and ſo retired; whether ſent on purpoſe, or on their own accord, Sigonius accounts it uncertain, though Marcellinus wrote that they were ſent by Anaſtaſius, and it doth not ſeem probable that Robbers and Pirates ſhould put to Sea with ſo great a Power without the Knowledge and Approbation of the Prince. Theodorich having little or no Diverſion given him hereby, the Year following hired a great Number of Gepidæ to reinforce his Garriſons in Gall, and took ſpecial care that in their Paſſage through Liguria, and the Countrey of the Veneti, they ſhould doe no injury to the Inhabitants. To this purpoſe he directed his Letters yet extant to Veranus Saio to ſee them keep good Order in their March, and wrote to the Army it ſelf, acquainting them that he was once minded to give them Proviſions for their Journey in Specie, but afterwards conſidering that Victuals either might not conveniently be had, or elſe ſpoiled by the way, he had now ordered them three Solidi in Gold by the week; a ſmall Allowance one would think, or elſe his Forces were not very numerous.

Significanda magis ſunt Gothis quam ſuadenda certamina.

Sends Gepidæ into Gall.

Caſſiod. var. l. 5. Ep. 10, 11.

8. Theodorich having allowed his Gepidæ three Solidi a Week for their Paſſage, gravely, and like a Prince that was ſolicitous for the good of his People, admoniſhed them by Letters to carry themſelves moderately, and as became thoſe that fought for the Safety of all Italy. But they meaſuring Decency by Convenience alone, and accuſtomed to Depredations, could not keep their Hands from pillaging the Inhabitants of the Cottian Alpes in their way, which Miſdemeanour touched the King as near as if he in his own Perſon had been the Sufferer. And as a prudent Prince who ought to neglect his Profit for a time, rather than utterly to looſe his Revenue, he cauſeth his Letters to be written to Fauſtus the Præpoſitus, or Præfectus Prætorio (to whom he giveth the Title of Illuſtris Magnificentia tua) wherein he lets him know that he remitted to the ſaid Inhabitants of the Alpes Cottiæ the publick Money payable in the third Indiction. He compares the Army to a River, which though it doe much good flowing in its own peculiar Chanel, yet inlargeth its Paſſage and doeth much Miſchief, when it riſeth beyond its due Proportion, bearing down all before it. By the third Indiction is meant the third Year in fifteen, according to which Number the Emperours computed the times, after that the reckoning by the Olympiads came to be obſolete. Who began this Computation is uncertain. It's commonly aſcribed to Conſtantine the Great; but Cedrenus will have it invented by Theodoſius. Of thoſe who father it on Conſtantine, Panninius fetcheth the Original of the Indictions from his Victory over Maxentius, Joſeph Scaliger from his Exhibition of his Munera Quinquennalia to the time of his Vicennalia, thinks the Number of fifteen was invented. Baronius affirms that there is no reckoning of Years by the Indictions to be found before the ſeventh Year of Conſtantine, wherein he overcame Maxentius; that Cenſorinus, who writes of all manner of Supputations, ſaith nothing of them, nor do any Eccleſiaſtical Monuments till the ſitting of the Roman Council under Julius the Succeſſour of Sylveſter; but from the Greek Faſti it manifeſtly appears that from the ſaid ſeventh Year of Conſtantine, and the Conſulſhip of himſelf, and Licinius, the Indictions began to be reckoned in the Calendar.

Providentiſſimi Principis eſt, &c. Caſſiod. variar. lib. 4. Ep. 36.

He pardoneth the Tax due in the third Indiction to the Inhabitants of the Cottian Alpes.

Several Opinions about the Original and Number of Indictions.

Quem vide ad An. 312.

9. Now for better underſtanding this matter it is to be conſidered, that the Indictions were famous for two things, viz. the Payment of Tribute or the Ordinary Tax, and the Supputation of Years or Diſtinction of times. In reſpect of the firſt, they ſeem of a much earlier Date than the times of Conſtantine, and introduced by Auguſtus Cæſar, who, as Dion Caſſius witneſſeth, a little before Our Saviour's Birth began a Reſcription or Tax; firſt of ſuch as lived in Italy, and were worth Ducentia Seſtertia, omitting then ſuch as were not ſo rich or inhabited the Provinces, for fear of Inſurrections. From which ſhortly after being delivered by the ſettlement of his Affairs, when his Treaſury was now very low, he impoſed the Tax upon all the World. Perceiving that Commotions might hereupon be raiſed, ſeveral Perſons were ſent away into ſeveral Provinces to look to the Peace, and amongſt the reſt Sulpicius Cyrenius was taken from his Attendance upon Caius Cæſar, and diſpatched into Syria, M. Lollius being appointed Governour to young Cæſar in his room. That in this ſenſe Indictions were not of a much later date, appears from Julianus and Paulus the Lawyers, from what they anſwer concerning Lands obnoxious to this Indiction or Payment. But what ſort of Payment this was or how it was ſeſſed, whether by Poll or a Tax upon the Eſtate, hath been doubted. It's moſt probably conjectur'd that it was levied both ways, at firſt, a certain Eſtate in Land and a certain Age (though various at ſeveral times) being required of thoſe that paid it. For the Chief Collectour took notice of all Perſons who were to pay and who not, and at what time they had already begun or were to begin to pay, regiſtring their Names. The Syrians, as appears from Ulpian, were obliged to pay Tribute, the Males at fourteen and the Females at twelve Years of Age, or the time of Puberty. Afterward, the way of payment by Poll called Capitatio, came to be more diſtinguiſh'd from the Land Tax called Jugatio, and that in the time of Ulpian.

1562 l. 10*s.*

D.l.3. de Cenſibus.

10. Granting then that the Indictions, as they noted or impoſed Payment of Money, were before the time of Conſtantine, yet that ſo anciently they were made uſe of for Supputation of times doth not any where appear. But how ſhould they come to comprize the Period of fifteen Years, or ſo many together to be called the firſt, ſecond, third Indiction and ſo forward, till the fifteenth be reckoned, and then to begin again? Some with Scaliger gueſs the reaſon to have been, becauſe Conſtantine reckoned from his Quinquennalia to his Vicennalia. Others, as Paulus Petavius, becauſe Men being not ſeſſed of old, till they were fourteen Years old complete, the Seſs or Tax could not be laid or eſtimated but for fifteen Years at moſt, thoſe who ſhould be taxed at the next fifteenth Year being yet unborn. And Baronius cannot poſſibly (he ſaith) aſſign any other reaſon than this, that whereas ſixteen Years were formerly required for a Soldier to ſerve before he could challenge a Miſſion, Freedom from the Capitatio, or the Privilege of the Emeriti, Conſtantine, who had much kindneſs as he himſelf profeſſeth for the Veterane Soldiers, cut this term ſhorter by one Year, and appointed fifteen for their Service. That all theſe fifteen Years ſhould be reckoned by ſo many Indictions thence probably came to paſs, becauſe of every of theſe Years Annona indicebatur, Proviſions either in Specie or in Money were impoſed and laid upon the Provinces by Reſcript or Edict of the Prince, and ſo they were called Indictions ab indicendo; care being taken by ſeveral Laws, that before the beginning of the Indiction, true and Authentick Breves ſhould be made for prevention of Fraud and Cheating in the Collectours. Hence this Indiction came to be called Diſtributio and Fuſio. Baronius farther conjectureth, that the Reaſon why the Indictions began on the twenty fourth of September was, becauſe that then Harveſt being every where got in, the Emperours were wont at that time to indict, impoſe or lay the Taxes upon the ſeveral Provinces. But Petavius affirms that the beginning of an Indiction was the ſame with that of a Year, and that thereupon the Romans computed their Indictions from after the Winter Solſtice, but the Greeks from the firſt new Moon after the Autumnal Æquinoctial, who having not their Months fixed as had the Romans but moveable, and their firſt Month beginning with the firſt New Moon after the Autumnal Æquinoctial, which moſt commonly happened on the twenty fourth of September, it came to paſs that the Roman Indiction had a divers Epoche from that of the Greeks. The Emperours that ſucceeded Conſtantine followed the Greek Account, as alſo did their Subjects; but the Biſhops of Rome always obſerved their own, and ſtill retain, we are told, their ancient Cuſtome. The Indictions were ſo notable, and the Supputation by them, that it was very convenient to make this Digreſſion upon them. But of their beginning diverſly in divers Countries we have ſpoken in our ſecond Part; Let us return to the Kingdom and Government of Theodorich.

Vide Baron.

Fœlix made Conſul with Secundinus.

11. For the Year ſollowing or the DXI. of Our Lord, in the fourth Indiction, Theodorich to oblige the Countrey of Gall, and reward the Virtue of Fœlix a deſerving Perſon of that Nation, joined him in the Conſulſhip with Secundinus, who was named for the Eaſt. Concerning this Perſon he wrote an Epiſtle Commendatory to Anaſtaſius the Emperour, ſtill extant, for his approbation, together with another directed to Fœlix himſelf, both Commonitory and in way of Commiſſion. Herein he commends him for his frugality, which had inabled him to undergoe the Expences of the Dignity to which he doth alſo incourage him, they being great. For the ſame Year and the ſame fourth Indiction he made Argolicus Prefect of the City, that he might, as he tells him in his Patent, ſucceed to his Father's Honours, bidding him conſider how great a matter it was in the beginning of his Preferments to have grayheaded Rome committed to his Government, and charging him to carry himſelf ſo juſtly, modeſtly and generouſly, that he might no way diſgrace his Employment, but maintain his Dignity amongſt ſo Caſſiod. var. l. 2. Ep. 1. Piiſſimo Anaſtatio Imp. Theodericus, Ibid. Ep. 2.

Caſſiod. var. lib. 3. Ep. 11.

many grave and underſtanding Perſons as the Roman Senate afforded. In another Epiſtle he commands him to give all furtherance to one John, with whom he had agreed for cleanſing the common Sewers of the City of Rome, concerning the prodigious Magnificence of which he ſpends many words, affirming that they exceeded even the Miracles of other Cities. In a third he orders him to give leave to Paulinus a Patritian to re-edifie the publick Store-houſes, which were fallen down for Age and want of Care, that they might be preſerved for the uſe of Poſterity. About the ſame time he wrote to the Senate of Rome, and having aſſured the Fathers, that as he took care for redreſſing all grievances, eſpecially ſuch as concerned their City, ſo he could not but mind them of ſeveral Omiſſions, which by Information of divers well meaning Perſons were come to his knowledge. As that the waters of the Formæ were now made uſe of to turn Mills and to water Gardens; that the ſlaves appointed by Princes to that ſervice were ſeized and employed by private Men, and that Braſs and Lead which had made Eternal Jones King of Theſſaly, and Midas King of Phrygia their firſt Inventours, being employed by adorning the Walls, were pilfred away and imbezelled. He tells them therefore that he had ſent one John, (probably the ſame with the other) to have information, concerning theſe matters, and bids them join with him, to promote that for which they of their own accord ought to have petitioned, Ibid. Ep. 30.

Theodorich reprehends the Senate at Rome.

12. Being now much intent upon Acts of Charity and Publick Works,as he had before been kind to the Gravaſiani and Pontonates, he remitted the Tribute of this fourth Indiction to the Inhabitants of Arles, who endured the penury of that glorious ſiege as he expreſſeth it, and with them to all in Gall under his Power, giving many reaſons to Gemellus to whom the Order is directed, for his dealing ſo favourably with that People; but chiefly this, that rather the Equity of their Cauſe, than good Nature induced him ſo to doe. About this ſame time he ſent one Maradas a Comes, to protect and defend thoſe of Marſelles from all Acts of Violence and Oppreſſion, commanding them to receive and obey him in ſuch Capacity. The year following foreſeeing in what danger Italy might be through the many Excurſions and Depredations made by the Northern Nations, and conſidering how he himſelf had ſhewn the way, to any that would invade theſe Quarters, he cauſed the Caſtle of Veruca ſituate upon the River Atleſis to be fortified. Moreover at this time, as Sigonius will have it, he married his Siſter Amalafreda to Traſamund the Vandal King of Africk, as alſo his Neice to Herminfred King of the Thuringi. And taking notice of Symmachus a Patritian, how excellent an Architect he was, and how induſtrious he had been in adorning the Suburbs of Rome, with private Buildings, he thence takes occaſion to perſwade him to imbrace a more Noble Subject of his Abilities, in repairing the Ancient Theatre, which through Age, the conſumer of all things, was ſo much decayed. In the Letter the King, or rather Caſſiodorus, fell into a Rapture, when he conſiders the force of time, which one would have thought, ſhould ſooner have worn out Mountains than ſo ſtrong and admirable a Fabrick. Having admired its arched Roofs, he falls into a Diſcourſe of the Original of Theatres, becauſe he hath to doe with a Learned Man. He tells him that when of old, Countreymen in Feſtivals were wont to ſacrifice in their Groves to ſeveral Deities, the Athenians firſt brought up this Countrey practice into the City, calling that a Theatre in the Greek Language,which may be expreſſed in Latin by the word Viſorium, as which at a diſtance, and without any impediment might be ſeen by the People. The Front hereof was called Scona, from the darkeſt ſhade of the Grove, where, at the Spring, Shepherds were wont to ſing their Songs to ſeveral tunes. In thoſe times flouriſhed Muſick and Sage Sentences of thoſe moſt prudent Ages,but afterwards this honeſt Diſcipline,avoiding the Converſation of naughty Perſons out of Modeſty, retired.

Doeth ſeveral Acts of Charity.

Ibid. lib. 3. Ep. 32. & 40.

Ep. 34.

Caſſiod. Var. l. 4. Ep. 51.

The Original of Theatres.

13. Thence he comes to ſhew both whence the Tragedy and Comedy received their Names, to ſpeak of the Muſes, the Mimus and Pantomimus, wherein we muſt not follow him, and at length tells Symmachus, that whether it ſhould be thought fit to underprop the Fabrick or repair it by new Buildings, the Expenſe ſhould be out of his Chamber, both that the Architect might be renowned for ſo good a work, and Antiquity ſeem decently repaired in his own time. And this we thought fit to inſert, that the Reader may ſee the generous Humour of Theodorich, and the Learning of Caſſiodorus though a little affected, whoſe ſtyle is not ſo much barbarous as was the time, wherein Latin through long continuance, which altereth all things, and much more through the mixture of foreign and exo-tick words, if we look at the true idiome and phraſe, was quite changed from it ſelf, and acknowledged its vaſſalage and ſubjection to the barbarous Northern Nations as well as the Cities and the Countrey it ſelf. And hereof this learned and worthy perſon was ſo ſenſible, that in his Preface to his Epiſtles he both acknowledgeth it, and deprecates the diſdain and indignation of his Reader. This ſame year ſo fruitfull in acts of Clemency and Magnificence, Theodorich did ſtill more good in remitting to the Inhabitants of Campania the Tribute they were wont to pay, and this he did in conſideration of the loſs they had ſuſtained by the eruption of the Hill Veſuvius. Concerning this there is a Letter or Order extant directed to Fauſtus the Prefect, wherein he tells him that the Campanians having received this damage had petitioned him to that effect. That he was ready to grant their requeſt, if he could be rightly informed of the accident, and how to judge of the particular damages done thereby. He commands him to ſend ſome perſon of approved fidelity into the Territories of Nola, or Naples, to ſurvey the Grounds, and take an eſtimate of the loſs, that he might know how to make a proportionable allowance out of the Tribute.

Theodorich remits Tribute to the Campanians becauſe of the Eruption of Veſuvius.

Caſſiod. Var. lib. 4. Ep. 50.

14. Then doth he tell the Hiſtory, and recount the ſad circumſtances and effects of the uſual Eruptions. He premiſeth that the Countrey, leſt it ſhould enjoy perfect felicity, was continually allarmed with that calamity, yet was it not ſo terrible as elſe it would have been, becauſe it gave fair warning of the impendent and approaching miſchief. For ſuch ſtrugglings and motions there were within, that Vapours breaking out with a mighty noiſe terrified all round about the place. The Air, ſaith he, is all thickened and darkened with that ſooty Exhalation, ſo that it gives notice of its riſing to all Italy. Aſhes throughly calcined flie throughout the great Sea, and terrene Clouds being gathered, it rains drops of Duſt in the tranſmarine Provinces: it being then clearly diſcovered how much Campania it ſelf ſuffers when the miſchief is felt in another part of the World. You might there behold, as it were, Rivers of Duſt to run along the ground, and dry Sand to flow with fervent violence, as if it had been liquid ſtreams. You would be amazed to ſee the plain Fields ſwell as high as the tops of Trees, and thoſe Meadows ſadly waſted with hot Embers which lately by their pleaſant greenneſs allured the Eye. That everlaſting Furnace belcheth forth purple but barren Sand, which though aduſt with continual burning, yet cauſeth to take Root and fructifie thoſe ſeveral Seeds or Stalks it receiveth, and with great celerity repaireth what it had formerly waſted. What ſtrange Exception is this to the general rule and courſe of Nature, that one Mountain ſhould roar to ſuch a degree, that ſo many parts of the World ſhould be terrified by the change of the Air; and that ſo it ſhould caſt about its own ſubſtance that yet it ſhould receive no loſs nor diminution! It bedews the Regions far and near with Duſt; vomits out heaps upon the Neighbourhood, and yet this Mountain, exhauſted by ſo many and ſo great evacuations, continues to be an Hill for ſo many Ages. Who would believe ſo great pieces of Earth, lying in the plain, ſhould have bubbled up out of ſo profound depths, and no otherwiſe than as light Chaff ſpit or blown out of the Mountain's mouth? Elſewhere great Mountains burn privately, and in their own place; here almoſt the whole World muſt know of the matter. Wherefore ſeeing that the Inhabitants are not to be credited in a thing which may be atteſted by the Univerſe, let your prudence make choice of a man who may both rehearſe them, and prevent all fraudulent and ſurreptitious dealings. Thus doth Caſſiodorus though in an odd ſort of Latine elegantly deſcribe and paint out to the life all the Accidents of this Eructation, which, and that deſervedly, makes Baronius reprehend John Bodin for taxing Procopius of lightneſs and inconſideration, in that he writes how the Aſhes of another Eruption flew as far as Conſtantinople.

A Deſcription of its Eruption.

Ad Ann. 471.

A Deſcription of Veſuvius.

15. This too famous Veſuvius takes its riſe from a pleaſant and open Champion (being made or nouriſhed of Earthquakes and Burnings) where the pleaſant Sebetus empties its Waters into the boſome of the Tyrrhenian Sea, and that in the lower part of Campania the Happy, a Countrey never ſufficiently commended for its admirable fertility, in which reſpect Pliny calls it the place of perpetual contention betwixt Ceres and Bacchus, and by Merula it is ſtyled the Paradiſe of Italy. This Mountain, or Hill rather, elevates its ſelf for about four miles, its higheſt top not being one mile perpendicular from the Sea, in compaſs about twenty four, ſo ſeparated from all other Hills as if it ſcorned their conjunction and alliance, or rather they were afraid of it as a dangerous Neighbour. The skirts of it are beſet with fruitfull Vines, beautifull Trees, pleaſant Flowers, and wholeſome Herbs, all over but where it looks upon the Eaſt, which ſide being either originally, or through through the acceſſion of this new adventitious Earth, more ſteep than the other, bears onely wild Trees and bruſhy matter. On the top it is divided, or rather incompaſſed with another hollow Hill, ſhaped in the figure of an Half Moon, from which it is parted but with a ſmall Valley or Plain called the Atrium, it being probable that anciently it was all united in its ſelf, and plain and even, as both Strabo deſcribes it and Dion Caſſius witneſſeth; in proceſs of time this diviſion being made by Stone and Aſhes, which it vomited out of its own Bowels. From this Plain, as well the one as the other of thoſe higheſt Ridges, is barren, naked, and all covered with Aſhes and broken Stones, which continually rowl downward, which makes it very difficult to climb up, ſo high, as to come to the proſpect of the ancient Vorago or Hole, although there grows Broom, which affords ſome ſhelter againſt the Torrent, and here and there cauſeth better footing.

Vide Schotti Itiner. Ital. lib. 3. Gioviano di Lucca dell' Incendio fattali nel Veſuvio, &c.

Of the Countrey about it.

16. At this day the Mountain is incompaſſed with a well peopled Countrey, and noble and elegant Cities, adorned with rich and ſumptuous Edifices, and in many places with large and ſtately Palaces, each whereof ſeems rather the Habitation of a King than the Pleaſure-Houſe of ſome private Nobleman; ſo rich are they in their Furniture, exquiſite in their Fabrick and Workmanſhip, and deliciouſly ſeated amongſt Gardens, Grotto's and Fountains. But as nothing is perfect in this World, but the beſt and moſt pleaſant things ſubject to change and inconſtancy, Campania the Happy is in this reſpect unfortunate, that it foſters ſo great a miſchief in its own boſome, which Time, the finiſher as well of miſeries as pleaſures, hath had no power to conquer and ſubdue. Whether this Fire find matter within the Bowels of the Mountain it ſelf, or rather burning below in ſome inferiour Valley makes onely a paſſage through it, and a vent for diſcharging the Vapours and Aſhes which ariſe from the bituminous matter, Sulphur and other Minerals lying in the Countrey round about, and by its hot Fountains and otherwiſe giving arguments of terreſtrial Fires, as Seneca was of opinion, it's not our work here to enquire. If we could tell the Reader when either the Eructations of this Mountain or Ætna began, it would be more proper to our Deſign; but here we are deſtitute of Intelligence; for the inward cauſe having been the ſame in all Ages, many ſuch Accidents may have happened before theſe Monuments of Antiquity received their Being, which communicate to us the moſt ancient Obſervations about this Countrey. It's ſcarcely worth the while to take notice what the pretended Peroſus of Annius tells us, that in the laſt year but one of Aratius the Sixth, King of Aſſyria, Italy burnt for many days in three ſeveral places about the Iſtri, Cymei and Veſuvii, and that theſe places were by the Janigeni called Paleuſana, that is, the burned Region.

Ep. 70. de Ætna.

17. This is indeed agreeable to the Etymology of the word Veſuvius, ſignifying Fire or Spark, in the Greek Tongue, as a late Writer tells us, in which reſpect the Volſci in their ancient Speech called it Veſbia, which as thoſe who are skilled in that Language affirm, is the ſame with Fire. Several others write of the Antiquity of theſe Fires proceeding from this Mountain, and whence the Countrey ſhould be called Campi Phlegræi, but when they firſt began, they do not take upon them to tell us. Diodorus Siculus and Strabo ſeem to ſpeak of them as having happened in times remote, ſuch as they had heard and read of, and the Hole and Aſhes onely demonſtrated to the eye, that formerly ſuch things had been. This perhaps was alſo the reaſon, why Pliny who was ſo diligent in reckoning up the ſeveral places of this nature, yet makes no mention of this though it was ſo near him, and his curioſity at length, to pry into the myſteries of ſo great a wonder, brought him to his end. But he intended onely to make mention of ſuch as continually vomited forth their flames, which this Veſuvius doth not; and perhaps it might have ſmoaked in his time, but becauſe it did not much endamage the neighbouring Countrey he paſſed it over in ſilence. To be ſure, Tacitus, deſcribing the pleaſantneſs of the Iſle of Capri, the place of the ſenſual and voluptuous retirements of Tiberius, ſpeaks of this Hill as not having formerly done that miſchief, which it did afterward in the time of Titus. Hence Writers conclude, that before the time of Tiberius there happened no ſuch burnings as to deſtroy the natural beauty of the Mountain, at leaſt had not been ſo long a time as ſuffiſed to the reparation of it. And this they inforce from a Verſe of * Martial, which ſeemeth to hint at ſome ſuch thing.

The ſeveral Eruptions when.

Annal. l. 5. Proſpectabátq; pulcherimum ſinum, antequam mons ardeſcens faciem loci verteret.

 Hic eſt pampineis viridis veſuvius umbris. l. 1. epigr.* 105.

18. John Boccace ſpeaking of Veſuvius, tells how it broke out into flames before the reign of Titus in the time of Nero, having firſt ſent forth a thick ſmoak, which ended at laſt in a ſhower of Aſhes that filled all Campania, and the Sea it ſelf. Seneca ſpeaking of this very time, which fell in the LXV. year of our Lord, in the

Lib. di Mont.

Nat. l. 6. co. 3. 27.

Conſulſhip of Regulus and Virginius, and on the fifth of February, makes no mention at all of the burning out of that portentous Earthquake which ruined a great part of Pompeia, and much endamaged all the Countrey. It's ſuppoſed therefore that Boccace miſtakes the Name of the Emperour, although the experience of modern times aſſureth us, that ſuch Earthquakes are ordinarily accompanied with Eruptions of Veſuvius. But to be ſure ſixteen years after, about the year of our Lord LXXXI. in the time of Titus, happened ſuch an one as could not be concealed; it's effect being ſo ſharp, as made thoſe that lived in that time both to feel and ſpeak. Of this have written Pliny junior, Suetonius, Zonaras, Oroſius, Tacitus, Valerius Flaccus, Statius, Silius Italicus, Martial, Auſonius, Euſebius, and many others. So ſtrange were the accidents, circumſtances and effects of this Eruption, as cannot well be expreſſed. Suetonius gives an Abſtract of them, but Xiphilin the Epitomizer of Dio is more expreſs, who having firſt deſcribed the Mountain, and then the ordinary and common ſigns and effects of its conflagration, affirms that they were nothing in compariſon of what happened at this time.

The dreadfull one in the time of Titus.

19. Before the Eruption a great number of men of unuſual bigneſs, ſuch as Giants, its ſaid, were ſeen to wander about the Hill, the Countrey and neighbouring Cities, both by day and night. After followed a very great drought, and preſently ſo dreadfull Earthquakes, that the tops of Mountains became level to the adjoining Grounds. Then were heard ſubterraneous ſounds, like to Thunder and the bellowing of Beaſts, the Sea roared, the Heavens made a noiſe, and great crackings and ruſhings were heard, as if the Mountains had all fallen together. Then firſt of all began mighty Stones to be caſt up to the top of the Hill, which being removed out of the way, ſuch vaſt quantities of Fire and Smoak burſt out, that the Air was filled, and the Sun darkened no leſs than in the greateſt Eclipſe, the Day turning into Night, and Light into ſo prodigious Darkneſs. Hereupon the people, according to the ſuperſtitious humour of thoſe times, thought the Giants were fallen out amongſt themſelves, the rather becauſe the Image and repreſentation of them were to be ſeen in the Smoak, and a noiſe of Trumpets ſeemed to be heard. Some thought the World now returned into its ancient Chaos, or was to be conſumed by Fire; yet unwilling to die, and covetous of Life, when the whole World ſeemed to periſh with them. They ran out of their Houſes into the High-ways, out of the Ways into their Houſes; from Sea they haſted to the Land, and from the Land to the Sea, ſtill imagining, according to the reſtleſs humour of mankind, that new things would be better than the preſent condition.

20. So vaſt a quantity of Aſhes at length fell, that both Land an Sea, as well as formerly the Air, ſeemed therewith overwhelmed, which did great miſchief, not onely to Men, their Fields and Cattel, but deſtroyed in a manner all Fiſh and Fowl. Two Cities, Herculanum and Pompei it covered, and buried therein the Inhabitants alive, as they were ſitting in their Theatres. Nay ſo incredible was the quantity, that it flew as far as Ægypt, and Syria, not to mention the nearer parts of Africk; as for Rome it ſo thickened and darkened the Air there, that the Sun was thought to be eclipſed, to the ordinary ſort, and the more underſtanding were confounded at the accident, knowing nothing of what had happened in Campania: therefore they imagined that Nature was diſſolved, and that Heaven and Earth would come together. And although at Rome they were more ſcared than hurt for the preſent, yet afterwards a grievous Peſtilence followed, as the dreadfull Effect of ſo diſmal a Cauſe. The beginning of this Eruption fell on the firſt of November, about one a clock, in the firſt year of Titus his Reign, as appears from an Epiſtle of Pliny junior, wherein, ſetting down the occaſion and manner of the death of his Uncle (who wrote the Natural Hiſtory, and going too near to pry, was choaked with the Smoak and Duſt) he reſembles the firſt appearance of that huge and ſtrange Cloud unto a Pine Tree, for to no other, he ſaith, he could fitly compare it, it ſeeming to have, as it were, a long Trunk, and Boughs ſpreading out above it. Sometimes it appeared white, otherwhiles dusky and ſpotted, according to the mixed proportions of Earth and Aſhes. Reckoning up the ſeveral accidents which accompanied this Prodigy, amongſt the reſt he ſaith that the Pumice Stones flew about the Ears of men in the open Fields, yet having conſulted together what to doe, they held it ſafer during the Earthquake, when their Houſes tottered and reeled as if they had been drunken, to be without than within doors, arming their Heads with Pillows and Bolſters againſt the blows they expected. In concluſion, ſo dreadfull was this Conflagration, as well in its ſelf as circumſtances, that Cluverius affirms the Hill ever ſince to have burned, and others that from this time it became forked or horned at the Top. Eccleſiaſtical Writers make uſe of it to expreſs the Infernal Fire, and particularly our Learned Doctor Jackſon upon the Creed affirms this burning of Veſuvius to have been as a Beacon to give warning to all Fleſh, and from the admirable Conformity betwixt the Predictions of the Prophet Joel and the Narration of Pliny, he doubts not to ſay that now was fulfilled that Prophecy, I will ſhew Wonders in the Heavens, and on the Earth, Bloud and Fire and Pillars of Smoak, as alſo that this was the beginning of the terrible Day of the Lord foretold by the Prophet, wherewith the World was a long time ſhaken by fits, as it were by a deadly fever, as may appear from the like Calamities in Trajan's time, recited by Dion Caſſius.

Lib. 1. c. 24.

Joel. 2. 30.

Another in the time of Severus.

De Prodigiis, l. 2.

Of Diocleſian.

L. 1. Coll. 16. p. 284.

Others.

Dottor di Leggi, è Protonotario Apoſtolico.

In Napoli per Secondino Roncagholo.

21. The next Eruption of this ſubterraneous Fire that is taken notice of, happened in the time of Severus; and as Lycoſthenes gueſſed in the Year CCIII. and the tenth of that Emperour. The Hiſtorian relates that now Veſuvius ſhined with mighty flames, and roared with ſo huge a Noiſe that the ſound reached as far as Capua; this being poſſibly the time whereof Galen writes, that a great Quantity of Aſhes was carried from it as far as the Sea. The next breaking forth of this combuſtible matter was in the time of Diocleſian, about the Year CCCV. when it flew over all Europe, if Maiolus be to be credited, who writes that the Fire was extinguiſhed by the Prayers of St. Januarius, how truly, ſeeing no other Authours make mention of this Eruption, we ſhall not enquire. Of that which followed next after, and happened on the ſixth of November in the Year CCCCLXXI. many Authours have written. We are told that adjoining Towns and Regions were laid waſte by this burning, and that ſuch a Fear and Conſternation ſeized the People, that they betook themſelves for many Years to Supplications and Proceſſions, that they might avert the Wrath of Almighty God. Beſides what happened in this Year two other Eruptions are ſpoken of in the CCCCLXXII. and CCCCLXXIII. of Our Lord, which ſome conjecture to have been one and the ſame, and that it either continued or broke out at ſeveral times for ſo long together. However the matter ſtood in reference to time, moſt dreadfull were the Accidents of this, or theſe Conflagrations. Marcellinus affirms the day to have been turned into Night, and that all Europe was covered with the ſmall duſt which flew about in the Air, and the Inhabitants of Conſtantinople, to prevent the like Judgment for the future, kept an Anniverſary day of Prayer and Supplication the ſixth of November. This confirms what Procopius relates of the flying of the Aſhes as far as that City, for which he is raſhly taxed by Bodin, though Leo the Emperour was ſtruck with ſuch Conſternation, that he could not reſt quiet in the Town, but went and ſojourned at Mamantis, and theſe Aſhes were blown into Africk as far as Tripolis, if not in the ſame Year, in that which followed. The next Conflagration was that which gave occaſion to this Diſcourſe, and happened in the Days of Theodorich, which ten others have followed in ſucceeding Ages. But the greateſt by far as can be known was, that which fell out lately in the Year M. DCXXXI. on the ſixteenth of December, the manner whereof and the direfull Effects, are deſcribed in the Italian Language by Gioviano di Lucca, a Doctor of the Laws and Apoſtolical Protonotary as he is ſtyled, who hath taken pains to collect out of Hiſtory all the other Conflagrations mentioned. But we have made too long a Digreſſion, which the remarkableneſs of the Subject extorted.

Theudas Victorious in Spain.

Theud-hais, Populis imperans.

Troſt. Mund, Conſolans os.

22. Spain being now at this time held, and governed by the two ſeveral Intereſts of Giſalarick and Amalarick, the two Gothick Kings, the former it ſeems not content with his ſhare, reſolved to have all or none, and for that purpoſe took Arms againſt his young Neighbour. But his Deſigns were not ſo deeply laid, nor his Preparations ſo quick and ſurpizing, but Theudas the Governour or Protectour of Amalarick eaſily diſcovered them, and was ſo well provided, that he gave him Battel and a great Overthrow, and forced him to quit the Countrey. Giſalarick betook himſelf to Traſamund the Vandal King of Africk, who kindly entertained him, and jealous of the Power of Theodorich ſupplied him with Money. This Theodorich much ſtomached, and wrote a Letter to him, wherein he upbraided him with ingratitude; in that having been ſo obliged by him he requited him by entertaining his Enemy. He had honoured him, by beſtowing his own Siſter on him in Marriage; whereas he had given but his Daughters or Nieces to other Princes: which Siſter he extolls not ſo much for her high Birth and Quality, though ſhe was deſcended of the Stock of Amalus, as the Excellency of her Mind, being a Woman equal to him her Husband in Prudence, and not ſo conſiderable for her Royal Eſtate, as admirable for her rare Policy and Councils. He admoniſheth him ſeriouſly to conſider of the Injuſtice he had done; leſt the King of Italy ſhould be provoked to doe ſomething, which might manifeſtly break that good underſtanding, and peace that had been formerly betwixt them, for as much as an unlooked-for Injury, and the finding of Treachery where one expected Friendſhip and good Offices cannot be endured. He deſires him to give heed, to what he had ordered his Ambaſſadours to ſay to him by word of mouth. Giſalarick (or Geſaleck) it ſeems by this Letter, having got what ſupply of Money he deſired, was gone into other Countries to find out ſome good Advantage for recovery of his former and better Fortunes. Yet Traſamund excuſed himſelf ſo plauſibly, that he gave full and abundant ſatisfaction to Theodorich, which he expreſſeth in another Letter publiſhed by Caſſiodorus next after the former, wherein is mentioned alſo a Preſent of Gold ſent by the Vandal King. This Theodorich refuſeth to accept, expreſſing what great delight he took in reſtoring it, and ſome Vanity, in ſetting forth his own Commendations for ſo doing, concluding with an Exhortation to his Brother-in-Law to be more cautious and exact for the time to come. In the mean time Theudas, by his order, governs all Spain in the Name of Amalarick.

Caſſiod. Var. lib. 5. Ep. 43. Amal, Cœleſtis, unde Amalfrida cœleſtis pax, Amal-ſchuente, cœleſtis forma.

Fecimus utiq; Regalia, &c. ibid. Ep. 44. ſine ult.

Caſſiodorus made Conſul.

23. The year of Our Lord DXV had M. Aurelius Caſſiodorus Senatour for Conſul, of whom we have already ſpoken, and by whoſe means and procurement we have diſcourſed ſo much other matters, eſpecially of Italy, and the Weſtern Provinces. To ſo high a Dignity he did not come per ſaltum, or leaping over the Heads of ſuch as were far above him, through the wantonneſs of Fortune, but by degrees and as Vertues themſelves are wont to increaſe, for ſo Theodorich his Maſter expreſſeth it in his Letter to the Senate. His firſt ſtep in preferment was the Comitiva privatarum, which Office having managed prudently, innocently and without Corruption, he was advanced to the Comitiva ſacrarum Largitionum. Having in this place alſo demeaned himſelf with ſuch Moderation, that he ſhewed what was juſt and equal, both by his Example and Precepts under the former King, by Theodorich he was preferred to the Dignity of Prætor, in diſcharge of which Truſt, having left a pattern of Modeſty and Moderation to ſuch as ſhould come after, he came to be Corrector of the Brutii and of Lucania his own Countrey. At length he aroſe to the Dignity of Præfectus Prætorio, as alſo the ſupreme Honours of a Patritian and Conſul diſcharging the Office of Secretary ſtill as appears by the Letter lately mentioned, wherein aſwell as in that which precedes it he is commended, though truly, for the greatneſs of his Family, the honourable Actions of his Anceſtours, and his own Perſonal Vertues. But it was the Cuſtome for Princes to extoll their Candidates, and blazon their Vertues and great Atchievements to the Senate, that they might ſeem not to have conferred Dignities and Preferments, upon unfit and undeſerving Perſons.

Caſſiod. var. lib. 1. Ep. 4.

His Preferments.

Theodorich ſubdues the Allemans.

24. About this time, it's uncertain what Year, Theodorich ſubdued the Allemans, and forced them to pay Tribute, as Agathias hath written, and appeareth from the Kings Letters directed to the Inhabitants of Suevia, wherein he lets them know that he had made one Fridelade their Governour, for reſtraining thefts and robberies wherewith they were much diſturbed. Within a year after the Conſulſhip of Caſſiodorus, while he ſtill cheriſhed the Fortunes and Hopes of Amalarick his Nephew in Spain, he was informed that Eutharick, the Son of Viterick and Grandſon of Beremund, lived in that Countrey. For Beremund the Son of Thuriſmund deſcended of the Family of Amalus, leaving Scythia, as Jornandes writes, went and lived in Gall with Theodorich the Succeſſour of Vallia King of the Weſtrogoths, by whom being honourably entertained, he left a Son called Viterick, who was Father to this Eutharick, a Perſon excellently qualified both in Body and Mind. Theodorich hearing him much commended was very deſirous to ſee him, and when he had the ſatisfaction, glad he had found out one who was both of his own line, and every way deſerving his Alliance, he gave him in Marriage Amalaſuenta his Daughter. Two or three Years after he made him Conſul, and Anaſtaſius the Emperour, to pleaſe and oblige the Old Man, preſented him with the Robe called Tunica palmata, and adopted him as his honorary Son in the way of Arms. In the mean time Herminfrid, King of the Heruli, put to death his Brother Berthar, and after that calling Theodorich King of Gall to his aſſiſtence made an end of Belderick his other Brother; but when he had done his work, and Theodorich demanded part of the Countrey conquered according to the Articles of their Alliance, he refuſed to make good what he had ingaged, and thereupon mortal and irreconcileable differences aroſe betwixt them.

He married his Daughter Amalaſuenta to Eutharick his Kinſman.

Eutharick being Conſul viſits Rome.

25. Betwixt the Emperour Juſtin and Theodorich, there was maintained from the firſt a good Intelligence and Correſpondence, as appears from mutual Offices of Kindneſs and Amity. Juſtin himſelf bearing the Title of Conſul in his ſecond Year, took Eutharick the Son-in-Law of Theodorich for his Collegue, and farther graced him by a titular Adoption, as a Letter ſhews, which afterward was written to the Emperour by Athalarick the Son of Eutharick, whom Amalaſuenta his Wife bore the Year preceding his Conſulſhip. Being deſigned Conſul, Eutharick went to Rome, there to enter upon his Office, which before he approached he was met by all the Ranks and Degrees of the City, who ſtrove by all means to doe him Honour, as one whom they expected to ſee ſhortly upon the Throne. He on the other ſide omitted nothing to gain their good Opinion, diſcharging his Office with all poſſible Liberality and Magnificence; for ſome way or other he gratifyed the Senatours both Goths and Romans, and pleaſed the People with Shews on the Theatre, particularly with ſuch wild Beaſts procured out of Africk, as Rome had never ſeen till that time. Having done this at Rome he returned to Ravenna to his Father-in-Law, and there alſo ſtrove to exceed himſelf in Liberality and obliging Actions. Some time after Theodorich was vexed in his mind by News received out of Africk, where the Wandals had impriſoned his Siſter Amalfreda after her Husband's Deceaſe, and put all the Goths to death who went over with her upon the Account of the Alliance, under pretence of a Conſpiracy. Theodorich having not ſufficient ſtrength at Sea for Invaſion of Africk, could not revenge the Injury as he deſired, and in the mean time Hilderick the King contracted a faſt friendſhip with Juſtinian, Nephew to the Emperour, and who managed all Affairs in the Extreme Age of his Uncle.

Theodorich turns cruel to Boetius,

A moſt excellent perſon.

26. Hitherto we have beheld Theodorich ſo to demean himſelf, that one might not fear to propound him as a pattern to other Princes, and his Actions as ſo many Copies for them to write after, ſuch his prudent Conduct, his Valour, Magnificence, Bounty, and which Cemented all, his Juſtice, Equity and Moderation. Now we muſt ſee him degenerating from himſelf, and blurring thoſe Lines of Government which he had ſo exactly drawn; ſo hard is it for Man that is placed on high, not to be giddy and intoxicated with Eaſe, and the Fumes of continual Pleaſure. Yet had he ſhewn any diſcretion in the choice of a Subject, wherein to exerciſe the mutability of his humours, he had been the leſs unfortunate, becauſe more excuſable; but the hard Meaſure he made, falling upon one who deſerved better than any of that Age wherein he lived, in this reſpect Fortune it ſeems ow'd, and paid him a very ill turn. This Perſon was Boetius a Patritian who had twice or thrice been Conſul, and ſuch a Man as one ought carefully to deſcribe, leſt we doe him injury. Of ſo noble an Extract, that therein he excelled all his Contemporaries, deriving his Pedigree from Manlius Torquatus, which of later times had been enobled more by Anicius his Great Grandfather, and others of that moſt potent and noble Houſe, to behold the Power and Intereſt of which moſt Eminent Perſons came into Italy; an Houſe which ſo abounded with Wealth, that Zoſimus the Hiſtorian envying the Greatneſs thereof, writes that this Family of Anicii poſſeſſed in a manner the Riches of all the Romans. In his younger years he ſtudied at Athens, where the Profeſſion of Philoſophy had been reſtored, which as he neglected not in general, but ſearched into the depths of all Sects and Opinions, ſo eſpecially he addicted himſelf to that of Ariſtotle, and therein ſpent moſt of thoſe Eighteen years which he paſſed away in that Univerſity. The Name of that Philoſopher, was formerly ſcarcely known to thoſe that were merely skilled in Latin, as he himſelf ſaith; but he tranſlated his works, and illuſtrated them with Commentaries in that Language, hereby ſufficiently evincing that of all Roman wits, he beſt underſtood the Scale, and could fathom the Depths of the Peripatetick.

Vide Baron.

27. For the Reader muſt not think that the Philoſophy of Ariſtotle, which in theſe later Ages hath obtained the Principality in the Schools, was always of ſuch Reputation as we have ſeen it in our time. At the beginning of Chriſtianity the Sect of the Stoicks much prevailed, but eſpecially, the Opinions of Plato, which in the primitve times were of ſuch Repute, that the greateſt Rubs, the true Religion met with, were laid by thoſe Prejudices that were thence received. For although much furtherance it received from ſuch Philoſophers as were converted, in refuting the Vanities and Impieties of Paganiſm, yet the great Writers againſt it were of that Sect, and both Tertullian and Origen of old complained, all or moſt of the Hereſies which crept into the Church, took their Original from the Tenets of (this) Philoſophy. Long was it e'er the Schools became

Sect. 3.

The progreſs of Peripatetick Philoſophy.

Peripatetick, and Philoſophy had ceaſed to be Pagan, e'er ſhe forſook the Accademy and the Porch. At length ſhe courted Ariſtotle ſo much, that ſhe made him ample amends for her former Neglects; and here, as formerly ſhe had done much miſchief as well as good in the School of Plato, ſo ſhe indeavoured to obtrude the Opinions and Notions of Ariſtotle upon the Chriſtian Faith, witneſs Gilibert or Giſlebert, the Biſhop of Poictiers, of whoſe Profeſſion of Philoſophy and the Hereſie he thence ſucked, let Eccleſiaſtical Writers ſpeak. We ſhall onely obſerve farther concerning this Subject, that the Peripatetick Philoſophy was vehemently believed and promoted by the Schoolmen who found it moſt agreeable to their Quirks and Niceties, and poſſibly the real and eſſential Difference and Subſiſtance it placeth betwixt Subſtances and their Qualities (upon which Doctrines ſome Novelties in the Church have been founded) was the great Reaſon it hath been advanced, not onely above true Reaſon but the Holy Scriptures themſelves. As much concerned are they to anſwer a text or place in the Philoſopher, as in St. Peter or St. Paul; and Theology hath not onely received its Model and Method but even Rules from him. So hath this Sect prevailed in later Ages, that from it Writers have received their Terms and Manners of Speech, which makes it neceſſary that young Students be therein firſt inſtructed and well grounded before they advance to other Exerciſes, and make any Attempts upon Experimental Philoſophy, or Divinity it ſelf.

Vide Caſſiod. Var. lib. 1. Ep. penult. & l. 2. Ep. 40.

28. But to return to Boetius, none draws his half fac'd Picture ſo much to the life, as he who afterward deſtroyed the Archetype, I mean Theodorich the King who gives him ſuch Encomiums, and heaps ſuch Commendations upon him, as the ſenſe and apprehenſion thereof could onely be obliterated by the Power of Jealouſie. He not onely commends him for his skill in the Precepts of Ariſtotle, but for his perfections in all manner of Learning, whereof he makes him ſo great a Helluo, that he uſeth a word applicable to ſuch Creatures, as upon which the Nouriſhment they have received hath been very well beſtowed. The knowledge he aſcribes to him is as well practical as ſpeculative, and herein appeared his worth, that he was not content to be Learned alone; but would have others partake of that which made him ſo conſiderable. Therefore he taught to ſpeak Latin, whatſoever Authour was conſiderable amongſt the Greeks; for inſtance Pythagoras the Muſician, Ptolomy the Aſtronomer, Nicomachus the Arithmetician, Euclid the Geometrician, Plato the Divine, Ariſtotle the Logician, and Archimedes the Mechanick, about whoſe Works the King, or Caſſiodorus for him, ſpends many words, the effect of which is this that Boetius perfectly skilled in his Doctrine of Motions ſhould make two Clocks, whereof one ſhould explicate the Motion of the Spheres, and the other the Diurnal Courſe of the Sun, both which were to be preſented to the King of the Burgi. Such is the Teſtimony given by one that turned his deadly Enemy, but this as we formerly termed it is but an half fac'd Picture, repreſenting onely an Idea of his Intellectuals, what he was for his Morals we muſt alſo diſcover, to preſent him in all his Proportions. Firſt then as a means to make him good aſwell as knowing, to the former ſecular Learning he added the Knowledge of Theology and the Holy Scriptures, as appears from his Books concerning the Bleſſed Trinity, and againſt the Errours of Neſtorius and Eutyches.

Multa eruditione ſaginatum.

Greek Authours tranſlated by Boetius.

29. What Influence this Knowledge of Chriſtianity and true Philoſophy had into his Life and Actions is ſufficiently evident from his Management of Matters during his laſt Conſulſhip, and the great hatred he contracted by his Impartial Juſtice, and defending private Perſons from the Injuries and Oppreſſions of unreaſonable Men how powerfull ſoever. Such were Conigaſtus and Triguilla the Maſter of the Kings Houſhold, and other greedy and ravenous Goths, from the Claws of whom he reſcued many miſerable Italians, and to the great Indignation of ſuch Monſters, protected his innocent Countreymen, aſwell from publick as private Impoſitions and Rapines. When during the Rage of a moſt Cruel Famine, a great Summ of Money was required of the Inhabitants of Campania to their utter undoing, he oppoſed the Project of the Præfectus Prætorio with ſuch Zeal and Conſtancy even before the King, that it was quite daſhed and laid aſide. When the greedy Courtiers had already devoured the Eſtate of Paulinus, a Man of Conſular Dignity, in hope and expectation, he reſcued it out of the Mouths of thoſe greedy Leeches. Albinus a Perſon of the ſame Quality, he defended againſt the Accuſations of Cyprianus the Informer, and by his Wit and Eloquence, protected him when the King accuſed him of High Treaſon, and referred his Trial to the whole Senate at Verona. Thus ſwimming againſt the ſtream he met with great oppoſition, both from King and Courtiers, and having inraged them by croſſing their Deſigns,

His Morals.

Vide Sigonium de Occid. Imp. l. 16. Boetium de Conſolatione.

Deſigns, he was at length ſwallowed up in the Gulph of his Princes Jealouſie and Indignation. Once out of his Office, in the ſucceeding Conſulſhip of Maximus, he was accuſed by Baſilius, Opilio and Gaudentius, of whom the firſt for no good deed had been diſmiſſed the King's Service, and undertook this Employment to redeem himſelf from his Creditours, and the other two having been condemned to Baniſhment had taken Sanctuary, and thereupon were ordered by the King's Edict, if by a day prefixed they departed not from Vienna, to be ſtigmatized in the Forehead and then driven away. Yet the very ſame day did theſe Villains accuſe Boetius, and their Accuſation was admitted; which tended to this effect, that he had endeavoured to advance the Power and Intereſt of the Senate above that of the King, having hindered an Informer from bringing in an Impeachment of Treaſon againſt the Fathers: and Letters were forged to make out his Intentions and Aims to be for the Recovery of the Roman Liberty. Theodorich either privy to this Villany, or lightly giving credit to thoſe ſuborned Witneſſes and feigned Crimes, raſhly condemned this Innocent Man, and confiſcating his Eſtate baniſhed him to Ticinum or Pavia, where comforting himſelf aſwell as he could with his Philoſophy, he made a Book concerning that Conſolation, and committed to writing thoſe paſſages for information of Poſterity, aſwell as of the preſent Age.

His pretended Crime.

He is baniſhed to Pavia.

30. Having impriſoned Severinus Boetius at Pavia, he cauſed Symmachus his Father-in-Law, and a Perſon of great Learning and other worth to be apprehended, committing them both to ſafe Cuſtody, for they were not both committed at the ſame time, as ſome have thought, but Symmachus enjoyed his Liberty, whilſt Boetius had too ſad occaſion to bewail his own Condition, and congratulate the Liberty of his Father-in-Law, as he doth in his Book de Conſolatione. Not long after Theodorich cauſed them both to be beheaded, and if thou wilt believe, Reader, the Relation of Martianus, who wrote his Life, and received it as a Tradition from the Church of Pavia, Boetius after his Head was off, took it up with both his Hands, and being asked who it was that ſtruck him, anſwered The Vngodly, and ſo walking into the Neighbouring Church and kneeling down before the Altar, when he had received the Sacred Myſteries, he expired, and after his Death was honoured for a Saint. And why may not this Story be as true as what we find concerning St. Denis, which whoſoever will not believe may goe and ſee, if he pleaſe, the Croſſes erected in the ſeveral Places where he reſted himſelf with his Head in his Hand, betwixt Paris and the Town which now bears the Name of that Martyr. The very ſame is alſo told of our St. Alban, who was beheaded for his Religion as St. Denis was. But ſo fell this Noble Pair of Senatours, ſurpaſſed by none other in any Indowment whatſoever, which renders Mortals both Excellent and Glorious. Concerning one of them we have already ſeen, what their great Enemy (as he proved) teſtifies, and for Symmachus, the ſame Hand gives him large Commendations, true no doubt, becauſe Procopius ſaith in few words the ſame things and more, although the reaſon the King gives in one of his Epiſtles, be not ſo ſolid as were the Buildings for which he ſo much extolls him, when he deſires him to take upon him the Care of repairing the Theatre formerly mentioned. That he was well skilled in Theology appears from Boetius his dedicating his writings to him concerning the Trinity, wherein he makes him Judge and Cenſour of his Books; and that he was well ſeen in all the Sciences, from Priſcian the Grammarian of Cæſarea, who taught about this time at Conſtantinople, and dedicated alſo to him the Book he wrote of Weights and Meaſures.

Beheaded together with Symmachus his Father-in-Law.

The Character of Symmachus.

Antiquorum diligentiſſimus imitator, Modernorum nobiliſſimus inſtitutor, &c. Caſſiod. var. lib. 4. Ep. 51.

Ex Priſciano Grammatico qui noſtro tempore Conſtantinopoli Doctor fuit, iſta collecta ſunt. Caſſiod. de Orthographia. c. 12. pag. 101. totius operis impreſſi Geneva.

Hiſt. Goth. lib. 1. ad initium.

31. But concerning the Worth and Innocency of them both, there is one Teſtimony behind, and that is the too late Repentance of Theodorich, whoſe ſorrow, as Procopius tells the ſtory, was in its occaſion and height full as remarkable as the Puniſhment had been unjuſt. Not many days after their Execution, when the King went to Supper, he had ſerved up to his Table the Head of a Fiſh of an unuſual bigneſs. This Theuderich (as he calls him, and by his right Name) fanſied to be the Head of Symmachus lately put to death, who, as it were biting the nether Lip, ſeemed to threaten him in a gaſtly and cruel manner. Seized hereupon with Horrour and Amazement, and falling into a Cold-ſweat he haſted to his Chamber, and lying down upon his Bed commanded his Attendants to cover him with many Clothes. Then did he reveal the whole matter to Elpidius his Phyſician, lamenting the Sin he had committed againſt Symmachus, and ſoon after died, this being the firſt and laſt wrong he ever did his Subjects, in pronouncing ſentence thus againſt men without Examination. Thus Procopius both excuſes and commends, cenſuring him for the Raſhneſs and Injuſtice of the Fact, and yet herein exceedingly praiſing him, that the Fact was ſingle, the whole Courſe of his Life and Government having been regulated and poiſed by Juſtice and Moderation. Though his putting thoſe Theodorich dies of Melancholy for having put them to death.

That ſet aſide a moſt Excellent Prince.

two Perſons to death was inexcuſable, yet his ſorrow and repentance was remarkable, though the thing ſavoured of Raſhneſs and Cruelty, yet his after-thoughts were ſigns of Mercy and good Nature; beſides, the Extravagance of his Fancy as to the Head of the Fiſh, ſeems to have been an Effect of the Fickleneſs or tenderneſs of his Conſcience. This however muſt be ſaid, that Italy never enjoyed more ſerene and happy Days, never more Splendour in the higheſt pitch of her Greatneſs, never more ſolid and laſting Peace with Eaſe, Pleaſure and Security, than under his Government. That few which obtained a Kingdom by Force and Violence, preſerved themſelves and it by ſuch Calmneſs and Sweetneſs of Councils and Actions: In concluſion, that few ſo beloved by their Subjects were ſo terrible to their Enemies, both which Procopius teſtifies of him. He died it's ſaid on the Second of September, in the 34*th.* of his Reign, and the Seventy ſecond of his Age. When he ſaw his end approaching, having ſent for the chief of the Gothick Nobility, he declared for his Succeſſour Athalarick the Son of his Daughter Amalaſuenta by Eutharick lately deceaſed, commanding them to receive and obey him as ſuch; to love and cheriſh the Roman Senate and People, and to maintain Amity, and good Correſpondence with the Emperour. His death is reported to have been portended at Naples, by the fall of the Head from off his Statue.

Athalarick ſucceeds his Grandfather.

Athal-rick, nobilitate pollens.

32. Athalarick then a boy of Eight Years of Age, ſucceeded his Grandfather. His Mother was the Regent of the Kingdom, being a Woman adorned with all Beauties and Accompliſhments both of Mind and Body. Of Countenance and Aſpect compoſed to ſuch Majeſty, as would ſtrike the beholder with Veneration. Of ſuch fluence and ſweetneſs of Speech, that being skilled both in the Latin and Greek Tongues, ſhe raviſhed the Minds and Affections of her Hearers; in ſum, for Wiſedom and other Indowments which fit and qualify a Perſon for Government, far above her Sex. By her order, Ambaſſadours and Letters are diſpatched, in the Name of the young King to the Roman Senate and People, and to the neighbouring Princes, in League and Amity with her Father, ſignifying his death, and how the Child ſucceeded by virtue of his laſt Will and Pleaſure declared in the preſence of the Nobility, whence the choice was ſo unanimouſly approved, that it ſeemed rather a manifeſtation of the Will and Pleaſure of Almighty God. That this Example of the Nobility, was readily and chearfully followed by both his Gothick and Roman Subjects, who had not onely promiſed but ſworn Obedience to him. The Senate therefore he deſires to imitate ſo good a Pattern, telling them he had ſent to them Sigiſmer a Comes with others, who in his Name ſhould alſo make oath to preſerve to them their Rights and Privileges, and he bids them ask boldly of him whatſoever they thought would increaſe the Security of their preſent Eſtate. The People he courts in like manner, requires alſo from them an Oath of Fidelity and Allegiance, and promiſes under no leſs an obligation all Offices of Juſtice, Equity and Clemency; to cheriſh the Goths and Romans alike, and maintain them in Equal Rights and Privileges, making no other diſtinction, than that the Goths undergoing the Travails and Dangers of War for the Publick good, the Romans ſhould enjoy quiet and ſecurity within the Walls of their own City. He puts them in mind, how by the mutual Oath of Prince and People, the Memory of Trajan's Government was renewed, who as appears from the Panegyrick of Pliny, at his Entrance upon the Conſulſhip, both ſwore himſelf and received the Oaths of the Magiſtrates, Senate and People. To Tiberius the Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, and the Provincials, as they are called, under his Juriſdiction, he promiſeth by Oath the like good Government, having exhorted them to Fidelity and Obedience, and written his Letters to Victorinus their Biſhop, to ſtir them up, and provoke them to be good Subjects, both by his Precepts and Example. He beggs alſo his Prayers, that the Heavenly King would be pleaſed to confirm to him his Earthly Kingdoms, that he would ſuppreſs his Adverſaries, forgive him his Sins, and mercifully conſolidate and preſerve what he had ſo bountifully and glorioully conferred upon his Parents.

Letters written by the Regent to Senate and People.

Adi & conſule Caſſiod. Variar. lib. 8. Ep. 1, 2, 3. uſque ad 9.

33. Such was the beginning of Athalarick, or rather Amalaſuentha (or Amalaſuntha, as ſhe is commonly called) his Mother; who, either as pious and humble Penitents are wont to doe, conſcious of the Frailty of Humane Nature, impoſed upon her ſelf and Son the ſtrong Bonds of an Oath, to check and pull them back when they ſhould exceed the Bounds of Equity and Moderation; or, not ignorant what Diſorder and Difficulties fall upon Kingdoms in the Minority of Princes, provided for his Security and Eſtabliſhment as prudently as ſhe could, courting thus his Subjects into the ſtrongeſt bonds and ties which could be laid upon their Conſciences, by this plauſible Stipulation and Exchange of Oaths. That the

Her care for his Education.

Vide Caſſiod. variar. lib. 9. Ep. 1.

the latter Conſideration effectually moved her, the Dictates of Nature may ſufficiently ſatisfie, and that the former did not want its effects alſo, the Courſe of her Actions doth ſufficiently manifeſt. For her principal care ſeemed to be for his good Education, and the ſeaſoning of his tender Years with good Learning and religious Precepts; committing him to the exact Diſcipline of moſt grave and ſober Maſters, who ſhould inſtruct him according to the Roman Cuſtome, and their manner of the Inſtitution of Youth, though the Goths were therewith offended. That ſuch there were at this time who could very well doe it, we cannot doubt, becauſe of that Publick School which had lately flouriſhed at Rome, wherein were profeſſed Law, Eloquence, and the Liberal Arts by moſt Learned Men, maintained at the publick Charge. But of late their Stipends had either been denied or very badly paid, which coming to the Knowledge of the Regent, ſhe directed Letters in the King's Name to the Senate of that City, expoſtulating the neglect of ſo conſiderable a matter, and requiring the punctual payment of theſe Salaries for the time to come. Foraſmuch as Arts are nouriſhed and maintained by Rewards, ſhe tells them it is Wickedneſs to defraud the Teachers of Youth of any thing due to them, who ought rather to be farther excited by an Augmentation of their Incouragements. She commands for a greater certainty of their Allowance, that they be paid every half year, and that if any Officers retain the Money longer than that time, they be reſponſible both for Principal and Intereſt. Her Reaſons are, that Learned Men are not to depend upon the proud and diſdainfull Humour of others, that it is a ſhame that Players ſhould be provided for, who ſerve onely for pleaſure and recreation, and they be neglected who are the Formers of good manners, and breeders up of Eloquent Wits for the Service of the Court. But eſpecially that they may not be diſtracted by ſolicitous thoughts, and neceſſary Cares for a Livelyhood, which muſt render their pains more ineffectual.

She makes Reſtitution.

Var. lib. 8. Ep. 1.

Vide Baron. ad Ann. 527.

34. Having ſufficiently provided for her Son's Inſtruction by way of Precept, ſhe her ſelf became his Miſtreſs in the other more ſignificant and effectual part of Example. She not onely kept off her Hands from invading the Lives, Rights, Privileges and Eſtates of the Subject, but reſtored to the Children of Symmachus and Boetius, what had been ſo unjuſtly taken from them, and in general protected and ſecured the Roman and Italian People from the Rapacious practices of the Goths; who as Strangers that have their Fortunes to make in a conquered Countrey, ſought to build their Families upon the Ruines and Deſolation of the Natives. To Amalarick the King of Spain, and her Nephew by her Siſter, who ſtood in need of ſome Incouragement and Aſſiſtence, (Theudas his Guardian having, by his Marriage with a great Lady of the Countrey, made himſelf in effect more King than his Pupil,) ſhe gave part of Gall lying beyond Rhodanus, and retained that on the neareſt ſide for her Son; what her Father had taken away from the Inhabitants of Carcaſſon, ſhe reſtored, and remitted the Impoſitions he had laid upon them. Foreſeeing alſo that by retaining that Part of Gall now mentioned, ſhe ſhould draw an heavy War upon the Kingdom, and the Franks into the Bowels of Italy, ſhe yeilded to their King's pretenſions, and delivered it up into his Hands. Shortly after Juſtinian came to the Government in the Eaſt, being aſſumed as Collegue in the Empire by his Uncle Juſtin. Aſſoon as his promotion was heard of in the Weſt, Amalaſunta diſpatched Ambaſſadours to him, to congratulate his good Fortune, and to deſire a Continuance of that Friendſhip and Alliance which had been betwixt their Predeceſſours; if the Epiſtle be rightly directed as now we have it in Caſſiodorus. And what ſhe deſired on her Son's behalf was readily granted, as we may conclude from that good Correſpondence, that was betwixt them as long as Athalarick lived, and the Coins which were ſtamped at this time, whereon is on one ſide to be ſeen the Image of Juſtinian, and on the other the Name of King Athalarick.

Hujus vol. lib. 1. c. 2.

Theodatus King.

35. We have already ſhewn how the Goths miſliked of the breeding of their young King, and deſiring to wrong the Subjects, would have him brought up after the Barbarian way. How hereupon he was debauched by ill Company. How Amalaſunta his Mother was brought into great Difficulties, and purpoſed to deliver up Italy into the Hands of Juſtinian. How Athalarick her Son died of a Conſumption, and thereupon ſhe procured Theodatus the Nephew of Theodorich to be King, and how in way of requital he baſely cauſed her to be murthered. We ſhewed in its proper place, that Juſtinian upon this occaſion reſolved to make war upon the Goths, having lately ſubdued the Vandals in Africk; that Meſſages paſſed betwixt him and Theodatus, who put a Guard upon the Emperour's Ambaſſadours,

Sect. 3.

Vitigis.

Ildebald.

Erarick.

Totilas.

Teias.

and in concluſion that Beliſarius by order paſſed from Sicily into Italy. The Reader muſt alſo remember that he preſſing upon the Goths, they choſe for King one Vitigis, who cauſed Theodatus to be murthered. Vitigis drew the Franks to his Party, but made war, though valiant enough, unſucceſsfully againſt Beliſarius, who at length carried him and his Wiſe along with him to Conſtantinople. Into his Room was Ildebald the Nephew of Theudas King of the Weſtrogoths, and Governour of Verona preferred, who killed Uræas the Siſters Son of Vitigis, and was himſelf killed by Vilas a Gepida. After him was made King one Erarick, by Birth a Rugian, and conſequently of a Gothick Nation, a Man of good reputation amongſt the Barbarians. He would for a good Reward have delivered up Italy to the Emperour, but after a ſhort Reign of five Months was killed by the Goths, who choſe Totilas to be their King. He proved a ſevere Scourge againſt the Greeks, then warring in Italy. He was the Brothers Son of Ildebald, a Man very Warlike and Active, as we have deſcribed his Actions at large. He carried himſelf with much Gallantry and Juſtice. He took Rome more than once, waſted Sicily, and at length died of his wounds, after the Battel fought with Narſes, received by one Asbades a Gepida. He Reigned eleven Years, and in him fortune ſhewed Fickleneſs and Inconſtancy. The next and laſt King was Teias the Son of Fridigern, who did wonders in Battel againſt Narſes, but was killed, and the Kingdom of the Goths in Italy received its period with him.

The Kingdom of the Goths in Italy wholly deſtroyed.

36. So was the Kingdom of the Oſtrogoths, overturned in Italy by the Vigilancy and Conduct of Narſes, that famous Eunuch, after it had continued ſome fifty nine Years. How this was done, hath been diſcourſed at large in our Account of the Wars of Juſtinian, to which here we have nothing to add, little occurring concerning the later Gothick Kings, but in reference to the Wars of Italy, managed againſt them, chiefly by Beliſarius and Narſes the Officers of that Emperour. The Goths after the Death of Teias were headed by Aligern his Brother, but without the Title of King, and they ſtrugled ſome time to no purpoſe, though they called in the Franks to their Aſſiſtence. Their Kingdom being deſtroyed, the Sovereignty and Command of Italy returned to Juſtinian the Emperour, who governed it by Narſes, as a Province of the Eaſtern Empire. Narſes having ſuppreſſed the Goths and driven out the Franks, ſet himſelf as to Actions of Piety and Religion, ſo to repairing Towns which had been demoliſhed in War, to the reſtoring of Buildings both ſacred and profane in Rome, and other places. But as of other things, ſo of theſe we have no particular Account, for the following Years are ſo barren of any Hiſtory, that as Sigonius witneſſeth, in all the Antiquities of Italy and the Weſt, nothing is more rude and uncertain, our beſt guides Procopius and Agathias having taken their leave. But, from the overthrow of the Gothick Kingdom in Italy, which happened in the Year DLIII. to the coming in of the Longobardi, or Lombards, which fell out in the DLXVIII. paſſed fourteen Years, all which time Narſes ſeems to have governed, and ſpent it well, as we are told, in mending what had been marred by the former Wars. In theſe Wars that great miſchiefs happened both to Places and Perſons cannot be doubted. That thoſe that were faithfull to the Emperour ſuffered much may eaſily be conceived, and particularly we are told of the Family of the Titiones. This Family flying their Countrey, loſt all they had, leaving a great Eſtate, and when the Goths were driven out, it ſeems made their Application to Juſtinian to be reſtored to their Lands and Poſſeſſions. Now it was a Rule in Law, that a Preſcription of thirty years was a ſufficient Bar againſt any pretender, let the Eſtate be come by how it would, and this it ſeems was pleaded by ſuch as had got into poſſeſſion. But the Emperour taking the caſe into conſideration, granted a Reſcript of Privilege to the ſaid Titiones, which broke the Preſcription; and this Reſcript, being the onely Monument of that dark time, Cujacius hath communicated to us, who received it as he tells us, from the moſt Learned and acute P. Galeſius a Spaniard. It being a Rarity in ſeveral reſpects, we ſhall not conceal it from the Reader. To Narſes it is directed thus.

Obſ. lib. 10. c. 12.

37. ‘ Flavius Juſtinian, Cæſar, Imp. Alanicus, Goticus, Wandalicus, Africanus, ever
‘ Auguſtus to Narſes the Patritian in Italy. With great anguiſh of mind we perceive,
‘ that our City of Rome having been in former times much emptied, hath continued ‘ long deſert, and in a manner deſolate, and that from it almoſt an infinite ‘ Number of Illuſtrious Families, have betaken themſelves to divers Climates of the ‘ World, to ſhun the direfull Cruelty and ſavage madneſs of the Goths and Wandals, ‘ amongſt which the moſt Eminent and moſt Noble Family of the Titiones, leaving
‘ the City in which it had happily flouriſhed before for many Ages, in the glorious

A Reſcript of Reſtitution granted to the Titiones by Juſtinian.

‘ ous Equeſtrian Order, was forced to fly to foreign Nations. Namely out of that ‘ Family, above an hundred and twenty Perſons paſſed over to the Vindelici and ‘ Retii,chuſing rather valiantly to undergoe hard Exile, than enjoying at home with
‘ the Enemy of the Roman Empire their own goods, to live in filthy and diſhoneſt ‘ ſlavery. Now we being deſirous to obviate ſuch Calamities and Miſeries diſpatched ‘ away the moſt glorious Beliſarius the Patritian into Italy againſt the Goths,that by ‘ him we might free the City,and Italy it ſelf, from ſo great Slavery, Captivity and ‘ Slaughter. And ſo it fell out, that in that Ingagement which Beliſarius had with ‘ Vitigis King of the Goths, and wherein he remained Victor, the King being taken ‘ Priſoner, the Strenuous, Valiant and Noble L. Galbinus Titio, valiantly diſcharging
‘ the Duty of a Tribune of Soldiers, died gloriouſly fighting, leaving three Sons, ‘ Aulus Anduatius, C. Tubero, and L. Reucardus, who all under thy Command in ‘ Italy, fought for us and the Roman Empire with the greateſt Fidelity againſt our ‘ Enemies. Wherefore ſeeing that in a Prince there can be nothing more Clement, ‘ nothing more Decent, nothing more glorious to be wiſhed for, than to have a ‘ reſpect for, and confer juſt and gratefull Favours on ſuch, whoſe Parents, by fighting ‘ manfully for the Empire and their Countrey, moſt religiouſly died; and ‘ whereas thoſe Brothers and their Progenitours were ſpoiled of their large Eſtate,
‘ by the wicked Enemies of the Roman Empire, which they enjoyed in the City, ‘ amongſt the Cemomani, eſpecially the Inſubres, Vercellenſes, Taurini and Lugares, ‘ for long ſpaces of time, We will, Command and require, as thou eſteemeſt our ‘ favour, and art zealous for our Honour, that having made a diligent ſearch, ‘ thou put them again into poſſeſſion of their Eſtates, and goods of their Anceſtours,
‘ having no regard at all to thoſe by whom they are ſeized,and reſtore theſe Brothers
‘ to the City, their Honours and Dignities; and eſpecially the Equeſtrian, in which ‘ they have flouriſhed with great Commendation from their Great and Great great ‘ Grandfathers, and to place them again in their Houſes, removing any that may ‘ detain them. For all thoſe who from the beginning take Poſſeſſion by force,
‘ and thereby lay unjuſt Foundations, do not acquire juſt Poſſeſſion by the uſe of ‘ time, neither they who derive action from them; and we will not that ſuch Occupiers ‘ be aſſiſted by any Preſcription, although of the longeſt time, from which ‘ we derogoate, and by our fulneſs of Power will have Derogation made, that the ‘ ſaid Brothers may ſerve us with the ſame Fidelity and Valour, which they have ‘ derived from their Parents. We will have therefore this our Pleaſure, or rather ‘ juſt and deſerved Reſtitution, inviolably obſerved under Penalty of an hundred ‘ pounds of Gold, and have commanded it to be ſtrengthned by our Imperial ‘ Seal. From the City of Conſtantinople on the Ides of February, in the ſix and ‘ thirtieth Year of our Reign, in the Year of our Lord DLXV, ſigned Juſtinian,
‘ and underneath,Procopius. This is very remarkable, and little or nothing is there ‘ farther of Italian matters, till the coming of the Lombards into Italy; of the occaſion ‘ thereof, and their progreſs till their ſetling therein a Kingdom, we have already ‘ diſcourſed amongſt matters relating to the Conſtantinopolitan Empire.

SECT. IV.

The Kingdom of the Lombards in Italy, from the Expiring of the Command of Duces, and the Promotion of Authari to be King, to the End of this Kingdom.

The Space of 206 Years.

Sect. 4.

Authari made a King.

1. THE Lombards having ſetled their Domination in Italy, were ten Years, as we have ſaid in the Hiſtory of the Empire, without a King and under Duces or Captains. But theſe ten Years expired, into the Dignity and Title of King they advanced Authari the Son of Clepho formerly mentioned, whom they ſirnamed Flavius, for the more grace of the matter, as Paul their Hiſtorian tells us, or to mollify the ſound of his barbarous Name, with a ſirname familiar and eaſie, as others conjecture; for this of Flavius became afterward common to all their Kings. Now all the Great Men contributed half they had to the maintenance of his Port and Dignity. And this is to be admired in the Government of the Lombards, that there was no ſuch thing amongſt them as Violence and Oppreſſion. No Treachery, no Compulſion was practiſed. No Man was deprived of what he had by Thefts or Robberies, but every one went about his buſineſs ſecurely, without the leaſt fear or apprehenſion of Danger. So Paul writes; but we remember that he himſelf was a Lombard, and ſpeaks poſſibly in ſavour of his own Nation, ſo he doth when he commends and applauds, for their Valour and Deportment, the Party which fought under Narſes, whereas Procopius tells us, that they were ſent back in diſgrace for their unrulineſs. And however he conceals their Faults, and commends them for ther great Juſtice and Moderation, it appears from Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, that after they were become Maſters of Italy, they did many horrid Acts; and upon this account Gregory the Great calleth them a moſt wicked Nation. But poſſibly the truth lies betwixt both Extremes.

Childebert being hired againſt the Lombards, he hath Money on both ſides.

2. Mauritius the Emperour, not being in a Condition himſelf, hired Childebert King of the Franks for fifty thouſand Solidi, to diſpoſſeſs them. The King with a vaſt Army breaks into Italy, but Paul ſaith, that the Lombards dealt with him by Meſſengers, and perſwaded him to take Money and be gone. He promiſed to return the Solidi to Childebert, with whom the Lombards made a League, but had work enough cut out for them by Droctulf, who being a Suebian or Alleman by Birth, for his Goodlineſs of his Stature had got the Honour of a Duke; but to revenge his Captivity had lately revolted to the Emperour, and carried over to his Party a conſiderable Number of their Men. Lying now at Broxillus a Town ſituate upon the Poe, thither Authari removed with his Army, and ſtraitly beſieged him. The ſiege continued long, and he held them to it; but at laſt he was compelled to quit his Quarters and betake himſelf to Ravenna; which having done, Authari took Broxillus and diſmantled it, and made truce with Smaragdus the Patritian the then Exarch of Ravenna, for three Years. This notwithſtanding, Mauritius ſent the ſecond Time his Ambaſſadours to Childebert, and perſwaded him to break the League and fall upon the Lombards. He invaded Italy, but as they were on their march toward him, the Alemans that were in his Army fell out with the Franks, and the Diſſention grew ſo great, that they parted and returned back without having any thing done.

Druckt-ulf, fidelis Auxiliator Druck & Trud. Trouwe fides, Trucktin Dominus, ſæpe occurrit in novo teſtamento vetere Germano. Angloſaxonibus noſtris Drickteu Dominus. Suedis Regina Drotning fortaſſe quia fides eis data eſt, ut qui fidem dederunt. Drudos, Drudi, Druides. Scribitur hoc nomen in ex. Allem. Tructolf. Truktolf. Thrutolf. contracte Truto.

Another fruitleſs expedition of Childebert.

Dreadfull Inundations.

3. At this time happened ſuch Inundations in ſeveral Parts of Italy, as the like had never been heard of ſince the Univerſal Deluge. Multitudes of Men, beſides other living Creatures, were deſtroyed. The River Atheſis flowed as high as the Windows of St. Zeno's Church near Verona, part of the Wall of which City was alſo broken down; and after two Months it periſhed almoſt all by Fire. The River Tiber was ſo overcharged, that it roſe higher than the very Walls of Rome, defaced ancient Buildings, and overturned the Granaries belonging to the Church, wherein great Quantities of Wheat were loſt. A Multitude of Serpents together with a Dragon of a vaſt Bigneſs, ſwom down the River (Paulus Diaconus ſaith through the City) into the Sea, where killed with the Saltwater, they were caſt upon the ſhore. This happened in the Month of November, and in January following a dreadfull Plague called Peſtis Inguinaria, from the Privy parts which it invaded, fell upon Italy, eſpecially Rome, and deſtroyed an infinite Number of People, on whom Arrows were ſeen to be darted from Heaven, if credit may be given to no leſs a Man than Pope Gregory. This was the Plague, as ſome would have it, wherewith Men being ſeized fell into great fits of ſneezing, and ſo ſuddenly died, whence the Cuſtome proceeded of praying, as ſtill we do, for ſuch as ſneeze. But that this was in uſe long before amongſt the Pagans, who invocated their Gods upon the ſame occaſion, is atteſted by Pliny, not to ſpeak of more ancient Writers, and therefore it could not take its riſe from the Mortality whereof we now ſpeak.

The Peſtis Inguinaria follows.

Nat. Hiſt. l. 28. Vide Bar.

4. Much about this time Authari King of the Lombards, ſent Euin the Duke of Trent to waſte Hiſtria, whence he brought very rich Plunder. Others of his ſubjects were then employed in beſieging Francio, one of Narſes his Captains, in the Iſland Amacina, where he had continued twenty Years, but after a ſiege of ſix Months, was forced to yield it up, and to depart with his Wife and Baggage to Ravenna. Authari aſwell as his People being much inriched began to look high, and asked the Siſter of Childebert King of the Franks to be given him in Marriage. Childebert receiving his Preſents, promiſed he would ſend her, but failed of his word being ſued to by the Gothick King of Spain, to beſtow her on him; and ſenſible it ſeems of the Injury, and how good Cauſe he had given Authari to be angry with him, he ſent to the Emperour, and promiſed now he would doe his utmoſt for removing the Lombards out of Italy. And he ſent an Army to make good his promiſe, but the Lombards, concerned now more than ordinary to ſhew their Valour, made greater ſlaughter of them, than ever was heard to have befaln that Nation, and very few returned home. Flavius Authari now incouraged by this Succeſs ſends his Ambaſſadours into Baioaria, to ask in Marriage Theudelinda the Daughter of King Garibald, who readily granted their ſuit, and after their return Authari himſelf makes a Journey thither Incognito to ſee her. Not long after his return, troubles ariſing betwixt Garibald and the Franks, Theudelinda with her Brother Gundoald retired into Italy, where Authari met her with Royal Pomp, and conſummated his Marriage at a Place called Sardis above Verona, on the Ides of May.

Franks deſtroyed.

Authari Marries.

Theude-linda, Populis mollis.

Gunduald, Benevolentia potens.

5. At this time, for what Cauſe is uncertain, Auſul the King's Kinſman was ſlain at Verona, and not long after Childebert, to gratify the Emperour Mauricius, ſent another Army of twenty thouſand Men to ſubdue the Lombards. Of theſe Men *Andual*d, Olo and Cedinus were the chief Captains, whereof Olo laying ſiege to the Caſtle of Bilitio, was ſhot with an Arrow under his Pap and died, many of his Countreymen in their Excurſions being met with and ſlain. Anduald with ſix inferiour Officers came before Milan, where he met with the Emperour's Ambaſſadours, who promiſed him relief after three days; but three and three they expected them to no purpoſe. Cedinus going the way toward the left hand took five Caſtles from the Inhabitants of which he exacted an Oath. They pierced by Placentia as far as Verona, and many Towns they demoliſhed contrary to Articles, leading away the Townſmen Priſoners. But the Summer now grew very hot, and the Franks not accuſtomed to the Italian Air, were much afflicted with the Dyſentery whereof many of them died, and having been three Months in the Countrey to little purpoſe, the Lombards ſecuring themſelves in their ſtrong holds, and their King particularly in Pavia, they were neceſſitated to return home, which they did with ſo great Difficulty, that they were firſt conſtrained to ſell their Cloaths off from their backs, and then their Arms to purchaſe Victuals in their paſſage. About this time it is that Paul thinks the famed Conqueſts of King Authari happened, as that through Spoletum he proceeded as far as Beneventum, and having made himſelf Maſter of all that Countrey, kept on his Progreſs as far as Rhegium, the laſt City of Italy, and neareſt to the Sicilian Iſland. There, as the ſtory went, ſtood a certain Pillar within the water, to which he rode ſo near as to touch it with the Point of his Lance, and ſaid, Thus far ſhall extend the Borders of the Lombards. The Pillar was reported to be ſtanding in the days of the Hiſtorian, and to be known by the Name of Authari his Column.

Anſ-huld, Gratiæ fidelis.

Another fruitleſs Expedition of the Franks.

The Conqueſts of Authari.

6. The firſt Duke of the Lombards which ſetled in Beneventum, was Zotto, who held the Government for twenty years. Authari ſent to make a League with Guntram King of the Franks, who referring them to Childebert his Nephew, e'er they could Zotto, Suavis nunc ſtultum ſic vocant Angl. a Sott mutatâ in pejus ſigni-

Sect. 4.

Authari dies.

Agilulf ſucceeds.

could finiſh their Negotiation, Authari dies at Pavia, by poyſon as was reported, on the Nones of September, after he had reigned ſix Years. Aſſoon as he expired, notice was ſent away to Childebert, and a Peace deſired of him, who at length yeilded unto the requeſt of the Lombards in this matter. They had ſo much Kindneſs for Theudelinda their Queen, that they permitted her to retain her Royal Port and Dignity, and to chuſe out of their own Nation a fitting Man to be her Husband, and their King; whereupon after good advice had with the wiſeſt of them, ſhe made choice of Agilulf Duke of Taurinum, the Kinſman of Authari, a very valiant Man, and in every reſpect fit for Government, who was married to Theudelinda and her Kingdom in the Month November, and afterward publickly crowned at Milan, in a full Aſſembly in May following. Agilulf, or Ago, as he was called for ſhortneſs, being confirmed in his Power, ſent Agnollus Biſhop of Trent into France, to redeem ſuch as had been taken Priſoners in the Territories lying about that City, and ſome he brought back, whom Bramhildis the Queen of the Franks, had ranſomed with her own Money. Euin alſo, the Duke of Trent, he ſent Ambaſſadour to make an Alliance and Confederacy with that Court, which he effected. The ſame Year happened a great Drought from January to September, which was followed by as great a Famine, and a great ſwarm of Locuſts covered the Countrey about Trent, of a greater bigneſs than uſual, but fed onely upon the Graſs, doing little prejudice to the ſtanding Corn.

ficatione ut in multis. Sweete tamen manet in priſtina ſignificatione apud Anglos. Soote apud Belgas.

*Agel-hulf, Liber Auxiliator. Idem contracte Ago, Paulo hic monente. Paulus Diaconus. lib.*4.*c.*1.

Agilulf his Succeſs againſt ſeveral Dukes.

7. Agilulf in the mean time puts to death Minulf, Duke of the Iſland St. Julian, for having revolted formerly to the Franks; and reduces Gaidulf, who had rebelled and fortified himſelf in his City of Pergamus. Though he gave Caution now that he would be quiet, yet he ſecured himſelf again in the Iſland Comacina, whither the King purſued him, and beating out his Men got into his Hands a Treaſure, which had been there laid by the Romans. But Gaidulf eſcaping him returned to Pergamus, where after ſome oppoſition he again made his peace, and was received into favour by Agilulf, who was alſo ſo fortunate about this time, as to reduce into order Ulfari, another Duke or Captain who had revolted. The ſame Year the Plague called Peſtis Inguinaria, again broke out at Ravenna and other places, killing as many Men as it had formerly done. Agilulf makes peace with the Avares, and a Winter follows ſo exceſſively cold, as the like had not been known. Moreover in the Countrey of the Brioni, bloud inſtead of water dropped from the Clouds, and Rivers ſeemed to flow with it as preſages of thoſe Miſeries, which were ſhortly again to fall upon Italy, the Peace being broken. For not long after Romanus the Patritian and Exarch of Ravenna goes and viſits Rome, and in his return takes in ſeveral Cities, that had belonged to the Lombards. Agilulf inraged hereat, marches ſpeedily from Pavia, with a ſtrong Power of Men, and lays ſiege to Peruſium, wherein lay Mauriſio a Duke of his own Nation who had revolted to the Romans. Him he took and put to death, poſſibly becauſe he had betrayed the Towns lately mentioned into the Hands of the Exarch; and he caſt them at Rome into a very great fright, particularly Gregory the Biſhop, from whoſe Writings it appears, that the Army of the Lombards invaded alſo the Territories of that City, and did great Miſchief, though Paul the Hiſtorian paſſes all by, and tells us he ſetled his matters, and returned after the taking of Peruſium unto Pavia. Gregory was conſtrained to break off his Cuſtome of preaching, and betake himſelf to the Law of the City, the Liberty and Safety whereof he was forced to purchaſe with Money, and through the Intervention of Theudelinda the Queen, made a firm Peace for his Romans.

Minn-ulf, Fæminis Auxiliator. A Man. Fæmininum Menne, nam quod Angli hodie dicunt in plurali Men, antiquis erat Mannum. Inde Meerminne, maris fæmina & nutrix, fæminam per excellentiam & Minnen fæminarum amore tangi, id enim Grotio monente proprie & antiquitus ſignificat.

Gaid-ulf Conjugis Auxiliator.

Ulf-ari, Auxilii Dominus; Welf-hari, Luporum Dominus.

Mauriſch, Niger.

Vide Baron.

8. From an Epiſtle of this Biſhop to Conſtantina the Empreſs, it appears that the Miſeries which the Emperour's Subjects in theſe Parts endured under his cruel Officers, were as great as any of them almoſt ſuffered from the Barbarous Lombards. The Burthen of the Taxes and Impoſitions were ſo heavy upon thoſe of Corſica, that they were forced to ſell their very Children to make Money, and all little enough to ſatisfie the Ravenous Collectours, which not able to bear, they fled to the Lambards in Italy, and in a manner left the Iſland deſolate. In that of Sicily one Stephen the Chartulary of the Sea Coaſts committed ſuch Rapines, as the Biſhop affirms all his particular Acts of Violence and Injuſtice could not be contained in one Volume; and deſires her to be a means to the Emperour, that thoſe things might be redreſſed for the preventing of Judgments otherwiſe like to fall upon himſelf, and his Sons, and that Italy might rather want ſupplies of money, than that they ſhould be raiſed in that ſinfull manner. From Gregory his Writings it is farther evident, that the Emperour's Miniſters who being at a great

Lib. 4. *Ep.*33. Indict. 13.

The Emperour's Officers drive his Subjects to revolt.

diſtance

Sect. 4.

diſtance from their Maſter, promiſed themſelves impunity in their evil courſes, oppoſed him in his endeavours for making peace with the Lombards, who, whatever Paul the Deacon hath written, for two years and more waſted the Roman territories with fire and ſword, and did great miſchief in Campania, where many Captains being taken, he took care for the redeeming of ſuch as were too poor to pay their Ranſome, ſeveral Prelates of this time contributing to ſo good a work. In the third year, having often attempted to make a Peace, at length he obtained a Truce, with hope that the King would at length ſign the whole Treaty; but not willing to be cheated with good words and fair promiſes, he orders all his Friends to ſtand upon their Guard. This Truce continued till the year following, and then a Peace was made, or another Truce rather, ſeeing it ſcarcely deſerves the name of a Peace, which was to endure but for two years, and yet the Biſhop rejoycing that poor Italy ſhould have but ſome time to breathe in, by Letters ſtill extant gives the King thanks that he had heard his petition. That this Peace he ſo much rejoyced in was in effect almoſt as good as none appears from this; after the ſigning of the Treaty he ſtill complains of his being preſſed with the ſword of the Barbarians, beſides the pains of the Gout and other loads of Cares that lay heavy upon him. The reaſon was this: though Agilulf the King had ſworn poſitively, yet Arnulf the Duke of Spoletum would not ſwear but with reſtrictions, and upon conditions, which caſt the good Biſhop into great fears again, as appears by his Letter written to Theodorus the Curator of Ravenna, wherein he alſo expreſſeth the Jealouſie of King Agilulf that he favoured too much the Cauſe and Party of the Exarch being indeed Mediatour betwixt them.

Gregory Biſhop of Rome makes a Peace with the Lombards.

Lib. 7. Ep. 30. Indict. 2.

Arenulf idem quod Ari-ulf, ſed à plurali, Honoris Auxiliator. In voc. Alem. Arolf.

Lib. 7. Ep. 102. Indict. 2.

9. About this time a blazing Star was ſeen for a month together, at morning and evening. Not long after, Euin Duke of Trent died, and was ſucceeded by Gaidoald a very good and religious man. The Baioarii in thoſe days fell upon the Sclavi with two thouſand men, but were all met with and put to the Sword by Cacanus; and now firſt of all, ſaith our Authour, were wild Beaſts reſembling Horſes and Oxen, brought firſt into Italy, and gazed on as wonders by the people. Not long after Cacanus King of the Hunnes ſent and made a League with Agilulf at Milan, and Romanus the Patritian dying, Gallicinus ſucceeded him as Exarch, and made peace alſo with this King, as alſo did Theuderick, King of the Franks. Agilulf had the more reaſon to embrace the amity of his Neighbours, becauſe his own Subjects indangered his Eſtate at home. For Zangrulf Duke of Verona rebelled, whom he over-powered and put to death, as alſo Gaidulf Duke of Pergamus, whom having twice ſpared, he now took in the ſame fault again; as alſo Warnecaut, whom that he might by this ſeverity give ſome ſtop to this growing miſchief, he commanded to be executed at Pavia. Much about this time another great Plague ſeized Ravenna and other maritime places, and the following year a great mortality to the people that lived near Verona: Spears, as it were, of bloud were ſeen in the Air, and the Nights were as light as Day. The year following Ariulf, who had ſucceeded Faroald in the Dukedom of Spoletum died, and Faroald's two Sons contending who, ſhould poſſeſs his Father's place, Theudelap obtained the Victory and It together. Zotto the Duke of Beneventum in like manner dying, King Agilulf ſent one Arigis to ſucceed him, a Kinſman of Giſulf Duke of Forum Julii, whoſe Sons he had brought up. Shortly after, the Daughter of Agilulf was together with Godeſcalck her Husband, of the City of Parma, taken priſoner by ſome of the Exarch's men and carried to Ravenna, her Father buſying himſelf in gathering together Ship-Carpenters, which he ſent to Cacanus, King of the Avares, to make him ſome Veſſels, wherewith he tranſported men, and made himſelf Maſter of a certain Iſland in Thrace.

Gaide-wald, conjugi Imperans.

Tunc primùm Caballi ſilvatici & Bufali in Italiam delati Italiæ populis miracula fuerunt.

Zangr-ulf, Infirmis Auxiliator.

Warne-gaut, cuſtos Auri.

F[illegible]-wald, familiæ parens, Faro idem contracté.

Theud-tolap, ad populum accurrens.

Argis, Honore fortis.

Giſel-ulf, Comitum Adjutor.

Gode-Schalck, Dei Servus.

Nam Deum non aliter quam Bonum nominare mos erat Germanis.

Scalck, Servus in novo fœdere ſæpe. Hinc Marſchalck & alia.

10. In the mean time Theudelinda the Queen diverts her ſelf with magnificent Buildings. At Modicia twelve miles from Milan, ſhe cauſed to be erected a beautifull Church, which ſhe dedicated to St. John Baptiſt, and richly endowed it, in the ſame place where formerly Theodorich King of the Goths had built a Palace, it being near the Alpes, and cool and temperate in the heat of Summer. In the ſame Town ſhe alſo made a Palace for her ſelf, wherein ſhe cauſed to be painted the Atchievements of the Lombards, which paintings plainly ſhewed that at this time they cut their Hair, and ſhaved all up from the Neck to the upper part of their Head, their Locks hanging down upon their Faces to their Mouths, which they parted and laid on each ſide their Foreheads. Their Cloaths, ſaith Paul, were looſe and for the moſt part of Linen, ſuch as the Angli-Saxons wear, having large Seams and interwoven with various Colours. Their Shoes were open almoſt to the end of their Toes, and buttoned or laced together. Afterward they began

The Queens magnificent Buildings.

The Habit of the Lombards.

Poſtea vero cœperunt hoſis uti ſuper quas equitantes tubrugos birreos mittebant. l. 4. c. 23.

Padua demoliſhed by them.

began to wear Hoſe, over which when they rode they drew a ſort of Breeches called Tubrugi birrei, but this faſhion they received from the Romans. Hitherto the City of Padua had valiantly ſtood out againſt them, but now it was all burnt, and by order of King Agilulf, levelled with the ground, the Garriſon Souldiers being permitted to goe to Ravenna. Agilulf his Ambaſſadours returning from Cacanus brought the ratification of a perpetual Peace and Amity made with the Avares, who ſent theirs alſo to the Kings of the Franks, requiring them in the League made betwixt the two Nations, to comprize alſo the Lombards. Now did the Lombards, Avares and Sclavi invade Hiſtria, which they waſted with fire and ſword, at what time Theudelinda bare a Son to Agilulf, whom being born in the Palace of Modicia, they named Adaloald. After this the Lombards took the Caſtle of Mount Silex, and much about the ſame time Gallicinus being beaten from Ravenna, Smaragdus returned, who had formerly been Patritian, as Paul calls him, or Exarch of that City for the Emperour.

Adal-wald, nobilitate pollens. Idem contractè, ut monet Paulus Ado.

11. That ſort of Peace which we find was made betwixt Agilulf, Gregory the Roman Biſhop, and the Exarch, was openly broken by the latter, who took Parma, and therein Godeſcalck and his Wife, the Son-in-law and Daughter of the King; at which time alſo he ſent ſome Troops and ſeized on Brexillum, which had been forſaken of the Lombards. Agilulf, as he had reaſon, was very much concern'd, and reſolved to ſet upon the Romans with greater fury than ever, and take from them thoſe Towns which the Arms of fierce Alboin had left unconquered. From Milan then in the month of July he ſet forward and laid ſiege to Cremona, being aſſiſted by the Sclavi, which Cacanus King of the Avares had ſent him, and took it on the nineteenth of Auguſt. He levelled it with the ground as he had done Padua before, and then turned upon Mantua, the Walls of which he ſo long battered alſo, that he took it about the middle of September, ſack'd it and defac't it in a lamentable manner. Afrighted hereat, they that held the Caſtle of Vulturnia yielded it up, and thoſe that had ſeized on Brexillum ſet fire to it and departed. Matters thus proceeding, the King's Daughter was ſet at liberty by Smaragdus the Exarch, who by command of Mauricius the Emperour, had ſucceeded Callinicus, together with her Husband, and all that belonged to her; and a Truce was made from the month of September till the April following. The King's Daughter from Ravenna went to Parma, and falling into Travail, thereof died, to the no ſmall diſcontentment as well of her Father as her Husband.

Cremona levelled.

Mantua defaced.

Paulus Diaconus de Geſtis Longobard. l. 4. c. 29.

A Truce betwixt Agilulf and the Exarch.

12. So great were the Troubles in Italy betwixt the Exarchs of the Emperour and the Lombards, that the people were miſerably haraſſed betwixt them, and little or no reſt could they have by virtue of any Treaty or Truce that could be made. Gregory the Biſhop of Rome having a deep ſenſe of theſe miſeries, and having often in vain expected aid from Conſtantinople, when he heard of the death of Mauricius rejoyced, and ſent away ſpeedily a Meſſenger with Letters to claw Phocas the Murtherer and his Wife, that he might obtain ſome effectual means for reducing the Lombards into order, and quieting the Countrey; and on the twenty fourth of April the Images of Phocas and his Wife were ſolemnly brought to Rome, and after the Senate and Clergy had made their Prayers for their proſperity with great joy, the Biſhop cauſed them to be placed in the Palace, in the Oratory of St. Cæſarius the Martyr. About this time Theodelind bare a Son to Agilulf, whom he called by the name of Adaluald, being Chriſtened upon Eaſter-day. Now the Truce was at an end, and an heavy war ſeemed to threaten the Exarchate of Ravenna, when yet Agilulf conſidering how hard the enterpriſe of taking that City would be, ſtill gave his conſent that the Truce ſhould be renewed. And there was great need of it both in reſpect of the preſent ſeaſon, and the ſtate and condition to which Italy had been before that reduced. The Summer was ſo exceſſive hot and dry that all the Corn was burnt up and ſpoil'd, and ſuch a dreadfull cold Winter followed, as in a manner deſtroyed all their Vines.

Exaudi Chriſte. Phocæ Auguſto & Leontiæ Aug. vita. Adal-wald, Nobilitate pollens, idem contractè Ado ut monet Paulus.

The Truce renewed.

13. But ſuch had been the lamentable Eſtate of poor Italy for ſeveral Years before, that this might ſeem to give the laſt blow to it already in a dying Condition. So Gregory the Roman Biſhop, who died this very year, in his Expoſition of the Prophecy of Ezekiel, deſcribes it to us. "We every where ſee nothing "but mourning, hear nothing but grones, Cities are deſtroyed, Caſtles demoliſhed; "the Countrey depopulated; the whole Land reduced into a Deſart. In the fields "there are no Husbandmen, in the Cities no Inhabitant, and yet the ſmall Remainders of Mankind, are even now ſtruck at without Intermiſſion; ſome led "into Captivity, ſome maimed, and others ſlain. And in what plight Rome is, "though once the Miſtreſs of the World, we ſee, even ſpent with great and manifold

Vide Baron.

“ fold miſchiefs, by loſs of Citizens, Incurſion of Enemies and frequency of Threats. “ All potent Perſons are taken away from her. Where is now the Senate? Where “ is the People? All order of Dignity in her is extinct, and yet as that remains “ every day the Sword, daily innumerable Tribulations do preſs her, and after “ that men fail the very Walls do fall. So dreadfull a face of things was in Italy, the effect of the late Conqueſt, for when the Victory is obtained, and the Countrey won, the miſeries of the conquered People are not then ended but begun, more grievous are the courſes which Conquerours take to preſerve, than thoſe whereby they firſt obtained. But now Agilulf by means and perſwaſion of his Wife eſpecially, ſeems to be well inclined for peace, and applies himſelf to other Methods, tending to ſettle and ſecure that in his Family by love, which hitherto had been kept by terrour.

Agilulf makes his Son a Child King.

Tribute to the Franks bought off.

Paulo Balneum Regis & Urbs vetus. Paulus ubi ſuprà, c. 33.

Agilulf enlarges Ferrara.

Truce with the Exarch renewed.

14. He began to think of his own Mortality, and how he might provide for the ſecurity of his young Son Aldonald, which at length he concluded would be beſt effected, by ſetting the Crown upon his Head in his own life time. For this purpoſe he aſſembled the Eſtates together at Milan, where in the open Cirque the Infant was ſaluted King by the People, in the Preſence of the Ambaſſadours of Theodebert King of the Franks, and inveſted with Royal Ornaments. With the Franks the Peace was renewed, and a perpetual League ſworn on both ſides, a more joyfull day was never ſeen in Italy, ſo bright and pleaſant a Sun-ſhine, after ſo great and terrible a Tempeſt. But though a League, as we ſaid, was made with the Franks, it was upon very uneven Terms. For the Lombards paid to the Franks, and ſo had long done a yearly Tribute, which Agilulf diſdaining, as much below him who had made himſelf famous by ſo many Victories, ſent three Ambaſſadours with abundance of money into Gall, wherewith the Principal Courtiers were ſo bribed, that Clothair the King was perſwaded for thirty thouſand Solidi to ſell it, and releaſe the Nation for the time to come. There was much about this time ſome Action betwixt the King's and the Exarch's Forces, for the Lombards as ſoon as the Truce was out, ſuddenly ſurprized Orbitum and Balneoregium belonging to the Romans. But Smaragdus the Exarch got them reſtor'd, and for twelve thouſand Solidi, the Truce to be renewed for another year. Being now ſecure and at his eaſe he began a worthy work, for whereas hitherto Ferrara had been but an inconſiderable Village, but very conveniently ſeated upon the River Padus, or Poe, he compaſſed it about with walls, and brought it into ſuch Reputation, that it daily increaſed as well in bigneſs as fame, and afterward became the ſeat of moſt potent Princes, and ſo hath a long time continued. This ſame year, which was the ſix hundred and ſixth of our Lord, died Boniface the Third, Biſhop of Rome (the Succeſſour of Sabinian, as he of Gregory the Great) and Boniface the Fourth of that Name ſucceeded him. He was conſecrated in the Month of Auguſt, and in November following the Truce betwixt the King and the Exarch was renewed for three years longer.

The Duke of Forum Julii ſlain by the Hunnes.

Giſel-ulf, Comitum adjutor.

Vide Paulum Diaconum hujus Eccleſiæ qui rem fusè narrat. lib. 4. c. 38.

15. For two years following though Italy reſted from war, yet was it ſorely afflicted by Famine and Sickneſs; the Effects of too exceſſive moiſture by reaſon of abundance of Rain. In that following, a Peace and Confederacy was made betwixt Agilulf and the Emperour Phocas, which continued for about two years, ſo long as the Tyrant lived. He being ſlain by Heraclius, John Lenugius a Patritian, was ſent to ſucceed Smaragdus at Ravenna, who being a Man of a peaceable diſpoſition, and finding Italy in quiet, laboured earneſtly ſo to keep it, by the ſame means his Predeceſſour had done, conſtantly renewing the Truce with the Lombards, as there was occaſion. By this means Italy continued in good repoſe for four or five years more, till it was diſturbed again upon a foreign Account, after this manner. Cacanus the young King of the Hunnes, impatient of reſt and greedy of booty, with a ſelect Party of Soldiers, came out of Pannonia, and fell on a ſudden into the Dukedom of Forum Julii. The news thereof being brought to Gilulf the Duke, he was not at all wanting to himſelf, but gathering an Army, as he could, met the Hunnes, and adventur'd to give them battel, wherein his Fortune anſwered not his Courage, for being incompaſſed by the Multitude of the Enemy, he was ſlain in the Place with almoſt all his Men. This being known, Romilda the Duke's Wife with his Sons, and the choice of the Nobility ſhut up themſelves in Forum Julii, and the other Towns were reinforced by others, that fled out of the Countrey. The Hunnes having waſted all at their pleaſure, at laſt came before Forum Julii, and laid ſiege to it. Here it happened that Romilda the Dutcheſs getting a ſight of Cacanus from the Walls, was ſo taken with the beauty of the young man, that falling deſperately in love with him, ſhe offered to him by a Meſſenger in caſe he would marry her, to deliver the Town into his hands. He promiſed her Marriage, and accordingly got into the Town, but then breaking his word he plundred and burnt the place, made the Lombards priſoners, and giving her the ſatisfaction of enjoying him for one Night, then delivered her up to twelve Hunnes to be ſatiated with what ſhe had deſired, and at laſt, thinking her not fit to live, cauſed her to be hanged upon a Gibbet. Her Daughters fared better for their Chaſtity, being ſpared by the Hunnes, who thought they ſtunk, becauſe out of deſign they had bound putrified Chickens betwixt their Breaſts.

Romilda the Dutcheſs deſervedly put to death.

Hæc inſuper exprobrando inquiens, talem dignum eſt maritum habere.

Tato, Taſo, & Tazo apud Procopium Trazo coacervator.

Caco contractum ex Caganhaut ut in voc. Alleman, aut Cakanhart, Cibo ſimile id eſt dulce.

The Exarch killed.

Eleutherius, ſent in his room.

Gundualdͅ, Benevolentia potens.

Agilulf dies.

Theude-linda, Populis mollis.

16. The Sons of the Duke, Tato, Caco, Rodoald and Grimoald, when they perceived the King's treachery privately withdrew themſelves and reſolved to fly. Grimoald the Child being not able, as they concluded, to ſit his Horſe, one of them was about to kill him leſt he ſhould alive fall into the Enemies hands. But he crying out, and promiſing to ride as faſt as the beſt of them, he ſet him upon his Horſe without any Saddle and bade him follow. But he could not ride ſo faſt, but the reſt eſcaping he was overtaken by an Hunne, and being by him carried back toward the Camp did a thing which one would not have expected from a Man, much leſs from him. For as the Trooper went before him with the Child's Horſe in his hand, he gave him with his Sword ſuch a blow on the Head that he left him for dead upon the ſpot, and turning his Horſe he put him to his full ſpeed, and ſo at length reached his Brothers. The Hunnes departing out of the Dutchy, led away Captives many Men, Women and Children, promiſing to beſtow them in convenient places in Pannonia, but when they came upon the Borders, perfidiouſly put all the Men of ripe age to death, and led away the Women and Children. After their Retreat, the Sons of Giſulf returned, and Tato and Caco the eldeſt ordered the matters relating to Government. While this diſaſter happened to the Lombards they at Ravenna were not in quiet, where John the Exarch bearing himſelf very haughtily, and laying on the people heavier burthens than formerly they underwent, was by the Multitude killed in the Palace with ſuch Judges as he had called together for deciding Cauſes. Neither were the Affairs of Campania more ſettled, where John Conſinius the Duke of Naples, contrary to his Faith formerly given to the Emperour, ſeized that City, and with a ſtrong Garriſon held it out againſt him. The News hereof being carried to Conſtantinople, Heraclius ſent as Exarch into Italy, one Eleutherius a Patritian, and his Chamberlain, a man of great wiſedom and vertue. This ſame year was too remarkable for ſeveral other accidents. In Auguſt there was a great Earthquake, and this was followed by as great a Plague, a kind of Scab called Elephantia, which ſo disfigured the Faces of the diſeaſed, that they could not be known from dead Bodies. Three eminent perſons alſo died, the Biſhop of Trent, Duke Gundoald the Brother of Theodelind, and King Agilulf himſelf, after he had reigned twenty five years: a perſon famous for his Wars, and as acceptable upon the account of his Orthodox Religion. This was the DCXV. year of our Lord.

Adaluald his Son King after him.

Agilulfus Rex qui & Ago eſt appellatus.

Paulus Diac. lib. 4. c. 43.

A baſe Act of Gregory the Emperour's Officer.

Gros-hulf, Grande Auxilium. Rodwald, Quietis compos. Grim-wald, Iræ potens. Ar-gis, Honore fortis.

17. Agilulf (or Ago) being dead, the Kingdom was confirmed to Adaluald his Son, who reigned under the Government of Theodelind his Mother. No Wars now are heard of, ſhe as became her Sex applying her ſelf more to the works of Religion than thoſe of Mars, for which ſhe is deſervedly celebrated by Church-men. But her Neighbours could not be quiet. There was one Gregory a Patritian who governed thoſe parts for the Emperour which lay near the Dutchy of Forum Julii. He pretended great kindneſs to Tato the Son of the deceaſed Giſulf, made him believe he would adopt him for his Son, and enticed him to Optigerium, the place where he lay to perform the Ceremony by cutting his Beard according to the Lombard cuſtome. But having got the poor young man into the Town, with Caco his Brother and others of their followers, he cauſed the Gates to be ſhut, and then ſent Souldiers to fall upon them, whom they repulſed and ſo long defended themſelves, till being purſu'd from Street to Street they killed many they had to doe with, and at laſt were themſelves ſlain; which great atchievement being performed, Gregory ſent for Tato his Head, and then cut off his Beard to perform his godly promiſe. The report of this villany being ſpread abroad, Graſulf their Uncle haſted and ſeized on the Dutchy, Rodoald and Grimoald being yet ſo young as not to be fit for the management of matters, who within a while, for that their Uncle was, or they ſo thought or pretended, very ſevere to them, fled to Arichis the Duke of Beneventum, with whom they had been brought up in their Infancy, who kindly entertained them. The ſame year, which was next to the death of Agilulf, Eleutherius the Exarch came to Ravenna, where he made inquiſition after the death of John, and puniſhed with death ſuch as were found guilty of the Murther.

Thence by the way of Rome, where he was honourably received, he went to Naples, where not being received, he beſieged the other John Conſinius in the City, which being at laſt conſtrained to ſurrender, he was put to death, and pardon was granted to the Citizens, who were forced to receive a new Governour.

Eleutherius the Exarch thinks to uſurp.

Is ſlain by his Soldiers.

18. With this Succeſs Eleutherius was ſo puffed up as to forget that Vertue and Moderation once ſuppoſed to be prevalent in him, and to approve that Vice in his own Perſon, which he had ſo declaimed againſt, and puniſhed in other Men. Having opportunity, the great Corrupter of Mankind, by reaſon of the great diſtance betwixt theſe Countries and the Emperour, he reſolved to make for the Sovereignty of Italy, and knowing he muſt have the Soldiers at his beck to aime at this, he paid them their full wages, a thing they had not been much uſed to, and by all other means poſſible endeavoured to oblige them. While he muzed and contrived how to accompliſh this great Deſign, the death of Deuſdedit the Biſhop, preſented him as he thought with a fit occaſion to begin the Work. In the interval, before the Election of another he reſolved to ſeize on that City, and led his Men thitherward to get him poſſeſſion, but in the way met with the News of Boniface the Fifth his Promotion, which made him alter his Councils, and make a flattering Speech to the Army, by which and great promiſes for this time he inveigled them, and aſſumed the Title of King, which to have farther confirmed, by inveſting himſelf with Royal Enſigns of Majeſty, he would go on to Rome, the fitteſt place he ſaid of all others to receive them. But when they were come as far as Luceoli, the Soldiers had better conſidered of the matter, and upon better thoughts deteſting the Treachery fell into a Mutiny, which grew to that height, that they ſlew him as a Traitour on the twenty fourth of December, and returning to Ravenna, ſent his Head to the Emperour. The Emperour Heraclius, named Iſaacius a Patritian, his Exarch in his Room for the Government of Italy; and now being reſolved of a War with Perſia, made peace with Cacanus the Hunniſh King. Some four years after, one Euſebius came or pretended to come Ambaſſadour from the Emperour, about ſome weighty affairs to King Adaluald. He getting intimacy with him one day when the King came out of the Bath, either following the Directions of Heraclius, or on his own Head gave him ſomething to drink, which drove him into a Melancholy or Dotage. Perceiving this Plot to have taken, he made uſe of his Youth and Madneſs, and feeding his Extravagant fancy, perſwaded him to kill all his Nobles for his own ſecurity. He followed his Advice, and twelve he procured to be ſlain, which gave ſuch an Alarm, that the Lombards fearing the miſchief would increaſe, accuſed him as one that acted the part not of a King but of a Tyrant, and the year following growing more tumultuous, removed him and his Mother from the Government; which done they put into his place Arioald the Duke of Taurinum, who had married Gundeberg the Siſter of Adaluald. A.D. DCXXIIII.

Adaluald depoſed, and Arioald made King.

Ar-walt, Honoris tenax.

19. This Revolution caſt the whole Kingdom of the Lombards into very great Troubles, all that were concerned not conurring with thoſe that did the Fact. The Biſhops beyond the Poe were earneſt for Arioald, and laboured to draw the reſt to their ſide. But Honorius the Biſhop of Rome, and Iſaacius the Exarch, either by his procurement, or the Inſinuations of Theodelind were for reſtoring Adaluald, and the rather induced, becauſe the New King was of the Arian perſwaſion. Iſaacius with an Army endeavoured his Reſtitution, and Honorius wrote to him, that as ſoon as he had done his work he ſhould ſend the Diſſenting Biſhops to anſwer their Rebellion at Rome. But Iſaacius failed of his Deſign, and Arioald kept his poſſeſſion, governing himſelf with that prudence and temper, that notwithſtanding the Attempts of the Exarch, yet he was ſo true to the Intereſt of his Kingdom, as not to break the Peace with the Romans. The ill Succeſs caſt Theodelind into ſo great a Fit of Melancholy, that, not able to bear up againſt it, it brought her into a Conſumption of Spirits, and this to her Grave the year following. She was much lamented by all good Men, for her Excellent qualifications both of body and mind, and above all the great reſpect ſhe bare to all things Sacred. Several years did Arioald Reign with great Peace both at home and abroad, till ſomething happened in his own Court, which gave him and his Family great diſturbance. One Adalulf a Nobleman ſolicited his Queen Gundeberga for unlawfull pleaſures, and was with much Scorn and Indignation rejected. He fearing ſhe would accuſe him, to prevent her, got to the King, and tells him a formal ſtory, how Tato the Duke of Etruria, had conſpired to take away his Life, and marry the Queen. Arioald, burning with rage and jealouſie, ſhut up his Wife cloſe cloſe priſoner in the Caſtle of Amellum, where ſhe continued three years, till ſhe was releaſed and reſtored to her former reputation. For Cletair King of the Franks taking pity of her, ſent and expoſtulated with her Husband for condemning a Lady deſcended of the Royal Bloud of the Franks, and deſpoiling her of her dignity without any cauſe or crime committed. Arioald anſwered it was not without cauſe, to whom Anloald one of the Ambaſſadours replied, that they would agree with him if he would but permit one of her Friends to try it with her Accuſer in a ſingle Combat. The cuſtome of the Lombards was, as indeed of all theſe Northern Nations, to decide Controverſies concerning Accuſations in that manner; therefore he not being able to refuſe the offer, Aripert her Kinſman produced one Pitto, Paulus Diaconus calls him Carell, as her Champion, who got the better of Adalulf, and ſo the Queen's innocency being clear'd, ſhe was reſtored to her former Eſtate and Honour. And this added to her Fame, that ſhe out-lived her Husband, who died ſome four years after, and had the honour to make another choice both for her ſelf and the Kingdom.

A. D. 627.

Gundiberga, Benevola hoſpita.

Anſ-huld, gratiæ fidelis.

Ar-preht, honoris copioſus.

Agi-hulf, ſibi auxiliator.

Arioald dies.

Rothari choſen King.

Wreſts the Alpes Cottiæ out of the Emperour's hands.

Gives a grievous defeat to the Exarch.

Iſaacius the Exarch dies.

Theodorus Calliopa in his room.

Rot-hari, quietis dominus.

20. For Arioald dying without Iſſue, the Eſtates aſſembled about an Election, and giving her the ſame reſpect as they had done to Theodelind of chuſing her ſelf an Husband, and the ſame a King for them, ſhe pitch'd upon one Rothari, fit every way for ſo great an Employment, but tainted alſo with the Arian Hereſie. There lay at this time within Italy and ſome Territories of the Lombards two Provinces, as yet ſubject to the Emperour; viz. the Alpes Cottiæ and Opitergium, with all the Towns adjoyning as far as Tarinſium. Rotharis or Rothari, as Paul the Hiſtorian calls him, with a great Army invaded the Alpes Cottiæ, and wreſted this rich patrimony out of the Emperour's hands, whence bending his Forces into Venetia he took Opitergium, and the other Towns by ſurrender. The Exarch being ſurprized, and not able ſo ſoon to get his Troops together as to doe any thing effectual for preſervation of theſe places, yet thought himſelf in honour obliged to fall with all violence he could upon the Dominions of the Lombards. Rothar was ſufficiently aware thereof, and having taken Peruſia, with greater numbers of Men haſted to Æmilia, and ſo homeward to give him battel, and found him out upon the borders at the River Scultamna. Here they engaged in Battel with this ſucceſs that eight thouſand of the Romans were ſlain and all the reſt fled: a Defeat of ſuch conſequence that it put an end to all Wars betwixt the Kings of the Lombards and the Exarchs, till the time of Luitprand. The chief Inhabitants about Opitergium having loſt their Dwellings and Eſtates, imitated the ancient Veneti and betook themſelves to the Æſtuaris of the Sea, and at the mouth of the River Planis built them a City, which after the Emperour's name they called Heraclia. Certain Countrey-men with their Cattel followed them, and becauſe they could not all be contained within the Walls of the new City, built themſelves a Town alſo which they named Egnilium. About this time Iſaacius the Exarch, having happily ſuppreſſed a Sedition raiſed at Rome by one Mauritius a Chartulary againſt him, died ſuddenly. The year following, his Death being known at Conſtantinople, Conſtans the Nephew of Heraclius, who having driven away Heracleonas, was owned Emperour by the Senate, ſent Theodorus Calliopa his Exarch into Italy.

The Edict of Rotharis.

Ann. Dom. DCXLIII.

21. Now arrived the ſeventy ſixth year from the Entrance of the Lombards into Italy, who all this while being more intent upon matters relating to War than Peace, and ſo concerned in ſecuring their publick Eſtate from their Neighbours without, that they ſcarcely had time to contend amongſt themſelves about private Intereſts, had never been governed by any written Laws but onely by Cuſtome and ſuch Rules as were kept in memory and deſcended by Tradition. But now having Peace abroad, as it ever happens, they became the more contentious at home, and eaſe and plenty made them quarrel and begat ſo many Suits that the former Cuſtomary Laws ſeeming inſufficient, Rothar applied himſelf to collect them in Writing, and adding to them many other Decrees to anſwer ſuch Caſes as they could not reach, he publiſhed them under the name of an Edict at Pavia, in the ſix hundred and forty third year of our Lord, with this Preface. "Here begins "the Edict which I have renewed with my principal Judges, I in the name of God, "King Rotharis, the moſt Excellent Man, the Seventeenth King of the Nation of "the Lombards, by the goodneſs of God, in the Eighth year of my Reign, and "the thirty eighth of mine Age, the ſecond Indiction, and after the coming of "the Lombards into the Province of Italy, ſince Alboin King at that time by Divine Clemency came, the ſeventy ſixth, happily, given at Pavia in the Palace. "How great our care and anxiety is and hath been for our Subjects, that hitherto “annexed doth declare. Then he tells how he was moved to make theſe Laws by the daily oppreſſions of the poor, and the inſolence of thoſe that had power to afflict their Neighbours, that every one might live in peace and keep what was his own without intrenching upon others. He concludes with a Sanction that theſe Laws and no others ſhould be in force, always ſaved and reſerved a power to himſelf to add thereto ſuch as by himſelf, or by ancient Men could be called to mind. He commands that ſuch Cauſes as were already ended ſhould not be called again in queſtion; but ſuch as were not yet decided, or from that preſent twenty ſecond day of November ſhould take their riſe, ſhould be ordered and determined according to this Edict. And this he commands in general, that no advantage be taken by reaſon of any fault of the Writer, and to prevent all inconveniences of that nature, credit ſhould not be given to any other Copies but ſuch as ſhould be written, approved or reviſed by Anſuald his Notary, who had ſufficient licence and authority in that behalf.

22. Some five years after the publication of this Edict died Arichis the Duke of Beneventum, after he had held the Dukedom fifty years, who left a Son, Aio by name, but he being a Man of a crazy Brain (Paul tells us by reaſon of a Potion given him by the Romans at Pavia) he commended to his Lombards, Radoald and Grimoald the Sons of the Duke of Forum Julii, who, as we ſaid, had fled to him, and now were in the flower of their Age, affirming it were better for them that they governed than Aio. Yet Aio ſucceeded his Father in the Government of the Samnites, as Paul calls them, and the other two obeyed him in all things as their elder Brother and their Lord. The following year the Saracens and the Sclavi invaded Italy. The Saracens came from Africk, who having much haraſſed the Iſland of Sicily led away multitudes of Captives. The Sclavi from Dalmatia, on which they had ſeized, paſſed over to Sypontus and waſted Apulia, where they encamped themſelves; and about their Camp digged Ditches, which they covered over with light Earth as if it had been firm Ground. Aio hearing of their Invaſion, with a party of Men, but without the knowledge of Radoald or Grimoald his Governours went out againſt them, and thinking to fall upon their Camp, he fell into one of the Ditches, and therein was overpowered and ſlain, after he had been Duke a year and five months. Radoald within a little time, hearing what had happened, gathers together a ſufficient power, and coming upon them more warily than the other had done, kills of them a great number, revenges the Death of Aio, and drives the reſt out of all the Dominions of the Dukedom, of which now he took the Title and the Protection. But he did not long enjoy the Honour, dying within leſs than two years, and left his Brother Grimoald his Succeſſour. The ſame year Olympius the Exarch having beaten the Saracens out of Sicily died of ſickneſs he had contracted by too much pains he had taken; which Conſtans the Emperour having underſtood, ſent for Theodorus Calliopa and ordered him once more to go Exarch into Italy. This was the ſame year that the Saracens took Rhodes, and caſt down the famous Coloſſe which was dedicated to the Sun, whereof we have already ſpoken: The ſix hundred and fifty firſt year of our Lord.

Lib. 4. c. 45.

Ay, inſulanus. Ai, Ei, inſula ab ovi ſimilitudine. Sic Grotius. Ea autem eſt Aqua Saxonicè, atque Inſula eſt Ealond nobis Iland, ab Ea Francicum Eau. c. 46.

The Saracens invade Italy. And the Sclavi.

Olympius the Exarch drives the Saracens out of Sicily and dies.

A. D. 651.

23. In that which followed King Rothari died, after he had obtained much honour both for the Wars he had managed, and the Laws he had made; and left Rodoaldus his Son his Succeſſour, a Man of a peaceable diſpoſition, making no Wars, but ſome religious Conteſts with the Orthodox Biſhops, being tainted, as his Father had been, with the Arian Hereſie. There is little or nothing memorable of him, but that after he had been King five years and ſeven days he was killed by a Lombard whoſe Wife he had debauched. He having left no Children, though Paul tells us he married Gundiberg the Daughter of Agilulf and Theudelind, the Eſtates met about a new Election, and the choice fell upon Aribert (or Aripert) the Son of Gunduald, who was Brother to Theudelind. Neither is there any thing memorable of him, but that he built at Pavia the Oratory of St. Saviour, and died after he had reigned nine years, ſaith Paul, although Sigonius allows him not above five at moſt. He moſt imprudently divided his Kingdom betwixt his Sons, two young Men, Bertarid (or Pertharit) and Godebert, or Gundebert, which gave occaſion to very great Commotions. Bertarid was to reign at Milan, and Godebert at Pavia. But the latter not content with the Part allotted him quarrelled with his Brother, and as in all ſuch ambitious practices is common from leſs to come to more, and at length nothing would ſatisfie him but the whole Kingdom; which though he himſelf by plain ſtrength could not compaſs, yet by the means of Friends he doubted not but at length to be poſſeſſed of the whole. He ſent Garibald the Duke of Taurinum to Grimoald the Duke of Beneventum to deſire his

King Rothari dies, and Rodoald his Son ſucceeds,

Rod wald, quietis compos.

And Aribert him,

*Ar-prebt, honoris copioſus. Paulus Diaconus, l.*4.*c.*53. Breht-reid, latè equitans. Berd, Brehd, Breed & noſtrum Broad idem. Reita eſt equitatus in Legibus. Goede-breht, bonorum copioſus. Gund-breht, benevolentia abundans.

Who divides his Kingdom betwixt his two Sons.

his help, and in caſe he would give him his utmoſt aſſiſtence, to offer him his own Siſter to Wife. But the Ambaſſadour acted quite beſides his Inſtructions, adviſing Grimoald to come himſelf, and to decide the Controverſie betwixt the two Brothers, by making himſelf Monarch of the Lombards, being as to Age more ripe, as to Counſel more prudent, and as to Strength , of greater Intereſt than either of them.

24. Grimoald being a man of an active and ambitious temper could not but liſten to him, and at length his ambition quite conquered other paſſions, ſo that he became a Competitour for the Kingdom, and to make himſelf a Title, with a very powerfull Army marched toward Pavia, having appointed his Son Romoald to be Duke of Beneventum in his ſtead. When he came to Placentia he ſent Garibald before to declare his coming to Godebert, who conſulting with Garibald about a fit place wherein to lodge Grimoald, he anſwered none was ſo fit as his own Palace for him, to whom he had promiſed his Siſter. Accordingly Grimoald came and was received into the Court, but Garibald that was the evil Inſtrument betwixt them, perſwaded the King that he ſhould not admit him to his preſence without having put on privy Armour, and then Grimoald he told on the other ſide, that except he came well prepared Godebert had a deſign and would kill him, wearing privy Armour for that purpoſe. Accordingly the next day when they came to meet, Grimoald found the King armed, and thinking it was upon deſign, as he had been informed, drew his Sword and ſlew him in the place, which done he made himſelf Maſter of his whole Dominion and all his Treaſures, though he left a young Son named Reginbert, whom his faithfull Friends concealed and reſerved, if it might be, to another time, Grimoald making no great inquiſition after him becauſe an Infant. Bertarid the other Brother, hearing how matters went, deſpaired of withſtanding ſuch an Adverſary as Grimoald, and ran away from Milan to Cacanus the King of the Avares, leaving his Wife Rodelind and Cunibert his young Son behind him, whom Grimoald baniſhed to Beneventum. As for Garibald the Authour of all theſe miſchiefs ſuch an end he had as he deſerved. For there was one of the Family of Godebert, little in ſtature but a Man of extraordinary courage and reſolution, who living in Taurinum, and hearing that he would come to Church on Eaſter Day, placed himſelf near the Font with a naked Sword under his Clothes, and as he came near the place, with all his might laid at him and ſlew him. He himſelf by the followers of Garibald was incompaſſed quickly and ſlain; but ſo he revenged the Death of Godebert his Lord. And with their two Lives Paul the Deacon concludes his fourth Book of the Geſts or Actions of the Lombards, to whom, as his Countreymen, he bears no ſmall affection.

Rom-wald vel Rum-wald, Fama potens.

Grimoald kills Godebert and ſeizes on the Kingdom.

Regin-breht vel Ragin-breht, Puritatis copioſus. Ragin & Regin idem quod Rein purus.

Garibald deſervedly ſlain.

25. Grimoald having killed the one Brother, and driven the other with his Wife and Son into baniſhment married their Siſter, and with great applauſe of the Lombards declared himſelf King; which done, he ſent back his fortunate Army to Beneventum , retaining onely the principal Officers to doe them honour. He did not doubt now to ſecure his Eſtate if he could but deſtroy Bertharid (or Pertharit) the other Brother, for which purpoſe he ſent to Cacanus, or the King of the Hunnes, requiring him upon pein of his diſpleaſure, and an abſolute rupture betwixt the two Kingdoms, to baniſh him his Dominions. Cacanus not thinking fit to be at difference at this time with his Neighbour, commanded the poor Prince to quit his Territories, which he perceiving he muſt out of neceſſity doe, and that he could not promiſe himſelf whereever he ſhould go any conſtant maintenance or effectual aſſiſtence, thought it moſt fit to goe to him who had the moſt reaſon of all to ſupply him, and ſent before him one Unulf his Friend to give him notice of his coming. Grimoald was very joyfull to hear of it, and commanded an Houſe to be furniſhed at Pavia every way fit for his Reception. But his Friends were too friendly, flocking in great numbers to him night and day and ſhewing ſo much kindneſs as caſt the Uſurper into a very great fit of jealouſie, which wrought ſo far that he appointed him a Guard, and the next night intended to make an end of him. Now it wonderfully happened that Bertarid had notice of the Deſign, and ſuch a ſagacious Wit as that of Unulf to aſſiſt him, by whoſe advice he changed his Cloaths, and paſſing by the Sentinels, got over the River, and ſo taking in the Paſtures ſuch Horſes as he could come by, with ſuch Companions as Unulf had provided him, eſcaped to Haſta, thence to Taurinum, and at laſt into France; where when Grimoald heard that he was arrived, he fretted much, as at a thing which had happened quite contrary to his expectations. Yet was he ſo generous and incomparably mercifull withall, that he did not onely not blame or quarrel with Unulf, but commended him highly for his conſtant fidelity to his Maſter, and gave him and another of his Servants leave, either to ſtay or go to him as he ſhould think convenient. The King of the Franks, to whom Bertarid made his application, was ſo touched with a ſenſe of his affliction, that the Year following he ſent a ſtrong Army, to replace him in his former condition. Grimoald buckled himſelf to reſiſtence, but perceiving he was too weak to graple with ſuch a Power, when ſtrength would not doe, he uſed Craft, and thereby became Superiour to his Enemies. He himſelf made as if he fled out of fear, but left his Camp well furniſhed with all Neceſſaries, eſpecially Wine in great Quantity, by which bait he hoped to catch the inconſiderate Franks. And ſo he did, for they coming and finding no body there but ſo good chear ready for them, inſtead of purſuing the Enemy fell on it, and when their Bellies and Heads were full, betook themſelves to their reſt. Grimoald having notice hereof, after the ſecond Watch, when they were in a dead ſleep, came upon them and made ſo great a ſlaughter, that he left very few of them alive, to carry home the News of the defeat.

Paulus Diac. Lib. 5. c. 2.

Idem ibid. c. 3, 4.

Cap. 5.

26. The year following, Conſtans the Emperour came into Italy, upon what account Opinions are various. Some, as we have already ſaid, thought him by terrible Dreams and a frightfull Conſcience, about his Brother whom he had murthered, driven from Conſtantinople to ſeek Diverſion. Others believed he departed from that City out of hatred to the Inhabitants, who bore him no good will upon the account of Religion. And ſome, as Anaſtaſius and Paul, were of opinion, that he came to drive the Lombards out of Italy. With a Fleet exceedingly well furniſhed he arrived at Tarentum, and thence led his Army to Beneventum, taking Luceria and ſeveral other Towns belonging to the Lombards in his way, and ſate down before it, reſolving to uſe all force and art imaginable, for ſtorming of it. Romoald the Son of Grimoald the King was now Duke thereof, who aſſoon as the Emperour approached, ſent away to his Father Seſuald who had been his Governour, to let him know the great danger he was in; and now refuſing to venture for the main chance, diverted the Beſiegers, as he could, by frequent Sallies, and obviating their Strategems and Deſigns. Grimoald receiving the News with all ſpeed he could got an Army together, and with as much haſte marched toward Beneventum, ſending the Meſſenger back with News of his coming, who being near his Journeys end, fell into the Hands of the Romans, who brought him to the Emperour's preſence. Conſtans demanding what he was and whence he came, he without concealing his buſineſs told him he was ſent by the King to give his Son notice of his coming, which caſt the Emperour into a mighty fear, and cauſed him to treat about Peace with Romoald, that before his Father's coming, he might get ſafe to Naples, for performing the conditions of which he received, Giſa the Siſter of Romoald as an Hoſtage. But to deceive him he commanded Seſuald to goe to the walls, and tell him nothing of his Father's approach, but on the contrary to affirm that he could not poſſibly give him any relief. He promiſed he would doe ſo, but coming to the walls and asking for Romoald, he bad him be of good comfort, for his Father would ſhortly be with him, being that Night to encamp at the River Sangius, deſiring him to be good to his Wife and Children, for theſe perfidious People would not ſuffer him to live. Accordingly the Emperour commanded his Head to be cut off, and with an Engine to be caſt into the Town, where Romoald cauſed it to be brought to him, and, having with Tears and Lamentations kiſſed it, to be decently buried.

C c. 6. & 7.

Conſtans the Emperour comes into Italy.

Jeſualdus Sigonio, Seſualdus autem Paulo. Sitswald, Sedum potens. Sigonius cum eſſet Linguæ Teutonicæ ignarus, in propriis nominibus ſæpe errat.

Idem. c. 8. Giſa contractum ex Giſelbreht (unde Gilbert) comitum copioſus.

27. Conſtans having done this great feat, for fear of Grimoald his coming departed for Naples, and in his way received ſome loſs by Tranſemund the Count of Capua, his falling on his Men, and taking them in a diſadvantageous Poſture. Whether to be revenged for this or for other reaſons, Saburrus one of his Nobility deſired he might have but twenty thouſand Men, ingaging with them to defeat Grimoald, of which the whole Court had ſo great apprehenſion. Grimoald being come to Beneventum, and having notice of this his undertaking, though he thought at firſt to have gone againſt him in Perſon, yet at his earneſt deſire ſent Romoald his Son, who met him at Formiæ, and gave him battel. For a long time the Succeſs was doubtfull, till one Amelingus a Lombard, that carried the King's Spear, ſtruck down a certain Greek from his Horſe, and afterward taking him up on the Point of his Spear, held him aloft over his Head to the great Admiration of all the Beholders, and the Conſternation of the Greeks, who preſently began to run, and left an undoubted Victory to Romoald. Conſtans perceiving it labour in vain to meddle any more with the Lombards, that he might not ſeem to have come into Italy for nothing, reſolved to goe and viſit Rome. Both the Biſhop and all the Citizens were glad to hear the News, it having been a long time ſince Paulus, lib. 1. cap. 9. Tranſemundus Sigonio, Paulus autem eum vocat, Mittolam Capuanum Comitem, dicítq; eum juxta fluenta Caloris fluminis in loco qui ad ſuum uſq; diem Pugna vocabatur vehementer exercitum Conſtantis attriviſſe.

His men defeated.

Idem, ibid. Cap. 10. Ameling, cœlo ortus. Cap. 11.

He is ſacrilegious at Rome.

A. D. 663.

Paulus quo ſuprà.
Cap. 16.
Troſt-mund, Conſolans os.

ſince an Emperour had therein ſet his foot, and they reſolved to receive him with Extraordinary Honour. Vitalianus the Biſhop with all his Clergy, and the Roman People met him at five Miles diſtance from the City, on the third day before the Nones of July in the ſixth Indiction, and the ſix hundred and ſixty third year of Our Lord. Having done his Devotions at the Churches, and viſited all the places worthy of his Notice, after twelve days ſtay in the City; he departed and carried along with him all the braſs he could find, defacing many great Monuments of Antiquity, and the Majeſty of Rome, and not abſtaining from the very Coverings of Churches. From Rome by Land he went to Naples, and thence by Sea paſſed into Sicily. Grimoald to reward the ſervice done by Traſemund the Duke of Capua, gave him his Daughter to Wife, and Zotho the Duke of Spoletum dying, that Dukedom as a Portion, which done he returned back to his Houſe at Pavia.

Lupus revolts.

He is ſlain.

And his Son.

Lup. alias Laof quies. Hinc. Lupfrid, Lupwald in vocab. Alleman.

Cap. 17.

Cap. 18.

Cap. 19.

Cap. 20.

Paulus Diac. lib. 5. c. 21.
Warne-frid, cuſtos Pacis.
Cap. 22.
Cap. 23.
Paulo Theude-ruda, Theude-rada, Populis conſulens.

28. During his Abſence Lupus the Duke of Forum Julii, had plaid many pranks which were not to be paſſed over in ſilence. Into the Territories of the Veneti, he marched with a Party of Horſe, and plundered the Church of Aquileia, with the wealth of which not contenting himſelf, being left by Grimoald in Pavia, he committed there many outragious Enormities, verily believing that the King would never return alive from the Expedition. But hearing that he returned with a kind of triumph, he durſt not abide his coming, but flying to Forum Julii, there he revolted and renounced his Allegiance to Grimoald, who being highly incenſed againſt him reſolved to reduce by force, and puniſh him, but unwilling in the leaſt to bring his Lombards acquainted with Civil wars, he hired Cacanus the Hunn to come upon him, who accordingly the following year with an infinite Multitude invaded his Territories, and waſted all far and wide with an hoſtile Courage. Lupus was not yet backward to defend his People, but with ſuch Forces as he could make oppoſed himſelf, and that with ſuch ſtrange Succeſs, that fighting four days together, Cacanus at firſt received more loſs, than he brought damage to the Lombards. But at this incenſed, as at the greateſt Infamy, with all Violence and better Conduct he ſet upon them again, and not onely defeated them, but killed Lupus in the Battel. Accounting now all his own he overran the Countrey, and waſted all parts of it at his pleaſure, till Grimoald being made to underſtand it ſent to him, and putting him in mind of their former Covenant, admoniſhed him, his work being now done, to draw his Forces out of the Dutchy of Forum Julii: Cacanus anſwered plainly, that he would not ſo quit a Countrey, which he had obtained by Arms, and with ſo much bloud of his followers, with which anſwer Grimoald was highly offended, and got together as good an Army as he could, but nothing to be compared for Numbers to that of his Adverſary. Being therefore ſo inferiour in Numbers, he invented a way how to have his Forces repreſented to the Hunniſh King far more numerous than they were. The Ambaſſadours of Cacanus, being preſent when he muſtered his Souldiers, he cauſed them the next day to change their Cloaths, and ſo he did twice or thrice, which made the Ambaſſadours fully believe they were thrice as many as indeed they were, and they reporting it to their Maſter out of fear, he retreated into his own Kingdom. Lupus being ſlain, Warnefrid his Son by the aſſiſtence of the Sclavi, ſought to obtain the Poſſeſſion of his Fathers Dukedom, but by the procurement of Grimoald was overpowered and ſlain. He then made one Weclari Duke of Forum Julii, and married Theodorata the Daughter of Lupus to his Son Romoald.

Grimoald revengefull.

C c. 26, 27, 28.

Cap. 29.
* Gaſtalde exponitur qui curtim gubernat, propriè poſitus, qui vicem gerit. Ga & Ge augmenta ſunt & pro Dialectis variant. Alii Ca habent ut Caſtaldus. De Duce Gaſtaldium vocitari præcepit. Eui uſque hodie in his ut diximus locis habitantes,

29. Grimoald being now at his eaſe, thought it time to animadvert upon thoſe who in Expectation of a Change, had forſaken him in his march againſt the Emperour Conſtans. A Town called Forum Popilii belonging to the Romans, he depopulated becauſe the Inhabitants had been very troubleſome to his Men, during the War in their paſſing, and repaſſing to Beneventum. Pretending an Expedition another way in the time of Lent he paſſed over the Hill Bardo into Treſcia, and on a ſudden, when none expected it from the Apennine, fell down upon it on Eaſter Eve; at ſuch time as they were buſie in baptizing Children, and filled the City with ſuch ſlaughter, that the very Deacons, that miniſtred at the Sacrament, were not ſpared. After this remembring how his two Brothers Tato and Caco had been circumvented and baſely killed at Opitergium, he deſtroyed it alſo for Company. Two Years after Alzeco the Duke of the Bulgari came with many Followers, but peaceably into Italy, and deſired of Grimoald ſome grounds to inhabit, which requeſt the King granted, aſſigning them the Towns Sepia, Bonianum and Æſernia, which at this time were not inhabited in the Dutchy of Beneventum, and commanded his Son to admit him as * Gaſtald, or the Count of them. The year following ing Grimoald kept himſelf at home, and applied his mind to the fitting of Laws to the wants and temper of the People, to which purpoſe he reviſed the Edict of Rothari formerly mentioned, repealing ſome things, and adding many, which his Judges ſuggeſted to him to be both wanting, and neceſſary for the Adminiſtration of Juſtice. The Year that followed was Conſtantine the Emperour ſlain in the Month of July, and Conſtantine his Son continued his Reign as he had begun. Grimoald lived ſome three years after him, and then died after this manner. He had been let bloud, and nine days after going to bend a bow to ſhoot at a Pigeon, three Veins in his Arm broke, and, as was reported, his Phyſicians applied ſome poyſonous Plaſter to the Sore, and ſo made an end of him; after he had reigned nine Years, as Paul the Deacon writes, but Sigonius begins his Reign in the ſix hundred and ſixty firſt Year of Our Lord, and ends it not till the ſeventy ſecond. He was a Man of very ſtrong Conſtitution of Body, and had an Head as well furniſhed.

Sect. 4.

quanquam & latinè loquantur, linguæ tamen propriæ uſum minimè anteferunt. Sic Paulus.

Menſe Julio, Anno Regni 6. Indictione 11. A. D. 668. Paulus, lib. 5. cap. 33.

Grimoald dies.

A. D. DCLXXII.

30. He left a Son by the Daughter of Aribert, named Garibald, who was very young. At the ſame time Bertarid was making a Journey from France into Britain, to viſit the Saxon Kings. He had ſcarcely put off to Sea, when a Voice was heard from Land which asked for him, and adviſed him to return home, for Grimoald had been dead three days. Returning with ſpeed to the ſhore, the Perſon that ſpake it could not be found; he therefore interpreted it as a Voice from Heaven, and preſently put himſelf upon his Journey. And his Expectation deceived him not, for when he came to the Alpes, he found there the Guards, and all the Officers of the Court ready to receive him, whither he haſted with a chearfull mind, and depoſing the Boy Garibald, in the third Month after the death of his Father, with the great Joy and Expectation of the Lombards, he reaſſumed his Royal Eſtate, and called back his Wife Rodelinde, and his Son Cunipert from Beneventum, where they lay in Exile. Having reigned above ſeven Years, in his eighth he made Cunipert his Partner in the Kingdom, and with him reigned ten more, if Paul our Hiſtorian be in the right. Many years they lived in great tranquillity, and the State proſpered; till at length their Quiet was interrupted by Alachis the Duke of Tridentum or Trent, who having overmaſtered the Count of the Baioarii, was ſo puffed up with his Succeſs, that depoſing the King he fortified his City all manner of ways againſt him. Bertarid hereupon, with what forces he could get together, beſieged him in Trent, but he made ſo violent a ſally out againſt him, as obliged him to break up his ſiege, and after great loſs of Men to fly away for his Life. Notwithſtanding this yet Cunipert, having had great Friendſhip and Familiarity with him from his youth, perſwaded his Father to pardon and receive him into favour, and ſo true was he to the ſacred Rights of Friendſhip, that when Bertarid ſeveral times contrived his Ruine, yet ſtill he diverted the Execution, nay hoping ſtill he would at laſt be faithfull, and with intention to conquer him by kindneſs, he perſwaded him to make him Duke of Brixia; though the old King bid him ſtill take heed what he did, and told him he did not ſo much by theſe good Offices oblige to him a Friend, as ſtrengthen an Enemy to his own deſtruction, for he would by the freſh help and aſſiſtence of the Brixians (who made a powerfull Intereſt among the Lombards) at length puſh for the Kingdom it ſelf. About this time one John was ſent to ſucceed Theodore in the Exarchate of Ravenna, and ſome three years after Bertarid, the old King of the Lombards, died, a Prince to be commended for his Piety towards God, his Juſtice toward his Subjects, and his Charity to the Poor.

Bertarid recovers the Kingdom.

Rode-linde, quies tranquilla.

Cun-breet, Animi abundans, ſic Grotius.

Cun autem & Kenne ſcientiam denotant. Inde Cunning, adeo ut Cunbreet interpretari poſſit Scientia abundans.

Hic dum Dux eſſet in Tridentina civitate, cum Comite Baioariorum, quem illi Gravionem dicunt, qui Bauzanum & reliqua caſtella regebat conflixit, eúmque mirificè ſuperavit. Paulus Diaconus. lib. 5. c. 36.

Bertarid dies.

Cunibert his Son King.

31. Canibert his Son then continued his Reign, having married Hermelinda a Lady of the Stock of the Anglo-ſaxons. No ſooner almoſt was his Father dead, but he found how true a Prophet he had been in the Caſe of Alachis, who in return to all his kindneſs, and more than Brotherly-love, plotted how to deprive him of his Kingdom, and get the Crown upon his own Head. Having drawn into the Conſpiracy two Brothers Aldo and Granſo, the moſt conſiderable Citizens of Brixia, and ſeveral other Lombards, he watched his time when the King was abſent, and contrary to his Oath of Fidelity ſeized on his Palace in Pavia, which done he took upon him the Royal Title. Cunibert having notice of this Treaſon, and altogether unprovided, as having never expected any ſuch thing, went and fortified himſelf as well as he could in the Iſland Comacina, in the Lake Larium. In the mean time the Tyrant carries himſelf as he had begun, and hurried by his own Inclinations, never conſidered how it behoved him by a fair demeanour, to keep what he had already obtained. To the Churchmen he carried himſelf with great pride and ſeverity, and could not conceal his Tyrannical and Ingratefull Humour, Alachis rebels.

Paulus Diaconus, lib. 5. c. 38.

Humour, toward thoſe that had been the Authours of his Advancement. On a time as he was telling Money in his Palace, the Son of Aldo happened to be there, and a piece falling down upon the Table, took it up and officiouſly gave it to him. He imagining the Child could not underſtand his meaning, ſaid to him, thy Father hath many ſuch as this, which if it pleaſe God, he ſhall e'er long give to me. But the Boy at his Return home told this, and other paſſages to his Father, from which Aldo concluded he had been groſly miſtaken in his meaſures, and that if he did not by ſome ſpeedy Act prevent it, death and the Ruine of his Family ſhould be the Reward of all his Services to the Tyrant. Having communicated his thoughts with Granſo his Brother, and others of his Friends, they thought fit to perſwade Alachis to go out to hunt, and take his pleaſure in the Foreſt, promiſing they would keep the City of Pavia for him, and moreover at his Return, preſent him with the Head of Cunibert that drunken Sot. Idem ibid. c. 39.

32. He was perſwaded, and out he went to recreate himſelf in the Foreſt, which while he did, Aldo and his Brother repaired to Cunibert in the Iſland. Falling at his Feet they bewailed their Crime and Misfortune together, and begging his pardon, agreed on a day whereon to put Pavia again into his Hands. This they performed to the great Joy and Satisfaction of the Inhabitants, the Clergy eſpecially, and to the as great diſſatisfaction of Alachis, who after he had ſpent the heat of his Rage againſt Aldo, went into Iſtria to raiſe Forces. Several Cities, ſome by perſwaſions, and others by force, he brought to join with him and the Army of Forum Julii, which was marching to the Aſſiſtence of Cunibert, by a ſtrange wile he diverted from their purpoſe, for, ſtanding at a Bridge they were to paſs, lying over the River Liquentia, as they marched ſtragling one from another, he forced them to ſwear Fidelity to him, and then kept every one from returning to his Companions to tell them the cheats, and give them notice of whom to beware. Not long after having got together a conſiderable Power, he moved againſt Cunibert, and they incamped the one againſt the other in the Fields of Coronata, where Cunibert ſent and challenged Alichis to a ſingle Combat, to ſave the Lives of ſo many which elſe of neceſſity muſt be deſtroyed. But Alachis remembring his Strength and Courage, when they were young together refuſed the offer, though he was alſo ſolicited to it by one of his followers, who upon his refuſal diſdaining to ſerve ſuch a Maſter, forſook him, and went over to his Enemy. The two Armies then being to decide the Controverſie, when Cunibert was about to charge, Zeno a Deacon of the Church at Pavia, bearing him great affection, and afraid he ſhould miſcarry, came to him, told him all their Safety conſiſted in his, and that if he periſhed in the Battel, the Tyrant would by divers ways of Torment put them to death, therefore he prayed him to give him leave to put on his Armour to counterfeit his Perſon, and to goe for him: if ſo be he periſhed the loſs would not be great, and if he lived the thing would redound unto his Honour, having by his Servant obtained the Victory. Cap. 40.

33. The King very earneſtly refuſed, but overcome by the Prayers and Tears of ſeveral of the By-ſtanders, at length yielded, and Zeno being much of his height and ſhape, when he had put on his Armour, he could not be known from Cunibert himſelf. The Battel was fought with great Animoſity on both ſides, and Alachis bending all his malice, and the utmoſt force he could make toward the Wing, where, as he imagined, Cunibert ſtood, came up with and ingaged his diſguiſed Adverſary, whom but little skilled in ſuch affairs he ſlew, and in great jollity and triumph commanded his Head to be cut off, and ſet upon the Point of a Spear, that the Soldiers on both ſides might perceive it. But when he came to take off his Head, the Head of a Clerk not that of a King appeared, whereat he was much amazed, and from his amazement fell into a great paſſion againſt all Churchmen vowing in caſe he got the Victory, he would fill a Pit with their Teſticles. In the mean time Cunibert, perceiving his Men much dejected at the Report of his death, and that they began to fly, ſhewed himſelf to them, and revived their Spirits to ſuch a meaſure, that they were ready and chearfull for a ſecond ingagement; when Cunibert again ſent to Alachis, and to avoid the Effuſion of Bloud, once more offered to decide the Quarrel by a Duel. But he refuſed, joyned battel the ſecond time, and therein was ſlain, and with him moſt of his followers; ſuch of them as eſcaped, being ſwallowed up by the flouds of the River Adua. The Army of the Dutchy of Forum Julii, was not at the Battel, for having ſworn to Alachis, and yet it being againſt their Conſciences to fight for him, they neither aſſiſted the one nor the other, but when they came to ingage, departed home. Alachis being thus ſlain, King Cunibert in triumph returned to Pavia, and having Cap. ult. Is ſlain.

having made a ſumptuous Funeral for Zeno the Deacon, reigned with all Proſperity, Juſtice and Moderation. In the Field of Coronata where the Battel was fought, he built a Monaſtery to St. George.

A Monaſtery built to St. George.

34. About two years after Romoald the Duke of Beneventum, for what cauſe is uncertain, invaded Calabria belonging to the Emperour, and being without any conſiderable Fortification or Defence he took Tarentum, Brunduſium and the whole Countrey round about, and not long after died, when he had Governed ſixteen years, and left his Dukedom much inlarged to his Son Grimoald, who held it for three years longer, having married Wigilinda the Siſter of Cunibert, and Daughter of King Bertarid. After the Death of Grimoald, Gaſulf his Brother was Duke, and held the place ſeventeen years, whoſe Wife was Winiberta the Mother of Romoald his Son. But much about the ſame time that Romoald invaded the Territories of the Emperour great ſtirs happened in the Dukedom of Forum Julij; where Rodoald had ſucceeded Landar, as he did Weclari, who was made Duke by King Grimoald as we ſaid before. In the abſence of Rodoald from the City one Anſfrid, from a certain Caſtle called Reunia, ſeized on the Government and Title of Duke without any Warrant or Authority from the King. Rodoald in much trouble at the Report, departed into Iſtria, and thence Sailing to Ravenna, he ſo came to Pavia to Cunibert, who ſhortly had Intelligence that Anſfrid intended to be his Rival alſo for the Kingdom; but as he was making preparations for ſo great an Enterprize, he was taken at Verona, and being brought before the King, was deprived of his ſight, and ſo baniſhed. Then was Aldo the Brother of Rodoald made Duke of Forum Julij, and held it ſeven years, as Sigonius gathers from ſome other circumſtances, though Paul the Hiſtorian writes that he Governed by the Name of Preſervator or Protector of the place but for one year and ſeven months. Such proſperity had Cunibert during his Life, which laſted twelve years after that of his Father. He was a man very eminent for his neatneſs and goodneſs, and no leſs remarkable for his courage and dexterity in War.

Anſ-frid, Gratioſa Pax. Ans, vel Anſt, Gratia in Novo Teſtamento & Dictionario.

Foro Julianorum autem ducatum poſthac. Ado frater Rodoaldi loci ſervatoris nomine per annum & menſes ſeptem gubernavit. lib. 6. c. 3.

Cunibert dies.

35. His Succeſſour he appointed his Son Liutbert, and becauſe he was young, left one Aſprand a man of great Nobility and Wiſdom to be his Governour, who held the place and managed it with great ſincerity for the ſpace of eight months. Then did Godebert's Son, Ragunbert by Name, whom when Grimoald ſlew him he left young, and who now was Duke of Taurinum, thinking he had good opportunity preſented by the Infancy of Liutbert, ſet up for himſelf, and defeating Aſprand and his Aſſociates in battel, obtained the Sovereignty. During his adminiſtration of affairs, Giſulf the Duke of Beneventum with a ſtrong Army invaded Campania; which waſting with Fire and Sword, he took thence great numbers both of Cattel and Captives, and proceeded ſo far that John the Biſhop of Rome was ſorely frighted, and knowing the City was not ſtrong enough to make any reſiſtence, betook himſelf to intreaties, and he and his Clergy going out to meet him, prevailed with him to return back and diſmiſs his Priſoners. Ragunbert died within the year, and was ſucceeded by his Son Aribert, who more effectually proſecuted his Intereſt, than did his Father. He renewed the War with Liutbert, who had by this time got a very ſtrong Party, for not onely Aſprand but Otto, Tazo, Faro, and Rotharit Duke of Bergomum joyn'ed with him. But all theſe he defeated in one battel at Pavia, Liutbert he took Priſoner, Aſprand and Rotharit fled, the one to the Iſland Comacina, and the other to his City of Bergamum, whither Aribert purſued him, and having taken Landis a Town in the Territories, laid Siege to the City, and uſing all violent courſes, at laſt took it by ſtorm, and therein Rotharit, who by this time had aſſumed the Title of King. Having cauſed his Head and Beard to be ſhaven, he ſent him away to Taurinum, where not long after he was killed by the King's command, who alſo preſently after cauſed Liutbert his young Competitour to be ſtifled in a Bath. Then ſent he his Army to Comacina againſt Aſprand, who having timely notice, got him thence to Ravenna, and eſcaped to Theudebert the Duke of the Baioarij, with whom he continued nine years. But the Army of Aribert took the Iſland, and Aſprand being eſcaped he raged cruelly againſt his Relations; he pulled out the Eyes of his Son Sigibrand. His Wife Theuderada by name, who in her womaniſh tattle had given out ſhe ſhould one day be a Queen, he disfigur'd by cutting off her Noſe and her Ears, and dealt with Aurona her Daughter in like manner. Onely Luitprand his youngeſt Son, becauſe he was a child, he ſpared and ſuffered him to go to his Father, Providence, as Paul the Hiſtorian obſerves, preſerving him for great things in time to come.

A. D. 703. Luit-brcht vel Luit-preht, Subditis copioſus non Luitpert ut apud Sigonium. Haiſt-ſpar, citò comparcens, utrumque Anglica Teutonicum.

Ragunbert gets to be King.

Cap. 18.

Aribert his Son ſucceeds him.

Cap. 19.

Rotharit, quiete pollens.

Cap. 20.

Cap. 21.

Lib. 6. c. 22. Sige-brand, victoria incenſus. Au-runa, Campeſtris fæmina. Runa fæmina. unde Friderun in vocabulario.

Sect. 4.

36. Aldo being dead, who, as we were told by Paul, was Præſervator of the place of Forum Julij, Ferdulf obtained to be Duke, a man proud and inconſtant, deſigning to get renown by ſome notable action againſt the Sclavi, he ruined himſelf and almoſt the whole Dukedom. He hired ſome of that Nation underhand to bring an Army of their Countrey-men into his Province. But before this was brought about, ſome of the Sclavi came on pilfring into the Territories of Forum Julij, and made prey of ſome ſheep and the Shepherds that kept them. The Governour of that place, Argaid by name, but by reaſon of his Office in their Language called Schuld-hais, a man of Noble Extract, and otherwiſe very eminent, purſued after them, but to no purpoſe. In his return he was met by Ferdulf, who demanding what was become of the Thieves, upon his anſwer that they were fled, replied: How canſt thou doe any thing gallantly, who beareſt the Name of Argaid, which is derived from Arga? The other exceedingly vexed, and being a man of great courage, hereupon pray'd that they might live ſo long till the world by ſome eminent token might ſee which of the two was moſt Arga. Not long after came an Army of Sclavi, procured as we ſaid by Ferdulf, which incamped on the top of an high mountain, moſt difficult of acceſs on all ſides. Ferdulf came with his Army and compaſſed the Hill, conſidering on what place he might moſt conveniently attack them; to whom Argaid then ſpake and bade him remember how he had called him a lazy and unprofitable man, and by the vulgar word of Arga; but now ſaith he, let God's curſe fall on him who laſt of us two comes up to the Sclavi; with that he turns his horſe and up he rides, where it was moſt ſteep and craggy, toward the Enemies Camp; and Ferdulf for very ſhame followed him, which his Army perceiving, up alſo it marches, eſteeming it an heinous thing not to follow their Captain whitherſoever he led them. The Sclavi ſeeing them climb up ſuch ſteep and almoſt impaſſible places, wondring at their reſolution, prepare to receive them with Stows and Axes, rather than any thing elſe, and thus they ſtruck them off from their Horſes, and ſlew them all in a manner, getting a Victory, not by their Valour, but ſuch a ſtrange Adventure. There fell Ferdulf, Argaid his Adverſary, and all the Nobility of Forum Julij, and ſo many valiant men beſides, upon the occaſion of their fooliſh Emulation, as under ſafer Conduct would have put to the rout many thouſands. Onely one Lombard of note, Munichis by Name, the Father of Peter, afterward Duke of Forum Julij, and of Vrſus the Duke of Cenetum eſcaped home. For though he was ſtruck from his Horſe, and one of the Sclavi had ſeized on him and tied his hands, yet bound as he was, he ſnatched a Lance from the man's right hand, and therewith ſtriking him down, got away through the precipitous places with his hands ſtill tied together.

Ald, vetus, Old.
Paulus lib. 6. cap. 24.
Ferd-ulf, Longè auxilium ferens.
Far help.

Sculd-Hais, Debiti Præfectus, qui non de capite ſed de pecunia judicat, manet in hunc diem nomen variè corruptum. Scultheizo, Sculdaſius, Scultes, Sculter, Scouter & Scout apud Belgas.
Arga, Ignavus, nunc malitioſum ſignificat.

The Sclani defeats them of Forum Julii.

37. Ferdulf being thus dead, one Corvulus was made Duke, but continued ſo but a ſhort ſpace; for having offended the King, his eyes were pulled out, and he lived afterwards in diſgrace. Then was one Pemmo preferr'd to the place, to which being an ingenious man he was very ſerviceable. He was born at Bellunum, whence for raiſing a Sedition he was driven away, and coming to Forum Julij, there peaceably lived. He had a Wife named Ratberga, whoſe face being nothing comely, ſhe often deſired him that he would diſmiſs her, and marry ſome other that might be a Wife fit for ſo great a Duke. But he being a wiſe man, anſwered that her good qualities, her humility and modeſty more pleaſed him than any external bounty of the Body. By her he had three Sons, Ratchis, Ratchais, and Ahiſtulf, men of renown, the Nativity of whom, as Paul expreſſeth it, advanced their Mothers humility unto glory. This Duke Pemmo ſeeking for the Sons of all the Nobility that had been ſlain, educated them with, and not otherwiſe than as if they had been his own Children. As for Aribert though he was cruel at firſt, yet afterward he is ſaid to have governed with much Prudence and Juſtice, beſides his Liberality to Churches, the Roman eſpecially, to which he reſtored, as their Writers tell us, many Lands, and particularly the Patrimony of the Alpes Cottiæ, taken from them formerly by Rothari, the inſtrument of which donation he ſent written with golden letters. But however he carried it now to Churchmen, Aſprand could not be reconciled to him, who ſtill lying in Exile, longed to return to his own Countrey, which to effect, the Duke of Baioaria, with whom he ſojourned, offered him a competent force to be revenged on his Enemy. With this Army he went into Italy and engaged with Aribert in ſo bloudy and tedious a Battel that Night onely parted them; yet Aſprand and his Baioarians had clearly the worſt of it, Aribert his loſs not being comparable to that of theirs. However, Aribert would not keep the Field, but would needs remove to Pavia,

Idem, ibid. c. 25.
Cap. 26.
Pemmo meliùs in vocabulario Allem. Penno, Pennhok, vertice eminens, Penne, vertex. Inde Penninus Jupiter in Alpium vertice. Hok, Hoch, High, Sublimis. Ratberga, concilii celaris, in vocab. Allem. Ratbirg.
Paulus, ibid. c. 28.
Cap. 35.

Aribert drowned.

which as a ſign of fear, as uſually it is of weakneſs, miniſtred matter of deſpair to his own men and confidence to his Enemies. Perceiving his errour, he then reſolved to fly into France, there to hire a new ſupply, and for that purpoſe took good ſtore of gold out of the Palace, with which he would needs ſwim over the River, and attempting ſo to doe was drowned, as thoſe about him had concluded. The day following, his Body was found and buried in the Church of St. Saviour, founded by Aribert the Firſt. He was wont to go out diſguiſed in the night and hear himſelf what his People ſaid of him, and how his Officers miniſtred Juſtice. To Ambaſſadours of Foreigners he always gave Audience in bad Clothes, and never would entertain them with delicate Wines, or other coſtly things, that he might not bait them by ſuch Allurements to invade Italy. He Reigned with his Father and by himſelf about eleven years, as Paul informs us. And yet Sigonius begins his Reign in the ſeven hundred and fifth year of our Lord, and ends it but in the ſeven hundred and twelfth. His Brother Guntbert fled into France, and there continued till his death, whoſe eldeſt Son Raginbert in the days of Paul, Governed the City of Orleance for the King.

Anſprand ſucceeds.

Him after three months his Son Liutprand.

Ans-brand, gratia fervens.

Liutprand, ſubditos accendens.

Cap. 30.

Far-wald, familià potens. Faro idem contractè. Wachi-lap, viæ curſor. Wach nob. Way, Lap, Leape, Lapon enim vel (ut apud Belgas) Lopen antiquitus erat; currere.

Cap. 38.

38. Aribert being dead, Anſprand ſucceeded him without oppoſition, but reigned onely three months; a man of as great accompliſhments as one can imagine The Lombards perceiving him deſperately ill, made King his Son Liutprand (who as we ſaid by permiſſion of Aribert went to him into Boioaria) to the great contentment of his Father, and after his death confirmed their choice. Much about the ſame time died Tranſimund the Duke of Spoletum, into whoſe place ſucceeded Faroald his Son, and Governed joyntly with his Brother Wachilap. Liutprand coming to Govern, ſhewed himſelf a man of Ability in matters relating both to Peace and War. He had a difficulty to ſtruggle with at the beginning of his Reign, which he conquered much to his reputation: He had a Kinſman called Rothari, who invited him to a Feaſt at his Houſe in Pavia, but had men there ready concealed to kill him when they ſhould have the word. But before he went he had the good fortune to be informed of the Treaſon, and ſent for Rotharit to his own Palace, whom according to his intelligence he found privily armed. Finding himſelf diſcovered, he leaped back and drew his Sword to kill the King, who therewith drew alſo, and his Guard coming in they diſpatched the Traytor. Liutprand was a man of very great courage, which farther ſometimes tranſported him, than was convenient for his own ſafety and the concernments of the Kingdom. On a time two of his Attendants agreed when a fitting opportunity ſhould preſent it ſelf, to kill him, which he alſo underſtanding, went with them two alone into a thick Wood, and drawing his Sword upbraided them with their treachery, bidding them begin and make a tryal upon him. They were ſo ſtruck with ſo ſudden a thing and his generoſity, that falling down at his feet they told him the whole truth, and as well they as others, to whom he demeaned himſelf in the like ſort, obtained his Pardon.

Ait tamen Paulus C. ult. Hic imitio Reg ni ſui Boioariorum plurima caſtra cepit.

He publiſheth a new model of Laws.

39. Having conquered his Enemies at home by his valour and kindneſs, and married out of gratitude as well as to ſtrengthen himſelf from abroad, the Daughter of the Duke of Baioaria, who had received him and his Father in their diſtreſs, he ſet himſelf to reform the Laws of the Kingdom. All the Judges he ſummoned to Court to give in their opinions concerning a new model, which being done, it was publiſhed the laſt day of February, in the eleventh Indiction in the firſt year of his Reign, as he himſelf teſtifies in the Preface to this purpoſe, viz.
“ Remember how our moſt Mighty Predeceſſour, and moſt Eminent King Rothar, as “ he himſelf ſpeaks in his Writings, renewed and ordained an Edict for the Lombards, “ wherein he prudently cauſed to be inſerted this Paſſage, that any Prince of “ the Lombards his Succeſſour, if he found therein any thing ſuperfluous, might “ wiſely take it away, and what he found wanting he might add by the aſſiſtence
“ of God. After him the moſt glorious King Grimoald, accordingly added and aboliſhed
“ what to him ſeemed fit, whoſe example we following, as we hope, inſpired
“ by God, in like manner ſuch things as according to God's Law have appeared “ to us convenient to be done we have decreed to be added and omitted, according “ to what we have commanded to be written in this preſent Volume. Therefore “ in the Name of the Omnipotent God, I Liutprand the moſt Excellent, the “ Chriſtian and Catholick King of the Nation of the Lombards, beloved of God,
“ in the firſt year of my Reign, through God's goodneſs, the day before the Calends
“ of March, in the eleventh Indiction, together with all the Judges from the “ Parts of Auſtria and Neuſtria, and the borders of Tuſcia, with others of my “ faithfull Lombards, and all the People aſſiſting thoſe according to the fear
“ and Auſtria and Neuſtria what.

“ and love of God have appeared good to us, and therewith we are pleaſed. The Style is ſo difficult that hardly can it be brought to correſpond with the Engliſh Idiome; but the Reader may take notice that this was the third Edition of the Laws of the Lombards, whereof we muſt ſpeak more anon; he may obſerve alſo the Titles theſe Kings took, and that even in Italy, there was Auſtria and Neuſtria, as well as in France and in Pannonia, Parts of the Kingdom ſo called in reference to their Situation. For the word Ooſtriick, which in Latin they barbarouſly, as I may ſay, turned into Auſtria and Auſtraſia, to thoſe Teutonick People ſignified the Eaſtern Kingdom or Dominion. So was the Kingdom of the Mediomatices called by the Franks, and Pannonia by the Germans, part of which ſtill, and that alone, retains the Name of Auſtria. In like manner Weſtriick or Weſtreick, they changed into Neuſtria, it ſignifying the Weſtern Dominion in oppoſition to the Eaſtern. From their Situation ſome were called Æſtij, Eaſt with us, and thoſe that ſo called them being the ſame with what others pronounced Ooſt. The Nortmanni, Northendi, Alpes Noricæ, and Norici the People, from their Northern Situation had their Names.

Stirs amongſt the Lombards.

A. D. 718.

Paulus Diaconus, lib. 5. *c.*44.

Troſt-Mund, conſolans Os. Draſamunt in Vocab. Alleman. & Thraſamunt, contracte Theuſo, Thriuſo, ibid.

40. For the ſpace of about three years we hear little more concerning Liutprand, whom we may conclude intent upon the Laws, and ſuch farther Reformations as tended to the well being of his Subjects. But in the fifth year of his Reign, noiſe enough was made in Campania by the Duke of Beneventum, who by a Wile got Cumæ into his hands. Thoſe of Rome were highly concerned at it, and the Biſhop dealt with him both by fair words and money to reſtore it, and when that would not doe, thundred againſt him by excommunication. But this alſo he deſpis'd, whereupon the Biſhop was forc't to betake himſelf to the Secular hand, procuring John the Duke of Naples to ſet upon it by might, which he did, and ſurpriſing it, killed therein three hundred Lombards with their Gaſtald, and took Priſoners more than five hundred which he led away to Naples, and ſold the Town to the Biſhop for ſeventy Pounds of Gold, as had been agreed. The year that followed Faroald the Duke of Spoletum took Narnia by cunning from the Romans, and pretending a Journey to the King ſurprized Claſſis, another Town belonging to Ravenna; but he was commanded by Liutprand to reſtore them both. Though the King did not, his own Son Traſemund puniſhed him for his temerity, depoſing him ſhortly after, and compelling him to take Orders that he might have his place. About the ſame time the Sclavi made another Irruption into the Territories of Forum Julij, called Lauria, where Pemmo the Duke ſet upon them, and with loſs but of one old man, Siguald by name, who in a former Fight betwixt them and Ferdulf had loſt two Sons. Once and again he had done great Execution upon them, and now the third time, though his Captain and other Lombards forbade him, yet would he not be kept from ſpeaking openly to the Sclavi: Now I have ſufficiently revenged the Death of my Sons, if Death ſhould come I ſhould chearfully undergo it. And accordingly it came to paſs; for he was the onely man that died in the Fight; Pemmo having ſlain many Enemies, and unwilling to looſe any more of his own men, made Peace with the Sclavi in the ſame place. And from this time forward they began more to ſtand in awe of the Arms of Forum Julij.

Liutprand invades the Exarchate.

41. Now for many years had the Kings and Kingdom of the Lombards been in peace, except ſome petty broils betwixt them and their neareſt Neighbours, or that they contended one with another. The Exarchs and they had ſince the time of Rothari, maintained a very good correſpondence together, the Romans and Lombards, though Neighbours, perfectly agreeing. But now was this Kingdom at the higheſt pitch alotted for it, and upon the brink of proſperity, which never continues but changes moſt commonly to the other extreme. Wealth and Eaſe had made the King and the Subject both confident and overweening, thoſe ever thinking they have the greateſt ſtrength, who never made any tryal of it; yet did they think their preſent condition mean in compariſon of what they were in capacity to attain, and therefore they muſt up and be doing, and involved themſelves in ſuch a War as deſcending to their Succeſſours, at length procured the ruine of their Name and Dominion. Liutprand having prepared all things beforehand for ſo great an enterprize, Invades the Exarchate on a ſudden, and lays Siege to Ravenna the ſeat of the Governour. Paul who at preſent by favour of Leo the Emperour held that place, we are told by Sigonius, was very much ſurprized, as from the higheſt proſperity being on a ſudden caſt into the greateſt difficulty. But there was no ſuch cauſe of his being ſurprized, if we conſider but what the ſame Authour had related but a little before, he tells us in many words that that Leo the Emperour being at odds with Gregory the Roman Biſhop, upon the account of Images took ſeveral Courſes to make him away, and for that purpoſe ſent Paul, as Exarch into Italy, who having once attempted it, but to no purpoſe, the Emperour the following year ſent him a Meſſage, that if he could not kill, yet he ſhould remove him from his Office and put another in his Room. Paul thus importuned by his Maſter, and bearing himſelf hatred to Gregory, becauſe he had forbidden the Tribute to be paid which he had laid upon the Churches, ſent one Maricius the Spatharius of Leo, and whom he had made Duke of Rome, to that City with order to lay hold on the Biſhop, and commit him to Cuſtody. But matters were not ſo privately carried but that the Biſhop, whoſe Power and Intereſt now began to be mighty in Italy, had notice of it. Therefore he hires the Lombards out of the Dukedoms of Spoletum and Tuſcia for great Rewards, to ſtop the paſſage of the Exarch's Army. They with much Alacrity marching to the City poſſeſſed themſelves of the Bridges Salarius and Milvius, and oppoſing themſelves to the Forces of Ravenna, not onely hindred them from returning to Rome, but conſtrained them and their Leader to return back to their own City.

Vide Sigon. de Regno Italiæ. lib. 3. Pp. 99. & 100.

Takes Ravenna.

42. This happened but the year before the Siege of Ravenna, and therefore whether the Exarch had reaſon to be ſurprized, or rather ought not to have expected ſome ſuch matter, and whether the Biſhop of Rome, who had already joyned the Lombards with him, was not concerned, we leave the Reader to judge. However Paul, whether aware or not of Hoſtility from the Lombards, moſt gallantly demeaned himſelf in the keeping of Ravenna, ſhewing himſelf ready to undergoe any thing rather than to yield up the place; inſomuch that Liutprand deſpairing to doe any good, broke up his ſiege and departed to Claſſis, which being but ſlenderly provided he eaſily took, and having plundred it, laid it level with the Earth. But upon the Report of what had happened to Claſſis, the Citizens of Ravenna began to be very fearfull and dejected as if their turn was not far off; which being underſtood by Liutprand, their fear became his confidence, and he drew back his Army to the City, which having had ſome taſte of the fruits of Conqueſt, he thought now would fall upon it with more Alacrity. And ſo it proved, for they tired out by their frequent Aſſaults both the Garriſon Souldiers and the Townſmen, which when Paul perceived, and deſpaired of receiving any Succours from abroad, he left the Town to the Diſcretion of the Inhabitants. The Beſiegers having notice of his flight, knew it a fit time to renew their Violence, and with little more trouble carried the Place, which Liutprand permitted his Souldiers to plunder. And here they got plunder enough, wealth ſufficient to glut their minds, and take off their edge from any farther adventures, contrary to the true Policy of a Captain, who ought to uſe his Men in this caſe as Huntſmen deal with their Hounds, to give them ſuch a taſte of the Prey as to ſtir up their Appetites, and make them more eager after the game, but not to fill them and make them lazie. This City being the ſeat of the Exarch, of Kings, Emperours and great Prelates, abounded with all Riches imaginable. Liutprand ſpoiled it of many rare Monuments of Antiquity, amongſt which the moſt remarkable was a braſen Statue of an Emperour on Horſeback, a Piece of admirable Contrivance and Workmanſhip, which he cauſed to be tranſlated to Pavia, where it remains, and by its rareneſs ſomething comforts the Citizens, for the decay of the Glory of that Place.

The Exarchate of Ravenna turned into a Dukedom.

Hildeprand & in vocab. Allemanico Hildibrand, Eximiè fervens.

43. Ravenna being taken, moſt of the Cities of the Exarchate preſently yielded, and from an Exarchate it was changed into a Dutchy, over which was ſet Hildebrand the King's Nephew, who becauſe he was young, Peredeus a Duke was made his Governour. Paul the Exarch thus outed of Ravenna, betook himſelf to the Venetians at Heraclia, where he implored the Aſſiſtence of Urſus the Duke. All this while Gregory, the Roman Biſhop, was a Looker on, after he had ſet the Lombards and Paul together by the Ears about his buſineſs. He had a deſign to chaſtiſe the Exarch, but not to encreaſe the Power and Dominion of the Lombards; his ſpleen excited him againſt the Emperour, and his Intereſt cauſed him to wiſh that both ſides were more weakened and humbled, that his own Authority already in a fair way, might make the greater progreſs in Italy. Liutprand had made ſuch a progreſs in the war as made him tremble, and he perceived it was high time to put a ſtop to the Carreire of his good Fortunes. He writes his Letters to Urſus, the Duke of the Venetians, exhorting him to give aid to the ſaid Paul, and now quite alters his ſtyle, making thoſe be black who formerly were white, and him white whom before he could not enough tax and load with opprobrious Language. He tells him that by reaſon of ſin the City of Ravenna, which was the Head of many Churches, was taken by the wicked Nation of the Lombards, and his worthy Son the

The Biſhop of Rome, jealons of the growing Power of Liutprand, turns againſt him.

Extant literæ apud Sigonium quo ſuprà. P. 101.

Lord Exarch, as he underſtands makes his abode at Venice, therefore tells him that he ought to ſtand by him and with him in his ſtead, that the City of Ravenna might be reſtored to the ancient Eſtate, and the Imperial ſervice of the Lords his Sons Leo and Conſtantine the Great, Emperours, and that for the Love of their Holy Faith.

44. The Venetians had good reaſon to be concerned alſo at the growth of ſo potent a Neighbour, and therefore the better to balance him, reſolved to give their utmoſt aſſiſtence to Paul, rigging up a Fleet under pretence of fighting againſt the Saracens, at the Inſtance of the Emperour. Paul having ſped at Venice according to his Wiſhes; yet, as having been repulſed, gathered together ſome Forces, and made as if he would beſiege Imola, and under this pretence increaſing his Army as much as he poſſibly could, removed on a certain day appointed betwixt him and the Venetians, and laid ſiege to Ravenna by Land, the Venetian Fleet doeing the ſame by Sea almoſt at the ſame inſtant. Hildebrand and Peredeus though exceedingly ſurprized, yet forced all that were able to bear Arms to the walls, where they behaved themſelves with much reſolution; but while they fought ſtoutly on the Land-ſide againſt Paul, the Venetians broke open the Water-gate and got into the City. The Defendants having notice made ſtout oppoſition here alſo, and a terrible Fight followed; till Paul coming about to the Aſſiſtence of his Friends decided the Controverſie, and took the Town. Peredeus was ſlain, and Hildebrand fell alive into the Hands of the Venetians, who having thus gallantly demeaned themſelves, departed home, before ſuch time as Liutprand, having received Intelligence, could move from Pavia. Not long after this, Leo the Emperour, and Gregory the Biſhop of Rome falling out about the Worſhip of Images, the Biſhop excommunicated the Prince, abſolved all his Subjects of Italy from their Allegiance, and commanded them neither to pay him Tribute nor any other Teſtimony of Duty or Allegiance. Hereupon the Romans, Campanians, and thoſe of Ravenna and Pentapolis revolted, and riſing in great Tumults laid violent hands upon their Governours. Paul the Exarch was killed at Ravenna, Peter the Duke of Rome had his Eyes put out, and in Campania the Duke Exhilaratus was with his Son Hadrian ſlain by the Romans, who were ſent thither for that purpoſe.

Ravenna recovered by the Exarch.

Pered-eu, latè patentis legis.

The Biſhop excommunicates the Emperour. Paul is killed. Great Rebellions.

A. D. 727.

45. The year following Liutprand, taking advantage of theſe Tumults, made war upon ſome places of Æmilia, betwixt Imola and Mutina, which hitherto had been untouched by the Lombards. He eaſily made himſelf Maſter of Monsbellus Ferionianum, Buxetum and Perſicetum, and at length of Bononia alſo, a Town built by the Etruſci when they poſſeſſed the Region on this ſide the Apennines, afterward the Seat of the Galli Boii, and then made a Latine Colony by the Romans, from whom it was taken by the Goths, then recovered, and now at length conquered by the Lombards. Thus far Liutprand having proſpered as he could deſire, paſſed by the Dominion of Ravenna and fell upon Pentapolis, which he overran from Ariminum, as far as Auximum without any reſiſtence; and at length made a ſtop at Vicus Pileus for ſetling the Government of it, whither the Cities appointed their ſeveral Deputies to repair, but as they were on their way, a Party of Roman Souldiers light upon them, and cut them off every man. The Rumour of the Revolt in Italy coming to the Emperour's Ears, was received with ſuitable regret, and he ordered Eutychius a Patritian, to go thither as his Exarch, with Inſtructions how to puniſh the chief Authours and Contrivers of it; which going about, he was alſo ſtrucken with the Thunder-bolt of Excommunication by Gregory. This did the more incenſe him, for that having eaſily reduced Ravenna to the Emperour's obedience, he drew the Lombards to his Party, who the Year following took Sutrium by ſome Arts from the Church, for ſo we muſt call it now, Gregory having procured the Romans to renounce their Obedience to their Sovereign, and ſwear Obedience to him and his Succeſſours; whereby Rome and the Roman Dukedom became transferred upon the Roman Prelates; of which more, in a more proper place. Gregory again got Sutrium out of their hands, but Eutychius made a ſtronger League with Liutprand, from whom Traſemund the Duke of Spoletum having revolted, they covenanted, as well to ſuppreſs him as Gregory, and reduce the Rebels to their former duty owing to their ſeveral Lords. Falling firſt upon Traſemund he ſubmitted himſelf, knowing he was not able to bear up againſt the Shock, ſo that the whole work now was with Rome, which they cloſly beſieged. Gregory found himſelf in the ſame condition as to reſiſtence, and therefore reſolv'd to take the ſame courſe to rid himſelf of the danger impending. He went out of the City to Liutprand, to whom he uſed many flattering words, telling him he did this for his ſake, upon the account of his Eminent Piety, whereas had Leo's Army alone beſieged the City,

Eutichius the new Exarch excommunicated.

The Exarch and the Lombards join and beſiege Rome.

The ſiege raiſed.

City, he would not have ſtirred one foot out of it. He ſpake vehemently againſt the Emperour, and propounded to the King the Example of Attila a furious Barbarian, who by the deſires of a Roman Biſhop, was diverted from Rome. He ſpake ſo effectually, that he not onely procured Liutprand to break up the Siege, but made a ſeeming agreement and friendſhip betwixt him and the Exarch.

Friendſhip betwixt Charles Martell and Liutprand.

Death of great Men.

46. About this time Charles Martell the Major of the Palace in France, conceiving the Friendſhip of the Lombards to be very convenient for ſtrengthening of the intereſt of his Family, ſent his Son Pipin to Liutprand, that by the cutting off his hair, as the cuſtome was, he might adopt him for his Son. And ſuch were the fruits of this Friendſhip, that the Saracens invading Gall the year following, Liutprand at his requeſt aſſiſted him in Perſon with a conſiderable Army, and contributed no ſmall matter to the Victory obtained over the Infidels. At his return he found new work made for him by the Exarch, who taking the advantage of his abſence, reſolv'd if poſſible, to re-take Pentapolis and Æmilia. He himſelf invading Pentapolis, defeated the Army of the Lombards, and reduced the Cities. But Agatho the Duke of Peruſium, whom he ſent into Æmilia, had the quite contrary ſucceſs, being forced with great loſs from Bononia, which he had beſieged. The five or ſix years that followed, were famous for little but the Death and Succeſſion of Great Men. Romuald the Duke of Beneventum died after ſix and twenty years Government, leaving a young Son named Giſulf, whom ſome went about to make away, but the People always faithfull to their Governours preſerv'd his life, and put to death them that had conſpired againſt it. Liutprand coming to the City took the Boy away with him, being too young for Government, and placed in his room Gregory another of his Nephews. Some time after, Rachis the Duke of Forum Julii invaded Carniola, which Paul our Hiſtorian calls the Countrey of the Sclavi, where he ſlew a great multitude of them, and waſted it far and wide. On a time they made a ſudden Aſſault upon him, and his Armourbearer had his Lance, but he killed the firſt of them that gave the Onſet with a Cudgel he had in his Hand, and therewith ſo afrighted them that they retreated. From this time he became every day more celebrated for his Valour.

47. At the ſame time broke out into Rebellion, Traſemund the Duke of Spoletum, and made a ſtrict League with Gregory the Third the Roman Biſhop, and Succeſſour to him who had aſſumed the Dominion of Rome, and the places to it belonging. As a Condition of this Alliance he gave up to the Biſhop the Caſtle of the Gallienſes, upon the Account of which he had formerly had much trouble from the Dukes of Rome. Truſting to this Alliance, he refuſed to obey the Orders of the King, who conceiving that ſuch a Revolt touched the very Inwards of his Concernments, ſpeedily raiſed an Army and led it againſt him. But the Rebel durſt not abide his Coming, but getting out of the City fled to the Biſhop, who now gliſtered with his new Principality; deſiring him to undertake his Patronage, who had protected his Predeceſſour from the Violence of the Exarch, and had entred into a moſt ſacred League and Alliance with himſelf. The Biſhop asking advice of Duke Stephen, with the Conſent of the Roman Souldiers (who doubtleſs could not but deſire Action) undertook his Protection; when in the mean time Liutprand ſeized on his Dukedom, and beſtowed it on his Nephew Hilderick; which having done, he ſent his Ambaſſadours to Gregory, requiring him to give up the Traitour into his Hands, or to expect him with an Army to fetch him. The Biſhop thought it below him, and no way conſiſtent with good Nature to give him up, and returned ſuch an anſwer to the King, who when Winter was over, removed his Forces from the Dukedom of Spoletum into that of Rome, where having taken Ameria, Orta, Polimartium and Bleda, he laid ſiege to the City it ſelf, and incamping in Nero's Fields, drew many of the Nobility to him, the Hair of whom he cut after the Lombard faſhion. Gregory being put to ſore ſtraits, firſt betook himſelf to the Artifice of his Predeceſſour, thinking by good Words and intreaties to remove the Enemy from the Walls; but this device failing him, he had recourſe to a more ſevere remedy; ſending to Charles Martell, the Major of the Palace in France, the Keys of the Holy Sepulchre and other things of great requeſt; beſeeching him to ſend relief to him and the diſtreſſed Church, and free the City from the ſiege of the Lombards. Charles readily embraced the offer, as tending to the Advancement of his Reputation in the World, and ſent a Meſſage ſo acceptable to Liutprand, that he aroſe from before Rome, and keeping onely in his Hands four Towns which he had ſeized, departed to Pavia in the Month of Auguſt, and the ſeventh Indiction. A. D. DCCXXXIX.

Ad Pontificem novo principatu fulgentem confugit, atq; eum, &c. Sigonius de Regno Italiæ. lib. 3. p. 110.

Liutprand beſieges Rome.

Exercitum ex Ducatu Spoletano in Romanum traduxit.

At the perſwaſion of Charles Martell raiſeth the Siege.

48. Traſemund, when the Siege was raiſed, reſolved to make again for his Dukedom, being readily aſſiſted by the Biſhop, who by this means hoped to recover his four Towns, and by Godeſcalc, lately advanced to the Dukedom of Beneventum, by the People againſt the King's mind, in the room of Gregory deceaſed, who thought hereby to weaken the King, and ſtrengthen his own illegal Title. At his firſt Invaſion of the Countrey, he eaſily recovered ſeveral Places, and at length in December, and the Eighth Indiction, took Spoletum by ſurprize, and therein killed Hilderick the young Duke. He had a great Advantage for managing his Affairs preſented by the Sickn of Liutprand, which was ſo grievous, that the Lombards deſpairing of his Recovery took Hildeprand his Nephew, and carrying him to our Ladies Church without the Walls, inaugurated him King. But an odd Accident happened at the Ceremony; for having a Spear delivered into his Hands,according to the Cuſtome,a Cuckow came and ſate thereon,which by Wiſemen was looked on as prodigious,and betokening a mean Reign to their young King. Liutprand when he was recovered and had notice what was done, took it ill, but becauſe the ſolemnity was paſt, made Hildeprand King together with himſelf. The following year was eminent for the Ends of three mighty Men in the World, Leo the Emperour, Charles Martel lately mentioned, and Gregory the Roman Patriarch; to whom ſucceeded one Zachary a Greek by birth. This Zachary was ſcarcely ſetled in his Chair when he ſent to Liutprand, and demanded the four Towns to be redelivered, to which Meſſage he anſwered, that when he ſhould come to the Places, he would give him abundant ſatisfaction. Liutprand in the mean time reſolved, not to ſuffer Traſemund ſo to carry the Dukedom of Spoletum; but the Year that followed made war upon him by the Aſſiſtence eſpecially of Rachis the Duke of Forum Julii. Traſemund aware of their coming, went to meet them at the Place he thought they would land their Men, and when there he miſſed of his opportunity followed them to Forum Sempronii, and reached them in the middle of the Foreſt. Rachis and his Brother Aiſtulf, with their Forojulians brought up the Rere, and being firſt ingaged, though the Commanders omitted nothing of their Duty, many of them were ſlain. Rachis by one Berto of Spoletum, was challenged to a ſingle Combat, wherein he diſmounted his Enemy, and ſuffered him to creep away on his Hands and Knees into the Wood. Aiſtulf was by two ſet upon on a Bridge, both whom he tumbled down into the River, and eſcaped. Traſemund found himſelf concerned to retreat to Spoletum, where he was beſieged, and at length being forced to yield, was compelled to enter into Orders. Then did the King beſtow the Title, and Office of Duke upon Aſprand another of his Nephews.

Death of three great Perſons.

A. D. 741.

49. In the mean time Liutprand reſtored not the Places before mentioned to the Biſhop, who wondering thereat, reſolved to doe as Gregory the ſecond his Predeceſſour had done before him; to go himſelf in Perſon and ſpeak with him, then lying at Interamna, in the Territories of Spoletum. Liutprand hearing of his coming ſent Grimoald with a Complement and order to bring him on his way as far as Narnia, where he was to be received by the Army. He himſelf when he drew nigh to Interamna,went out to meet him, and after ſome friendly diſcourſe diſmiſſed him to his Lodgings. The next day coming again together, the Biſhop clawed him with good words. “He related how for his Predeceſſours ſake he had raiſed his “ Siege from before Rome, and commending him for his Juſtice and holy demeanour “ towards all men,put him in mind what a blot it would be upon his Memory,
“ as well as a wound upon his Conſcience, to break his word given to St. Peter, and
“ to rob him and the Church, to which he had pretended to bear ſo good affection:
“ In ſumm he deſired he would give up the four Towns he had ſo long held in his “ hands, and farther make a League with the Church, which if he did, he might “ be ſure to have everlaſting Salvation after death, and eternal Renown with all Poſterity.
“ We are told the Device ſo took, that Zachary obtained whatſoever he deſired, not only the four Towns, but a League with the Church for twenty years; and moreover ſome Lands in Sabinum, which thirty years before had been taken away with others in Narnia, Ancona, Auximum and Humum, which they called Patrimonies, and the Valley known by the Name of the Great, in the Territories of Sutrium. The next day having lovingly dined together, the Biſhop departed to receive the Towns from the Kings Commiſſioners, who were Hildebrand his Nephew Duke of Cluſium, Tacpert, Raning, and Grimoald, Gaſtalds of Etruria. Firſt he recieved Ameria, then Orta, afterward Polimartium, and at length through the Borders of Tuſcia belonging to the Lombards and the Sabini they came to Bleda. Thence returned he to Rome,where,as well he might, for joy be made a Solemn Proceſſion.

Anaſtaſius.

Liutprand perſwaded to be kind to the See of Rome.

ceſſion. And theſe things were thus tranſacted in the Tenth Indiction, if we believe Anaſtaſius who was Library keeper to ſome of his Succeſſours.

Gode-ſchalck, Dei ſervus. Nam Deum non aliter quam bonum nominare mos erat Germanis. Schalc ſervus in Novo Teſtamento ſæpe, hinc Marſchalck & alia. Paulus Diaconus, Lib. 6. Cc. 57, 58.

Invades again the Exarchate.

50. Liutprand all this while did not forget Godeſcalck, who both had ſeized on the Dutchy of Beneventum without his leave, and had aſſiſted Traſemund alſo in his Rebellion. Having rid his hands of Traſemund, he led an Army againſt him, but he durſt not abide his coming, but reſolved to fly into Greece, which as he attempted, and had put his Wife and Houſhold-ſtuff into the Ship, when he himſelf was to go aboard he was killed by thoſe Citizens of Beneventum, that bore good will to Giſulf, and his Wife eſcaped ſafe to Conſtantinople with all ſhe had. Liutprand coming to the City reſtored Giſulf his Nephew to the Title and Office of Duke, whom he had formerly removed for his Youth and Inability to govern: The following year and the eleventh Indiction, as Anaſtaſius aſſures us, either impatient of reſt, or out of an ambitious deſire of farther Conqueſt, he again invaded the Exarchate, and having taken Cæſena, openly ſhewed that he intended once more to be Maſter of Ravenna. Eutychius the Exarch, as well as John the Arch-biſhop, with the Citizens and the Cities of Pentapolis and Æmilia knowing themſelves too weak to make reſiſtence, betook themſelves to Zachary, whoſe authority they knew to be ſo ſacred and inviolable with the King, that he would deny him nothing. He ſent a Meſſage to him to reſtore Cæſena, and to leave the Exarchate in repoſe, and it being rejected, he himſelf made a Journey firſt to Ravenna and thence to Pavia, where he cauſed the King to conquer his Inclinations, to reſtore Cæſena, and promiſe not any more to offer violence to the Exarchate. The Biſhop ſhortly after his Return (of which, as alſo his Journey, Paul the Deacon makes no mention, though by reaſon of the Age he liv'd in he could not be ignorant of ſo notable a matter) had News brought him of the ſudden death of Liutprand, who left this life after he had reigned one and thirty Years and ſeven Months. A man of great worth, if his extreme thirſt after Conqueſt and Domination be excepted, though Paul to other great Commendations adds this, That he was a lover of Peace, which muſt be reſtrain'd to what he coucludes his Book with, that with the greateſt care he preſerved Peace with the Franks and Avares. For together with his Life Paul ſhuts up his Hiſtory of the Acts of the Lombards. He was Deacon of the Church of Forum Julii, in the Territories of which Leuphis his Great Grandfather's Father ſeated himſelf, when with the Lombards his Country-men he came into Italy. He dying there, left five Sons who were all taken away into Captivity by the Avares at that time, that Romilda the Wife of Giſulf betrayed Forum Julii into the hands of their King. Of theſe five only Lupicis returned into the place of his Nativity (of the ſtrange Circumſtances of his Return, let the Reader if he liſt conſult the Authour himſelf) where he married and begat a Son named Arichis. This Arichis had a Son named Warnefrid who by Theudelinda his Wife had our Hiſtorian, (beſides another Son called Arichis) whom we can eaſily believe to have been a Lombard by deſcent, though he had not told us. For Jornandes, the Hiſtorian of the Goths, and he, by the manner of their writing, ſufficiently diſcover that Natural affection which men bear to the Stocks from whence they proceed.

Liutprand dies.

The Hiſtory of Paulus Diaconus endeth with him.

Liup-gis, Amore fortis. Liup, Amor, Anglis Love. Hinc Liupman & alia in vocab. Allem. Leupichis idem quod Liup-gis. Lib.4. c.39. Warne-frid, cuſtos pacis.

Hildebrand his Nephew ſucceeds.

Vide Sigonium.

51. Liutprand being dead Hildeprand or Hildebrand his Nephew (i. e. his Grandſon, as Sigonius interprets it) ſucceeded him in the Government, whom being formerly choſen by the People he had confirmed, as we formerly ſhewed. But his former Election and Confirmation were not of ſuch moment with the Lombards, but that rejecting him of whom they themſelves had made the choice, after ſeven months they depoſed him, and made King in his room Rachis the Duke of Forum Julij, a man much admired for his Virtues. Rachis with univerſal applauſe having aſcended the Throne, ſhewed that though he was fit for War, yet he deſired Peace; and became the great Patron of Churches. And in the ſecond year of his Reign finding the Laws (notwithſtanding the ſeveral Alterations made by his Predeceſſours) to be defective, he ſummoned all the Judges of the Lombards, both out of Auſtria and Neuſtria, and according to their Judgment and Approbation, amended and added what was faulty or defective. The year which followed this, being the ſecond of his Reign, on the firſt of March, and the fourteenth Indiction he publiſhed his Amendments with a Proeme, wherein he takes notice how Rothair, Grimoald and Liutprand his Predeceſſours had taken the ſame care before him; but he having ſeriouſly conſidered of what they had publiſhed, found ſome things good, and other things fit to be purged and corrected. Some five years he ſpent in the Studies of Peace and Laws, and then a fit of War took him, being no longer able to ſubſiſt without ſome Martial Diverſions. He invaded Pentapolis, where having at the Makes War on the Biſhop of Romes Towns.

the firſt onſet taken moſt of the Towns, he paſſed thence into the Dukedom of Rome, and the Territories belonging to the Biſhop, and laid cloſe Siege to Peruſia. The Emperour was far off, and ſeemed not much to regard how matters went in Italy. The Exarch had Will enough, but wanted Might to protect the Borders of his own Juriſdiction; much more to give aſſiſtence to his Neighbours at a diſtance. Zachary therefore ſaw it was incumbent upon him, ſeeing he could not doe it by force, to try if he could drive the danger farther from himſelf by his Authority, and undertake another Journey, his former having been ſo ſucceſsfull.

52. He came to Rachis as he lay incamped before Peruſia, and there ſorely laid the Law unto him, urging how unbecoming, not to ſay wicked, a thing it was for a Catholick Prince, and one who had been ſo eminent a Law-maker to invade that to which he had no right, to injure other Chriſtians, who had never by any Miſdemeanour provoked him, and eſpecially violate the Goods and Poſſeſſions of St. Peter. He is ſaid to have made ſo copious and convincing an Oration concerning Juſtice and Oppreſſion, and the Rewards and Puniſhments of another World, that Rachis not onely raiſed the Siege from before Peruſia, but reſtored the places he had taken in Pentapolis: Nay, the Preſence and Authority of the Biſhop had ſuch incredible influence upon him, that taking his Wife and Daughter along with him, he muſt needs the following year go to viſit him at Rome, where he took Orders from the hands of Zachary, and became a Monk in the Monaſtery of St. Benedict at Caſſinum; his Wife and Daughter beſtowing themſelves in a Nunnery not far off, of their own founding. Thus Zachary made Monks of Kings much at the ſame time, one at his own deſire, and another ſore againſt his will, at the Suggeſtion and Importunity of others; one by his own Reſignation, and another at the ambitious ſolicitation of other perſons: For this very year, as Sigonius reckons, did he by his Authority declare Chilperick King of the Franks, to be no King, and Pipin the Major of the Palace to enjoy the Title, as well as the Power; after which Chilperick was depoſed, and thruſt into a Monaſtery. But Rachis having thus outed himſelf after he had reigned about ſix years, the Lombards meeting together choſe Aiſtulf his Brother to ſucceed him, a man as fit for the place as any, both in reſpect of his Wiſedom and Courage. Yet in the beginning of his Reign he followed the footſteps of his Brother, preferring Peace before Martial Actions, and was perſwaded by Stephen the Biſhop of Rome, to enter into a League with his Church for forty years: No ſooner had he taken upon him a Royal Crown, but Anſelme the Duke of Forum Julii, whoſe Siſter Giſeltrade he had married, renounced his Ducal Coronet, and entred into a Monaſtery; into whoſe place Peter the Son of Munichis was preferred.

Perſwaded by the Biſhop he reſtores all,

And turns Monk.

A. D. 750.

His Brother Aiſtulf made King.

53. But Aiſtulf having ſetled well his matters, in the ſpace of two years, had then as reſtleſs a fit upon him as Liutprand or Rachis his Predeceſſours, and as violent a paſſion for inlarging his Dominion. After the example of Liutprand he reſolved to ſet firſt upon the Exarchate, becauſe he thought Conſtantine the Emperour did not much concern himſelf with the Affairs of Europe, and if he ſhould, he could leaſt doe it at this time when he was engaged in another War, and all Greece and Aſia were miſerably waſted by a raging Peſtilence. With greater preparations than ever formerly had been made he marched to Ravenna, and with all the ſtrength the Lombard Kingdom could afford, ſet upon it. Eutychius who was ſtill Exarch there made all the reſiſtence he poſſibly could, arming the Townſmen, oppoſing force to force, and ſtrategem to ſtrategem, till ſeeing the Town exhauſted and no hope of any ſuccours from abroad, he reſolved to yield, and without any hope of recovering the place as formerly, withdrew himſelf into Greece. The Head of the Exarchate or Metropolis being thus taken, all the inferiour Members eaſily were reduced to the ſame condition, together with Pentapolis. So here ends this Government of the Exarchs, or Lieutenants of the Emperours which had preſerved, in an eminent height of luſtre and dignity, a ſhew and repreſentation of the ancient Roman Empire, for near two hundred years, from the time that Narſes left his Employment. And here doth the conſtant Domination or Empire of Revenna receive its period, which began at ſuch time as Honorius removed his Seat from Rome to this City.

Falls upon Ravenna.

Which being taken,

The Exarchate falls.

A. D. 753.

54. Now did the Kingdom of the Lombards comprehend all Italy, Rome onely, and the Roman or Pontificial Dominions excepted. Aiſtulf being Maſter of the Exarchate and Pentapolis, notwithſtanding the League made with Stephen, grudged that ſo good a ſhare of the Countrey ſhould be kept from him, and eaſily made himſelf beleive he had a Title to it, ſeeing the Exarch formerly had Authority as well over the Romans as others, and how they came to be abſolved from their obedience to the Emperour, whoſe Succeſſour by right of War he was, he could not well ſee; notwithſtanding the Hereſie that had been laid to the charge of Leo, and the pretended power challenged by Gregory and his Succeſſours of diſpoſing of other mens Eſtates. In the fourth month therefore after the making of the League he entred with an Army the Territories of Narnia, which Town he preſently took, and thence ſent to the Biſhop to let him know that he would by Arms reduce their Countrey and City to his abſolute obedience, except they would yeild to pay him a yearly tribute of a golden Solidus for every Head. The Biſhop being extremely ſtartled at the Meſſage, ſent two Abbats of good Report back to him, to put him in mind of the League he had lately made, and by all Arguments and Perſwaſions to move him not to commit ſo perfidious, and otherwiſe wicked an act as he was about; and beſides they went not empty handed: but the King rejected both the Meſſengers and their Preſents. Stephen upon the firſt Irruption made by Aiſtulf into the Exarchate had diſpatched away his Letters to Conſtantine to let him know what the Lombard deſigned, and to remonſtrate to him how pernicious it would be to his Empire, and how great a blot would lye upon his memory to all poſterity if he ſuffered theſe Dominions in Italy to be loſt. The year after came John a Silentiary with Letters from the Emperour, written both to the King and the Biſhop, whom Stephen ſent away with his own Brother Paul to Aiſtulf, who then wintred at Ravenna, joyning with Conſtantine in this requeſt, that he would reſtore ſuch Places as he had already taken, and remove the danger from thoſe which had reaſon to apprehend an impending miſcheif.

Aiſtulf invades the Roman Territories.

55. To this he onely ſaid, that he would return anſwer to the Emperour by an Ambaſſadour of his own, which the Biſhop underſtanding, ſent to Conſtantine the ſecond time, to let him know that Intreaties would doe nothing, and that therefore he was obliged in honour, by virtue of the Dignity which he bore, with Arms and Force to reduce the proud Lombard into order. No ſooner were the Meſſengers diſpatched, but Aiſtulf was in the Bowels of the Roman Territories, which he waſted with Fire and Sword, took their Towns, led away the Inhabitants into Captivity, and now at length removed to the City it ſelf, where he denounced Ruine and Servitude, both to the Romans and their Prelates, except they would yeild up both their Cities and their own Perſons into his Power. The Biſhop in ſo great a ſtrait, after his Prayers made, bethought himſelf of Foreign Aid, foraſmuch as there was none could be hoped for out of Italy. He remembred the obligations which Zachary his Predeceſſour had put upon Pipin the new King of the Franks, by procuring him no leſs than the Kingdom, at leaſt it was believed that it came by his means. He choſe out a truſty Servant, who in the habit of a ſtranger eſcaped by the Lombards and got to Pipin, with this Errand, "That the Biſhop would gladly meet him in ſome ſafe and convenient "place, but ſeeing he was Beſieged and could not come at him, he deſired he "would ſend his Ambaſſadours to procure him liberty to come to his preſence. Pipin was very willing to pleaſure him, not ſo much out of gratitude to his See, for what Zachary had done (by whoſe authority and reputation the depoſition of Chilperick, a thing not to be believed had been made juſt and lawfull, though he had nothing committed which deſerved ſo great a cenſure, and the fault was not his that was objected againſt him) as in forecaſt to ſerve himſelf of this preſent Pope in the behalf of his two Sons, Charles and Carloman, to ſettle the Succeſſion upon them. Glad of ſuch an occaſion, he ſent a Duke and an Abbat on the Embaſſy, who met with John the Silentiary, returned back with the Biſhops Meſſengers from Conſtantinople, and joyning with him obtained leave for Stephen to come forth of the City. On the twenty ſecond of October, the ſeventh Indiction he came forth, and with the Ambaſſadours took the way for Pavia, to which when he approached, Aiſtulf ſent a Meſſage to him, requiring that he ſhould not ask of him Ravenna, or the Exarchate, or any thing which had been taken by the Lombards, "yet not affrighted he ceaſed not to importune him to "reſtore what he had unjuſtly got from other men, and particularly Ravenna the "Seat of the Empire in Italy; which the very Barbarous Alboin and Authair "had ſpared, leſt he ſhould be branded by Poſterity, with more odious Epithetes "than thoſe of Heathen and Heretick. The Ambaſſadours of Conſtantine made the ſame demand, but Aiſtulf was deaf to all their charmes, and very unwillingly, as he had reaſon, permitted the Biſhop to goe for France.

The Biſhop of Rome goes into France.

56. On the fourteenth of November he ſet forward toward the Alpes, and coming to Pipin, eaſily prevailed with him to undertake a War with the Lom- bard for the Church, and the Redemption of the Exarchate; and becauſe one good turn requires another he was prevailed with to ſtay till Winter was over, and the Army could be ready to march, and in the mean time to anoint Kings of France, Charles and Carloman, the more effectually to recommend them to the People. Aiſtulf all this while as a Man unconcerned about War, applied himſelf vigorouſly to the Affairs of Peace, making another Amendment of the Edict or Body of Laws formerly publiſhed, and ſo oft amended by his Predeceſſours. “In “the Preface he ſignifieth, that having ſeriouſly weighed what had been done by “them; he found ſome things wanting, which defect was the Original of great “Errours. Therefore in the fifth Year of his moſt happy Reign, in the Name “of God, on the firſt day of March, the ſeventh Indiction; having called together his Judges from the ſeveral Parts of his Kingdom, he cauſed to be affixed to “the Leaves of the Edict, what ſeemed juſt to his Excellency, and agreeable to the “mind of the Lord. The Biſhop of Rome, being all this while in France, fell ſick, and therefore the Expedition was put off till the Month of Auguſt, wherein he anointed Pipin, his Wife and both their Sons. Then in Order to his Return, finding theſe Kings, and their Subjects ſufficiently propenſe to gratifie him, whereas at his firſt coming he had ſo worded it, that Pipin underſtood the Exarchate was to be reſtored to the Commonwealth or Empire, now making uſe of his time he turned his Tale, and though he had ſo much preached the Doctrine of Reſtitution to the right Owners, unto Aiſtulf; he contended that neither the Exarchate nor Pentapolis was to be reſtored to the Emperour, for this reaſon, becauſe Conſtantine was unworthy to have any thing to doe in Italy, who had forſaken it, and exerciſed open Enmity with the Church. If ſo be Pipin would diſcharge the Duty of a gratefull Man, or conſult his Souls Health, or give any reward to the Biſhop for the danger he had undergone, and the pains he had taken for the good of Italy and the Church, he ſhould grant both the Countries to St. Peter. He ſo prevailed upon Pipin, that he openly promis'd, that in caſe it pleaſed God to make him victorious over the Lombards, to obtain the Remiſſion of his Sins, he would take away the Exarchate, and Pentapolis from the Commonwealth of Rome, and deliver them to St. Peter, and his Succeſſours, to be poſſeſſed by them for ever. This he cauſed the Clerk to record, and confirmed it farther by his own Oath, and the Oaths of his two Sons, Charles and Carloman then preſent.

Que Præcellentiæ noſtræ ſecundum Dominum juſta comparuerunt.

Proxima æſtate exercitum trans Alpes trajecturum, & Aiſtulfum, ſi ultro nolit, per vim Exarchatum & cætera. loca juri Reip. reſtituere coacturum. Sigon. de Reg. Italiæ. lib. 3. p. 126.

Nè ea redderetur Imp. contendit. Quippe Conſtantium propter deſertam Italiæ tutelam, & inimicitias cum Eccleſia apertè ſuſceptas, indignum eſſe, qui rerum in Italia potiretur. Quod ſi Pipinus aut grati hominis officium præſtare, aut, &c. p. 127.

57. During the Preparations for War, we are told that Aiſtulf was once and again importuned, and with great gifts allured to ſurrender the Cities; but when neither gifts nor intreaties would prevail, in the eighth Indiction, Pipin cauſed his Armies to begin their march through the Territories of Vienna. Now again it pleaſed the Biſhop out of his Abhorrence of the Effuſion of Bloud, and hope that he might by the report of ſo great an Army be frighted into a Compliance, to ſend once more to Aiſtulf, to invite him to doe by fair means, what elſe he ſhould be compelled. By the Ambaſſadours of Pipin he ſent his Letters, wherein by the Holy Myſteries, and the dreadfull day of Judgment it ſelf, he beſought him that peaceably and without bloud, he would reſtore what he had taken to the Holy Church, and the Commonwealth of the Romans. This he obſtinately again refuſed to doe, adding Threats both againſt Stephen, Pipin, and his Followers. Pipin then proceeding towards Italy, ſent a Party to the Alpes, to ſeize on the Straits, and ſecure his Paſſage, which Aiſtulf underſtanding, and deſpiſing the Franks for their Number, with a Multitude of his Lombards he haſted thither, and very confidently fell upon them; but the Franks having the Advantage of the Ground, and being a Party of choice Men picked out, ſo warmly received him, that they made great ſlaughter of his Men, which he not enduring is ſaid to have ran away to Pavia, there to abide the Storm that was coming upon him. Pipin finding the Paſſage clear, marched on without any Moleſtation, and with the Accidents uſually accompanying ſuch Invaſions, came and ſate down before Pavia, whence perceiving that the King would not ſtir, he haraſſed the Countrey round about, and made his ſiege as ſtrait as could be. Aiſtulf ſeeing what advantage the other had againſt him, within a ſhort ſpace thought it beſt to come to a Treaty, wherein it was agreed, that by a corporal Oath he ſhould ingage to reſtore the Exarchate with Pentapolis, and whatſoever other Places he had taken, and for farther Confirmation hereof, give up forty Hoſtages which were to be ſent into France. This done, Pipin, though in the middle of Winter, returned back into his own Countrey, and Stephen the Biſhop with great Joy and Expectation to his See.

Pipin at his Requeſt invades Italy.

And forces Aiſtulf to Terms.

58. They

Sect. 4.

Aiſtulf again for fear of Pipin quits Rome.

58. They being returned and the Tempeſt quite blown over, Aiſtulf repented of what he had done, and was ſo far from delivering up the Places, that gathering an Army together at Ravenna, he brake into the Roman Territories, and doing therein all violence poſſible came before the City, having ſeized on Narnia, which not long before he had reſtored. He thought that Pipin, having already diſcharged the Duty of a Friend, would no more paſs over the Alpes in behalf of the Biſhop; who, having quite other thoughts, ſent away his Meſſengers by Sea, that they might have a more ſafe and ſpeedy paſſage, by all things ſacred conjuring the King, that he would make good what he had promiſed to St. Peter. Pipin in great wrath denounces War afreſh, and for that purpoſe makes new Levies, which Aiſtulf hearing and ſurprized with the News, after three Months ſiege leaves Rome, and hurries away to defend his own Quarters. It was now Autumn, when Pipin being in a readineſs began his march, and paſſing the Alpes with little Difficulty, came and beſieged Aiſtulf in Pavia, as formerly. It was not yet known at Rome, that he had paſſed the Mountains, where were arrived from the Emperour two Ambaſſadours, George a Protonotary and John the Silentiary, who were to deal with Pipin about reſtoring the Exarchate and Pentapolis to the Empire; for they had heard at Conſtantinople, how the Roman Biſhop had been tampering about them. From Rome they ſtreight departed for Marſeilles, where being arrived, they had News of Pipin's being in the Territories of the Lombards. Stephen had alſo ſent his Meſſengers with them, whom, becauſe they might probably hinder his buſineſs, George cauſed his Fellow John there by ſome Arts to detain, and he went before to Pavia, where having Audience of Pipin, he delivered his Meſſage as advantageouſly as he could. But Pipin with the greateſt Piety (ſo the Biſhop's Favourers write) anſwered, that by no humane Rewards he was induced to doe what he did, but inflamed with a deſire of procuring the Favour of Almighty God, he had received the Church of Rome into his Protection, perſwading himſelf it was for the Health of his Soul, and would avail for the Remiſſion of his Sins. In caſe he ſhould recover the Exarchate and Pentapolis, he had ſworn to deliver them to St. Peter, and his Succeſſours; and by no reaſons or Arguments whatſoever would be drawn from being as good as his word, and diſcharging his Duty.

And gives up the Exarchate and Pentapolis to the Biſhop.

The Cities of the Exarchate.

Of Pentapolis.

59. In the mean time Aiſtulf was cloſely beſieged, and ſo much ſtraitned, that fearing the Effects of a Storm, he ſent out to Pipin his Plenipotentiaries to make an Agreement, who offered not onely to reſtore the Exarchate and Pentapolis, but Comachim alſo to redeem his Peace. Pipin accepted of their Propoſals, and the Agreement was ratified by Oaths, and giving up of new Hoſtages; which done, Pipin again ſurrendred the Exarchate and Pentapolis to St. Peter, and his Succeſſours to be held by them for ever, and commanded Inſtruments of the Donation to be drawn accordingly. Leaving Fulrade the Abbat to receive all agreed on from Aiſtulf, and to put them into the Biſhop's Hands; he ſhortly after departed into France. Fulrade going with the Commiſſioners of Aiſtulf, received all the Cities of the Exarchate and Pentapolis from their Hands, except Ferraria, Faventia and Caballum, and having from every one of them Hoſtages, he took along with him to Rome the Principal Inhabitants, and he laid up the Keys of the ſeveral Cities together with the Inſtruments of the Donation in the Confeſſion of St. Peter. Now to underſtand theſe matters more clearly, the Reader may know, that in the Exarchate were compriſed theſe Cities: Ravenna, Bononia, Imola, Faventia, Forum Popilii, Forum Livii, Cæſena, Bobium, Ferraria, Comachim, Adria, Ficolæ and Gabellum. Pentapolis contained theſe: Ariminum, Piſauram, Concha, Fanum, Senogallia, Ancona, Auximum, Humana, Æſium, Forum Sempronii, Mons Feretri, Urbinum, the Balnenſian Territory, Calles, Luceoli and Eugubium, with the Forts and Territories to theſe Cities belonging, all which had afterward the Name of the Marquiſate of Ancona. But thus the Biſhop of Rome became poſſeſſed of other Mens Goods, the Reader ſees how, and for what Reaſons the Emperour the Right owner was deprived, by what Arts and Devices is alſo manifeſt. Stephen committed the Government of Ravenna to the Arch-biſhop, and the Tribunes of the City, whereupon the Archbiſhop afterward wrote himſelf Exarch. As for Aiſtulf who was but juſtly compelled to ſurrender, having had as little right to theſe Eſtates as he who now poſſeſſed them; we are told that the following year he ſpent in Conſultations how to break the Agreement, and toward the end of it, being in hunting either thrown by his Horſe, or as others wrote wounded by a wild Boar died within a few days after, whoſe Actions we might poſſibly have had related with more favourable Circumſtances, had either 756.

Aiſtulf dies.

Sect. 4.

Paul the Deacon continued his Hiſtory ſo far, or any other of his Nation written his Life, or any indifferent Pen had tranſmitted theſe Revolutions to Poſterity. But Paul living in the time of Charles the Great, the Son of Pipin, when it was a Crime to write any thing well though truth of the Lombards, (for looſers in theſe caſes of Conqueſt have not leave to talk) durſt not burn his fingers by medling with matters of ſo late concernment; and therefore wiſely left off where theſe things began, which brought deſtruction to the Lombard Kingdom. His Countreymen for the ſame Reaſon were all ſilent. They onely were Publiſhers of theſe tranſactions, who were joyned both in their Affections and Intereſts with the Prevalent Party.

Deſiderius makes himſelf king.

60. Now was Aiſtulf dead, and none left to whom the Kingdom by right of Succeſſion or Inheritance appertained. Therefore Deſiderius, who had been his Comes Stabuli, or Maſter of the Horſe, as alſo promoted to the Dukedom of Tuſcia, ſet up for himſelf by the favour and aſſiſtence of the People of that Countrey. Rachis was ſtill living, and ſo enraged at his Exaltation, that he exchanged his holy Zeal for Indignation, and purpoſed to leave acting the part of a Monk, and reaſſume his former dreſs of Royalty; and he wanted not either Adviſers or Aſſiſtents to ſuch an Undertaking, the Inhabitants of Liguria, Æmilia and Venetia, flocking to him. Deſiderius hereat ſtartled, as being in danger, not onely to miſs of the Kingdom, but to looſe his Dukedom too, took the right courſe to prevent both the one and the other: He betook himſelf to Stephen the Roman Biſhop, and bargained with him to reſtore Faventia, Caballum and Ferraria, which Aiſtulf had ſtill kept in his hands, if either by his Arms or Authority he could maintain him in his poſſeſſion of the Kingdom. The Biſhop having communicated the matter to Fulrade, the Abbat, reſolved to attempt the thing, and ſending him with his Brother Paul into Etruria, made a firm League and Alliance with Deſiderius, and admoniſhed Rachis now the Monk, to hold him to his preſent courſe of life, and not diſturb him whom he had named King and taken for his Alley and Confederate. And if all ſhould fail, Fulrade had got an Army of Franks and Romans together, to diſpute the Controverſie by dint of Sword. So Rachis gave over his Enterprize, and therewith the Lombards of his Party being diſcouraged, Deſiderius enjoyed what he had got; and going to Pavia, where he ſolemnly entred upon the Government, he reſtored Faventia, Caballum and Ferraria, to the Church, according to Articles. Not long after died Stephen on the twenty fifth of April, a man ever to be had in remembrance by his Succeſſours, for his inriching his See with the goodly Poſſeſſions of the Exarchate and Pentapolis, to be compared (as Sigonius writes) with Gregory, ſirnamed Dialogus, who procured for it the Dutchy of Rome.

61. Paul his Brother ſucceeded him, and renewed the League made with Deſiderius, who, in the third year of his Reign, took his Son Adulgiſe to be his Partner in the Kingdom. Giſulf the Duke of Beneventum dying, he beſtowed the Dutchy on Agariſme, who had married his Daughter Adelperga. For ſeveral years he bore himſelf with great reſpect to the Roman Church, and with a mind ſo devoted for Religious matters, that his own Daughter Anſilberga, he made Abbeſs of an Abby of his own founding, and otherwiſe he ſhewed himſelf a great Patron of that Profeſſion. Thus he continued for ſome ten years, and then they tell us he began to ſhew himſelf another man; as if Ambition had been hereditary to theſe Lombard Kings. Paul the Biſhop dying, he cauſed a Schiſm to be made by the illegal promotion of one Conſtantine, and when this Device was fruſtrated by the means of Chriſtopher the Primicerius (or Aſſeſſor to the Biſhop, as was the Secundicerius alſo, they ſitting next to the Duke of the City) who to remove the Schiſm cauſed Stephen the Third to be Canonically choſen, he himſelf went to Rome under a ſhew of Devotion, and there dealt with Affiarta the Duke of the City, to accuſe Chriſtopher and his Son the Secundicerius of ſome feigned Crime, and then having ſeized and made them away, to impriſon or drive thence the moſt Eminent Citizens, and ſo to tame the reſt, as that they ſhould not have courage to attempt any conſiderable matter: At the Inſtance of Bertrade Wife to the late Pipin of France, he gave his Daughter to Carloman one of her Sons, or rather two of his Daughters to her two Sons, for both are affirmed to have married this way. About two years after Carloman died, whoſe Widow Berta finding her ſelf and young Sons not treated after the beſt faſhion by Charles his Brother, they came into Italy to her Father, who was vehemently incenſed againſt Charles, for putting away his other Daughter; and, deſirous to imbrace any occaſion of revenge, purpoſed to get the Boys Conſecrated Kings by the new Roman Biſhop. One of theſe things he hoped would follow: Either he ſhould thereby procure an ill underſtanding betwixt Charles and the Biſhop, or ſome Tumults and Stirs in France, which would preſent him with a fit opportunity of conquering Rome and all Italy.

62. But not knowing how Adrian, at preſent Pope, ſtood affected, he would firſt try him, whether he would renew the League. He anſwered, he was willing to have all Chriſtians his Friends, and the Lombards amongſt the reſt, upon thoſe terms, whereon their Predeceſſours had founded their Alliance; but as for Deſiderius, he had learnt ſo much of his falſeneſs from Stephen, who had lately occupied that See, that he could not truſt him; and when the Ambaſſadours promiſed with Oath, that he ſhould give him full ſatisfaction; he ſaid, that he would return Anſwer by Meſſengers of his own. Deſiderius judging by this Reply, that he was not to be truſted, would get by force what he could not obtain by Intreaties; and when Adrian had not ſate two full Months, he brake into the Exarchate, where he ſpeedily took Ferraria, Comachim and Faventia; making open ſhew that he would attack Ravenna it ſelf. Adrian having notice ſent order to his Meſſengers that were on their way, as far as Peruſium, to make demand of the places lately taken. The King anſwered, that if the Biſhop would come to him he ſhould command him; which he refuſing to doe, he in great wrath invaded Pentapolis; where he waſted the Countrey belonging to Senogaltia, Æſium, Monsferretri, Urbinum, Eugubium, and other Cities, killing the principal Inhabitants of Bleda, who were gone out to reap their Corn, and carrying away much booty and Captives. Ocriculi alſo, within the Borders of Rome, underwent the ſame and worſe fortune. Hereupon the Biſhop ſent to him the Abbat of St. Vincent, with twenty Monks of great Reputation for their Sanctity, who coming to Pavia caſt themſelves at his feet, and beſought him with many tears, to give over thoſe violent courſes, and reſtore ſuch Places as he had taken from the Church. To them he anſwered as before, that he would doe both if Adrian would come to him.

Deſiderius breaks into the Exarchate.

63. To this purpoſe he ſent Ambaſſadours of his own, who deſired a meeting. Adrian made a ſolemn and religious Proteſtation, that if he would but reſtore the Towns of St. Peter, he would either give him a meeting at Rome, or where elſe he pleaſed, and conſult with him for the quiet and Repoſe of Italy; and if he did not, it ſhould be lawfull for him to re-invade the Places at his pleaſure. But in caſe he would not reſtore them, he would never ſee his face, and he ſent two to receive the Cities; but having proteſted the ſame, they received the ſame Anſwer as before. After their return others were ſent, whom he refuſed to ſee, and with great threats diſmiſſed, that he would bring his Army before Rome. Adrian then looking for extremity, cauſed the City to be fortified as well as it might be, and as Stephen his Predeceſſour had done, reſolved to advertiſe Charles the King of the Franks, in what eſtate he was, and to deſire his aſſiſtence. "He ſent one Peter " by Sea to intreat him that, after the Example of his Father and Grandfather, he " would ſuccour the Church now in diſtreſs, and the City of Rome, which was " threatned with deſtruction. The cauſe of ſo wicked an undertaking he told him " was palpable, to compell him to anoint the Sons of Carloman, which how it " ſtood with his Concernments he left it to him in his wiſedom to judge. To this Crimination Deſiderius anſwered in an Edict which he ſent to Grimoald the Count of Viterbium, wherein he ſhewed he had well deſerved of Italy, * contrary to what Adrian had laid to his charge. He reckons up many places built and repaired by him, and concludes, that this is not to deſtroy Etruria, as Adrian accuſeth him, who refuſeth Peace offered by him. He commands therefore Grimoald, that ſo long as Peace continueth doubtfull, he order all the Souldiers of Tuſcia to be in Arms, and to furniſh them with Proviſions and Pay plentifully, that they may not onely be ready to receive an Enemy, but prepared alſo to make an Invaſion. And he requires him not to burthen the People with new Exactions.

64. Adrian his Meſſenger got ſafe to Charles, and eaſily obtained a promiſe to ſtand by his Maſter in all his difficulties whatſoever; for Charles remembred what advantages his Anceſtours had got by adhering to the Church of Rome, and had no reaſon to hope leſs than any of them, conſidering how the World went at this time. He ſent to Deſiderius requiring him to reſtore to the Biſhop what was belonging to him, who promiſed to give him full ſatisfaction; but he was reſolved to try another courſe. Taking his Son Adulgiſe along with him, with his Daughter Berta and her Sons, in a peaceable manner he went towards Rome, under pretence of paying a Vow at the Sepulchres of the Apoſtles, which when he came as far as Spoletum, he cauſed to be ſignified to the Biſhop. Adrian cauſed the Walls and Gates to be ſtrictly guarded, forbidding he ſhould have any entrance, and the Churches of St. Peter and St. Paul without the Walls, to be faſt locked and barred up; which notwithſtanding, when he proceeded on his way, he ſent to him as he lay at Interamna, denouncing unto him by all things ſacred, that without his leave he ſhould not ſet his foot within the Roman Territories. He had before compoſed a Song of heavy Curſes againſt him, his Family, and thoſe that accompanied him in his Journey. But this Denunciation cauſed him to go back, though with an angry and revengefull mind. For now came Ambaſſadours from Charles to ſee whether he had ſatisfied the Biſhop, who at their return ſent ſome of his own back with them, and ordered them to call upon Deſiderius at Pavia, where they had as cool welcome, and as reſolute an Anſwer, as thoſe that had been before them. Proceeding then in their Journey, they ſolicited Charles for help to recover the Cities, which to obtain by fair means, he is ſaid, once more to have ſent to Deſiderius, offering him fourteen thouſand Solidi to ſatisfie the Biſhops pretenſions, but to no purpoſe; reſolving therefore to force him to it for nothing, he call'd an Aſſembly of his Franks, and related to them the whole matter. There was none preſent who did not load Deſiderius with Invectives, and give his Vote for ſending ſpeedy relief to the Church. Then was the War reſolved on, and Levies of Souldiers were made greater for number, and with more care and accurateneſs than ever formerly had been known, which clearly ſignified to any intelligent Perſons, that how ſpecious ſoever their pretences were, the Franks buckled themſelves to this Expedition, not ſo much for the relief of the Church, as to put a Period to the Kingdom of the Lombards.

---

* Nos enim non ſumus Tuſciæ deſtructores ut nos apud Gallos accuſat Hadrianus Papa, nam in Tuſcia ædificavimus à fundamentis, &c. Vide Sigonium, p. 138. Hoc itaque non eſt Etruriam deſtruere, ut nos arguit Hadrianus, qui pacem ultrò à nobis oblatam reſpuit; quare tibi Grimoalde Præfecte Viterbienſis præcipimus, &c.

65. The whole Army coming to the Rendezvous at Geneva, Charles divided it into two Parties, whereof the one he committed to the Conduct of his Uncle Bernard, and the other he led himſelf another way. Deſiderius having certain Intelligence of his Motions, ſent ſome Troops with ſpeed, to make good the Straits, then did he gather out of the Dukedoms of Forum Julij, Beneventum, Spoletum, Etruria, and his whole Kingdom, a vaſt Army, which he ordered to march to Auguſta and Taurinum, to give Charles Battel, in caſe he ſhould deſcend from the Mountains. Charles drawing nigh the Alpes, once more (they ſay) ſent to him, offering him the ſame Sum of Money as formerly, and requiring but the Sons of his Judges, as Hoſtages, for delivery of the Towns, but he gave the ſame reſolute Anſwer; which received, the Franks continued their March till they came to the Straits, which they found ſeized by the Lombards. Charles perceiving they ſtopt the Paſſage, ſent a Party over the Mountains another way, to come upon the back of Deſiderius, which Device took very well; for it put the King into ſuch a fright, that by Night he left his Camp and ran away, which Charles underſtanding, followed him as faſt as he might, and in the purſuit killed many of his followers. But here we arrive at a piece of difficulty, our Authours not agreeing amongſt themſelves concerning what followed, though as we ſaid, being of the contrary Party, they are no ways favourable to the poor Lombards who had no Writers to diſcover their partiality. One ſaith that a great Battel was now fought in a Field lying betwixt Novaria and Papia, where Deſiderius received a great Overthrow, and thence the place had the name of Mortaria. Others will have Deſiderius, without giving Battel, to have fled (ſcarcely looking behind him all the way) to Pavia, where he ſhut himſelf up, having ſtrongly fortified the City. His Son Adulgiſe, with Berta and her Children, he ſent to Verona, the ſecond place for ſtrength and convenience in the Kingdom.

Charles King of the Franks invades Italy.

66. Before ſuch time as Deſiderius went towards the Alpes, we are told that ſome of his Subjects of Spoletum, and of the Reatines, deſpairing of his Succeſs, went to Rome, and put themſelves into the hands of the Biſhop, whence followed ſome out of every City (like good Subjects doubtleſs) and in St. Peter's Church, proſtrating themſelves at his feet, ſwore perpetual Fidelity and Obedience to the Roman Church, cutting their Beards and their Hair after the faſhion of the place. But after it was once noiſed that Deſiderius was beaten back from the Straits, all the reſt, in a manner, fled to Rome; where binding themſelves with the ſame Oath, they were kindly entertained. The Biſhop uſing moderation, with the approbation of the Inhabitants, made Hildebrand Duke of Spoletum; and to ſuch Lombards as would dwell at Rome, he gave a place to Inhabit, which from them received the Name of Lombard-ſtreet. The Example of thoſe of Spoletum, was followed followed by the Firmani, thoſe of Auximum and Ancona, with the Citizens of the Caſtle of Felicity, who cut their Hair, and ſurrendered themſelves into the Dominion of the Church. But Charles perceiving Deſiderius would not fight, beſieged him cloſe in Pavia, whither he ſent for his Wife and Sons; and there in the Camp ſpent the former part of a ſharp Winter, till Chriſtmas was over. The Solemnity being paſt, he committed the Siege to the care of his Uncle Bernard, and went himſelf and beleagured Verona, where Adulgiſe deſpairing of holding out, fled, and went into Greece; after whoſe departure the Inhabitants quickly ſurrendered the place, and therein Berta and her Sons, into the hands of Charles, who we are told, ſent them into France, and treated them very honourably; and well he might, conſidering what an Intereſt they had in that Countrey. Verona being gone, upon Summons the reſt of the Cities beyond the Poe, yielded themſelves to the Conquerour, who then returned and reinforced the Siege of Pavia. Eaſter now began to approach, the Feaſt whereof Charles had a great deſire to celebrate at Rome with the Biſhop. Leaving the Siege to be carried on by Bernard, with a ſplendid Train he took his way thither, and being honourably received in every place he paſſed, on Eaſters Eve he arrived at the City.

Verona yielded.

Charles goes to Rome.

67. Adrian conceived himſelf obliged in the moſt honourable way he could, to receive a King ſo great, who had done ſo mighty matters for the Church, and was in a fair way to effect more. Firſt, all the Judges went out and received him with Banners thirty Miles from the City. A Mile off all the Schools met him, the Children bearing in their hands the Branches of Palmes and Olives, and ſinging out his Commendations. The Rere was brought up by many Croſs-bearers, as it was the Cuſtome of old for Exarchs and Patritians to be received. The Biſhop himſelf early in the morning, with all the Clergy and People, went to the Vatican Church, where ſitting with his Clergy upon the Steps, he received him. Charles, as ſoon as he ſaw the Croſſes, alighted from his Horſe, and with his Judges went the reſt of the way on foot, till he came to the Steps, to every of which (you muſt know) giving a kiſs, he mounted up to the Biſhop, by whom being lovingly received, after mutual Imbraces and Congratulatory Speeches, he was brought into the Church, all the Clergy ſinging, and calling him the Authour of the Publick ſafety and Liberty, and merrily acclaiming, Bleſſed is he that cometh in the Name of the Lord. Afterward with a Train of Biſhops, Abbats, and the Followers of Charles, they came to the Confeſſion, where proſtrate on the ground, they rendred thanks to God and St. Peter for ſo great a Victory; which done, the King deſired he might go into the City to perform a Vow, and viſit the Churches, which the Biſhop permitted; each having firſt ſworn over the Holy Body of the Apoſtle, that he intended no harm to the other. Firſt, he went to our Saviour's Church in the Laterane; where ſeeing the Biſhop adminiſter Baptiſm, after a little ſtay, he returned to the Vatican. The day following being Eaſter day, he made a ſolemn Entry into the City, the ſecond time being received by the Judges and the Roman Souldiers, and came to the Church of St. Mary ad Præſepe, where after Service he dined with Adrian in the Laterane. On the third day in the Vatican after Prayers, the Biſhop cauſed ſolemn thanks to be given him in an Oration. Herein the kindneſſes of Pipin and Martell to the Roman Church were commemorated; the great Piety, Faith and Fortitude of the Family were gloriouſly ſet forth, and therewith was joyned great Commendations of the whole Nation. It was told the Auditours that Charles (not in the leaſt degenerating from the worth of his Anceſtours) was come with a mighty Army againſt the Enemies of the Church; and by the help of God, had been as proſperous as he had been ready to undertake the work. And it was to be hoped, that within few days all Italy would have cauſe to congratulate his complete Victory, as now both Italy and the Church gave him hearty thanks for what he had already performed.

Charles makes a new Donation to the See of Rome.

68. On the fourth day Charles was preſent at Service in the Church of St. Paul. On the fifth the Biſhop procured him to meet him in the Palace of the Vatican, where in the preſence of their Judges he deſired him to make good what Pipin his Father, he himſelf, and his Brother Carloman had ingaged to Stephen at Cariſiacum. Hereupon Charles cauſed the Inſtruments of the Ingagement to be read, afterward with his Judges approved them, they containing a Grant of the Exarchate and Pentapolis. Iterius his Secretary he commanded to add a new Grant, and therein to add Corſica, Sardinia, Sicily, the Territory of Sabinum, the Dukedoms of Spoletum and Tuſcia, with the Revenues paid formerly for theſe Dukedoms to the Lombard Kings; always excepted the Royal Prerogative and Authority, over theſe Dukedoms. The Inſtruments of this Donation being ſigned with his own hand, and atteſted by the Biſhops, Abbats, and his Secretaries, he depoſed upon the Altar of St. Peter, and in the Confeſſion, as Monuments in time to come, binding by Oath himſelf and his to the obſervance of them; and took a Copy of them along with him. For this Donation the Teſtimony of Anaſtaſius the Popes Library-keeper is produced, an Epiſtle of Adrian himſelf to Conſtantine the Emperour and his Empreſs Irene, and the Inſtruments of Ludowick the Son of Charles, wherein it is more fully expreſſed, and whence it appears that the Lombard Dukedom of Tuſcia, comprehended the Caſtle of Felicity, Orbitum, Balneoregium, Ferenti Caſtrum, Viterbium, Marchia Tuſcana, Populonium, Soanæ and Roſellæ. Theſe things thus appointed, when Charles had made a ſtay of eight days in Rome, and in this ſpace ſatisfied the deſires of the Church-men as well as his own Curioſity, he returned to the Camp at Pavia.

69. Here Deſiderius, in a moſt fortified City, reſolved to hold out, knowing that all the Kingdom would be loſt with it, and if it were ſafe the reſt might eaſily be recovered. Though there was ſmall hope of ſtarving the place, or carrying it by any ſtrategem, yet the reaſons that made Deſiderius reſolved on one ſide, made Charles as peremptory on the other, reſolving not to raiſe the Siege till he ſhould have ſome good account of it. But that which breaks ſtone Walls, broke at laſt the reſolution of Deſiderius, and broke open the Gates to the Franks, not onely the Townſmen but Souldiers too, being conquered by Hunger, which being accompanied by a raging Peſtilence, drew neceſſity upon the King, a thing too powerfull for him to withſtand; ſo that at laſt he yeilded up himſelf, his Wife and Children, and all he had into the Power of Charles. By ſo doing, if we believe the flouriſhes of Sigonius, he was more famous, viz. by looſing his Kingdom, than either was Alboin for beginning it, or Agilulf for reducing it into form and order, ſo much fame and favour did the greatneſs of the Conqerour procure unto him. But here was the period of the Kingdom of the Lombards in Italy, in the two hundred and ſixth year after their ſeizing on that Countrey, the ſeven hundred and ſeventy fourth year of our Lord. However ſome Biſhops of Rome have beſpattered the Nation, and the ſucceſs of Charles both eclipſed their glory and ingaged all Pen-men on his ſide and the Pope's (ſo that this late Revolution is deſcribed to us with unworthy and unprobable circumſtances on the Part of Deſiderius) yet were they a People very Warlike and conſiderable. Their Domination being barbarous and cruel at firſt, after they came to taſte of Chriſtian Religion grew more mild and benign: witneſs their good and wholeſome Laws, whereby Theft, Robberies, Murthers and Adultery were ſeverely puniſhed, and the Liberty and Property of private men moſt carefully provided for; witneſs the magnificent Churches, rich and ſpatious Monaſteries, wherewith as Monuments of their Religion they adorned that part of Italy where they had moſt power; the ſumptuous Palaces and endowments of Biſhopricks, the notable Towns they either built from the ground or repaired, the many men eminent for ſanctity, which they highly cheriſhed; and even the Biſhop of Rome himſelf whom they greatly inriched. And though with Sigonius we conclude that Ambition, and a luſt of Reigning caſt them down from the Royal height of Dignity and their ancient Dominion in Italy, yet we ſhall conclude alſo that the enjoyment of other mens Rights, Succeſs and Conqueſt, though they varniſh over Names and Titles, to wiſe and ſober Perſons argue neither true worth, nor ſolid Felicity.

Deſiderius delivers up himſelf and all he hath to Charles.

The Kingdom of the Lombards ends.

70. But having lately mentioned the Laws of the Lombards, we muſt not diſmiſs them without ſome farther reflexions upon that Subject. They had not onely written Laws purely digeſted and ſupplied by their ſeveral Princes upon occaſion, but cuſtomary, whereby Lands and Poſſeſſions were held by Services. Theſe are called Feuda or Feoda, concerning which, both as to the Etymology of the word and the original of the thing, opinions are various. Some derive the word from Faida (whence our Fewde) ſignifying enmity, ſtrife, war or diviſion, in the Tongue of the Lombards; ſome from the word Fœdus, a League or Alliance; ſome from Fieri, and others from Fides or Fidelitas. Accordingly the word is variouſly written ſometimes, (Feodam and Feudam) otherwhile Foeudum, and Fœdum alſo. It properly ſignifies a Salary, or Stipend, and Secondarily, or by way of Tranſlation, the Lands or Territories, which by the good will and bounty of the Lord, the Vaſſal enjoys in the place or room of a Stipend or Salary. It ſeems therefore to be derived from the Saxon or Teutonick word, word, ꝼo, ꝼeh, or ꝼeoh, which the ancient Franks called Fe, and we at this day Fee, for ſo was and is called a Salary, Stipend, or Reward. The Saxon letter h might well be changed into ꝺ, or rather hade or hod might be added, which in Saxon ſignifies a State, Order, or Condition. So might it be called Feodum from ꝼeohaꝺ or ꝼeohoꝺ, as that which was poſſeſſed in the quality or condition of Reward or Stipend. So our Saxon Anceſtours called the Military Order, cnẏꝣꝼhꞇ-haꝺ, as we at this day Knight-hood, and many other things in like manner, as we now ſay Father-hood, Child-hood, Man-hood, and the like.

(Feoda whence ſo called.)

Sect. 4.

71. Whenceſoever the word had its Original, the Original of the thing hath been as much controverted; ſome derive it from the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Romans, from their Patrons and Clients; it being the cuſtome from the time of Romulus for Plebeians to make choice of certain Patritians for their Patrons to protect them, as we have formerly ſhewn out of Dionyſius, they being to ſerve them with their lives and fortunes upon occaſion. In imitation of them the Provincials, and the Aſſociates of the People of Rome had their Patrons in the Senate. Others will have the Stipends of the Roman Souldiers in the Civil Law called Militiæ to have reſembled theſe Feuda, and ſome compare the Coloni Glebæ aſcriptitii, to theſe Vaſſals and Feudataries. But their opinion moſt reſembles the truth, who in this point of the Romans, think the Feuda to have begun under Alexander Severus, at leaſt under Conſtantine the Great. For Severus, as Lampridius the Hiſtorian informeth us, to the Captains and Souldiers of the Limits, gave thoſe grounds that had been taken from the Enemy to be poſſeſſed by their Heirs, in caſe they ſerved in the Wars, wiſely concluding that they would be more carefull and induſtrious to defend their own; which Conſtantine perceiving not to have been practiſed without reaſon, ordered that theſe grounds ſhould paſs alſo to the Heir called Hæres Paganus, the more to oblige his Souldiers to him. But all theſe Remarks conclude nothing as to the Nature of the Feuda, as they are now received amongſt the ſeveral Nations, being conſtituted in a moveable thing, or ſuch as come near thereto, the uſe and Vtile Dominium whereof, is onely granted to the Client, but the Propriety or direct Dominion, neceſſarily remains in the Granter and his Heirs, and beſides that Fidelity which the Client by oath promiſeth to his Patron (from which the one is called Dominus, and the other Fidelis) or Lord, is reſerved a certain Juriſdiction over the Client or Vaſſal in caſe he acted or omitted any thing contrary to their Agreement, and the Nature of the Action of a Feudum, of which there is nothing to be found either in the Laws or Cuſtoms of the Romans. A Perſon very eminent in his Profeſſion writes, that he had looked over all Roman Treatiſes, and thoſe Books alſo which have been written of theſe Feuda, and from them all (a very few onely excepted) he pronounces that the Feuda were utterly unknown to the Roman Laws, and not the leaſt Footſteps of them are to be found in that of Juſtinian, but that they roſe up from the Manners and Cuſtoms of other Nations after the Roman Empire was ruined in the Weſt.

Vid. Dr. Duke, de Auth. Juris civilis, lib. 1. cap. 6.

Molinæus des Fefs. n. 5.

72. But of what Nations it is farther controverted. The ſame learned Perſon is concerned for the Honour of his own, and beſides him ſome few others contend that the Feuda were introduced by the Kings of the Franks, before the Domination of the Lombards in Italy. It appears indeed from Gregory Turonenſis and others, that there were Dukes and Counts which held certain Territories, and that there were Leudes which are interpreted Vaſſals. But yet from the Nature of the Offices of theſe Dukes and Counts, can nothing certain be concluded to make them Feuda; ſo uncertain was their Tenure and Succeſſion therein, and ſome Image or Reſemblance there might be of theſe Feudataries, but no perfect Idea of theſe Leudes. The general opinion of Authours is that the Feuda had their Original from the Lombard Kings in Italy, who, as the Reader may diſcover by what we have written, were wont to grant Cities, Towns and Territories to Dukes and Captains to uſe and enjoy, the direct Dominion ever reſerved to themſelves. For farther Confirmation hereof, and in anſwer to what is objected on the French Part, there is one who proves, that the greateſt part of the Cuſtoms, and moſt of the words which the French themſelves uſe about theſe Feuda, were taken from the Lombards. The words are Teutonick, and ſavour not onely of the German Tongue, but its moſt ancient Dialect or the old Saxon; whence, and becauſe the Lombards were a Teutonick Nation, ſome will have the firſt Original of Feuda to have been in Germany it ſelf, and they fanſie they find ſomewhat of the Condition of Vaſſals in the Story of Tacitus, which he tells concerning the Comites amongſt the Germans; who brought Council and Authority to the Princes of Gregor. Turon. l. 8. c. 9.

They had their Original from the Lombards.

Equinarius Baro, de jure benefic. lib. 1. in præf. ad Joan. Bertrand. Franc. Cancel.

Spelmanni Gloſſar. in voc. Feudum.

Sect. 4. of the Villages, and they think this adds ſome force to their Conceit, that Vaſſal is derived by ſome Etymologiſts from the German word Geſſel, by which is expreſſed the Latin word Comes.

73. The truth ſeems to be this. There was ſomething of this ſort of Service and Dependence practiſed by the ancient Germans, which being by all the Barbarous Teutonick Nations partly brought out of that Countrey, were mightily ſtrengthened and confirmed by certain practices, which at that time the Neceſſity of Affairs put the Roman Emperours and other Princes upon. Severus and Conſtantine the Great, and after them others found it highly convenient for the Safety of their Territories, to beſtow part of them upon Captains, and Souldiers as Wages, or Fees, or Rewards, and placed them upon the Borders where moſt danger lay, that by protecting what they now looked upon as their own, by one and the ſame Act they might alſo defend the whole Empire. Barbarous Princes taking up this cuſtome, as highly neceſſary, formed it according to their own, and ſhaped it into a Service and Dependence ſuitable to their own German practices. Hence came it to paſs that not onely the Lombards, but in truth the Franks had ſome Services of this Nature, and this is to be obſerved, that theſe German Nations the nearer they were to the Romans, and the more ſubjected to Invaſions, the more perfect and formal were theſe Vaſſalages and Services. Therefore do we hear little or nothing of Feuda amongſt our Saxon Anceſtours here in Britain, nor amongſt the Goths in Spain. The Lombards, being neareſt the Romans, learnt the fore-mentioned Cuſtome from them, and being as in a Pit invironed with Adverſaries, were put upon joining it with their own, and framing them into a German or Teutonick Model. As the Emperours of old aſſigned Lands to their Captains by way of Fee or Stipend, and to protect the Borders, ſo did they. But they added a peculiar Oath of Fidelity and Homage, and not onely Grounds upon the Limits in the Mouth of Danger, but even all their Countrey they diſtributed to be held by Fidelity and Services, as we ſee by the many Dukedoms into which it was divided. And mutual at laſt, by practice and continuance, began the Obligations of Lord and Vaſſal. At firſt it was in the Power of the Lord to take away what he had granted in Feudo when he pleaſed. Afterward it was to be certain to the Vaſſal for a Year, and a Year onely, and at length the Poſſeſſion was extended to the Term of Life. But his Poſterity being ſtill unprovided for, it was brought down to one of his Sons, on whom the Lord would pleaſe to confer it, and at laſt came to be diſtributed equally amongſt them all. Lib. 1. Tit. 1.

74. Afterwards Conradus Salicus the Emperour, in the Year 1025, going to Rome to take the Crown from the Hands of John, the twentieth, his Vaſſals petitioned him to exact by a Law, that the Feoda might deſcend to Grandſons, and that a Brother or his Son might ſucceed to one that died without lawfull Iſſue, in that which had been poſſeſſed by their Father. But in caſe one of the Brothers received a Fee (ſo now will we call it) from the Hands of a Lord; he dying without a lawfull Heir, his Brother could not ſucceed in the Fee, and although it were received in general, yet could not one ſucceed the other, except it was expreſly by Name ſo provided; viz, that one dying without lawfull Heirs the other ſhould ſucceed, to be ſure an Heir being left the other Brother ſhould be excluded. Its farther to be underſtood, that a Fee or Beneficium collaterally went anciently no farther than Couſin-Germans, but in ſucceeding times came to be ſtretcht as far as the ſeventh Degree, and to Males in a deſcending Line in infinitum. And this is to be noted, that though Daughters as well as Sons ſucceed their Fathers, by the Laws yet they are prohibited to ſucceed in a Fee, as alſo their Sons except eſpecial Proviſion be made for them. This little Hiſtory of Fees is given us by the Compiler Gerard Niger, wherein is to be obſerved, that as to what he writes concerning their deſcending upon Males by a new Law in infinitum, that in France theſe inferiour Fees, as well as Dukedoms, Counties, Baronies, and the like came to be hereditary under Hugh Capet, who began his Reign eight and thirty years before the Law made by Conradus. From this time forward Noblemen (the leſſer Nobles or Gentlemen are included) from their Fees began to take Sirnames to themſelves, and to their Names to add de ſuch a place, a thing ſo ridiculouſly practiſed in France to this day, that if a mean man that can write himſelf but Sieur, have five or ſix Sons, if he have ſo many little Hamlets or even Cottages erected in ſeveral Grounds, each muſt be denominated from one of them. In caſe he be not ſo wealthy, if he have a Mill in his Ground, a Rock in his Field, or a Meadow belonging to his Cottage, one muſt be called de Moulin, another de la Roche, and anothet des Prez, whereby you would take them for Perſons of Extraordinary Extract and Revenue, Perſons indeed that deſerve, as Lords to impoſe Manners, Faſhions and Language upon a World ſo inconſiderate.

75. But by ſuch Degrees came Vaſſals to be poſſeſſed of Fees, which they loſt again by many Acts of Ingratitude and Unfaithfulneſs, ſeveral Crimes which are not here to be related at large, but onely to be touched on. As firſt in caſe after the Death of the Lord or Vaſſal, the Heir came not within a year and a day to ſwear fealty,and deſire Inveſtiture. If three times being cited to the Lord's Court, to receive Inveſtiture and ſwear Fealty he refuſed it. If he refuſed to perform the Services due, or renounced his Fee. In caſe he ſold it without conſent of his Lord; For ſo the Services due to the Lord ſhould come to nothing, the Vaſſal being reduced to Want or Beggary. If he infeoffed any other Perſon with other Conditions, than he himſelf held the Fee, or ſuch a Vaſſal as was not in a Condition to ſerve it. If he took Holy Orders, or a Religious Vow upon him. If he acted contrary to what was expreſſed in his Oath of Fidelity. In caſe he committed another Felony by betraying his fellow Vaſſal, ſo as he could not appear in Court. Theſe Crimes or Felonies reſpected the Fee it ſelf, ſuch as follow the Lord of the Fee himſelf. As in caſe he made an Aſſault upon his Lord's Perſon, or by Sword or Poiſon contrived his Ruine: or by Force and Arms ſet upon any Caſtle or Town, in which his Lord or Lady reſided. If in any Fight or Battel he forſook his Lord, or when it was in his Power, he freed him not from the danger of death or a Siege. If knowing any one to contrive the Aſſaulting, Taking, the Death or great Damage (in his Patrimony) of his Lord, he did not make him acquainted therewith, as ſpeedily as might be. In caſe he turned Enemy to his Lord, or adhered to his Enemies. If he turned Accuſer of his Lord, or brought him into any great danger. If he accuſed him, or bore witneſs againſt him. If he betrayed his Councils or Secrets. If he made him a Cuckold (Si Dominum Cucurbitaverit) and wantonly ſported with his Wife. If he lay with his Daughter, his Son's Daughter, his Son's Wife; or the Siſter of his Lord remaining in his Houſe. In caſe he would not doe him Juſtice. If he committed Felony againſt or Cuckolded one of the Lords, of whom he was the Common Vaſſal, he was onely to forfeit that Part. If ſo be the Vaſſal killed his own Brother, or his Brother's Son to get the Inheritance: or betrayed his Fellow Vaſſal, ſo as he could not ſtand any more in Court, he ſhould be deprived of his Benefice or Fee; but foraſmuch as this Felony was not committed againſt the Lord, the Fee ſhould not fall to the Lord, but to the next Kinſman by the Father's ſide. If he killed the Brother of his Lord, it ſeemed no Felony, for he loſt not his Fee. Neither indeed ſeems that to be Felony, properly ſo called, which the Lord committed againſt his Vaſſal, although it was equally puniſhed. Nor was Felony always puniſhed with a perpetual loſs of the Fee.

Lib. Feud. paſſim & vide Spelman. Gloſſar. in voc. Felonia.

76. Beſides the looſing of the Fees, to which Vaſſals were by theſe means obnoxious, they were alſo ſubjected to many, and often very heavy Services. Firſt, they ſwore a moſt ſtrict Fealty and Allegiance to their Lords, whence in ſome Hiſtories they are to be known by the Name of Fideles, and performed their Homage in a very humble, if not ſervile manner, the forms and faſhions whereof we cannot here diſcover. Upon Summons from the Lord they were obliged to arm themſelves, to follow his Standard, and ſtand by him in all Dangers of the Field. Beſides they were obnoxious to the payment of many Tributes, Aids or Subſidies. And when they died, their Lords were to have Cuſtody of their Fees with the Gardianſhip, and Manage of their Heirs under Age. And from thoſe that were Adult, Relief for their Conſent to enter upon the Inheritance; at leaſt in ſome places. The manner of Inveſtiture into Fees, was ſolemn and various. The Greater by delivery of a Banner; in France by ancient Cuſtome both Biſhopricks, and all other Fees by a Ring, and a Staff, by them Rain and Baſton. Sometimes it was done by delivery of a Sword, an Inſtrument in Writing, a Clod of Earth, an Arrow, a Rod or other things. Fees were variouſly diſtinguiſhed, as ſome were Imperial and Regal conferred by Emperours and Kings, as, Dukedoms, Marquiſates, Counties which were held in Capite, or from the Prince, whence the Poſſeſſours were called Capitanei. Others were of a middle Nature,being conferred by theſe Capitanei to inferiour Vaſſals, as Barons, Valuaſſours and Caſtellani. Another ſort was Military, conferred by theſe Barons, Valuaſſours and Caſtellani. Yet was not this Diſtinction ſo ſolemnly obſerved, but that the Capitanei conferred Fees, ſimply Military, and Princes as well one ſort as another. There were ſeveral other ſorts diſtinguiſhed according to the Nature of the Fees themſelves, and of thoſe that received them, of which its not our part here to diſcourſe.

77. It's more proper for us farther to acquaint the Reader, that theſe Cuſtoms being various and growing to Multitudes, Judges in the Determination of Controverſies concerning Fealty and Obedience of Vaſſals, became confounded in their Sentiments and Judgments, as in Cuſtoms not written it ever happens. Therefore about the Year of Our Lord 1152, one Obertus Ortenſius of Milan, aſſiſted by Gerard Niger Capagiſtus, under the Reign of the Emperour Frederick Barbaroſſa digeſted theſe Cuſtoms concerning the uſe of Fees, into two * Books. Unto theſe Uſes of Fees compiled by him, were afterwards added the Conſtitutions of Lotharius the Firſt, Lotharius the Second, Henry the Fourth, Lotharius the Third; and Frederick the Firſt and Second; after which the Books of Fees became of ſuch requeſt in all Countries, that they equalled in Reputation the very Roman Laws of Juſtinian himſelf. From them by univerſal Conſent, all Controverſies not onely concerning meaner Fees, but Dukedoms, Marquiſates, and the like were decided. And although ſome there have been that contended, that the Lombards Laws of Fees have no place in France, where they will have theſe Fees to have been Patrimonial, and in the free Diſpoſition and Dominion of Clients, being called Allodia, yet other very eminent Lawyers of that Nation contradict them, who affirm that theſe Laws of Fees take place in all the French Provinces, eſpecially thoſe which are Juris Scripti, where the Cuſtoms of the particular places do not oppoſe them; for in ſeveral Provinces of Italy, as that of Monsferrat, and Mantoua, the Lombardick Fees are changed into Patrimonies and Allodia, Alienations paſſing without the Knowledge of the Lord, Daughters ſucceeding, and ſeveral other things wherein the Provinces rejecting the ſtrict Doctrine of Fees in theſe Points, have returned to the Directions and Practice of the Civil Law.

78. Out of France, the uſe of Fees was by William the Conquerour brought into England, where he diſtributed the conquered Countrey amongſt his Souldiers; the Scots pretend to have received them about ſixty Years before, in the Reign of Malerline the Second, but by Learned Men it is eſteemed no more than a Pretenſion. That our Saxon Anceſtours had ſome ſort of Knowledge and Practice of them, being Couſin-Germans to the Lombards, may be granted, but this knowledge and practice was very ſmall, for the Reaſons we have already alledged. Concerning the Fees brought in by the Conquerour; what peculiar Rules and Practices they have acquired different from all the World beſides, let our Municipal Lawyers tell if they pleaſe. It ſufficeth me (who have already ſaid too much) to put the Reader in mind, that the Feuda or Fees reduced into ſome Order came from our Lombards. The Conſent of Authours, ſo will have it. This is ſtrengthened by this Obſervation, that the Lombards were addicted to this Courſe, more than any other People. That Obert and Gerard were of Milan in that Countrey, and that in Italy, theſe Laws moſt flouriſhed from the time of Otho the Great, to that of Lotharius the Third, while the Civil Law was wholly ſilent. But theſe Fees were founded as we ſaid upon Cuſtome, and therefore amongſt the ancient written Laws of the Lombards, we never meet with the word Feudum, and the other word Beneficium ſignifying the ſame, is very rarely to be found.

SECT. IV.

---

* Præter hos Hotomannus obtrudit unum, Cujacius tres alios.

SECT. V.

The Kingdom of the Franks in Italy, from the Captivity of Deſiderius, to the Promotion of Charles King of the Franks, to the Title of Emperour.

The Space 27 Years.

Sect. 5.

Charles Crowned King of Italy.

1. D*Eſiderius* being conquered and taken, and all the reſt of the Lombards having after his Example yielded up themſelves and their Towns, Charles the Conquerour by right of Victory, challenged to himſelf the Kingdom of Italy, which that he might eſtabliſh to himſelf by a new Title, he made uſe of the old Decree of Gregory the Roman Biſhop, as it was accounted. At Modoſtia he cauſed himſelf to be Crowned with an Iron Crown, by the hands of the Archbiſhop of Milan, and ordained, that the ſame courſe ſhould be uſed by his Succeſſours. And it was performed with great Ceremony, as appeared from an ancient Ritual called Ordo Romanus, which Sigonius, as it concerned this matter, tranſcribed to this purpoſe, the King was out of his Chamber led into the Church by Biſhops, and being conducted to the high Altar, after ſome ſolemn Prayers the Archbiſhop demanded of the People, whether they would ſubject themſelves to ſuch a King, and with conſtant Fidelity obey his Commands. The People anſwering, Yes; with holy Oil he annointed his Head, Breaſt, Shoulders, and the Joynts of his Arms; praying that both in War and in Iſſue he might be proſperous. Having then girt him with a Sword, put upon him Bracelets, a Robe, a Ring, and a Sceptre into his hand, he ſet the Crown upon his Head; and having through the Quire led him to his Throne, thereon he placed him, and having given him the kiſs of Peace, then celebrated Divine Service. This Ceremony was now performed to Charles by Thomas the Archbiſhop of Milan, and hence he and his Succeſſours accounted themſelves ſo conſiderable, and to contend for Dignity with him of Ravenna.

Goes to Rome.

2. The Ceremony of Coronation being thus over, Charles, now as Lord of Italy, thought it is duty to ſettle the Frame and Polity thereof, and for this purpoſe reſolved to go to Rome to conſult with Adrian. He having notice of his Intentions, called an hundred and fifty Biſhops together, with many Abbats, and ſolemnly receiving him into the City, conſulted with them what Honours to beſtow upon him. They were unanimous in this, that a King ſo potent, and who together with his Father and Grandfather, had ſo much deſerved of the Roman Church, was to be rewarded with ſome extraordinary mark of Honour. It was univerſally then agreed and conſented to by all the Nobility, that he ſhould be a Roman Patritian; that throughout the Provinces he ſhould inſtitute Archbiſhops and Biſhops; ſo that except commanded and inſtituted by him, they ſhould not be Conſecrated by any: That he ſhould chuſe the Biſhop of Rome, and regulate the Apoſtolick See. Now Sigonius tells us, that the Order and Dignity of a Patritian was, ſince the time of Conſtantine the Great, moſt ſplendid and honourable in the Roman Empire. That what we called but now Inſtitution of Biſhops, they called Inveſtiture, and pleaſed it ſhould be performed by the giving of a Ring and a Rod. As for the choice of the Biſhop of Rome, it ſeems to be granted to him for preventing of Seditions and Tumults amongſt the Romans. For theſe differences, the ancient Diſcipline by little and little decaying, by reaſon of ambitious ſeeking of ſo great a Place and Dignity, had quite ſpoiled the Meetings for Elections, to the great ſcandal of all good Chriſtians; no Perſon at Rome having any Power or Authority to reſtrain them. But this right of chuſing the Biſhop, Charles uſed with great moderation, and remitted to the old way of the Aſſemblies of Clergy and People; provided the thing was done without tumult and indirect Practices.

Is made Patritian.

Hath power to chuſe the Biſhop of Rome, and regulate the Apoſtolick See.

Sect. 5.

He Modells the Kingdom of Italy.

Obliges the Dukes by an Oath of Fidelity.

3. After the receiving of theſe Honours, he addreſſed himſelf to the Modell of the Kingdom. Firſt, Apulia and Calabria he left to the Emperour as they had been after the Victory of Juſtinian; which afterward being ſeized on by the Normans, were reduced into another form of a Kingdom, which at length got the Name of Neapolitan. The Dukedom of Beneventum, he permitted to be held by Aragiſe the Son-in-Law of King Deſiderius; that of Spoletum, by Hildebrand, and the other of Forum Julij by Rodgand, as Fiefs from him, as formerly from the Kings of the Lombards. The Exarchate of Ravenna and Pentapolis, with the Dukedoms of Peruſium, Rome, Tuſcia and Campania, the chief Right, Principality and Sovereignty retained to himſelf, he yielded to the Roman Biſhop: The reſt he kept to himſelf in the ordinary way of a Kingdom. This was whatſoever the Kings of the Lombards had poſſeſſed in Liguria, Æmilia and Venetia, the hithermoſt Tuſcia (as they accounted it) and the Cottian Alpes being reckoned in. That part they called Longobardia, or as afterward Lombardia, or Lombardy. The Exarchate they called by the Name of Romania, or Romaniola. Italy being thus divided, the Government thereof he ordered ſhould be after this manner. The Dukes he would have free, bound onely by the Bond of a Royal Fee; with which whoſoever tied themſelves, were annually to take this Oath: I promiſe that I will be faithfull to my Lord Charles, and his Sons, as long as I ſhall live, without any fraud or manner of deceit: And, I ſwear by theſe Holy Goſpels, that I will be faithfull to him, as a Vaſſal to his Lord, neither to my knowledge will I divulge any thing which he ſhall commit to me, in the Name, or by Virtue of my Allegiance.

He ſettles the Government.

Three ſorts of Laws in uſe, viz. That of the Romans, the Lombards, and the Salick.

4. If ever it ſo happened that they brake this Oath, or died without Sons, the Dukedoms were conferred upon others, and this Tranſlation, or Collation, as in Biſhops and Abbats, was called Inveſtiture; the ſame being obſerved in other Vaſſals or Feudataries, as Counts, Captains, and Valuaſars, the Modell of the Services and Tenures of whom was afterward perfected by the Germans. The People and Cities were after this manner to be governed. The Limits of the Kingdom and the Towns, he committed to the government of Counts, aſſigning to them all publick and private Juriſdiction. The Limits or Borders they called Marchæ, or Marches, whence the Governours of them, obtained the Titles of Counts of the Marches, and Marqueſſes. Some extraordinary Commiſſioners he ſometimes ſent into the Kingdom, whom having greater Authority than Counts, they called Miſſi. The Grounds of the ſeveral Cities being confuſed or litigious in the Reign of the Lombards, he would have ſeparated and limitted, bounding them for the moſt part with Mountains, Fenns, or Rivers. The Cities he would have take an Oath of Fidelity to him, theſe words being added to it, I will preſerve his Life, Member, Mind, and true Honour. On the Feudatary Cities, Churches and Monaſteries, he laid certain Services, called Foderum, Parata and Manſionaticum, to be paid to him, eſpecially when he came into Italy, which by him and his Succeſſours were afterward either much diminiſhed, or wholly remitted. To Biſhops and Abbats he confirmed the Poſſeſſion of Churches and Monaſteries, formerly granted by the Lombards, and added new to ſuch as deſerved them. And that he might ſeem to have given liberty to Italy, when he came thither he was wont to aſſemble the Biſhops, Abbats, and Noble men together, and with them to deliberate of the great Affairs of the Kingdom, after the manner of the Franks. Into Italy he brought alſo the Salick Law; ſo that from this time forward, three ſorts of Laws became of uſe to it; that of the Romans, the other of the Lombards, and this Salick. But this was the cuſtome, that by what Law every man would live, he ſhould profeſs, and then according to that, Juſtice ſhould be adminiſtred to him; which Cuſtome prevailed in Italy, till the time of the Emperour Lotharius the Second.

Returns into France.

Duke Rodgand Rebells.

5. Things being thus ſetled, Charles returned to Pavia, where leaving a ſtrong Garriſon, he took Deſiderius and his Wife along with him, and returned into France. Yet did he not ſo well ſettle his Matters, but that within a year or two he was in danger to be diſturbed, the Reputation he got by Arms, not being ſufficient to bridle the Minds of the Lombard Dukes, who impatient, that the Kingdom ſhould be taken from them, began to make diſturbance in the Cities. The chief of the Conſpiracy was Rodgand Duke of Forum Julij, which Charles underſtanding, as he returned out of Saxony, reſolved betimes to obviate the miſchief, and by the terrour of ſeverity cauſe thoſe who had not yet diſcovered themſelves, to keep themſelves in their Duty. Having kept his Chriſtmas in

Alſatia,

Sect. 5.

Alſatia, with a powerfull Army he paſſes the Alpes, and marches ſtreight into the Dutchy of Forum Julij, where he gave Battel to Rodgand, who was defeated, taken Priſoner, and put to death, as having affected the Sovereignty. Such Cities as were faulty begging pardon, eaſily obtained it. Going then to Tariuſium to hold his Eaſter, he annexed the Dutchy of Forum Juliij to the Kingdom; committing the Government of the ſeveral Cities to Counts; and then returned into France, much about the ſame time that Leo the Emperour at Conſtantinople made Conſtantine his Son his Collegue and Aſſociate. For ſeveral years after, Italy remained quiet. The fourth, the return of Charles produced two memorable things; another Progreſs he made into Italy, and the Death of the Emperour Leo, whoſe Son Conſtantine Porphyrogenitus governed with his Mother Irene, a Woman of a Maſculine Spirit, and Diſpoſition. Charles perceiving, that being diverted by other continual Wars, he could not probably keep Italy in quiet, except he ſet a King over it, who by his Preſence ſhould adminiſter Juſtice, and caſt an awe as well upon Domeſtick as Foreign Enemies, reſolved to make Pipin his Eldeſt Son King with him. Returning out of Saxony, taking with him the ſaid Pipin, his Wife Hildegardis, and Lodowick his other Son; a little before Chriſtmas he came to Pavia.

Is defeated and put to death.

A. D. 776.

A. D. 780.

He makes Pipin King of Italy with him.

6. The Holydays being over, he ſummoned an Aſſembly of the Spiritual and Temporal Nobility, and made by their aſſent ſeveral Laws yet extant; and publiſhed on the firſt of March, concerning Biſhops and Abbats, their Rights, and their Diſcipline; as alſo concerning the puniſhment of Murthers, Robberies, Perjuries, and for the right Adminiſtration of Juſtice by the Counts, and the Vaſſi Dominici. This done, he went to Rome, to procure the Biſhop to anoint his Sons, who being very ready to beſtow what would coſt him nothing, anointed Pipin King of Italy, and Lodowick King of Aquitain on Eaſter day; and to another Pipin, he himſelf was Godfather. At their return to Pavia, the Ceremony was there renewed by Thomas the Archbiſhop, who Crowned Pipin with an Iron Crown, and was Godfather to a Daughter named Giſla. Italy was generally very well pleaſed with the Advancement of their new King, as one who would continue with them, and conſequently adminiſter Juſtice as there ſhould be occaſion, and protect them from the Inrodes of the Hunnes and Saracens. And Pipin did not fruſtrate their Expectations in any thing they could reaſonably require, beſtirring himſelf, and doing all good Offices of a King, as he had opportunity. He incouraged all publick Works, and made ſuch new Laws as were requiſite; ſeveral of his, as of his Father Charles, being ſtill extant, made in a full Aſſembly of the Nobility, concerning the ordering of Churches, repairing of Monaſteries, Hoſpitals, Bridges and High-ways, the ſecurity of ſuch as travelled to Rome, the Adminiſtration of Juſtice by Counts and their Judges. When he was in Italy he commonly reſided at Ravenna, either taken with the ancient famouſneſs of the City, or for convenience of managing Naval matters. This great Repoſe and ſatisfaction, was after ſome five years interrupted by the ambitious Practices of Aragiſe the Duke of Beneventum, who being Son-in-Law to Deſiderius, and puffed up with conceit of his own greatneſs, revolted. He was ſo proud, that he would be called Prince in the room of Duke, and be anointed and Crowned as King by his Biſhops, ſubſcribing his Diploma's, From our moſt Sacred Palace. Contemning Pipin, to inlarge his Dominion, he invaded the Roman Territories, not fearing the power of Charles, or the Cataſtrophe of Deſiderius. Charles being inform'd of his Motions by Adrian, having diſpatched his other Wars, reſolved to paſs into Italy and chaſtiſe his Folly. At the beginning of Winter he paſſed the Alpes with ſuch expedition, that he kept his Chriſtmas in Etruria at Florence, a City formerly deſtroyed by Totilas King of the Goths, and now ſaid, by command of Charles, to have been re-edified.

Enacts ſeveral Laws.

Aragiſe of Beneventum rebells.

7. From Florence he went to Rome to conſult with Adrian about the chaſtiſement of the Rebel, who now unbethinking himſelf, ſent his Son Romuald to beg peace with great preſents, and promiſe to give all ſatisfaction to the Biſhop. The King by the Biſhop's advice denied his requeſt, and led his Army into the Territories of Capua, which he compelled to ſurrender after he had waſted the Countrey round about. The report hereof terrified Aragiſe, who expecting the Storm to come upon Beneventum, quitted that place and returned to Salernum, a Sea-Town, whence if need were he might have a convenience of Eſcape. Now he ſent another Meſſage, offering to give up his other Son Grimoald alſo for an Hoſtage, and farther to doe whatſoever he ſhould be commanded. This was accepted by the King, who taking an Oath of Allegiance from him, and the Inhabitants habitants of Beneventum, diſmiſſed Romuald, and kept Grimoald with him as an Hoſtage. After this he viſited Rome again, and granting to ſeveral Church-men confirmation of their former Eſtates and Privileges, he returned into France. There he found that Taſſilo Duke of Baioaria had ſolicited the Hunnes to invade his Dominions, which they did with two Armies, the one whereof peirced into Forum Julii, but was repulſed with diſgrace and loſs. It happened about this time, that Charles having promiſed to give his Daughter in Marriage to Conſtantine the young Emperour, afterward, its ſaid, denied to ſend her, which ſo inraged him, that having Adulgiſe the young Lombard King in his Court, who had been honoured with the Dignity of a Patritian, he ſent him with conſiderable Forces into Italy, which he expected would revolt at the ſight of their former King, by bloud, and his former Intereſt, allied to them.

But begs Peace, which is granted.

Adulgiſe the Lombard King, invades Italy.

8. Grimoald was at this time, his Father being dead, Duke of Beneventum, by the favour of King Pipin, whom in way of gratitude or conſulting his preſent Intereſt, he advertiſed of this purpoſed Invaſion, though he was Nephew by the Siſter to the Pretender Adulgiſe; Pipin commanded Hildebrand the Duke of Spoletum to be in Arms, and ordered Winigiſe his General to march to him both with Horſe and Foot, deſiring Grimoald to be of good Courage, and to reſiſt the Enemy ſtoutly, if he ſhould break into his Quarters. Adulgiſe in the mean time landed in Calabria, with intention firſt to ſet upon the Dutchy of Beneventum, and thence to Invade the Dominions of the Church, which being underſtood, Winigiſe, Hildebrand and Grimoald haſted, and uniting their Forces, reſolved to give him a ſtop in Calabria, before he ſhould proceed any farther. And in Calabria was fought a moſt bloudy Battel, the Greeks endeavouring to approve themſelves for valour, and the Lombards themſelves for fidelity to thoſe that employed them. For a great while the ſucceſs remained doubtfull, but at length the Greeks were worſted, many ſlain, and more taken, amongſt whom was Adulgiſe himſelf, who died in his tortures. Four years after this, Italy continued free from War, but was then diſturbed by ſtirs raiſed in the Dutchy of Beneventum, by means of Grimoald the Duke, as is ſuſpected; it ſeemed to be of ſuch conſequence that Charles wrote to his Son Pipin to gather an Army in Italy, and promiſed to ſend to him another out of France by his Brother Lodowick, who came to him by great Journeys to Ravenna, and there kept his Chriſtmas. Then joyned they their Forces and invaded the Borders of Beneventum, where having taken one Fort, they wintred and then returned. It's probable that Grimoald was frighted into obedience, and complied with their Propoſals, elſe would not two Kings have ſo ſoon drawn back their Armies; but of this as of many other things, the Annals of thoſe times are ſilent.

Is overcome and tortured to Death.

Another Revolt by Grimoald Duke of Beneventum.

To Adrian ſucceeds Leo, in the See of Rome.

9. Some three years after died Adrian, the Biſhop of Rome, and was ſucceeded by a Prieſt who had the Name of Leo the Third. Immediately after his Conſecration he ſent to give notice to Charles, ſending him the Keys of the Confeſſion, the Banner of the City, and other great Preſents, to which Armonias adds, that he deſired him to ſend to Rome ſome one of his Nobles, who by Oath might confirm the Roman People in their fidelity and ſubjection. Not long before this time Charles had from a Province reduced Forum Julii into a Dukedom, and removing the Counts, had placed there as Duke, Henry a Frank, it's ſuppoſed out of deſign to reſtrain and keep the Hunnes in order. By command of King Pipin ſome years after, he Invaded Pannonia; and falling on them unexpectedly, killed Iring with other of their Dukes, and Plundering Rhing their Palace, ſent away the Treaſure to Charles, which they had been a long time hoarding up, moſt whereof he ſent to Rome, and then paſſed with an Army into Saxony: The Hunnes having loſt their Dukes made themſelves a King, under whom they prepared themſelves with all earneſtneſs to renew the War, which Pipin underſtanding, ſent notice thereof to his Father, and with a choice Party of Men brake into their Territories, took and plundered again their Royal Seat, and with a great booty went to his Father then lying at Aix, from whom he returned not into Italy till the year following, wherein Irene cauſed the eyes of her Son Conſtantine to be pulled out, that She might Reign without Controll. By this time the Romans, the Fear and Awe of the Lombards being removed, began to flow with Wealth, and grew wanton with Idleneſs and Luxury, and not content with the preſent poſture of Affairs, hatched deſigns to ſhake off the Biſhop, and recover their ancient Liberty.

A. D. 796.

Pipin makes War upon the Hunnes.

A. D. 796.

10. The main Authours and Promoters of this Deſign were the Kinſmen of the late Adrian, Paſcalis the Primicerius, and Campulus the Sacellarius, the Princes of

Sect. 5.

A Conſpiracy againſt Leo the Biſhop.

of the City. The firſt were inraged at Leo for endeavouring to reſcind ſome Acts of Adrian; and the two laſt becauſe he taxed their naughty manner of Life. They firſt objected ſome crimes to him in way of accuſation, and when they could make nothing of them, then entred into a Conſpiracy againſt his Life, and on a time, as he was going in a ſolemn Proceſſion, fell upon him with ſome of their Creatures they had laid in Ambuſh, and having indeavoured to cut out his Tongue, and pull out his Eyes, carried him into a Church, and before the Altar ſorely beat and wounded him. Albinus his Chamberlain found him in a Monaſtery, and brought him back to the Vatican, where he recovered, which ſo inraged the Conſpiratours that they pulled down Albinus his Houſe. Upon the report of theſe Diſorders in the Countrey, Winigiſe Duke of Spoletum, who had been ſubſtituted in the room of Hildebrand, came to Rome and carried him ſafe to Spoletum, whence he conveyed him into France to Charles, according to his own deſire. Charles honourably received him, and granted his requeſt to afford him his aſſiſtence againſt the Enemies of the Pontifical See, for he told him he had none elſe to whom he could betake himſelf; the Emperour, whoſe Duty it was to protect the Church, having lately rather been againſt it, and no good being to be hoped for from a Woman that now held the place at Conſtantinople. At length by the advice of ſuch Churchmen as came to Leo into France, it was reſolved that he ſhould be ſent back to Rome, and there the Merits of the Cauſe ſhould be ſearched into. At the time appointed Charles his Ambaſſadours held an Aſſembly with the Biſhops and Counts of France, in the Palace, and heard what the Conſpiratours could ſay, who pleading nothing but what was judged vain and frivolous, they cauſed them to be committed, and ſent them in Chains into France. The ſame year, Henry Duke of Forum Julii, after many Victories over the Hunnes, was murthered by the Inhabitants of Tarſatica, a Town of Liburnia.

A. D. 800.

11. Charles holding an Aſſembly of his Eſtates at Wormes, propounded theſe Caſes to them, the firſt concerned Grimoald, who had lately again revolted, the ſecond the death of Henry, and the third the violence offered to the Perſon of Leo, all which deſerving the preſence of a King, to puniſh them, he reſolved (and for one thing more doubtleſs) to goe again into Italy. Autumn now declining, with Pipin his Son he paſſed the Alpes and went ſtreight into Liburnia, where he puniſhed the Inhabitants of Tarſatica for the death of Henry. One Cadolack he made Duke of Forum Julii; which having done, he departed thence to Ravenna, where having ſpent ſeven days in preparation for the War of Beneventum, he came to Ancona. From Ancona, Pipin with an Army marched againſt Grimoald; and Charles, through the Dutchy of Spoletum, went for Rome; Leo and the Senate met him at Nomentum, twelve miles from the City, where having diſcourſed and feaſted with him, he returned to Rome to take Order for his Reception, after this manner. The next day the Croſſes and Holy Reliques, with the Banners of the City, were ſent out to meet him; In certain places were placed certain Chori of Citizens and Strangers who ſang his Praiſes. The Biſhop himſelf ſate upon the ſteps of the Vatican Church incircled by his Clergy, where he received him, and with ſinging conducted him into the place appointed for Prayers, and thence into the Confeſſion. After ſeven days Charles called the People together, and ſignifying the cauſe of his coming, appointed a day to hear their Biſhop's Cauſe. On the day appointed, by the advice of the Biſhops, both Franks and Italians, the Accuſers and Accuſed were cited to appear, and he himſelf ſate as Judge with the reſt. The Accuſers told their Tale, but the Biſhops would not ſuffer Leo, in reſpect of his Dignity, to anſwer formally as other Criminals were wont to doe, whereupon he ſaid he would uſe that courſe which the Laws allowed to purge ones ſelf of a Crime objected. On another day, he mounted the Pulpit, and in the preſence of them all, his Hands laid upon the Holy Goſpels, by a ſolemn Oath he proteſted that he was clear from the crimes they had ſlanderouſly laid unto his charge. This by the Auditours was counted enough, he was eſteemed Innocent, and ſolemn thanks were given to Almighty God and the Saints on his behalf.

Which is tryed before Charles.

And the Biſhop acquitted.

12. Now comes the principal Scene and the Parts which the Biſhop and Charles were to Act in this Comical expedition. Leo had been freed and abſolved before Charles his coming. The Inhabitants of Tarſatica were not ſo conſiderable, but that he might have eaſily puniſhed them by his Officers, and as for Grimoald, Pipin might have dealt with him as well, if his Father had been in France, as where now he remained at ſuch a diſtance. There was another greater thing for which Charles undertook this Journey: He had made broad * ſigns in the time

* Quin etiam Carolus vi-

time of Adrian, but that Biſhop either could not or would not underſtand him. But Leo knowing his mind, and being as ready as able to ſerve him in this affair, ſet about the work in this manner. He could not for ſhame but to bethink himſelf what way he might ſhew himſelf gratefull to him, who to free the Church from ſo great danger and Infamy, had not grudged to take a Journey out of France. He found that ſince Gregory the Second his Predeceſſour, had begun to be Perſecuted by the Heretical Emperour, there never were wanting ſome who earneſtly contended that ſome other Defender of the Church was to be found out, that is ſome other Prince to be dignified with the Imperial Title. That without doubt, if any one ſo great an honour was to be conferred, either it was due to King Pipin, or at leaſt to Charles his Son, who in aſſerting the Catholick Faith, and in perſecuting Infidels, Hereticks, and Rebels againſt the Church had excelled Kings, yea all Emperours whatſoever. What Adrian had omitted, and the King himſelf in his time, he knew, had affected from the tumults at Rome, he reſolved now to take occaſion to perfect, that he might oblige ſo powerfull a King, and obtain a Protectour and Patron to the Roman Church. The Ceremony he reſolved ſhould be on Chriſtmas day as a greater grace to the Fact, and that it might be more ſolemn and ſtately. Pipin himſelf, having committed the War againſt Grimoald unto Duke Winigiſe, came to the City, drawing with him an infinite number of Mortals to behold the ſight.

vente Hadriano eum affectaſſe titulum videtur, ſiquidem cum Beneficia Ecleſiis indulgeret, ita præfari conſuevit: Carolus Dei Gratia Rex Francorum & Longobardorum, & Patricius Romanorum, ſi Eccleſiarum Dei Servis Munificentiam noſtram impertimus, eorumq; ſtudiis libenter obſequimur, id nobis ad Auguſtatis excellentiæ culmen proficere credimus, & quod cunctis pretioſius eſt dignitatibus, æternum Retributionis præmium capeſſere non diffidimus. Vide Sigonium ubi ſuprà. p. 160.

Charles is made Emperour, and Pipin Crowned King of Italy by Leo.

13. The day being come, Charles, early in the morning went to the Vatican Church, and thence to the Confeſſion, where having finiſhed his Devotions, the Biſhop, who by former agreement was preſent, put on him an Imperial Robe, and ſet on his Head a moſt pretious Crown of Gold, which had been prepared for this purpoſe: At this the People three times acclaimed, To Charles Auguſtus, Crowned of God, the Mighty and moſt Pious Emperour of the Romans, Life and Victory. God and the Saints being then invoked, this Imperial Title was confirmed by the People, and their Acclamation being over, the Biſhop anointed both the Father and the Son ſtanding by, the one for Emperour, the other for King, and then ſet upon Celebrating of Divine Service. This ended, both Charles and Pipin offered in the Vatican Church, a Cupboard of Silver, and ſeveral Veſſels for the Service thereof, of pure Gold: in that of Lateran, a Croſs of excellent Workmanſhip made of Jacinths, which Leo in compliance with Charles, ordered to be carried in ſolemn Proceſſions. Such was the order of the ſolemnity, by which it appears, as Sigonius obſerves, how untrue the ſtory of thoſe is, who wrote that all this was done by Leo, Charles neither knowing any thing before, nor conſenting, as who ſhould ſay often, that had he perceived any ſuch thing, he would not that day have gone to the Vatican. But this Imperial Title having failed in the Weſt almoſt three hundred years before, at the Depoſition of Momyllus Auguſtulus, the Biſhop of Rome now renewed it in Charles, that his Church might have a Patron and Defender, obliged by ſuch a courteſie as we ſaid before. This is ſufficiently evidenced by the form of the Oath, which the Emperours of this Edition at their Coronations, had by theſe Biſhops impoſed on them: J. N. Emperour, in the Name of Chriſt, promiſe and ingage before God and St. Peter the Apoſtle, to be the Protectour and Defender of this holy Roman Church, in all its concernments, as I ſhall be aſſiſted by Divine helps, to my knowledge and Power.

Sigonius ex antiquiſſimo commentario qui Ordo Romanus dicitur.

14. And as Leo for his own reſpects, and thoſe of his Succeſſours was ready to give, ſo Charles, to ſerve his own Ambition and the Dignity of his Family, was willing to receive, though from him, this Glorious Title. For, now rejecting that of Patritian, he wrote himſelf Roman Emperour, and Auguſtus. Being placed in this high pitch of Majeſty, he thought it agreeable to his Office, not onely to look after the ſettlement of Italy, but all Chriſtendom, and in that ſtudy ſpent the Winter following. The Accuſers of Leo he condemned to death, but at the requeſt of the Biſhop, exchanged this puniſhment for that of Baniſhment. To the Edicts of the Lombards, he added ſuch Laws as he perceived from complaints whereas he came were wanting, and by others reformed Eccleſiaſtical matters. Sigonius tells us that the aforeſaid Laws were in his time to be ſeen at Mutina, with this Title in the Preface. Charles by Divine conſent (or Order) Crowned, Governing the Roman Empire, moſt Serene Auguſtus, to all Counts, Gaſtalds, or to all that by our meekneſs have been appointed Officers of the Common-Wealth throughout the Province of Italy, in the year eight hundred and one, from the Incarnation of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the ninth Indiction, in the thirty third year of our Reign over France, and over Italy the twenty eighth, the firſt of our Conſulſhip. Being now Emperour, he calls Italy not a Kingdom, but a Province, and

The Conſpiratours are condemned to Baniſhment.

Sect. 5.

and to make the world believe he was Emperour Indeed, a Roman Emperour, revives old Titles and Names, Styles himſelf Auguſtus, and talks of the Conſulſhip; but he entred it ſeems at the ſame time that he commenced Emperour, and ſo ſhews himſelf not to be of the true and genuine Stock, few, theſe excepted, who invaded the Empire, and the Titles of whom were precarious, but were Conſuls before they came to be Emperours. And whether in ſtictneſs his Title was not precarious, whether he was a Legitimate Roman Emperour, or can be ſo called is a Moot-point, may admit of a little Diſquiſition.

15. If he were an Emperour (take the word as one poſſeſſing or reigning over divers Kingdoms) yet could he be called by any other addition, better than that of Roman. The Roman Empire was now almoſt quite extinct in the Weſt, little or nothing left except a few Iſlands in the Mediterranean, and perchance a few Maritime Towns lying towards Sicily. The Emperour had been beaten out of this Countrey by the Lombards, who having made a Prey at laſt of the Exarchate, became themſelves a Prey to Victorious Charles, and the Exarchate, by what right ſoever was challenged as the Churches Patrimony. Grant then that the Romans had Power to name him Emperour, to confer that Title upon him or any other, a worthleſs empty Title muſt it be, ſignifying a Sovereignty over the City of Rome, and the ſmall Territory of the Exarchate (the reſt was quite alienated) ſuch a Dominion they had at the Baniſhment of their Kings, the Names of one of which would more have fitted him, as Servius, Tarquinius, or the like, than that of Cæſar. That they could give any thing of the Eaſtern Empire to him or any other, we cannot believe, after that Conſtantinople had been by Imperial Authority made a ſecond Rome, and all Co-equal Majeſty and Privileges conferred upon it. Rome of late had loſt the Imperial Title, been a Captive to Barbarians, a Member of a Kingdom, being though reſtored to her Liberty afterward, yet it was by the Help and Aſſiſtence of her Daughter, had all along hitherto truckled under her, and acknowledged the Sovereignty of her Princes, and ſubmitted to the Government of a Duke; till under ſhew of Religion, ſhe became diſloyal, and advanced her Biſhops from the Epiſcopal Chair to the Princely Throne.

CHAP. II.

The Affairs of Britain, lately a Roman Province, Contemporary with the Conſtantinopolitan Roman Empire.

SECT. I.

From the Departure of the Romans out of the Iſland to the Deſtruction of Britain, or the forcing up of the Inhabitants, into the Mountainous places by the Picts, Scots and Saxons.

The ſpace of One Hundred Ninety Seven years.

Sect. 1.

The Picts and Scots, invade Britain.

The Character of the Britains in thoſe days.

1. THE Britains being again forſaken by their Friends the Romans, who as we ſaid were called into Gall, the Neceſſities of the Empire there and then requiring it, became ſpeedily again a Prey to the ravenous Picts and Scots, who no ſooner was their fear and awe removed, but like Wolves they returned, and without any Pity or Compaſſion renewed their Slaughters, and the Havock they had made of a worſe than tame and ſheepiſh Nation. For, ſuch Qualities as are the certain Preſages of the Ruine of a People, had long e'er this manifeſted themſelves; Luxury, Effeminateneſs, and all ſorts of vitious Habits and Practices which weaken mens Hands, and enervate their Minds, which in all Ages have deſtroyed Families, and overturned Governments, abounded amongſt them: Never ſcarcely did a Kingdom, Empire or Eſtate miſcarry, but its Period was uſher'd in with Looſeneſs and Luxury. Let the Example of Sardanapalus, of the Army and Court of Darius, of Cleopatra, and her Egyptian Train, and that of the Romans after the times of Lucullus, ſpeak for the Aſſyrian, Perſian, Macedonian and Roman Empires. As for Kingdoms and States, Examples ſo abound, as it would be too tedious to relate them. Beſides the Juſt Judgment of Almighty God, who in the Deſtruction of thoſe that pervert Nature, and apply their Strength and Faculties to other things and ends than for which they were made, vindicates the Sovereignty and Right, which he neceſſarily hath over his Creatures. Luxury and vitious Habits in their own Natures, and by way of Efficiency procure what are the certain Cauſes of Ruine and Deſtruction.

2. For if things be preſerved by the ſame means they are got or obtained, this cannot be done but by Labour and Induſtry. Now Luxury brings Idleneſs and Lazineſs, renders Men effeminate and impatient of Toil or Induſtry. This is to be noted of vitious Perſons in all Ages. Firſt, ſuch Perſons conſcious to themſelves, that by all Rules of Sobriety they were condemned, found themſelves concerned for their Reputation (though this two at laſt they come oftentimes to ſlight) to excuſe, nay plead for what they were inclined to practiſe. Hence Sobriety was ever by them branded for Folly and foppiſh formality, and becauſe they could not out-reaſon, they were put upon it to jeer, or as they ſay to droll at all things and Perſons ſerious, and the moſt ſolid, ſubſtantial, and every way moſt worthy, they endeavoured to repreſent and render ridiculous. Learning, Diſcipline, honeſt Studies and Endeavours they ſcoffed at, cried up natural Parts, and flaſhy trifling Wits, becauſe they could not endure to take pains themſelves, being a kind of Euthuſiaſts in this reſpect, as expecting Inſpiration or Mahomet's Pidgeon, for the Infuſion of ſuch Abilities as cannot be obtained but by time and labour. Hence all Seriouſneſs being diſcouraged, none were preferred but vitious and ſuperficial Paraſites. When any able Perſons ſpake their Judgments they were derided, and all their good Councils by one twitting and drolling Speech rendred ridiculous. This cauſed them either to hold their Peace, or comply with the prevalent Humour, and then all good Council being diſcarded and raſh hare-brained Opinions admitted, Reaſon was baniſhed, Induſtry and Pains driven away and drew along with them, what are the uſual Effects and Products. The wiſe Man knew what he ſaid when he affirmed, that the Scorner, as it is tranſlated, or the Derider or Droller deſtroys the City, not the open Enemy, not the Traitour, for Governments uſually recover themſelves out of ſuch Hazards; but when all Sobriety is ſcoffed at, when diſſolute Perſons manage Affairs, and by their drolling render ſober and wholſome Councils ridiculous, then is a Kingdom or State in the ready and certain way to Deſtruction. Theſe are the certain Symptoms of its mortal Infirmity.

Lege Comment. Verulamii in hoc Proverbium. Deriſor perdit Civitatem.

3. Such was the State of the Britiſh Affairs; their Sobriety and Proſperity, if ever they enjoyed either, aroſe and decayed together. But if Gildas their Countreyman hath not injured them, they never much could pretend either to the one, or to the other. For the firſt, he tells us in General, that they neither behaved themſelves well towards Almighty God, towards one another, nor ſuch foreign Princes as had ſubdued them, and their Subjects. For the other, they ſubmitted to the triumphant Romans, and received their Commands without any reſiſtence, a weak and an unfaithfull People, ſubdued not ſo much by Sword, Fire and Engines of War (as were other Nations) as by Threats, Puniſhments and Edicts, and onely in outward ſhew pretending Obedience. Accordingly, when the Roman Souldiers were moſt of them departed, having left ſome Governours behind to eſtabliſh their Power, and not the leaſt thinking of a Rebellion, a wily * Lioneſs ſlew theſe Rulers. When the Senate had notice hereof at Rome, and ſent an Army to be revenged, nor Fleet was there prepared to fight for their Countrey, nor ſquared Battallion or Right wing (to uſe his words) was there to be ſeen, nor any other warlike Preparation on the ſhore; their backs were for ſhields toward ſuch as purſued them, their Necks trembling, and like Women they ſtretched out to their Swords, and offered their Hands to be manacled, ſo that it became a byword, and in Deriſion was wont to be ſpoken, That the Britains were neither valiant in War, nor faithfull in Peace.

They Rebell againſt the Romans.

Are beaten.

Hæc erecta cervice & mente ex quo inhabitata eſt, nunc Deo, interdum Civibus, nonnunquam etiam tranſmarinis Regibus & ſubjectis ingrata conſurgit. Gildas. p. 7. Impreſſ. Londini, 1568. Operâ Joan. Joſſelini.

Leæna trucidavit doloſa. Si per Leænam non ipſam Inſulam intelligit (ſæpè enim hoc genere dictionis utitur) virilis fæmina Bunuica ſive Voadicia eſt intelligenda, quæ apud Dionem 80000, apud Tacitum 70000 Romanorum, regnante Nerone, dicitur interemiſſe.*

4. The Romans having killed many of theſe perfidious Men, and condemned others to ſlavery, that the Land might not turn into a Wilderneſs, quitted again the Countrey that wanted both Wine and Oil, and returned into Italy, leaving a ſufficient Power behind them, to be as whips for the Backs, and Yokes for the Necks of the Natives, to afflict and tire them not ſo much with a military Hand as with ſtripes, but if need were to thruſt the Sword into the ſides of the Nation; and however to make the Name of Roman Slavery ſtick to the Soil, ſo that it ſhould be accounted not Britannia, but Romania, and what Braſs, Silver or Gold it could get, ſhould be ſtamped with Cæſar's Image. Having received the Goſpel in the time of Tiberius, it cannot be denied but that this Nation afforded ſeveral glorious Martyrs, but when Arianiſm once came to ſpread abroad, readily received the Venome of every Hereſie, being ever greedy of Novelty, and never ſtable in any thing. After this a vaſt wood of Tyrants (ſo he phraſeth it) ſprung up, and the Iſland retaining the Roman Name indeed, but little of the Manners or Laws, ſent into Gall Maximus, accompanied with many Souldiers, but ſuch as were tumultuous and over and above adorned with Imperial Enſigns which he never decently wore; not obtained legally, but as Tyrants were wont to compaſs them. This Man by craft rather than any Valour, having brought the Neighbouring Provinces into his Net, and by Perjury and Lies adjoined them to his wicked Dominion; ſtretched one of his Wings as far as Spain, and the other into Italy, and eſtabliſhing the Throne of his moſt wicked Empire at Triers, raved with ſo great Madneſs againſt his Maſters, that of two lawfull Emperours, the one at Rome, and the other elſewhere, he bereaved of his Religious Life. But preſently as he proceeded in ſuch curſed and audacious practices, was he at Aquileia ſmitten on the Head (he means ſlain) who had caſt down the honoured Heads of the whole World, from their Sovereignty.

A vaſt Number accompany Maximus the Tyrant into Gall.

5. But by this means became Britain bereaved of her Souldiers and Military Men, as alſo of her Governours (how cruel ſoever) and in a manner all her Youth, which following the Tyrant into Gall, never more returned home, and there-

Another Invaſion by the Scots and Picts.

Upon which a Meſſage is ſent to Rome for aid.

thereby growing utterly unſkilfull in matters of War, firſt was invaded by two tranſmarine and cruel Nations, the Scots from the Weſt, and the Picts from the North, under which ſhe groned for many years. Being haraſſed with their Inrodes, and the direfull Effects thereof, ſhe ſent to Rome with Tears, requiring that Succours might be haſtned away to her Relief, vowing in caſe the Enemy were removed to remain conſtant in Fidelity to the Empire. A Legion unmindfull of the former Miſchief was ordered her, which having paſſed the Seas preſently ingaged the Rovers, and having made of them a great ſlaughter, quite drove them out of the Countrey, and thereby freed the Inhabitants from cruel Death, or Imminent Captivity. This done, it ſet them upon making a Wall overthwart the Iſland to defend them from theſe Inrodes; but it being made by the Rabble without any Inſtructour, and not of Stone but of Earth, for the moſt part did them little or no Service. This Legion being returned with great Joy and Triumph, the ſame Rovers like ſo many greedy and ravenous Wolves came again upon their former Prey, no Shepherd appearing to protect the ſheep, bore down and trampled on all in their way like ſtanding Corn. Now again are Meſſengers diſpatched to Rome with their Clothes rent, and Earth upon their Heads, like as fearfull Chickens betake themſelves to the Wings of their Damms, beſeeching them not to ſuffer their afflicted Countrey abſolutely to periſh, nor the Roman Name (now indeed merely a Name) to be loſt, and extinguiſhed in the Iſland. The Romans receiving as great an Impreſſion from the Story of this Tragedy, as humane Nature was capable of, made aſmuch haſte to their Reſcue, as an Eagle can do in the Air, an Horſeman on the Earth, or the moſt expert Mariner can do upon the Sea; and like as a mighty Torrent falling from the Mountains, removes heaps of Sand which lye in its way, ſo did they ſweep and cleanſe the Countrey of theſe greedy Rovers.

A third Invaſion.

6. They now plainly tell thoſe, for whoſe deliverance they came, that they muſt not for the future, expect any ſuch tedious and laborious Journeys from them; and that the Roman Legions, or ſuch an Army, was not to be endangered by Sea and Land, for the driving away a ſort of inconſiderable ſtragling Thieves. They bid them apply themſelves to the ſtudy and practice of Arms, that by their own Valour and Conduct they may be able to protect their Countrey, their Wives, their Children, (and what ſhould be more dear to them) their Lives and Liberty; to ſtretch out their hands, not naked and diſarmed to be pinioned by the Enemy, but furniſhed with Swords, Spears, and ſuch like Inſtruments of War ready to aſſault and ſlaughter theſe Nations, which could not be more valiant and powerfull than themſelves, except ſloth and idleneſs made them ſo. They preſcribed them the way how they ſhould make another Wall, not according to the former Model, propounding couragious Exploits to a fearfull People, and a pattern to ſuch as were not willing to write after it. Upon the Southern Shore where their own Ships lay at Anchor, and the Invaſions of theſe Barbarous People were feared, they build watch Towers at a certain diſtance one from another, and bid farewell to Britain, as never more to return into the Iſland. They were no ſooner gone, but Swarms of Scots and Picts again appeared upon the Shore, and like a Swarm of Caterpillars overſpread the Face of the Earth; differing indeed in manners and Cuſtoms from each other, but both alike greedy to ſhed bloud, having their Faces more covered with Hair than their ſecret Parts with Cloaths; and they confidently ſeized on the Northern part of the Iſland, as their own, from the utmoſt bounds thereof, as far as the Wall. Upon the Wall the Britains ſet a Guard, but fitter to Eat than to Fight, trembling at the ſight of an Enemy, and pining away for the very thought of War. The Barbarians had certain Hooks, wherewith they would pull down to the ground, the unwary and helpleſs Defendant; who in ſo great a misfortune was in this reſpect happy, that he lived not to ſee thoſe dreadfull Calamities, which ſhortly after befell his Relations.

A ſevere Famine followed.

7. In ſhort, the Guard e'er long quitted both the Wall and the Towns adjoyning, and then followed the uſual Flights and Diſperſions of a poor ſheepiſh and miſerable People; for, to no other than ſuch a preying of Wolves and wild Beaſts, can this thing be compared; the miſerable Britains running away, and when eaſily overtaken, being ſlaughtered like Sheep with Complaints, but no oppoſition. Thoſe that remained alive, in another manner felt the dreadfull effects of this Invaſion, ſo ſevere a Famine following that havock which had been made of all things, that no food could be obtained, but what ſmall pittance could be got by hunting. The miſerable Remnant of the Britiſh Nation in this deſolate condition, having cauſe to apprehend another Invaſion, writes to Agitius a Roman Officer, ficer after this manner. “To Agitius thrice Conſul, the Groans of the Britains: “then after a few Complaints: The Barbarians drive us to the Sea, and the Sea “drives us back upon the Barbarians. Betwixt theſe two ſorts of death, we “have either our Throats cut, or are drown'd. But no ſuccour or relief could be obtained. In the mean time the Famine was ſo violent, that many gave up themſelves to the cruel Enemy, purchaſing a little bread with everlaſting ſlavery; others more valiantly betook themſelves to the Mountains, Caves and Woods, whence they made Sallies upon the Rovers: and now firſt of all betaking themſelves to Almighty God, and truſting in him, had for many years ſucceſs againſt, and killed many of them as they ranged abroad for Booty. Now (ſaith our Authour) the boldneſs of the Enemy for a little time ceaſed, but not the wickedneſs of our People, it being ever, as it now is, the cuſtome of the Nation to be weak to repell an Enemy (to blunt his Weapons as he expreſſeth it) but ſtrong enough to ſupport Civil Wars, and the heavy burthen of their ſins; infirm to execute the effects of Peace and Truth, but able to practiſe wickedneſs and Lies.

Agitio ter Conſuli gemitus Britannorum: & poſt pauca quærentes: Repellunt Barbari ad Mare, repellit Mare ad Barbaros. Inter hæc duo genera funerum aut jugulamur, aut mergimur. Hunc Agitium Beda vocat Ætium.

All things tending to ruine.

8. The Ravenous Scots then return into Ireland for a ſhort time. The Picts fixed themſelves now in the Northern part of the Iſland, and there continued making ſome Incurſions now and then. During the Truce, the Scarr of the Famine was healed up, another and more virulent Soar ſecretly growing. For theſe Hoſtilities ceaſing, ſo great a Plenty and abundance of all things followed in the Iſland as no paſt Age could parallel; and this was accompanied with every way proportionable as great Luxury. So greatly did this evil root ſprout up and increaſe, that at this time it might be truly ſaid, Abſolutely ſuch Fornication is heard of, as is not reported amongſt the Gentiles. But not onely this Vice, but all others that are incident to Humane Nature, and eſpecially (which alſo at this time ſaith he undoes all) hatred of the truth, and them that ſpeak it, lovers of Lies with thoſe that forge them; the taking of good for evil, veneration of evil for good, the deſire of darkneſs inſtead of the Sun, and the entertainment of Satan for an Angel of Light. Kings were anointed without any reſpect to God, but if there were any more cruel than their Fellows: And not long after they were murthered by thoſe that anointed them, without any examination of the matter, and more cruel ones were choſen in their rooms. If any of them had but a ſhew of mildneſs or ſeemed the leaſt inclinable to truth, the hatred and violence of all was upon him, as the Subverter of Britain. What was pleaſing or diſpleaſing to Almighty God, was all one and alike to them; but rather, what diſpleaſed him moſt pleaſed them: So that that Saying of the Prophet, may be well fitted to our Countrey, which was denounced againſt that ancient People. Children ye have forſaken God without a Law, and provoked to anger the Holy one of Iſrael. Why ſhould ye be ſmitten any more ye workers of Iniquity? All the Head is ſick, and the Heart faint, from the ſole of the foot to the crown of the head there is no health in it. So they acted all things contrary to health, as if the Univerſal Phyſician afforded no Medicine to the World. And theſe things were not onely practiſed by Secular men, but by the Lord's Flock and the Shepherds thereof, who ought to be an Example unto the People. They were debauched and grown ſottiſh by Drunkenneſs, fell one upon another, with Contentious Brawlings, and Emulations, having no diſcretion to diſcern betwixt good and evil.

Iſaiah, 1. 5.

9. In the mean while it pleaſing Almighty God to purge his Family, and by a Report onely of Tribulation, to cure it of ſo miſchievous an Infection, a ſwift noiſe pierced all mens ears of the ſudden approach of the ancient Enemy, who was now reſolved to deſtroy all the Natives, and himſelf to plant and inhabit the whole Countrey. Yet for all this did they not amend their manners, but like to fooliſh Aſſes biting upon the Bit of Reaſon, left the right Path, and hurried on the broad ſteep way which leads to deſtruction. Therefore, as Solomon ſays, When the Servant is not amended by words, the fool is whipped and doth not feel it; for a dreadfull Plague fell upon this fooliſh People, which in a ſhort time, without any aſſiſtence of the Sword, did ſuch execution upon them, that the living ſufficed not to bury the dead. Neither yet were they ever the better, that the Saying of Iſaiah the Prophet might in them alſo be fulfilled. And God called them to ſorrow and mourning, to baldneſs and the girdle of Sackcloath: but behold they fell to killing of Calves and ſlaying of Rams, to eat and drink, and they ſaid, Let us eat and drink, for to morrow we ſhall die. And why? the time approached wherein their Iniquities, as in old time thoſe of the Ammorhites ſhould be fulfilled. For they fell into a Conſultation, what might be the beſt and moſt effectual courſe to prevent the ſo diſmal and frequent Invaſions of the forenamed Nations. Then were all the Prov. 29. 19.

Iſaiah 22. 12.

Sect. I.

The Saxons are invited.

the Counſellours, together with the proud Tyrant himſelf, blinded, deviſing not a Protection, but the deſtruction of their Countrey; namely, that thoſe moſt fierce and curſed Saxons, hatefull both to God and Man, ſhould as Wolves into the Sheepfold be ſent for to repulſe theſe Northern Nations. Than which nothing was ever more pernicious, nothing more bitter. Oh the groſſeſt darkneſs of underſtanding! Oh the moſt deſperate dulneſs and blockiſhneſs of mind! Thoſe whom abſent they dreaded more than death, theſe fooliſh Princes invited under the ſame Roof, giving as 'tis ſaid fooliſh Council unto Pharaoh.

Who Land here.

10. Then did a Kennell of Whelps in three Veſſels, called by them Cynlæ, in our Language, ſaith he, Long Ships, ruſh out of the barbarous Lioneſſes Den, with a proſperous gale, and lucky Omen and Auguries, whereby it was foretold by a certain Preſage, That for three hundred years they ſhould poſſeſs that Countrey, unto which they directed their courſe; and for an hundred and twenty, or half that ſpace of time, often waſte and depopulate the ſame. Theſe having Landed, by Commandment of the unlucky Tyrant, firſt fixed their Claws upon the Eaſtern part of the Iſland, as with a deſign to protect it, but truly meaning to offer violence to it. And their forementioned Dam finding that her firſt Kennel proſpered, ſent after them a greater rabble of Dogs, which having paſſed over in Pinnaces, joyned with the former miſ-begotten Crew. Thence it is that the Sprout of Iniquity, the Root of Bitterneſs, the Virulent Plantation, but ſuitable to our Deſerts, ſprings up in our Soil, with their extravagant Buds and Branches. But theſe Barbarians being admitted into the Iſland as Souldiers, and ſuch (ſo they ly'd) as were to undergo great hazards for their Entertainers, obtained what was neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence; which being allowed for a long time (as it's ſaid) ſtopped the Dogs mouth. Howbeit afterward, they complain that they were but ſlenderly provided for, ſeeking for colourable Pretences to quarrel; and except their Allowances were increaſed, they threaten to break the Peace, and to haraſs the whole Iſland. Without delay they back their Threats by ſuitable Actions. For the cauſe, viz. their wickedneſs ſtill continuing the ſame, and being nouriſhed, the fire by the hands of theſe Eaſtern Sacrilegious men, was kindled from Sea to Sea, and conſuming the Neighbouring Cities and the Countries adjoyning, ceaſed not, till having in a manner deſtroyed all the Land with a red and terrible flame, it touched upon the Weſtern Ocean. In this violent Invaſion, comparable to that which the Aſſyrians made into Judah, is alſo fulfilled in us according to the Hiſtory, what the Prophet by way of Lamentation uttered: They have burnt thy Sanctuary with fire, they have polluted in the Land the Tabernacle of thy Name. And again: O God the Gentiles are come into thine Heritage: they have defiled thine Holy Temple, &c. Inſomuch that all the Colonies by the frequent battering of Engines, and all the Inhabitants together with the Prelates of the Church, the Prieſts and People, by Swords glittering on every ſide, and cracking Flames, were at once laid flat upon the ground; and which was a dreadfull Spectacle to behold, in the midſt of the Streets the ſtone-works of Turrets and high Walls, ſacred Altars, and pieces of Carkaſſes, cruſted over with a purple bloudy Dye, as in one horrible Wine-preſs to be ſeen mixed together. Neither was there any Sepulchre other than the Ruines of Houſes, and the Bellies of wild Beaſts and Fowls; with Reverence be it ſpoken to Holy Souls, if many ſuch were then found, which were carried by Angels up into Heaven. For that Vine which was formerly good, had ſo degenerated into bitterneſs, that according to what the Prophet ſays, Seldom could a Cluſter, or Ear, be found after the Gatherers or Reapers.

But find fault with their Quarters.

Item quærun-tur non affluenter ſibi Epimenia Contribui. Pro Epimenia voce Græca Polydorus Virgilius aliíque ponunt Annonas, ſed monet Joſſelinus in Saxo. lib. de vocabulis interpretari neſt, i. e. Nidos ſive habitationes.

Pſal. 73. 7.

Pſal. 79. 1.

Making havock of their Entertainers.

11. Some miſerable Remains being found upon the Mountains, were butchered by heaps: Others, almoſt ſpent with Fame, gave up themſelves to the Enemy into perpetual Slavery, if they were not preſently killed, which was eſteemed the greateſt favour imaginable. Others went into Parts beyond the Sea, inſtead of the Mariners Celeuſma (or Song at their firſt ſetting out) howling and roaring under their ſpread Sails, this Ditty: Thou haſt given us, O Lord, as Sheep to be devoured, and haſt ſcattered us among the Nations. Others ſtayed in their own Countrey, but betook themſelves to Mountains, to craggy places, and difficult of Acceſs, to thick Woods, and the very Rocks of the Sea, ever trembling for fear, and having their ſafety in ſuſpicion. A little time being paſt, when the cruel Rovers had retired, thoſe that were left behind being ſtrengthened by God, to whom now they flie from all places, as Bees to an Hive upon the approach of a Tempeſt, moſt heartily beſeeching him, and ſending up innumerable Prayers, that they might not utterly be deſtroyed from the face of the Earth; under Pſal. 43. 12.

Conduct

Sect. 1.

Conduct of Ambroſius Aurelianus a modeſt Man, who of the Roman Nation alone had ſurvived this Calamity, having loſt his Parents therein, who were clad with Purple, and whoſe Poſterity has now degenerated from their Grandfathers goodneſs; under him they take Arms and Courage, provoke the Conquerours to Battel, and by the Aſſiſtence of Almighty God obtain the Victory. From this time forward, ſaith Gildas, now the Natives, and then their Enemies have the better, that this Nation might be tryed, as formerly Iſrael was; whether it would love the Lord or not: even to the Year wherein Mount Badon was beſieged, and the laſt defeat given to theſe Rogues, the forty fourth year (viz. of the Saxons their coming into Britain) as I well know, one Month thereof being paſt, the ſame as of mine own Nativity. But even now the Cities of our Countrey are not inhabited as formerly, but lye waſte and deſolate, for though External Wars are ceaſed, yet Civil ones are not. However the remembrance of the Deſperate Condition of the Iſland, and of the unhoped for Relief, ſtuck faſt in the minds of thoſe who were witneſſes of both the Miracles: as in this reſpect Kings, publick and private Perſons, Prieſts and Eccleſiaſtical Men, every one in his Order.

12. But they being dead, and a Generation ſucceeding which was ignorant of the condition of the time paſt, and had onely felt the Serenity of the preſent, all Rules of Truth and Juſtice were ſo ſhaken and ſubverted, that I may not ſay no footſteps, but no marks at all of them remain in the late mentioned Orders, few, and they very few, excepted, who in reſpect of the loſs of ſo great a Multitude which daily runs Headlong to Hell, their Number is ſo ſhort, that in a manner our Venerable Mother the Church, cannot of thoſe that lye in her Boſome, perceive which are her true and onely Sons. After a few more words, he demands why that ſhould be concealed, which not onely is known, but upbraided by the Nations round about. Britain, ſaith he, hath Kings but Tyrants, Judges it hath but wicked ones, often fleecing and puniſhing, but Innocent Perſons, vindicating and patroniſing, but guilty Perſons and Thieves, having very many Wives, but theſe Whores and Adultereſſes, often ſwearing but forſwearing, vowing and then preſently breaking, waging Wars, but thoſe Civil and upon unjuſt Accounts, proſecuting Thieves mightily throughout the Countrey, and having ſome of them ſitting at their own Tables, whom they not onely love but reward, beſtowing Almes liberally, but on the other ſide, heaping up vaſt Mountains of Wickedneſs, ſitting in the Seat of Arbitratours, but ſeldom enquiring after any Rule of right Judgment, deſpiſing the Innocent and Humble, but aſmuch as in them lies, and as opportunity ſerves, extolling to the Skies all bloudy Perſons, proud, guilty of paricide, unlawfull Company-keepers and Adulterers, the Enemies of God, and who with the very Name it ſelf were to be deſtroyed and blotted out; keeping many bound in Priſon, whom by their own Craft, they oppreſs and load with Chains, rather than for any thing, wherein they have really offended: continuing with Oaths amongſt Altars, which within a little time they deſpiſe as dirty Stones.

Its Character in general.

13. After this, our Authour comes to the Reprehenſion of particular Perſons. Firſt he accuſes Conſtantine (whom he terms the Whelp of the Pannonian Lioneſs) of killing, notwithſtanding a corporal and moſt ſolemn Oath, ſomes Boys of Royal extract betwixt the Altars. Of living many years before in Adultery, having put away his own Wife contrary to Chriſt's Command. He affirms that he had planted in his Heart, which was like an Earth unable to bear any good Fruit, a ſlip of Unbelief and Folly taken from Sodom, which being watered by many known, though Domeſtick, Impieties, as ſo many poyſonous ſhowres brought forth to the offence of God, this impudent Crime of Paricide and Sacrilege, that ſtill intangled in the Nets of his former Miſchiefs, by his ancient faults he increaſes his preſent Enormities. * After this, ſaying that he reprehends him as preſent whom he knows yet to be alive, by laying before him the Eternal Puniſhments which were to inſue, and the promiſes made for his Salvation, he earneſtly exhorts him to the amendment of his ſinfull life. Now after him he takes Aurelius Caninus to task, whom he terms a Lion's Whelp, and demands of him whether he be not worſe than the former, ſwallowed up in the Filth of Paricides, Fornications and Adulteries. Whether hating the Peace of his Countrey, as a Serpent or ſome deadly thing, by thirſting after Civil Wars and unjuſt Depredations, he do not ſhut againſt himſelf the Gates of Heavenly Peace and Refreſhment. Seeing he was left alone as a withering Tree in the middle of a Field, he bids him remember the idle fancy of his Fathers and Brothers with their juvenile and immature Death. And bidding him not to think to live to the Age of Me-

As to particular Perſons.

Age jam quaſi præſentem arguo quem adhuc ſupereſſe non neſcio. f. 25. 6.*

Quid tu quoq; ut Propheta ait, Catule Leonine Aureli Canine Agis? Alii Aurelium Conanum vocant, Author noſter Caninum ut hic quem docti viri ſequuntur. Ego eum de induſtria ita nomen mutaſſe exiſtimaverim, quod ingenio hujus ſatyræ ſatis quadrat.

thuſalah, by the ſame Arguments, as formerly excites him to a ſpeedy Repentance. The next he undertakes is Vortiporius, whom he compares to a ſpotted Leopard, for the Multiplicity of his Crimes and his gray Hairs, being from the top to the bottom, defiled with Paricide and Adulteries, the Son not of a good King, as of Hezekiah was Manaſſes: He accuſes him for putting away his own Wife, and burthening his Conſcience with defilement of an impudent Daughter, concluding with the like Exhortation to amendment. Then falls he upon Cuneglaſus, whoſe Name in the Roman Language he ſaith importeth a Yellow Batcher, terming him a Bear, the Contemner or Oppoſer of God, who had wallowed in the Dregs of Wickedneſs from his very youth. He demands why he creates ſo much trouble to his Countreymen by his Civil diſſentions, and to God Almighty by his infinite Crimes? why he had driven away his own Wife, and taken her wicked Couſin-German to his Bed, which had promiſed perpetual Chaſtity unto God. Then by propoſing the like Terrours and Allurements, he endeavours to bring him to a better life.

14. But moſt pains he takes with Maglocunus the laſt in the Catalogue, but neither the laſt nor the leaſt in Crimes, whom he calls by the Title of the Dragon of the Iſland, terms the Suppreſſour of many Tyrants, but the firſt in Miſchief, greater than many both in Power and Malice, free in giving but more profuſe in Sin, in Arms powerfull, but more valiant in ſuch attempts as deſtroy the Soul, as one who ſottiſhly wallows in the Lake of his old Wickedneſs, as drunk with Wine preſſed out of the Sodomitical Grape. He demands of him, why he heaps ſuch loads of Sins as ſo many high Mountains upon his Royal ſhoulders? and why he doth not carry himſelf better than others, nay why he behaves himſelf worſe than others towards that King of all Kings, who had made him higher than all other Captains of Britain, aſwell in reſpect of his Kingdom as in Stature, and the Lineaments of his Body? He upbraids him for having by Fire and Sword deſtroyed the King his Uncle with moſt valiant Souldiers, the Countenances of whom ſeemed not unlike to thoſe of the Whelps of Lions: but eſpecially for devoting himſelf to a religious Courſe of Life, after his Violence had ſucceeded, and breaking thoſe Oaths which he had taken to that purpoſe; and then returning as the Dog to his Vomit, to as greedy a Proſecution of vitious Courſes as ever. He inſtances in his deſpiſing his own Wife, and loving the Wife of his Brother's Son, and the double Paricide which thereupon followed, and at laſt the Murther alſo of her by whoſe Suggeſtions and Solicitations, his Wife and her own Husband had been made away. He farther upbraids him with being inſtructed by an excellent Maſter, and having produced many Threatnings to him out of Scripture, he then leaves off the Proſecution of the Hiſtory of his Times, and to deter his Countreymen, as well thoſe of the Laity as his own Profeſſion, he proceeds in the Quotation of Scriptures full of Threats, and applies them to his Purpoſe. His Latin is Barbarous, and his Style vehement, and troubleſomely Luxuriant, but ſuch as diſcovers great Wit, and a mind full of Zeal both for his God, and for his Countrey.

Sed monita tibi profectò non deſunt, cum habueris præceptorem penè totius Britanniæ magiſtrum elegantem. Caveto igitur ne tibi quod à Salomone notatur accidat. Quaſi qui excitat dormientem de gravi ſomno, ſic qui enarrat ſtulto ſapientiam, &c. p. 33.

15. His Zeal was no whit extravagant, but adequate to the miſchief impending, viz. the deſtruction of his Countrey, and founded not onely on pious, but political reaſons; for Vice, as we could be infinite in ſhewing, has been the forerunner of the Ruine, both of States, Kingdoms and Families. But to come to our buſineſs, and to inlarge upon this Text of Gildas. The Romans having taken their farewell of Britain, the Natives were, we ſee, utterly at a loſs, not knowing how to behave themſelves, wanting both heads and hearts for the withſtanding ſo great a Storm as fell upon them: The Countrey having been drained of all its Inhabitants, which had either Skill or Courage. Their heavy caſe required able and faithfull Leaders; glad they were to accept of any that would undertake their Patronage, and to purchaſe their Conduct and Protection at what rate ſoever. Hereat it ſeems many took occaſion to ſet up for themſelves, and inſtead of Legitimate Princes and Fathers of their Countrey, their Countrey abounded with Tyrants, with Theives and Robbers which owned the Title, but diſowned the Duty of Rulers, were ravenous after the reward, but utterly careleſs of the work of Governours; Shepherds who ſpent all their time in Fleecing, never buſied themſelves about feeding or protecting the Flock farther than their own mere Intereſts carried them, to have ſome remaining over which they might domineer and tyrannize. That they had not one Monarch, but ſeveral Kings, appears ſufficiently both from the ſtory of thoſe times whereof we now write, and of thoſe which followed, and that this cuſtome began near as ſoon as the Romans had quitted them, is very probable, when like a ſick man they were glad to ſhift from one ſide, and from one thing to another, reſtleſs, by reaſon of that miſery which ſtill preſſed upon them. At length, haraſſed and tired out with the Inſolencies and Cruelties of many Tyrants; ſome of them they oppoſed, others they ſlew; but ſtill finding that ſeldom came the better, they thought it beſt to have one Supreme to curb and check, if need were, the other in their Extravagancies. The Iſſue of this Reſolution was, that one Vortigern was choſen King, whom we can grant to Polydore Virgil to have been moſt eminent amongſt them, for Authority and Nobility, but ſcarcely for Vertue; not to alledge any thing againſt his Valour.

Vortigern choſen King of the Britains.

Plures judicabant id decus deferendum Vortigerio, quod eſſet vir inter viros authoritate, nobilitate, virtute ſummus. Angl. Hiſtor. lib. 3.

16. Otherwiſe the Complaints of Gildas of the corruption of theſe times, muſt be interpreted rather too ſcant and narrow; for by the greater number of creditable Authours, he is deciphered to have been a proud and unfortunate Tyrant; and yet was he well enough beloved by the People, becauſe his vitious Inclination ſuited ſo well with theirs. In War he was neither skilfull, nor in Council prudent, but as Gildas deciphers others, Covetous and Luxurious, as inſatiable in Luſt, as prone to all other Villanies; in Gluttony and Riot he waſted the publick Revenues, and no otherwiſe endeavoured to propulſe common impendent dangers, than by an ungrounded confidence and ſupine ſecurity. Yet the frequent Inrodes of the Scots and Picts, and the dreadfull effects thereof, awakened the People, and the Clamours of the Multitude him, and cauſed him at length to ſummon a great Council, to conſult how ſome better courſe might be taken, for prevention of theſe Northern Miſchiefs. They had had all along great thoughts of their own Valour and Abilities (as all People have which are deſtined to a Conqueſt) but the ſtill continued ſmart was ſo great, which they received from ſo many reiterated blows, that it made them, though againſt their wills, feel their weakneſs and inability, to repell their Enemies. By general conſent therefore it was reſolved to call in ſome foreign Power to their relief, and hire an Army, which ſhould repell theſe Rovers with ſuch ſignal marks of their Valour, that they ſhould not dare any more to look upon thoſe grounds which contained the Carkaſſes of their ſo many ſlain Relations. The name of the Saxons was at this time very great, by reaſon of their ſeveral Exploits both at Sea and Land, their numerous Depredations and Invaſions, they had made into moſt Countries lying toward the Sea. It was reſolved to invite ſome of them over. They thought them poor, and wanting Habitation. They imagined they would be glad of an Employment, to take off their ſuperfluous numbers, and get them a Livelyhood abroad. They concluded they would be ſatisfied with reaſonable pay, their neceſſities were ſo great. At the moſt they believed they would take it as a mighty favour to have ſome ſhare of the moſt barren and inconſiderable part of that Countrey to inhabit, which by their toil and the expence of their bloud, they ſhould protect.

His Character.

He calls a Council.

Who agree to require aid of the Saxons.

Nec manu promptus nec conſilio bonus, imò ad illecebras carnis pronus omniúmque ferè vitiorum mancipium: quippe quem ſubjugaret avaritia, inquietaret ſaperbia, &c. Malmesbur. de geſtis Regum Angl. l. 1.

17. Ambaſſadours are accordingly ſent, and thoſe of the moſt eminent of the Nation, with great Rewards. But this was but to deſire their aid and aſſiſtence, over and above a ſtrict League and Alliance with them. Though our Britains were poor-ſpirited enough, yet not ſo ſlaviſh and baſe minded as to offer them ſubjection, and the Dominion of themſelves and their Countrey, can we believe, as the Saxon Authours for honour of their own Nation have recorded. One of them is ſo confident as to tell us the very Harangue the Ambaſſadours uſed, which was this: Worthy Saxons, the diſtreſſed Britains tired out, and overpowered by a perpetual invading Enemy, and hearing the fame of your valour, have ſent us hither to deſire your aid. Their Cauntrey is both fertile and ſpatious, which they have ordered us to ſubmit to your Commands. Heretofore we lived with freedom under the obedience and protection of the Roman Empire. Next to the Romans we knew none more worthy than your ſelves, and therefore now implore your proweſs for our relief. Let us not ſtill be ſubject to our preſent Enemies. To any thing you ſhall think fit to impoſe we ſhall ſubmit. Whatever the Ambaſſadours ſaid or offered, the Saxons were very well pleaſed with the meſſage, as being courted to that which they themſelves had infinitely deſired, and reſolving not to be guilty of any miſcarriage by their own delay, firſt return an obliging anſwer to the Ambaſſadours, as that the Britains might reſt upon their friendſhip and fidelity, as ſuch who would ſtand by them no leſs in their adverſe than proſperous Eſtate. The Ambaſſadours return very joyfull, as expecting thanks for the ſucceſs of their errand, and they are not deceived in their expectation, thoſe that ſent them now eſteeming themſelves made for ever.

Accordingly Ambaſſadours are ſent.

Witichind. Geſt. Saxon. Lib. 1.

Germani audientes rem mille votis petitam à ſe ultrò expoſtulari, &c. Malm. Ubi ſuprà.

Sect. I.

Hengiſt and Horſa with the Saxons arrive.

Cinlæ, al. Ceolæ, unde noſtrat. Keeles.

18. It appears from what we have cited out of Gildas, that the Pagan Saxons in their way, were ſo Religious as to conſult their Gods about the ſucceſs of this expedition, who anſwered, that the Land to which they directed their courſe, they ſhould hold for three hundred years, and half ſo much time ſpend in conteſt and bickerings with that Nation. From the three ſeveral ſorts of People called Saxons, Angli and Jutes, in three long Ships, by them called Kynles, were ſent a ſelect Company, not ſo much conſiderable for number, and the courage and dexterity of the Men, under conduct of two Brothers, Hengiſt and Horſa, of choiceſt Nobility amongſt them, as deſcended in the fourth degree from Woden, from whoſe Loyns moſt of theſe barbarous Nations derived the ſeveral Pedegrees of their Kings, and whom, for the renown of his Acts, they made their God, ſacrilegiouſly, as our Authour obſerves, dedicating to his memory the fourth day of the week, as the ſixth to the worſhip of his Wife Frea. But they came not ſo willingly, but they were as joyfully received, the People running out to meet them, and offering them all acts of kindneſs and hoſpitality, and the King giving them his hearty thanks for the great pains and peril they had been pleaſed to undergoe for the ſake of him and his Subjects. After ſome ſmall conference and faith given and received on both ſides, the Iſle of Thanet is aſſigned them for their ſupport, they ingaging indefatigably to uſe their endeavours for protection of that Land, the Inhabitants whereof, as ſtrictly engaged on the other ſide to give them ample rewards for their labours; within a little time they have full occaſion to try their Metal. The Scots make their uſual Inrodes without any apprehenſion of more reſiſtence than the pitifull Britains were wont to make. But they find a freſh Gameſter ingaged, with whom, after ſome tryal made, they think it not fit to meddle, but retreat back to their receptacles, and are very unwilling afterwards to grapple with him.

And are ſeated in the Iſle of Thanet.

Another Company follow.

Rowen married to Vortigern.

A third arrive.

Craterem vino coronatum Regi obtulit, flexíſque genibus, Liener, inquit, King Wacht heil, i.e. Clariſſime (potiùs chariſſime) Rex obſerva ſalutem. Quo per interpretem intellecto, Drinc. heil, inquit Rex, poculúmque accipiens puellam oſculatus eſt. Ab illo die inquit Galfridus Monmuthenſis uſque in hodiernum manſit conſuetudo illa in Britannia, quod in conviviis qui potat ad alium dicit Wacht heil, qui verò poſt ipſum recipit potum reſpondet Drinc heil.

19. The Saxons (or Angles) were as much elevated with their ſucceſs, as the Scots were diſcouraged at their unuſual diſappointments, and Hengiſt, a Man of excellent Wit, as well as Valour, perceiving with whom he had to deal, under other pretences, ſends back ſome of his Companions to acquaint his Countreymen with the beauty and fertility of the Iſland, and the cowardiſe and ſottiſhneſs of the Inhabitants, as well King as People, inviting them to make themſelves Maſters of ſo good a fortune as now offered it ſelf unto them. The Meſſengers eaſily perſwaded ſuch a Company to follow them as filled ſeventeen Veſſels, and together with their Countreymen already landed, would make up a formidable Army. And along with them they brought the Daughter of Hengiſt (by the Britains called Rowen) for beauty a miracle of Nature, and by it as it ſeemed, as well as by her Father deſigned, as a ſpectacle for Men to gaze on, and therewith to be enamoured. They are invited to a Feaſt, and Hengiſt appoints her to wait at the Cupboard to Captivate with her looks the affections of the Britiſh King. His device as ſpeedily takes as executed. For Vortigern being exceedingly given to Women by his own Inclination, was immediately wounded by the Darts which proceeded from her Eyes, and could think of nothing elſe, could no way be cured but by enjoying her, inſomuch, that out of hand ſhe muſt be his Wife. Hengiſt pretends an unwillingneſs, as loath the King ſhould diſhonour himſelf by ſo unequal a Match, and at length ſeems unwillingly willing, being bought off by a gift of all the Countrey of Kent, (formerly Governed laudably by one Gorongus) which munificence of Vortigern he was not able to withſtand. The Barbarian perceiving now he had got ſuch hold of him that he might be bold, ſo far abuſed his Imprudence, as to perſwade him to ſend over for Octa and Ebiſſa, his own and his Brothers Son (ſome ſay his Brother himſelf) that as he took upon him the Protection of the Eaſtern, ſo they might defend the Northern Parts from the violence of the Scots. By the King's leave then with forty Veſſels they Coaſted about Britain, and coming to the Orcades, ſuppreſſed both the Picts and Scots, and in that part of the Iſland, which afterwards was called Northumberland, ſeated themſelves, though without any Title or Name of Regality till the time of Ida, from whom the Kings of Northumberland deſcended. But this was not till long after.

The Saxons and Britains quarrell.

Gildas, Beda, Ninn. Malmſ.

20. Now the Saxons being numerous, and ſtrong enough to accompliſh what they had deſigned, take occaſion to pick a quarrel. They complain they are much Arrear in Pay, and when this occaſion is removed, after a little pauſe, they find fault that it is too little, not at all anſwering the pains and perils they undergoe, threatning War, and a ſeizure of the Land it ſelf, except their allowance were augmented. Guortimer the Son of Vortigern, a young Man of far greater Senſe and Spirit than his Father, could not any longer diſſemble his Indignation, to ſee himſelf and his Countreymen ſo impoſed on, and fully reſolving to attempt the expulſion of theſe Strangers, broke his deſign to his Father, and obtained his conſent for the putting of it in execution, and high time it was to doe it. For the Saxons, as we are informed by Gildas, making a League with the Picts and Scots, and iſſuing out of Kent, without any conſiderable reſiſtence, waſted the whole Land in a manner as far as the Weſtern Sea, making ſuch havock of all things, that Towns and Caſtles were overturned, all ſorts of People ſlain by heaps, and all places Sacred polluted and demoliſhed. Such as eſcaped the Sword, either betook themſelves to the Mountains, whither the ſame fate ſhortly after purſued them, or ſubmitted to ſlavery worſe than death it ſelf, or fled to thick Woods and Rocks of the Sea; or elſe fled over the Sea into other Countries. Guortimer as ſtrenuouſly as he could oppoſed himſelf; and the Monk of Malmſbury tells us, that after the Saxons had been in Britain ſeven years, the League was broken, and for twenty years Hoſtility continued amongſt them, in which ſpace many Skirmiſhes, or ſlight Ingagements happened, but four ſet Battels, wherein both ſides ingaged with their utmoſt force. The Britiſh Writers here tell us, that Vortimer thrice ſtraitned and beſieged the Saxons in the Iſle of Thanet; and when by reaſon of freſh ſupplies ſent from Saxony, they broke through and eſcaped this danger; fought with them four other Battels, whereof three are ſpecified by place and Circumſtance. The firſt on the River Darwent, the ſecond at Epiſford, wherein Horſa, the Brother of Hengiſt, fell together with Katigern, the other Son of Vortigern. The third was in a Field by Stonar, called then in Latin, Lapis Tituli; where he beat them into their Ships with ſuch Execution and Conſternation, that they ventured no more to Land for the full ſpace of five years.

Ninn.

Guortimer beats the Saxons.

Darentum non Eboracenſe illud hic intelligendum, ſed Darentum Cantianum à Darentford ſive Dartford oppido illi appoſito ſatis cognitum.

21. This might ſeem altogether uncredible, but that Gildas tells us how, after ſo great havock and deſtruction made by them, they retired, which others interpret of returning home, notwithſtanding the ſeeming eaſineſs of the Conqueſt. In this five years ſpace they will have Guortimer to have died, who deſired he might be buried in the Port of Stonar, perſwaded that the ſecret virtue of his Bones would keep off the Saxons, from ever landing in that place, but they neglecting his Commands, buried him at Lincoln. The Saxon Annals relate theſe matters otherwiſe. As that in the firſt Ingagement it was a drawn Battel in a place called Egleſtrhip, where on one ſide fell Horſa the Brother of Hengiſt (from whence Horſte the place of his Sepulture took name) and on the other ſide Katigis the ſecond Son of the King. In the reſt, Saxons or Angles had the better, and the Britains were forced to come to Termes; Guortimer their Captain now dead, who being of a different humour from his Father's eaſineſs, would have excellently governed, if Almighty God had ſo pleaſed; but he being gone, the Affairs of his Countreymen went quite down the wind. After the death of Horſa, Hengiſt his Brother took the Royal Title upon him in Kent, in which year Matthew of Weſtminſter writes; that thrice he fought againſt the Britains, but not able to reſiſt the valour of Vortimer, fled into Thanet, where he was daily vexed at Sea; and at length the Saxons left their Wives and Children behind them, and returned into Germany. And there they ſtaid, according to what intelligence that Authour had, till ſuch time as they heard of the death of Guortimer, who was poyſoned by procurement of Rowen his Father's Wife. With four thouſand men Hengiſt returned into Britain, and with ſo great an Army ſo alarmed Vortigern and his Nobles, that they conſulted how to oppoſe them, which being made known to Hengiſt by his Daughter, he ſent to tell the King that he had no deſign againſt any perſon whatſoever, Vortimer excepted; who being now removed out of the way, he was ready to ſubmit himſelf and all his men to his pleaſure, to keep as many as he thought fit, and ſend back the reſt into their Countrey. There are others that tell us how two years after the firſt Fight, wherein Horſa was ſlain in a Battel at Creganford, Hengiſt, and Eſce his Son ſlew of the Britains four chief Commanders, and as many thouſand men; the reſt being totally routed and flying to London. That eight years after this, he renewed the War, and in a Battel at a place called Wippeds-fleot, ſlew twelve other Princes, and loſt Wipped the Saxon Count, from whom the place received its name. And in another Encounter (the place is uncertain) he gave them ſuch a Defeat, that they left Camp and Baggage, and all behind them.

Dies.

Annal. Saxonicis Petroburgenſibus Æglesford, aliis Æegleſthrep, hodie Ailesford prope quem Catigirni ut putatur memoriæ poſitum Saxum cernitur monumentum Keith Cottyhouſe vulgò appellatum: neque Horſted procul diſſitum quod ab Horſa accepit nomen. Tertius Cocus qui, ut quidam volunt Horſo fatalis fuit, & Ninio Episford Henrico Huntindonienſi Aeilſtren vel Elſtre eſt dictus in Orientalibus Cantii partibus ſitus fuiſſe, (ſi quidem talis locus extiterit) in quibus ad ſua uſque tempora Horſam occiſum in bello à Britannis monumentum habuiſſe ſuo nomine inſigne, Beda Confirmat.

22. So different are Writers in their Relations of what paſſed in theſe obſcure times; but from all laid together it ſhould appear, that for a time the Invaders were repulſed and forced to retreat, if not home into Germany, to ſome remote place of ſhelter and ſecurity; for the Battels were fought in Kent it ſelf, and not onely there, but upon the Sea, as the word Wippeds-fleot intimates to us. But Hengiſt being landed, invites Vortigern his Son-in-Law to a Feaſt, together with three hundred of his Nobles; ſome ſay the meeting was appointed for a Treaty, to order their Affairs. To be ſure, he ſo ordered his matters, that having a number of his own men, ſufficient to overpower theſe Britains, whom he knew to be the chief of thoſe that could perform any thing either in Council or War againſt the Saxon Intereſt; he firſt cauſed them to raiſe a Quarrel, and then when they were warm with Wine, and more able to brawl than to defend themſelves, the Watch-word was given, Nemet Coar Scanes, upon which they drew their Scimiters, and murthered all their three hundred Gueſts in the place. They had another kind of deſign upon Vortigern, knowing he would eaſily be drawn to what they would have him. He was onely bound and kept in cuſtody, till for his Ranſome he aſſigned them three Provinces, which were afterward called Eſſex, Suſſex and Middleſex. After this, ſome Authours tell us, that Vortigern returned to his ſolitary kind of Life in that Countrey, which from him was called Guorthigirniauri, and thence to a Caſtle of his own building in thoſe parts, now called North-Wales, near to the River Tiebi; where living obſcurely among his Wives, he was, as it is ſtoried, burnt by fire from Heaven, at whoſe Prayer, whether German or Aurelius Ambroſius, it's not material to enquire. For the Reader muſt know that, according to the ſame Writers, he having committed Inceſt formerly with his own Daughter, was cenſured in a Synod, conſiſting both of Lay and Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, and partly for that Reaſon, partly for fear of the Saxons, by advice of his Nobility, retired into that Countrey, now called Wales; where he built him a ſtrong Caſtle (in Radnorſhire) by advice of a young Prophet, by ſome called Ambroſius, and by others Merlin. His Son undertook the Government, and in his Abſence reigned with great ſucceſs. After his Death Vortigern, either by the power of his own Faction, or by univerſal conſent reaſſumed the Government, which Hengiſt underſtanding, was incouraged to return and practiſe upon his Sottiſhneſs and Credulity, with that ſucceſs as we have now related.

Vortigern's Companions murthered by Hengiſt and his Saxons.

Eſſex, Suſſex and Middleſex, aſſigned to the Saxons.

Ninn.

Malmesb. quò prius.

23. The Britains having loſt the flower of their Nation in the Maſſacre, were much ſtartled at it to ſuch a meaſure, as they began to think of their wicked Courſes, and whither they were now bringing them, and began to be more ſober, and to betake themſelves to Divine Aſſiſtence. They were incouraged by ſome other Retreat of the Saxons, upon what occaſion it's uncertain, and by the great hopes conceived of Aurelius Ambroſius, who being deſcended of Roman Anceſtours, but ſuch as had born Regal Dignity in the Iſland, and loſt their lives againſt the Picts and Scots, had with their applauſe ſucceeded Vortigern; who, if credit may be given to ſome Authours, as much out of fear of him and the Romans, as of the Picts and Scots themſelves, firſt called in the Saxons. Under Conduct of this Aurelius Ambroſius, or Ambroſius Aurelianus (as Beda calls him) they took courage, and provoking their Enemies to Battel had the better of them. He is ſaid (by the Monk of Malmsbury) to have made much uſe in his Wars of one Arthur, and what Arthur ſhould this be, but him whom others make the Son of Pendragon his Brother. But ſo various and uncertain are the Reports of our Britiſh and Saxon Authours, that although much be written, yet very little of certainty have we either of the one or the other. As for Ambroſius Aurelianus, Ninius, as we lately hinted about Vortigern, will have him to have been famous, before the coming of the Saxons; according to which Aſſertion Sigebert begins 446 his Reign with their coming into the Iſland, at the year of our Lord 446; and talks of his Reigning and Fighting againſt them, for full five and forty years, contrary to the Evidence of all Hiſtory. Yet do ſome others tell us ſuch Stories 430 as yet farther caſt back his Reign into the 430 year of our Lord, which Henry of Huntingdon brings forward again to the year aſſigned by Sigebert, wherein he writes, that at a place called Arileſtreu, he led one Wing of the Battel againſt the Saxons, and Gortimer and Catigern, the Sons of Vortigern, the two others:
And this he accounts the ſeventh year after their coming into the Iſland. Geoffrey of Monmouth writes, that he burnt Vortigern, who after the death of his Son Vortimer had reaſſumed the Government; which Matthew Florilegus notes to 496 have happened in the year 496, ending the Reign of Aurelian, and his Life to-497 gether, in the year 497. Hector Boethius the Scotch Writer, begins his Reign at 498 498, which he writes to have continued almoſt ſeven years. But his Countreyman Buchanan agrees with the Welch David Powel in aſſigning 19 years to 481 his Government, which he will have begun in the year 481, and ended juſt 500 in 500.

Aurelius Ambroſius ſucceeds Vortigern in the Government.

Hiſt. lib. 1. c. 16.

Joannes Timuthenſis in vita Dubræij apud Uſſerum in Primord. Eccleſ. Britan. p. 447.

Hiſt. Scot. lib. f. 8, 9.

Rer. Scotic. l. 5. in Rege 45.

in Britan. Regum Catalogo.

24. But

Sect. 1.

ad Ann. 476. 477.

24. But concerning Ambroſius, none is more out of the way than Baronius the Cardinal, who imagined, and that for many Reaſons, he tells us, that he lived in Exile under Odoacer the King of the Heruli in Italy; whereas, not one tolerable ſhew of reaſon can be aſſigned, more than his very Name, of which there were ſeveral beſides this our Britain, who (he ſays) took the Purple, but not the Name of Emperour upon him, which he himſelf firſt attempted, but not his Parents, as Beda hath it, who writes, that theſe things happened in the Reign of Zeno the Emperour. The Cardinal as to his matter was alſo impoſed on by the falſe Copy of Gildas, publiſhed by Polydore Virgil, wherein the Singular number is pen'd inſtead of the Plural, which fault crept alſo into that Copy of Beda's Chronicle, which Paulus Diaconus uſed; and the errour became ſo infective, that Onuphrius Panninius and Octavius de Strada in their Catalogues of the Roman Emperours, talk of the Emperour Cæſar Ambroſius Aurelianus, Pius Fœlix, Auguſtus, 475 as who was ſaluted Emperour in Britain in the year 475, the 1227 of the City, and ſlain not long after. So much are we in the dark as to Ambroſius, whoſe Commendations yet we are told that Gildas an excellent Hiſtorian of the Britains wrote, above other Kings; nay, in an elegant ſtyle faithfully tranſmitted his Acts to Poſterity. Geoffrey of Monmouth indeed writes, that he had a Book which Gildas the Authour intituled, concerning the Victory of Aurelius Ambroſius. It's to be feared the Title belied Gildas, but whatever it was, from it and a Britiſh Copy brought out of Armenia, and given him by Walter the Archdeacon of Oxford, Geoffrey tells a long Story of this matter, whereof learned Uſher thus gives us the Summ.

Pro indutis indutus legitur.

*In Scotichronico apud Uſſerium, p.*449. lib. 4. c. ult.

Lib. 8. Cc. 3. 4.

Overthrows Hengiſt in Battel.

25. Vortigern being dead, the Saxons betook themſelves to the Parts beyond Humber, where they were no ſooner arrived, but Ambroſius was at their heels. In his paſſage he was much affected to behold the Countries ſo deſolate, but eſpecially at the ſight of ſo many Churches laid level with the Earth, which he promiſed ſhould be rebuilt if he got the better. Hengiſt brought into the field againſt him, about two hundred thouſand Armed men, at a place called Moriſbeli, but ingaging in Battel was worſted, and he himſelf, near to the City of Conan, by the Britains called Cair-Conan and Cuningburg by the Engliſh, was taken Priſoner by Eldole the Duke of Claudioceſter. The City being alſo afterward taken, and they coming to conſider what ſhould be done with Hengiſt, Eldade the Biſhop of Claudioceſter, the Brother of Eldole, a man of great Prudence and Religion, harangued to this effect. Though all ſhould agree to ſet him at liberty, I my ſelf would cut him in pieces. For I would imitate the Example of the Prophet Samuel, who having in his power Agag the King of Amaleck, hewed him in pieces, ſaying: As thou haſt made Mothers Childleſs, ſo will I make thy Mother this day Childleſs among Women. Doe ye in like manner to Hengiſt, who is another Agag: Which ſaid, Eldole led Hengiſt out of the City and ſlew him. 489 This Marlen, the Flowergatherer, writes to have happened in the 489 year our Lord, adding, that to Hengiſt ſucceeded his Son Oſric in the Kingdom of Kent, being ſirnamed Æſc, from whom all the Kings of Kent to this day are called Aſc-kynges. He differs but one year in his Account from Ethelwerd and the Saxon Annaliſts, who making no mention at all of the death of Hengiſt, neither of the many Victories which the Britains obtained over the Saxons, write that Æſc ſucceeded in the Kingdom of Kent the year preceding.

Hodie Coniſburgh in agro Eboracenſi ad Danum vel Donum fluvium.

Who is ſlain.

And ſucceeded by his Son Oſric in the Kingdom of Kent.

26. Geoffrey proceeds, and tells us that Ambroſe beſieged Octa the Son of Hengiſt, who had ſhut up himſelf in York, and Euſa his Kinſman, who had done the like in the City Alclud or Dunbritton; and conſtraining them to yield themſelves, granted them the Countrey lying near to Scotland. For all his Intent was, how to reſtore his Kingdom to its ancient condition, his ſtudy how to reform the Churches, renew the vigour and force of the Laws, eſtabliſh Peace and the courſe of Juſtice. Thence therefore he went to Gwinton, to repair it as other places; which when he had performed, by the advice of Eldade the Biſhop, he proceeded to the Monaſtery near Cair Caradoc, now called Saleberie, where lay the Conſuls and Princes, whom wicked Hengiſt had betrayed. There in the Mount of Ambrius (the Founder in old time as is reported) was a Monaſtery of three hundred Friars. By others this is called the Mount of Ambroſe, and ſaid to be that place, now known by the Name of Stakenges, where the prodigious Piles of Stones were not, as Polydore affirms, raiſed by Ambroſe in memory of theſe Princes, as is vulgarly believed, but by the Britains in memory of Ambroſe himſelf, who at this place ended his life in Battel. He tells us this Monument is to be ſeen in the Dioceſe of Salisbury near to a Village called Amſbery, or rather Ambreſbury, the Polyd. Virgil. Anglic. Hiſt. lib. 3.

Name denoting the Village of Ambroſe, whoſe name or that of Ambrius (if any ſuch there was) the famouſneſs of the Relicks of St. Melorus (or Melior) quite buried afterwards in the ſaid Village. But as to the Britiſh Princes ſlain by Hengiſt, that their memory might be perpetuated at the ſuggeſtion of Tremoun or Tremorin the Archbiſhop of Carleon, Ambroſius Aurelius, as Geoffrey tells the Story, ſent for Ambroſius Merlin a Prophet, and with an Army of fifteen thouſand Armed men under Conduct of his Brother Uther Pendragon, ſent him into Ireland, whence he brought from the Mountain Killara, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of Gillomant King of the Iſland, that noble Structure of Stones, which he placed in Salisbury Plain, where at this day it is to be ſeen. Though this be no better than an old Wives Tale, Giraldus Cambrenſis makes mention of it, as that this Structure of Stones, being called Chorea Gigantum (becauſe Giants had brought them from the utmoſt Borders of Africk, and placed them in the Plain of Kildare) was by the Divine Diligence of Merlin, at the deſire of Aurelius Ambroſius King of the Britains brought out of Ireland into this Iſland, and placed in the very ſame poſture they had formerly ſtood in that place, where the flower of Britain, had under pretence of Peace, been wickedy butchered by the perfidious Saxons.

Topograph. diſt. cap. 18. Non procul à Caſtro Naſenſi.

27. In reference to what Giraldus writes of Ireland, the late Learned Primate thereof obſerves, that in the Countrey of Kildare, about two Miles from the Caſtle he mentions, two ſuch like Piles are to be ſeen, which in that Countrey, they call the Long Stones, although the Writer of the Britiſh Hiſtory ſeems to have Killair, which is ſituate in the Weſtern Meath, where Giraldus affirms in his time to have been extant, a certain Stone called the Navel of Ireland, as ſeated in the middle thereof, for which yet at the King's County at Birra, another hallowed Stone is at this day ſhewed. But to that Pile of Stones in Salisbury Plain, none in all Ireland ſeems more like than what is to be ſeen in the County of Corke, near a Town called Cloughtekilty, from Stones lying in a woody place; where are alſo to be ſeen the Foundations of a very large Houſe, which the Inhabitants report to have belonged to Sir John Mandeville, ſo famous for his Travels of four and thirty years. But for the completing of the Fable (which thence ſeems to have had its riſe, that in Ireland ſuch kinds of Maſſy piles have been ſeen) we muſt take notice of what Geoffrey of Monmouth writes concerning the return and Succeſs of the Britiſh Army. Being arrived with a proſperous Gale, they began with their Stones to ſet out the Sepulchres of the murthered Nobility. This being made known to Aurelius, he ſends out Meſſengers through the ſeveral Parts of Britain, to aſſemble both the Clergy and People to the Mount of Ambrius, with Joy and Honour to adorn the foreſaid burying Place. They being met accordingly on the day prefixed, Aurelius ſets the Diadem upon his Head, and Royally celebrates the Feaſt of Whitſuntide, together with the three following days. Having beſtowed Honours upon ſuch of his Subjects as had deſerved, and particularly beſtowed the Metropolitical See of York upon Sampſon, a Man of great fame for Religion, and that of Caer Leon upon Dabritius, he commanded Merlin to ſet up the Stones he had brought from Ireland. He in obedience to his Commands erected them, about the burying place juſt in the ſame manner they had formerly ſtood in Killair in Ireland, and plainly ſhewed, that wit prevaileth above ſtrength.

28. Such is the Fable concerning Stoneheng (which though a Fable the Reader is to know) and concerning Ambroſe and his Prophet Merlin. But as there is no Law againſt the Improvement of Fables, Ninnius the other Britiſh Hiſtorian joins King and Prophet in the ſame Perſon, making that Child which propheſied to Vortigern the Son of a Roman Conſul, and calling him by the Name not of Merlin but Ambroſe; as that he was concealed by his Mother for fear of the King, who yet aſſoon as he had confeſſed his Parentage, either to reward his Predictions or as his Right beſtowed upon him all the reſt of Britain, retiring himſelf to a ſolitary Life. Amongſt theſe Incertainties of this, we may be certain from a more ſure Teſtimony of Gildas, that whatever otherwiſe this Ambroſe was, the Britains owed much unto his Courage and Conduct, by which a ſtop was for the preſent given to the violent proceedings of the Saxons, although their Writers conceal all things, that made againſt the Reputation of their Nation; recording nothing but Succeſs and Victories on their own ſide. And indeed ſhortly after they had ſufficient occaſion to doe it, notwithſtanding the real Performances of Ambroſe, and all the Romantick fine Tales told of his Nephew Arthur. For whatever became of Hengiſt; if he was ſlain in the North, in the South another of his Nation appeared, Ella by Name, who made himſelf King of another part of the Iſland. In the Year 477, (eleven before the death of Hengiſt, as ſome place it) with his three three Sons Cymen, Pleting and Ciſſa, in three ſhips he arrived at a place called Cymenſhore in Suſſex, whereupon the Inhabitants being caſt into a grievous fright flocked in vaſt multitudes, to the place of their landing from all Quarters. The Saxons being tall of Stature, and very ſtout and vigorous, received them couragiouſly who came hand over head upon them, and notwithſtanding their great Numbers put them to flight with ſuch ſlaughter as might be expected from ſo unequal an ingagement, and drove them into the wood, which the Saxon Chronology calls Andredes Leage. The Saxons ſeized upon the Maritime parts of Suſſex, and ſtill inlarged their Territories till the ninth year after their Arrival, wherein the Britains found themſelves ſo concerned, that they joined their Forces together, and ingaged them near a place called Mercredesburnanſtede. The Victory was doubtfull, both Armies drawing off after much loſs to their own Quarters which cauſed Ella to ſend for freſh ſupplies, as Henry of Huntingdon writes, though others are unwilling to let him paſs out of the Field without Conqueſt, according to their Cuſtome. However five years after this, Ella and Ciſſa his Son laid ſiege to a little City called Andredes Ceaſter, and taking it uſed their Conqueſt with ſuch ſeverity, that they left not one Britain therein alive.

Ella and his Saxons arrive in Suſſex.

And ſeize upon the Countrey.

Choriol. Saxon ad Ann. D. 477.
Her cƿom Ælle to Bretenlond ⁊ his III Sunu Cymen ⁊ Plencing ⁊ Ciſſa mid þrym ſcypum on ða ſtoƿe ða nemned Cymenes ora ⁊ ðær ofslogon moniᵹe ƿealas ſume on fleame bedryfon on ðone ƿudu ðe ᵹenemned is Andredes leaᵹe.
Huntindonenſis hanc pugnam ponit ad novum annum adventus eorum. Chronol. verò Saxonica ad An. 485. Ille locum vocat Mercredesburne hæc verò Mearcredes burnan ſtede.

29. Now is Britain become the Field of Fortune, News is perpetually brought to the Saxons, of the Succeſs of their Countreymen, and there is no one Eminent for Birth or Arms, but promiſes himſelf a good ſhare of ſo fertile a Countrey, together with a Royal Title. In the forty ſeventh year after their firſt coming into Britain, as Henry of Huntingdon, Count Cerdic (or Certic) the tenth in Lineage from Woden, an old and well practiſed Souldier, with Cenric his Son, and ſo many men as he could tranſport in five Veſſels, arrived at a place which from him was called Cerdiceſore. No ſooner did the ſhips appear, but the Inhabitants of theſe Parts ſufficiently warned heretofore, ſtand upon their Guard, and as the Invaders indeavour to land, manfully oppoſe them. But the Saxons ſtill advance, and what ground they once gain never more forſake it, till at laſt, the Britains in vain reſiſting, they get ſufficient footing in this Part alſo of the Iſland, inſomuch that the Britains vehemently ſuſpecting what the Induſtry and Valour of Cerdick and his Son might farther produce, combined againſt them with all the Power they could poſſibly make. But within ſeven years after their coming they had cauſe to be a little diverted from them by a freſh Onſet of new Gameſters, who arrived alſo out of Germany. One Port with his two Sons Bleda and Magla with two Veſſels arrived at Portſmouth (ſo named from him) and without much Difficulty repelling ſuch as unadviſedly made head againſt them, and having ſlain a young Britiſh Nobleman of great Eminency, carved for himſelf and Followers another ſhare out of the Countrey. Yet it ſeems the Adventures of Cerdick, made the Britains moſt apprehenſive, and therefore ſeven years after the Arrival of Port, and the ſixtieth after the firſt coming of the Saxons, the Archdeacon of Huntingdon reckons Nazaleod the greateſt King of the Britains, a Man both of a great Name and haughty Spirit, (from whom that Region was named Nazaleoli, which reached to the Place afterward called Cerdicesford,) gathered the whole force of Britain to ingage him. Cerdick aware of the danger deſired and obtained aid of Eſcai King of Kent, Ella King of Suſſex, and of Port, and his Sons, which done he divided his Army into two wings, whereof the Right he led himſelf, and committed the left to the Conduct of his Son Cinrick. Nazaleod, perceiving the Right wing to be the ſtronger of the two, bent his whole ſtrength and fury againſt it with ſuch Execution, that after great ſlaughter made of his men he forced Cerdick to run away, but purſuing with more heat than caution, the left wing commanded by Cinrick took the Advantage, and falling on his Rere renewed the Battel with ſuch Vigour, that he himſelf was ſlain in the place, and with him for Company five thouſand of his Followers.

Cerdic and his Followers invade the Land.

Another invaſion by one Port.

To Ambroſe ſucceeded Vtar Pendragon.

The Saxons obtain a great Victory over the Britains.

Chronol. Saxona ad An. 490.
Huntindonenſis Hiſt. l. 2.
Chronolog. Saxon. ad Ann. CCCCXCV.
Her cuomon tƿeᵹen ealdormen on Bretene Cerdic ⁊ Cynric his ſunu mid fif ſcipum in ðone ſtede þe is ᵹecƿeden Cerdices hora ⁊ ðy ilcan dæᵹe ƿid ƿeum ᵹefulhtan.
Cerdicis ora, vel Cerdicſford, noſter Cerdford. hodie contractè Chardford.
Chronol. Saxon. ad An. DI.
Huntindonenſis ubi ſuprà.

30. Such were the Circumſtances of the Battel, if the Archdeacon doth not take the liberty to frame theſe, and many more of his own head. But who this Nazaleod ſhould be is much controverted; for the Britains own no ſuch King by this Name. Some imagine it might be the Britiſh ſirname of Ambroſe, who it's certain about this time fought with the Saxons, with various fortune. Others think it the Name of Vther Pendragon his Brother, whom Hector Boethius writes to have governed the Britains at this time; but he adds that this Nazaleod, was a Man of obſcure Original, and that Vther made him his General, more out of reſpect to his Perſon, with which he had long been familiar, than to his Valour or Military skill; but being the beſt Captain next the King himſelf, he was ſlain in Battel together with fifteen thouſand Men. Matthew of Weſtminſter tells us how Vther

Pendragon now lay ſick, and therefore ſent this Man whom he calls Nathanlioth againſt the Saxons, who ſlew him and fifteen thouſand of his Britains. But foraſmuch as all the Saxon Annals unanimouſly call him a King, and ſo doth Ethelwald and Florentius Wigonienſis, and the Archdeacon ſaith he was the greateſt King of the Britains; Learned Uſher conjectures, that his Name might indeed be Natanleod, and that in reſpect of the great things atchieved by him, he might have the Sirname of Uther, viz. Admirable or Horrible, for ſo Uther ſignifies, Mab Uter being an horrible Son in the Britiſh Language, and Arthur an horrible Bear, or an Iron Mall wherewith the Jaws of Lions are broken. Could we fix upon this the Chronology of theſe obſcure times might be made much clearer, and the beginning of Arthur his Son, that King of whom Writers ſo much talk, and ſo much differ.

Notæ Ninio adjectæ de Arthuro, vide Uſſerium in Primordiis, P. p. 466, 467. Ut Græcis Ἄρκτος ita Britannis Arth, Urſum notat.

Another freſh ſupply arrives.

30. Though Cerdick, (or Certick) obtained the Victory, yet with ſo much loſs and danger, that finding ſtill ſome difficulties, he was glad to admit of freſh Supplies. Six years after the Battel, came two of his Nephews Stuf and Witgar with three Ships, and landed at Cerdicsford, where they found the Britains in a poſture of warmly receiving them. For if Henry of Huntingdon be to be credited, the Captains had marſhalled their men according to the exact Laws of War. When they marched with Advice and Caution, ſome on the Mountains, and others on the Vallies; as ſoon as the Sun aroſe and ſhone upon their guilded Shields, the very Mountains therewith gliſtered, and the Air it ſelf became inlightned and reſplendent, wherewith the Saxons were exceedingly affrighted. Yet drawing near to Battel when the two reſolute Armies came to joyn, the valour of the Britains, became inferiour, becauſe (as our Writer takes upon him to judge) God had deſpiſed them, and the Victory was evident on the part of the Saxons, who hereby obtained places not a few, and the Proweſs of Certic became terrible throughout the Countrey. Theſe that came over ſtill proſpering in this manner, not a man there was in Germany who was either touch'd with a ſenſe of honour, or not well ſatisfied with his preſent fortune, but muſt over into Britain, and accept of better, which ſo eaſily offered it ſelf. Therefore not long after the War, whereof we write, many more flocked into the Iſland, and as Huntingdon tells us, ſeized both upon Eaſtangle and Merce, though they continued ſome time in confuſion, not reduced under obedience of their reſpective Kings. For many Noble men there were who ſcrambled amongſt themſelves, and in great haſte and Emulation ſnatched and ſeized on ſuch Regions as they could. Hence innumerable Contentions and Battels followed againſt one another for ſuch and ſuch Territories, of which we are ignorant, as well as of the Names of theſe Cavaliers, ſo numerous they were.

More Saxons ſtill come over hither.

31. But for all their ſucceſs, it's certain they found great oppoſition, and were not ſeldomer (probably oftner) defeated than the Britains, who were onely tired out and overpowered by their conſtant ſwarming into the Iſland, there being no end of their Numbers; however the Saxon Writers conceal all that makes not for the inhancing of the Valour and Victories of their Anceſtours. Great pity it is that, as is uſual in great Deſolations, the Ruines of Britain buried theſe Monuments in the Rubbiſh, which ſhould have tranſmitted the noble Acts of its Captains to Poſterity, if any ſuch Monuments there were, if the proſpect of Death and Baniſhment, of the loſs of all that was near and dear unto them, did not divert their thoughts, and their deplorable condition afford them no other Ink than Tears, wherewith to deſcribe theſe valiant Deeds, which how daring and gallant ſoever, were rendred at length uſeleſs and ineffectual, by the Crowds of a perpetual ſwarming Multitude. Gildas was no way partial for his Countreymen, to ſay any great matters of their Valour, yet from that little he mentions of Ambroſe, and of the Victory they obtained at Mount Badon, as alſo of the viciſſitude of ſucceſs betwixt the Nations, ſufficiently evidence they had Commanders ſometimes who gave ſufficient proof of their Caurage and good Abilities. Though as to the mentioning of any of theſe Captains, we are deſtitute of Authentick Writers (Gildas excepted) yet Fame, and the Report of ſome Authours (but ſuch as wrote ſeveral hundreds of years after his ſuppoſed Reign) make a loud noiſe with the Name of Arthur the Son of Uther Pendragon, as Geoffrey of Monmouth is pleaſed to ſirname him.

To Uther Pendragon ſucceeded Arthur.

32. Concerning the time of this Arthur, (ſuppoſe his Perſon to have been) there is more variety of Opinions than concerning that of Ambroſe, ſo formerly related. (a) One placeth the beginning of his Reign, ſo high as to have it flouriſh in the year 458. (b) Another bringeth it down nine years, and placeth it at the

458

(a) Meyer Flandr. Annal. l. 1.

467

467 467 year of our Lord, the eleventh of the Emperour Leo, and the laſt of Hilary the Roman Biſhop. (b) Some ſay he flouriſhed in the Reign of Zeno the Succeſſour of Leo, and another will have him but to have been born in the twelfth 485 year of this Emperour, which fell into the year 485. (b) All theſe were Foreigners.
Of our own Writers, William (c) the Monk of Malmeſbury, Geoffrey (d) of Monmouth, Matthew (e) of Weſtminſter, and the Authour of (f) Eulogium would have him made King at fifteen years of Age; whereas (g) Ralph of Cheſter, John (h) of Tinmuth, and George (i) Buchanan the Scotchman, defers this till his eighteenth, Ralph of Baldec was of Opinion, that he began his Reign in the 515 year DXV, as alſo was Thomas Radburn; Matthew of Weſtminſter, and David 516 Powell, place it at DXVI; Buchanan at DXXVIII; and Hector Boethius caſts it back to DXXII. William of Malmeſbury in another place writes, that Cerdic coming into Britain in the CCCCXCV year of our Lord, ſo beat and terrified the Britains, that he forced them to ſubmit and yield themſelves to his victorious Arms, and in the twenty fourth year after his coming into the Iſland, in the Weſtern part thereof eſtabliſhed his Monarchy. But in the place before cited, he writes, that in the tenth year of this Cerdic, Arthur began to reign over the Britains; with whom ſeveral others, lately mentioned, concur; placing his beginning at 528 the year DXXVIII. To this one adds, that Cerdic often ingaging with Arthur, always came off with Victory, ſo that Arthur being tired out, after that Cerdic had been in Britain ſix and twenty years, took an Oath from him, and gave him the poſſeſſion of the two Shires, Hantſhire and Somerſet. Leland that renowned Antiquary, from other Authority affirms this done after Cerdic had been 506 in Britain but twelve years, viz. in the year DVI. Thomas Radburn to his Account, adds ten years more with this Note farther, that Cerdic for an Annual Tribute permitted to the Inhabitants of Cornwall, the free exerciſe of the Chriſtian Religion.

Several Battels between Cerdick the Saxon and Arthur the Britiſh King.

33. But however, Arthur was beaten and tired out by Cerdic the Saxon King:
There is great noiſe made of his overthrowing the Saxons in no fewer than twelve ſeveral Battels. The firſt of theſe, they ſay, was fought near the Mouth of a certain River, called Glenus or Glenn; the ſecond, third, fourth, and fifth, near another River in the Britiſh Tongue called Dulgas or Duglas; the ſixth at a Rivers ſide called Baſſas; and the ſeventh in the Wood of Chelidon, which in Britiſh had the Name of Cattoit Celidon. Matthew of Weſtminſter beſtows this Flower upon 518 this Battel. In the year of our Lord DXVIII, Arthur King of the Britains (ſaith he) having got together a great Army, marched therewith to the City, called then, Caerlindcoit, and now Lincoln; where finding out the Saxons, he made an unheard of ſlaughter of them; for in one day there fell of them ſix thouſand men, of whom ſome were drowned, others killed in the fight, or in the flight; for he left not off purſuing them, you muſt know, till they came to the Calidonian
Wood, when they rallied and made Head againſt him. Arthur perceiving their Reſolution, cauſed Trees to be cut down and the Trunks thereof ſo placed about them, that they ſhould have no way to eſcape, reſolving there to ſtarve them to death.
Of this they being ſenſible, begged leave they might return into Germany, though with naked Bodies, to which he conſented, after he had ſpoiled them of all they had, and taken Hoſtages for the payment of a Tribute. But enough verily of this Battel. The eighth was fought near (not the River but) the Caſtle of Suinnion, where all the day he carried the Image of the Virgin Mary upon his Shoulders.
The ninth in the City Leogis, in Britiſh called Caerleon. The Tenth in the ſhoar of the River, which we (ſaith Huntingdon) called Tracteheuroit. The eleventh upon the Hill Brenoin, by us (ſaith he) called Cathbregion, or Catheregio. And the laſt was fought at the Hill of Badon, where he himſelf, without aſſiſtence of any other Britain, ſlew four hundred and forty men. Theſe Battels and the places thereof, ſaith the ſame Authour, doth Gildas the Hiſtoriographer ſet forth; all which places yet are to our Age unknown, which we think came to paſs by God's Providence for the deſpiſing of popular air, flattering praiſe, and tranſitory fame. However many Battels were fought, wherein ſometimes the Saxons, and otherwhiles the Britains had the Victory: But the more Saxons that were loſt in fight, the more came to their ſuccour, being invited by the Countries round about.

34. However true may be his Story of the Battels, the name of this Authour is falſe, for Gildas it was not, but Ninius that was his Relatour. For the eleven they muſt paſs, and ſtill continue as unknown, as the Names of the places where they were fought; but for the Battel at Mount Badon, that ſuch an one

(b) Vide Uſſerium in Primordiis, p. 467.

(c) De Antiquitat. Eccleſ. Glaſton.

(d) Hiſt. Britan. l. 9. c. 1.

(e) Ad Ann. 516.

(f) Lib. 5.

(g) Polychron. l. 5. c. 6.

(h) In Aurea Hiſtor.

(i) Rer. Scot. l. 5. Scot. Hiſt. lib. 9. De geſtis Reg. Angl. c. 2.

there was at this Hill, is out of doubt from the certain Teſtimony of a true Gildas, whoever was then the Britiſh General. Here Matthew the Flowergatherer ſtrews his flowers or his Romantick Stories about him, and joyning the matter of this Ingagement, with that of the other in the Caledonian Wood, tells us, that it repented Colgrin, Baldulph and Cheldrick the Saxons, that they had made an Agreement with Arthur. Returning therefore into Britain, they landed at Totnes, and at laſt beſieged the City of Badon. Arthur receiving the news, commanded their Hoſtages to be hanged, then haſting toward the Siege, commanded all to be in Arms. He having already on his Corſlet, ſets on his Head an Helmet, whereon is ingraven the Image of a Dragon. On his Shoulders he hangs a Target, called Pridwen, whereon was painted the Image of the Bleſſed Virgin, which he often called to mind. Being alſo girt with the beſt Caliburnian Sword, into his right hand a Lance he takes, named Iron; and having given all convenient Orders, boldly ſets upon the Pagans. They ſtood manſully to it all the day, and killed many of the Britains. The Sun growing low they ſeized upon the Mount adjoyning, and for that Night uſed it as a Camp, whither the next Morning Arthur with his men aſcended. But in aſcending he loſt many of them, the Saxons having the advantage of the upper ground. But the Britains having with great valour reach'd the Hill top, moſt dreadfully laid about them, and made as dreadfull ſlaughter of their Enemies, inraged at their difficulty and loſs. The Saxons couragiouſly reſiſted, not fearing to ſtretch out their Breaſts towards the points of Spears and Swords, and much of the day was ſpent, when Arthur having drawn his Caliburn or Sword, called upon the Name of the bleſſed Virgin Mary, and ruſhing amongſt the thickeſt Troops of his Enemies, whomſoever he ſtruck he killed without any more to doe; neither ceaſed he to ſlay till he had ſlain no fewer than four hundred and forty men. Here fell Colgrin and Baldulph with his Brother and many thouſands of Barbarians. But Cheldrick perceiving the danger of his Companions, was ſo wiſe as to run away with the remainder of the Army, whom the King commanded Cador the Duke of Cornwall to purſue. Finding no place of ſecurity in ſtragling Companies, they came at laſt to the Iſle of Thanet, whither yet the Duke followed them, and never reſted till Cheldrick being ſlain, the reſt gave up themſelves into his Hands.

35. So doth Matthew tell the tale in conformity with Geoffrey of Monmouth, who ſetting it out at length, hath this Circumſtance, that the Saxons having waſted the Countrey as far as the Severn Sea, thence took their way to the City of Badon, which they beſieged: After that Arthur being entred then into the Province of Somerſet and perceiving what was done, animated his Souldiers to Battel, who being cheared up by the Benediction of Dubricius Archbiſhop of Caerleon, firſt drove the Enemy up to the Hill, and the day following utterly routed them. This City of Badon is, as John of Tinmuth and others rightly obſerve, the ſame with that we now call Bath, to the Britains known by the Name of Caer Badon, as well as Tr Exinant Twymin, in Ptolemy called ΥΔΑΤΑ ΘΕΡΜΑ, in Antoninus Aquæ Solis, and by the Saxons Baþanceſteꞃ & Hat Baþan, and from Diſeaſed People which flocked to the Hot waters Acmanceſteꞃ: In Stephanus we reade it Badica, and in Latin by the name of Bathonia. The Hill ſeemeth to be no other than the very ſame, which now is called Banneſdown, over a little Village near this City, which they call Bathſtone, on which there are Banks and a Rampire yet to be ſeen. And the vale which runneth along the River Avon is named in Britiſh Naut Badon, or the Vale of Badon. As for the time wherein the Battel was fought, Gildas, according to the beſt reading of his Text, tells us, that from that to the writing of his Epiſtle, had intervened forty years and one month, the Battel and his Nativity having fallen into the ſame year. This (as Matthew of Weſtminſter tells us) was of our Lord the DXX, with whom conſents the Chronographer of the Britains, who reckons from this Battel of Badon to the death of Arthur, two and twenty years. By which account Gildas muſt have been born in the ſaid year DXX, and have written the Epiſtle, now extant, in the year DLXIIII.

Camden in Somerſetſhire.

520

36. This is the laſt Battel ſaid to have been fought by Arthur againſt the Saxons. But many other Exploits are told to have been done by him, as well within Britain as without. Howel the Albanian, or King of Scotland, the Brother of Gildas Albanius (not Gildas whoſe Epiſtle we have ſo much ſpoken of, but one elder than he) a young Prince of great valour and hopes he ſlew, which that we may not take for a Fable we are told, by one concerned for the Britiſh Hiſtory, that in Venedotia the place is yet to be ſeen, which retains the memory of the Battel, where is erected a great Stone bearing the Name of the ſaid Howel according to the Vide Uſſer. Primord. p. 677.

Arthur ſlays Howel King of Scotland.

In inſula Mynaw ſive Angleſeia. Joan. Priſæus.

Sect. I.

Ad Ann. Gratiæ. 517.

the cuſtome of the Ancients of perpetuating the memory of ſuch like things. But Matthew of Weſtminſter preſents us with a flower which grew quite in another Garden. He talks of one Howel or Hoel, King of the leſſer Britain, the Siſters Son of Arthur by Dubritius the King of the Armorican Britains. That Arthur having beſieged York, and frighted thence to London by the coming of Cheldrick with ſeven hundred Ships out of Germany, ſent to this his Nephew to let him know the diſtreſſed condition of Britain, who, underſtanding the danger wherein his Uncle ſtood, with an Army of fifteen thouſand men, and the next fair wind, arrived at the Port of Hamon. He tells us that Arthur recieved him with joy and honour, becoming his Quality and Relation; and for four years after hath not one word concerning him, till the year after the fight at Badon, he writes how Arthur received news, that the Scots and Picts had beſieged him in the City Alchid, where he lay ſick. Hereupon the Uncle with all ſpeed haſted to relieve him; which when the Enemy heard, he fled to a place called Mureiſ, whither Arthur followed and beſieged them. But they fled out by night, and got to the Lake of Lumonoy; whereupon he got four Ships together, and for fifteen days together beſieged them in the Iſland, where being ſtarved with hunger thouſands of them died, which moved the Biſhops of the Countrey bare foot and bare leg and with tears in their eyes to beſeech him to have mercy on a miſerable People, and permit them to inhabit ſome portion of the Countrey, though under the Yoke of perpetual ſervitude. Arthur, good man, overcome by the tears of the Biſhops, whom all the water of the Lake could not before this mollifie, granted them pardon at their requeſt.

Marries.

Then Invades Ireland.

Holland, Juteland, and the Iſles Orcades.

Thence he Sails to Norway.

And ſo for Gall.

37. Two years after this, when he had reſtored Britain, you muſt know, into its ancient Eſtate, he married a Wife called * Guenhumara (having now leiſure enough to doat) one that was deſcended of the Noble Stock of the Romans, and educated in the Houſe of the Duke of Cornwall, a Lady ſurpaſſing in Beauty all the Ladies of the whole Iſland. Now doth he invite all notable Perſons from all quarters, and becomes ſo pleaſant in his Houſe, that both by putting on forſooth, and wearing his Armour, by ſpeaking and his demeanour, he provokes at diſtant People to Emulation; inſomuch that the Fame of his Bounty and Honeſty being divulged through divers Countries, all Foreign Kings, either loved or feared him. And there was good reaſon; now behold his exploits abroad. With a mighty Navy he firſt Invaded † Ireland, the King whereof, Gillamurg, for all his Bravado's, being taken Priſoner, all his Grandees were forc't to come and ſubmit themſelves. Then made he nothing of waſting with Fire and Sword, Holland, Juteland, and the Iſles Orcades, all which he ſubdued under Tribute; which done he returned into Britain. || Here, it ſeems, he ſtaid to breath himſelf a matter of 7 years. Then caſting in his mind, and could you blame him, how to become Maſter of all Europe; he reſolves to begin Northward, and drive all before him. He Sails to * Norway, whither, when come, he finds Sichelin the King of the Countrey dead, who had left Loth the Siſters Husband of Arthur his Succeſſour, being his own Nephew, and a young Man of admirable goodneſs and beauty. As young as he was, he had a Son by name Walwane, of twelve years of Age, ſent to Vigilius the Pope to breed, from whence he received the Girdle of War. Arthur finding things at this paſs, having ſubdued the Norwegians, advanced Loth to the Crown, and for Joy, would not follow on his Conqueſt, but returned again into Britain, but not without a deſire to conquer Gall alſo, which he mightily, yea, exceeding mightily thirſted after. His thirſt continued three years very vehement, and at length forced him to take the Sea to quench it, which having proſperouſly paſſed, with no more trouble than what the firſt Penner of the Hiſtory was put to, he conquered Neuſtria, afterward called Normandy, and proceeding farther, waſted all the Provinces of Gall, killed Frillo a Tribune in a Duel, had ſurrendred to him the City of Paris, and toward the Weſt, conquered all Anjou, Poictou, Gaſcoign, and every Foot of Aquitain.

Having beaten the Romans, and ſubdued all about the Alpes, he prepares to conquer Rome.

38. The † year following, being certainly out of breath, after he had Conquered all Gall almoſt at a bit, he came to Auguſtodunum or Autun, and there met with Lucius the Conſul of Rome, being thence come to oppoſe him; but he made nothing of killing both him and all his Roman Gallants near Lengriæ, in a Valley called (as truly) Seiſiæ. In the ſecond year after this, the Sun was darkened from its riſing till nine a Clock, envious it ſeems and not willing to behold the Succeſs of brave Arthur, who having now ſubdued all the Provinces about the Alpes prepared to go to conquer Rome. His Name by this time of day was become mighty throughout the World, whereupon Princes came far and near to live and learn

* Matheus Weſtmonaſt. ad Ann. 523.

† Idem ad An. 525.

|| Idem ad An. 533.

* Legibus Edwardi Confeſſoris adjicitur quod confœderavit Regnum Britanniæ in unum, quod expulit Saracenos & inimicos à Regno, quod ſubjugavit Norweiam & omnes inſulas ultra eam, ſcil. Iſlandiam, & Greenlandiam Snechordam, Hiberniam, Gurlandiam, Deciam, Semelandiam, Winlandiam, Curlandiam, Roe, Femelandiam, Wirelandiam, Flandriam, Cherrelam, Lappam, & omnes alias terras, & Inſulas Orientalis Oceani uſq; Ruſſiam in Lappa, ſcil. poſuit Orientales metas Regni Britanniæ. Alii dicunt eum Hieroſolyma uſq; fuiſſe profectum. O nimium!

Idem ad Ann. 536.

† Idem an An. 537.

Idem ad An. 539.

Sect. I. learn under him, and to be refreſhed with his facetious manner of converſe. But leſt you ſhould think this a wonder, you muſt know all this was foretold by Merlin the Prophet of the Britains, who affirmed, That oppreſſed Britain *ſhould prevail, and reſiſt the Cruelty of ſtrangers. For a * Boar of* Cornwall ſhould ſuccour it, and tread his Feet on the Necks of the Enemies. The Iſlands of the Ocean ſhould be ſubjected to his Power, and he ſhould poſſeſs the Gallican Foreſts. The Houſe of Romulus ſhould tremble at his Fiercene ſs, and his Exit ſhould be doubtfull. But he ſhould be celebrated in the Mouth of the People, and his Acts ſhould be meat to them that ſhould declare them.

Galfrid. Monmuth. lib. 7. cap.3.

 Quod ſcil. in Cornubiæ maritimo caſtro Tintagel fuiſſet genitus.*

39. But, for all this, heavy tidings! this Boar is forced back again to recover his own Stye, whilſt he is in his way to take up his Quarter in the beſt Palace Rome can afford. You muſt know, that Arthur at his ſetting out of Britain, had committed the Care thereof to Mordred his Nephew, together with his Wife Guenhumar. Mordred, his back being turned, uſurps; ſets the Diadem on his Head, and takes Guenhumar to be his Bedfellow; joining in Confederacy with thoſe Saxons, who came in eight hundred ſhips which they fitted out of Germany, and all now became Servants to Mordred. As ſoon as the News of ſo horrid Vilany reached the high Ears of Arthur, who had now began to climb the Ladder of Italy, viz. the Alpes, that he might get up into Rome, the higheſt Chamber of the Empire; out of Anger he would mount no more, but down he comes in a dump, and returns with the Kings of the Iſlands onely in his company toward Britain, burning with ſuch a Rage toward Mordred, as all the water in the Sea could not quench, ſo that as great a thirſt he had upon him at his return, as at his ſetting out. And it was not for nothing, that about this time ſo dreadfull a Comet appeared in Gall, the Countrey through which this King Errant paſſed, that the Heavens ſeemed to be on a flame. The ſame year alſo to uſher in and betoken the gore bloud, which ſhould be ſhed when doughty Arthur laid about him, true bloud dropped from the Clouds, a certain Houſe was found beſprinkled with it, and a grievous Mortality followed. Noble Arthur haſting towards Britain reſolved to land in the Port of Rutupus, afterward called Sandwich, whom Mordred there with a great Multitude oppoſed, and made great ſlaughter of ſuch as attempted to come on ſhoar. Here fell gallant Arguſel, the King of Albany, and Walwane the King's Nephew, and well-away others innumerable. But at length after vaſt pains taken, and much. very much bloud ſhed, Arthur and his Men got to land, and ſo hotly, too hotly, purſued his Enemies, that he drove. Mordred and his Army after no ſmall loſs received, I aſſure ran away to Wincheſter. This being alſo brought to the tender Ears of Guenhumar, without looking behind her ſhe ran away to Caerleon, and hid her head under a Nuns vail, profeſſing her ſelf a (chaſte) Nun in the Monaſtery of Julius the Martyr. Arthur almoſt mad with Anger comes to Wincheſter, and there beſieges Mordred; who the next Morning is ſo ſawcy as to ſally out upon the King, and the Villain did much Miſchief; but for all that ſtill thought one pair of Legs worth two pair of Hands, and ran away again towards Cornwall.

Idem ad An. 540.

Mordred Uſurps.

Several Preſages of Miſchief, enſuing.

Ad An. 541.

Is ſet upon by King Arthur.

40. Arthur would not balk him an Ace but followed as faſt as he ran, and caught him napping at the River Camblan. Would you believe the Rogue, for all this, would ſet his fellows in order, and give brave Arthur battel? He did it, reſolving to dye rather than run any more away, for he knew not whither to run, his ſhoes not being corked to take the Ocean. A ſad fray followed. Abundance of Bloud was ſhed, and the Cries of the wounded, and dying would have pierced ones very Bowels. They had fought almoſt a whole long day (a whole long day till Noon, as did Robin Hood and the Pinder of Wakefield) when Arthur ruſhed, not like a Boar, but a Lion into the place where he knew Mordred ſtood, and eaſily making way with his Sword, and removing the Enemies as he could do his own Servants with his word, he made moſt bloudy work on't, cutting down the ranks like Corn with his Sickle, nay even there where they were the thickeſt, and then thraſhing them. What ſhall we ſay? The battel grows hotter and hotter, and the Air rings again, and ſounds with the very blows that were ſtruck. The Villain, the Traitour himſelf fell, and with him the Saxon Whelps Cheldrick, Elaph, Egbrith and Bruning, and many thouſands with them, and the Victory was Arthur's. But woe and alas! he was mortally wounded in the fray, and was carried to be cured, if it might be, into the Iſland of Avalon, ſince ycleped Glaſcon. Deſpairing of Life, when he had cauſed his Enemies to be ſlain, he yielded the Diadem of Britain to Conſtantine his Kinſman, the Son of Cador, Duke of Cornwall. The good Soul being ready to depart hid himſelf, leſt Enemies ſhould inſult over ſuch a Miſchance, and his Friends be troubled. Hence it happens, that Hiſtories making no mention of the death of Arthur or his Burial, the Britains for the Exceſſive love they bear him, contend that he ſtill liveth. Here's an end of an old ſong, to the tune of Arthur of Bradley. A Fable which deſerves not confuting. Pity it was not writ in verſe, aſwell as the brave Adventures of Roland. Alas, poor Arthur, that being greater than he both as to Royalty and Atchievements, greater by far than Achilles, thou ſhouldſt be ſo * unfortunate as not to have as brave a Bard to make thee Immortal by Verſes dipt in Caſtalian Fountain! as brave a Trump to ſound forth thy Virtues. Blind and bald Chanters they were indeed, who took upon them to publiſh thy Glories.

And after ſeveral bloudy Battels is ſlain.

Arthur dies of his wounds.

Idem ibid. Vincentius Bellonacenſis Specul. Hiſt. lib. 21. cap. 74. Alan. in Merlin. lib. 1. Radulph. Niger.

*For not to have been dipt in Lethe Lake
Could ſave the Son of Thetis from to die.
But that blind Bard did him Immortal make
By Verſes dipt in dew of Caſtaly.
Which made the Eaſtern Conquerour to cry,
O fortunate young Man, whoſe Vertues found
So brave a Trump thy noble Acts to ſound.
Spencer.

41. No height of indignation can be too great againſt thoſe ignorant Scriblers, who by the deformed brats of their brains, have ſo impoſed upon an ignorant and unwary World. May a blot lye upon their Memories, who ſending their Follies abroad, did not cloath them in ſuch Garments, as might diſcover them to be what they really were. Courſe enough indeed their Dreſſes are, and the fancy wherewith they are inveſted is of a very thick-ſpun thread. Yet Wiſemen indeed are alſo often meanly clad, (true Hiſtories courſly writ) but Fools ſhould be dreſſed in fools Coats, a Romance writ like a Romance, a Poetick figment appear like a Poetick figment. Let it dance on ſix or ſeven Feet, and jingle with Rithm at every turn, or be ſet out with the party-coloured Coat of Extravagant fancy, and Effeminate Language, not clad in the grave, ſerious and ſubſtantial, (though courſe) Habit of an Hiſtory. Certainly, Reader, if the Sin and Injury of a Lye * conſiſts in this, that it takes away a Man's Right and Liberty of judging or knowing, whereupon he that took away the means or ways of Knowledge was ſaid by the Hebrews to ſteal the Heart, and the greater or more conſiderable the thing is which ſhould be known, the greater is the Injury, they that belye our Progenitours, and take away the means of our underſtanding the Originals of our Nations, muſt needs be guilty of a Theft greater than all others, in the Opinion of a generous Man, who by Nature it ſelf is ſtirred up with a deſire of knowing the State of his own Countrey, the condition of that ſtock, whence he or his Relations are derived. But though Britains and Engliſh are moſt concerned, yet hath this Injury extended to † Foreigners, who have, in reference to Arthur, in the ſame manner been impoſed on. That Arthur ſhould thus lay about him, doe ſuch wonders as never had been done before; that he ſhould conquer both Eaſtward and Southward, ſubdue Gall and pierce into Italy, and no notice of him taken by any Hiſtorian of that time, or any time elſe till Geoffrey of Monmouth began to collect the old Wives tales of his Countrey, and publiſh them in the Latin Tongue; that he ſhould goe and ſeek work abroad, when he had ſo much to doe at home, where ſo many thouſand Saxons had taken up their Habitations, and already ſetled ſeveral Kingdoms; is a thing that no ſerious Man with Patience may endure to reade or hear.

* Vide Grotium de Jure Belli & Pacis, lib. 3. c. 1.

† Vide Alanum de Inſulis in Merlini Prophetiam, lib. 3.

42. Theſe Romantick Tales have produced this Effect upon ſome more wary minds, that the ſhadows have brought the ſubſtance it ſelf into ſuſpicion; allthough as we ſay there could not be ſo much ſmoke, but there muſt have been ſome fire, and one ‖ of thoſe that queſtions the very being of Arthur, builds his Conjecture upon a weak Foundation, and is himſelf in other matters extravagantly credulous, and obtruding. Againſt this opinion poſſibly too extreme on the other ſide it may be objected, that the Sepulchre of Arthur was found in Glaſſenbury, in the Reign of King Henry the Second; being buried there, as one of the Monks of that Monaſtery wrote, in the Year DXLII. having come into that Iſland of Avallonia, to have his wounds cured, as writes the ſo often cited Geoffrey of Monmouth. Nay after Geoffrey himſelf was dead and buried, the Sepulchre of Arthur was found out, as ſeveral teſtify, and might have been ſeen in a great Table of the Monaſtery, whereon was written to this purpoſe: In this Iſland, which is called the Iſland of Avallonia, yea in this burying place of Saints, at Glaſſenbury reſt the renowned King Arthur, the flower of the Britiſh Kings, and Guenhumara his Queen. Who after their Departure, were honourably buried, by the old Church, betwixt two ſtone Pyramids in time paſt nobly ingraven; and for many years there they reſted (viz. ſix Hundred and twenty Eight Tears) till the time of Henry de Soili; who was Abbat of the place after the burning of the ſaid Church. Now this Abbat being often importuned by very many Perſons, gave order to ſome to digg betwixt the Pyramids, and ſee if they could find the Bodies of the forementioned King and Queen: and before they began to digg they hung up Curtains, and ſurrounded the whole Plat of ground. Having digged very deep, at length they light upon a great wooden Coffin cloſe ſhut, which having opened, they found his Body therein with a certain leaden Croſs, ‖ Genebrard in Chronogr. ad An. 498. Dicit ex Beda poſſe intelligi Arthurum Mag. nunquam extitiſſe; quare? quia illius omnino non meminit. Vide Uſſer. in Primord. p. 116. &c.

King Arthur and his Wife Guenhumar buried at Glaſſenbury.

in one part of which was written, Here lies buried renowned King Arthur, in the Iſland of Avallonia. Then opened they the Queens Grave and found her Hair diſhevelled, and lying about her ſhoulders, as if ſhe had been but newly buried, which yet upon touch fell all to Aſhes. The Abbat and Convent with great joy, and the greateſt honour imaginable, took thence their Reliques, and beſtowed them in the greater Church, in a Tomb which within was divided into two parts, and without nobly cut in a Rock, viz. the King's Body by it ſelf at the Head of the Tomb, and the Queen in the Eaſtern part thereof, over which they cauſed to be written, their ſeveral Epitaphs.

Avalonia vero dicta eſt vel ab Aval Britannico verbo quod pomum ſonat, quia ſolet locus ille pomis & pomeriis abundare, vel ab Avalone quodam territorii illius quondam dominatore. Item ſolet antiquitùs locus ille Britannicè dici Ynys gwyclrin, hoc eſt Inſula vitrea, propter Amnem, ſcil. quaſi vitrei coloris in mariſco circumfluentem: & ob hoc dicta eſt poſtmodum à Saxonibus terram occupantibus lingua eorum Glaſtonia, Glas enim Anglicè vel Saxonicè vitrum ſonat. Girald. Cambrenſ. in Specul. Eccleſ. diſtinct. 2. c. 9.

43. The Abbat, by whom theſe Bodies were found, was Henry Soliacenſis de Soily or Sully, and by ſome called Suineſius (not Henricus Bleſenſis, the Nephew of Henry the Firſt, as Leland miſtook, confounding them together) who was made Abbat after the burning of the Church of Glaſſenbury, which happened in the Year MCLXXXIV. afterward Biſhop of Worceſter, and died in the Year, MCXCV. He it was that placed their Reliques in a Marble Monument, and on it two * Diſticks for Epitaphs. But more than this Giraldas Cambrenſis, deſcribes the Bones of Arthur to us in this manner, having been ſhewn them by the Abbat of the place, together with the leaden Croſs lately mentioned. The Bone of his Leg reared up by the Leg of one of the talleſt men (as the Abbat experimented before the Authour's face) and placed by his foot upon the ground, was higher than the man's knee full three fingers. His Skull was prodigiouſly large and thick, ſo that between the Eyes and the Eye-brows one might lay their hand. In it appeared ten wounds or more, all which, one great one excepted, which gaped very wide, and was onely mortal, were grown up and cicatrized. As for the leaden Croſs he adds, that upon a broad ſtone, ſeven foot within the Earth, and three foot higher than the Sepulchre of Arthur was found ſuch a Croſs, not inſerted into the upper, but rather the nethermoſt part of the Stone, having theſe Letters ingraved, Hic jacet ſepultus inclytus Rex Arthurius in Inſula Avallonia cum Weneveria uxore ſua † ſecunda. This very Croſs being taken from the Stone he ſaw, being ſhewn it by the ſaid Abbat Henry, and read theſe Letters. But in this Inſcription, the five laſt words ſeem ſome way to be added, for they are not to be found in the Monk of Glaſſenbury, who tells this ſtory in the very words of Girald, nor were they to be ſeen in the Croſs it ſelf, which was preſerved in the Treaſury of the Church of Glaſſenbury, till the diſſolution of the Monaſtery which * Leland himſelf with moſt curious Eyes, and carefull Fingers viewed and handled, moved both by the antiquity and dignity of the object. It conſiſted of a piece of Lead about a foot long, and in Large Roman Letters, but ill cut, contained theſe words, Hic jacet ſepultus inclytus Rex Arturius in Inſula Avalonia. To conclude this Buſineſs, theſe Reliques were found in the days of Henry the Second, about the Year of our Lord MCLXXXIX. which may check the opinion of thoſe who believed there never was ſuch a Man (the Man we admit of, but the Romantick ſtories of him we abominate) and had it been known earlier, might have prevented that ridiculous humour of the Britains, who thought him ſtill alive many hundreds of years after, and that ſo confidently, that ſhould any Man have ſaid in the ſtreets in † Armorica or Little Britain, that he was dead, he ſhould have had the ſtones immediate flying about his Ears.

The dimenſions of his Body.

Which was found in the time of Hen. 2. A. D. 1189.

44. Arthur being ready to dye, is ſaid to have left the Diadem of Britain to his Kinſman Conſtantine, the Son of Cador, the Duke of Cornwall, who the year following had the better of the two Sons of Mordred, who roſe up againſt him, and purſued them ſo cloſe, that one of them he ſlew at Wincheſter, in the Church of St. Amphibalus before the Altar, and the other at London, where he was hid in a certain Monaſtery. In the third year they will have Conſtantine ſlain, and buried at Stoneheng, or the Chorea Gigantum, to whom ſucceeded Aurelius Conanus, and held the Monarchy of the whole Iſland, being a young man very well inclined, and every way worthy of a Diadem, onely too great a lover of Civil Wars; for he impriſoned his Uncle who ſhould have reigned after Conſtantine, and having ſlain his two Sons, obtained the Kingdom. Geoffrey writes that he died in the ſecond year of his Reign, and that Wortipor obtained the Monarchy, who diligently and peaceably Governed the People four years, which done, he left his place to Conſtantine ſucceeds Arthur.

* Hic jacet Arthurus flos Regum gloria Regni,
Quem mores probitas commendant laude perenni.
Arthuri jacet hic Conjunx tumulata ſecunda,
Quæ meruit cœlos virtutum prole ſecunda.
al. fœcunda.

Giraldas Cambrenſis, de Inſtitutione Principis & Speculo Eccleſiaſtico.

† Secunda dicta videri poſſit, reſpectu Guennivaræ alterius ab Arthuro in ipſo Regni ſui initio ductæ, quam à Melua Sommerſetenſium Rege raptam ad An. DIX. Ex Caradoco Lancarvanenſi annotavit Uſſerius. Quæ an illa Guanora Arthuri uxor fuerit cujus in Albaniâ oſtendebatur tumulus (quam ſi mulieres calcaviſſent, ſteriles inde ſe futuras credebant; ut ex gentilium ſuorum opinione Hector Boethius retulit) ipſi Scoti Albienſes viderint.

* Lelandus apud Uſſer. p. 120. in Aſſert. Arturii.

† Alanus de Inſulis.

‖ Matthæus Florilegus ad An. 542.

to Malgo. But here Geoffrey and his Companions cannot agree about their Verdict; for whereas he gives to the Reign of Aurelius Conanus, ſcarcely two years, Matthew of Weſtminſter allows him no fewer than two or three and thirty, and gives but three to Vortiporius. But both their Accounts are true alike, while they make them to ſucceed one another in the Monarchy of Britain, juſt like that Theophilus of Antioch, who makes thoſe Kings to have ſucceeded one another in one and the ſame Kingdom; which Moſes writes to have Governed ſeveral ſorts of People. For Gildas ſpeaks to them all perſonally, as living and reigning at the ſame time, in ſeveral Parts of the Iſland, and whereas they call Conſtantine Monarch of Britain, he terms him Tyrant of Damnonia or Cornwall. Malgo whom he calls Maglocunus, the laſt in the Catalogue, being another Regulus in Venedotia or the Northern Wales, to the Cambro Britains being known by the name of Maelgun Guineth, as he whom they call Aurelius Conanus, but Gildas Caninus rather, is by theſe Writers called Kynan Wledic, ſo is Vortiper Gwyrtheſyr. As Conſtantine reigned in Damnonia, and Malgo in Venedotia, ſo Vortipor in Demmetia, South-wales, as Carmarthen, Pembroke and Cardigan ſhires; and Aurelius Conanus, as is conjectured, in Powis or ſome other Province.

Several Kings or Tyrants Reign together.

45. Geoffrey did like our late Writers of Romances, who take ſome real Subject, ſome certain Perſons for the Baſis of their work, but cloath theſe Perſons with ſuch circumſtances, add ſo much of their own Invention, that in their ſtory there's hardly one ſentence of truth. Finding all theſe Names in Gildas, and wanting Succeſſours for his Arthur, whom he reſolved to extend to the ſeventh Generation, out of this ſtore he reſolved to furniſh himſelf, not ſetting them all at one time as Gildas doth; but making them ſucceed one another in the Monarchy: which thing Gildas overthrows in that he calls Conſtantine no Monarch but Tyrant, or Regulus of Damnonia. In like manner, by either a wilfull miſtake, or otherwiſe came the ſtory of the Church of St. Amphibalus. Gildas wrote that Conſtantine ſlew two Boys of Royal Bloud, ſub ſancti Abbatis amphibalo, that is under the Gown-coat or Veſtment of the Holy Abbat; for that Amphibalum was a ſort of outward Veſt or Garment, worn by Clerks and Monks, is very certain, hairy on both ſides, ſo that it was doubtfull which was the outward or inward ſide of it, whence it had its Name. Now Geoffrey from this place frames a Tale of the Martyr Amphibalus and his Church at Wincheſter. Hence came the very text of Gildas to be corrupted ſo, that in ſome Copies was written ſub ſancto Abbate Amphibalo, particularly in thoſe which Polydore Virgil followed in his Edition of this Authour. Hence alſo came the Fiction of the New Amphibalus Gimenus, Abbat of the Abby of Amphibalus the Martyr at Wincheſter, ſaid to have written an Epiſtle concerning this horrid fact to Gildas, as John Ball, and from him Pirſæus would have us believe. In like manner from ſome things charged upon theſe particular Princes by Gildas, he has raiſed particular ſtories. From his charging Aurelius with Paricides, and his being a lover of Civil War, he raiſed that of his Impriſoning his Uncle, and killing his two Sons. Gildas calls Maglocunus Inſularis Draco, and a depoſer of many Tyrants, another Saul, being taller than any other of the Britiſh Captains; and farther adds, that he was as it were drunk with the Wine that was preſſed from the Sodomitical Grape.

De ſucceſſoribus Arthuri pari impudentiâ mentitur, tribuenseis uſq, ad ſeptimam fere generationem Britanniæ Monarchiam. Guil. Neubrigenſis. Vide Cambdenum in Brit. de Wall. & Cornwall. Uſſer, ubi ſuprà. p. 539.

Amphibalum quid.

Lib. 11. c. 7.

46. Hence Geoffrey tells us, that his Malgo was the moſt beautifull Perſon of all Britain, that he was the depoſer or driver away of many Tyrants, larger than others, and moſt famous for goodneſs. Becauſe Gildas calls him an Iſland Dragon, he tells you that he obtained the whole Iſle, and moreover, adds ſince other comprovincial Iſles to his Dominion, viz. Ireland, Iſland, Godland, the Orcades, Norwey and Dacia, having conquered them, by moſt cruelly Fought Battels. And becauſe the ſame Authour uſed this expeſſion, that he was Wet or Drunk with Wine, preſſed out of a Sodomitical Vine, he repreſents him to you as guilty of Sodomy; whereas Gildas meant a general or univerſal heap of Sins and Iniquity, the phraſe being taken from the Prophet and elſewhere, which he had formerly alſo uſed to ſet forth the wickedneſs of Conſtantine. As for Cuneglaſus, it's a wonder he paſt him over, for he might have filled up ſome room in the Monarchical Catalogue; it's to be fear'd, the Copy of Gildas he ſaw had not his Name, there being no Memory of him in the Britiſh Hiſtory. But in reference to Maglocunus or Maglo, we find elſewhere, that under his Government a dreadfull epidemical Diſeaſe raged throughout (a) Cambria or Wales, called the Yellow Plague, by the Britains Y Gall Veleu, from the yellow colour of thoſe that were infected, but by the (b) Centuriators Morbus Regius, or the Kings Evil, as the Icterus or Jaundice, is ſometimes named by Phyſicians. As for his Uncle, whom Gildas writes, that he ſlew in his youth, he is by others called (c) Cathwallain, after whoſe death he Invaded the Kingdom of Madidus.

Jerem. 23. 9. Deut. 32. 3. 32.

(a) Girald. Cambr. Itiner. Cambr. l. 2. c. 1. Plures apud Uſſer. in Primord. p. 76.

(b) Centur. 6. c. 10

(c) Uſſerius in Indice Chronol. 1138.

of Venedotia. In conformity with this his ravenous and cruel Diſpoſition he is ſaid being King of the Northern Britains, to have come (d) with an Army to ſubdue and prey upon the Southern, to have always been an Afflicter of the Saints, eſpecially of St. Paternus, and to have been in particular (e) curſed by Thalieſſin, the Bard or Prophet. Yet is he memorable for ſomething not ill; for erecting (f) a new City called Bangor, upon the River Meanath, or Menai (an Arme of the Sea rather) which is by no means to be confounded with the other Bangor of the Monks killed by Ethelfrid, which ſtood in Wotton upon the River Dee, not far from Cheſter. This he did, and all theſe things happened while he was yet but Regulus of Venedotia. But afterwards Matthew of Weſtminſter tells us, he was 581 made King of the Britains at the year of Our Lord DLXXXI; about eleven years after the death of Gildas, the Complainer, who died at or about the year
570 DLXX.

47. At this time he is therefore thought to have been made King over the Cambrian Britains in General, the form of his Election being told us by Humphry Lhuyd, an excellent Antiquary of Denbigh, as appears by his Fragment (a) of the Deſcription of Britain, directed at the point of death to the Learned Antwerpian Abraham Ortelius. After that the Saxons, ſaith his (b) Authour, having overcome the Britains, had obtained the Sceptre of the Kingdom, and the Crown of London, all the People of Cambria, aſſembled together at the Mount of the River Dee, to chuſe them a King, and thither came the Men of Guynedh, the Men of Powys, thoſe of Dehenbarth, of Reynuc, Eſylluc or Sylluc, and Morganuc or Morgan, and made choice of Malgun, whom others call Maclocun Guened. From this paſſage he collects, that Cambria or Wales, was then divided after the Deſtruction of Britain, into ſix Regions or Parts, viz. about the year of Our Lord DLX. But 560 afterwards we meet with the King of * Dynetia, falſely called Demetia, the Kings of Guent Powys, and Northwales, and mention is alſo made of the Kings of Strat Cluyde; whence may eaſily be collected, that this Countrey was ſubject to divers petty Kings or Reguli, till the time of Roderick the Great; who obtained the Monarchy 843 of Cambria, about the year DCCCXLIII, and dividing it into three Parts, left it ſo to be poſſeſſed by his three Sons, for to † Meruin his eldeſt; he aſſigned Guynedh, to Anaraud (whom ſome make his Eldeſt) Powys, and to Cadelh his youngeſt with the bleſſing of the whole People, Dehenbarth, that is the Right part or Southwales. For the Britains, as Welch at this day, herein imitate the Hebrews, that as to the Coaſts they look Eaſtward, and name the South as on the Right Hand. This Dehenbarth, though it was in quantity larger, yet in reſpect of thoſe Noblemen, by the Welch called Tychelwyr, wherewith it abounded; who were prone to rebell againſt their Lords, and diſpute with them by dint of Sword, it was accounted much the worſt. This Diviſion of Wales (as generally all Diviſions of Kingdoms) at length deſtroyed the Government, while the Poſterity of theſe three Brothers conſumed it ſelf by inteſtine Wars, though each Prince was externally laid at by the Engliſh.

The Diviſion of Wales.

48. And ſo at length, and by Degrees were the poor Inhabitants of Britain by the Picts and Scots, and eſpecially the Saxons, outed of their Ancient Seats, and driven ſuch of them as fled not over the Sea, to the craggy and mountainous Places toward the Weſt of the Iſland, naturally fenced with Hills, and the Inlets of the Sea, whither their Ravenous Enemies could not eaſily follow them. Here they continued a very warlike Nation, as we ſhall have occaſion in the Proſecution of our Engliſh Saxon Story to demonſtrate, and for many years defended their Liberty, and though they were ſeparated from the Engliſh Saxons, by a ditch or trench, caſt by Offa King of the Mercians, yet ſtood they not onely to the defenſive part of War, but made many inrodes into the Engliſh Pale, and by Fire and Sword waſted the Countrey. Their Succeſs had been much better, but that they fell out amongſt themſelves, and as formerly when they lived in the Heart of the Land, ſo now alſo they groaned under the Yokes of their ſeveral Reguli or Tyrants, the Names of whom it will not boot much here to mention, and the Acts of whom as remarkable, reſpect chiefly the oppoſition they made againſt the Engliſh. Of the Parts into which they were driven, that called Cambria is moſt conſiderable, by them in their Language called Cymbri, and Wales, by the Engliſh, after the German Cuſtome. For, as one * obſerves, the Ancient Teutones or Germans, calling the Strangers that lived near them on one ſide by the Name of Galls, or Walls, afterward to all Strangers, and Inhabitants of other Provinces they gave the ſame Appellation, as at this very day not onely the Galls, but Italians and Burgundians they call by that Name, as all things ſtrange or Exotick

The poor Britains driven from their Countrey.

Some into Cambria or Wales.

(d) Johannes Tinmuth, ibid.

(e) Balæo & aliis Telieſinus Helius, vide & verſus Britannicos & in linguam Latin. verſos apud Uſſer. in Primord. p. 547.

(f) Mailgo Rex erexit novam Civitatem ſuper fluvium Meanath in Wallia. Erat enim altera Bangor ſuper Dee fluvium, ubi Ethelfridus Monachus occidit in Wotton non longè à Ceſtria. Johan. Roſſus apud eundem p. 133. A pulchro vel excelſo Choro Ban-cor ſive Bangoræ nomen poſtea eſt adepta

(a) Impeſſ. Coloniæ Agrippinæ. A. D. M. D. LXXII.

(b) Author antiquiſſ. libri de legibus Britannornm, à Yno Doethaut, à Guyr Guynedh, à Guyr Powys, à Guyr Dehenbarth, à Reynuc, à Eſylluc, à Morganuc, fol. 51.6.

* In miſerabili illa pugna contra Ethelfredum Northumbrorum Regem.

† Ita Galfridus ſeniorem nominat cui Lhuydus accedit.

* Lhuyd. in Frag. f. 46. 6.

tick Walſhe : The Wallons in the Low Countries, the Wallachians upon the Danube have hence received their Denominations. At firſt they ſeized, and ſolely inhabited all this Region. Afterward it began to be inhabited by the Engliſh, as far as the Ditch of Offa, with whom they had innumerable Skirmiſhes, and conteſts till the days of William the Conquerour, under whoſe Son Henry ſome Flemmings, who had been driven out of their own Countrey by Inundation of the Sea, received Roſſe, a Province of Demetia, to inhabit, and notwithſtanding all the Princes of Wales could doe, moſt valiantly defended themſelves, and ſtill preſerve their Language and Cuſtoms,different from the Britains. Afterward the Engliſh growing by Degrees upon them, ſeized ſeveral other Parts of the Countrey, and at length brought them into full ſubjection,upon which we muſt not now dilate. But thoſe that inhabited this Countrey, the Engliſh Saxons called Bꞃıꞇpealeꞅ, or Britiſh Welſh.

Others into Cornwall.

49. Another ſort they termed Coꞃnpealeꞅ from Cornwall, in Latin Cornavia, in the Britiſh Language Cernico, into which another Part of the Remnants of the Britains were driven. Theſe alſo uſe the Britiſh Tongue, all their words almoſt being radically the ſame with the Welſh; but in contexture of Speech, they do a little differ. Beſides theſe Countries, we are farther told by the Learned Anti- 870 quary lately mentioned, that till about the year of Our Lord DCCCLXX, theſe Parts lying about Carlile and Galloway it ſelf as far as the River Cluda, were poſſeſſed by the Britains, at which time being ſorely laid at by the Scots, Danes and Engliſh, and at length Conſtantine their King being killed in Anaudra, they were conſtrained to betake themſelves to their Countreymen in Wales, where they beat out the Engliſh, which had ſeized on the Countrey Tegenia, (by the Latins called Igenia, but Tegengel by the Welſh, that is Tegenia of the Engliſh) lying betwixt the River Dee and Conway. They founded a Kingdom by the Welſh called Stratcluyd (a), from the River Cluda, on whoſe banks they ſate down; for by the word Strat (b) added to a River, they underſtand the tract of ground lying upon or adjoining to the ſaid River, as Strad Alyn, Strad Towy, and the like. Here they had often great bickering with the Engliſh,till at length Dunwallon, the laſt of their Princes,deſpiſing his Principality went to Rome, at ſuch time as the Danes by their 971 Inrodes, ſorely afflicted the Iſland about the year DCCCLXXI. where he ſhortly after died. Such alternative Succeſſions were there in the places, whither the Welſh were driven,though as we e'er now ſignified,for the main they poſſeſſed the whole Countrey called Wales, eſpecially that toward the North, viz. Guynedhia by Latin writers corruptly called Venedotia. As for the other called Dehenbarth by them, and Southwales by us, the Engliſh having paſſed the River Severn, by degrees ſeized on all the Land betwixt it, and the River Vaga. So that all Herefordſhire, and that anciently called the Daniſh wood, and Gloceſterſhire with a great Part of Worceſterſhire and Shropſhire, are though beyond the River Severn, this day inhabited by the Engliſh.

Ut illos in Gallia. Galpealeꞅ.

Lhuydus quo ſuprà, fol. 26. b. & 56. a.

(a) Mariano Scoto Straudiylcad Walanorum corrupté.

(b) Ita ferè Angli uſurpant voc. Strand, ſignificat enim altam Ripum fluminis ut platea hæc Londino adjacens propriè ſic dicta.

50. This River, together with Dee of old, divided Cambria from the other part of Britain, called Lhoegria, and ſome do farther obſerve, that all the greater Towns which are built upon their Eaſtern Banks, were firſt raiſed for this very end, to reſtrain the Irruptions of the Cambrians, or Welſh into Lhoegria, like as the Romans very politickly erected very ſtately Cities upon the Weſtern Banks of the Rhine, to hinder the Inrodes of the Germans into Gall, and the laſt Wall which the Britains made, was by the Advice of the Romans, drawn by conſiderable Towns the more to ſtrenghthen it. But to purſue our buſineſs, theſe Countries lately mentioned,together with ſome Corners of Flint and Denbigh,were in times paſt ſubject to the Kings of the Mercians, and to this day the Inhabitants of them are known to the Welſh by theſe words, Guyr y Mers, or the Men of Mercia. For 770 Offa the moſt potent King of the Mercians,as we hinted before in the year DCCLXX, to diſtinguiſh, and fence his Limits from thoſe of the Cambrians, cauſed to be digged a very deep Ditch with an high Wall upon it from the Mouth of Dee, a little above Flint Caſtle, through moſt high Mountains, as deep Vallies, Fenns, Rocks and Rivers for an Hundred Miles, as far as the Mouth of the River Vaga. This Ditch retaining its old Name, (for by the Britains it's ſtill called Claudh Offa, or the Ditch of Offa) is clearly yet to be ſeen in all theſe Quarters; and almoſt all the Cities and Towns ſeated on the Eaſtern ſide of it, have their Names ending in Ton or Ham which makes it evident, that in old time Saxons there did inhabit. Yet again the Cambrians or Welſh, reſeated themſelves beyond the Ditch (on this ſide as we write) in all places toward Lhoegria or England, and the Inhabitants of theſe parts in their own Language are called Cymbri, in the pronouncing of which word the force of the letter b is ſcarcely to be perceived.

Sect. I.

The Language of the Britains the ſame with the Galls.

51. So much as to the Places into which our poor diſtreſſed Britains, were driven within the Iſland, now having mentioned their Language, it were convenient to ſpeak a little to it. And a little muſt be ſpoken by one who cannot ſpeak it at all, and has but little acquaintance with it. That it was the ſame with that of the old Galls, I am ſtill perſwaded both for the Reaſons I have given in the Hiſtory of the Franks, and alſo upon farther conſideration. Of Brennus, and his Exploits all who are meanly ſtudied in Antiquity have read, and that he and his were Galls, is the Opinion of the beſt Authours, both Greek and Latin. Now it may be proved, that they either ſpake the Britiſh Tongue it ſelf, or that which differed a little from it in Dialect. Pauſanias tells us, that in their Language they called an Horſe Marcha, and the way of their ſerving in war each with his two ſervants, ſo that they made three Horſe, Trimarchiſia. Now the Britains at this day call three in the Maſculine gender Tri, in the Feminine Tair, and an Horſe they know by the Name of March; yet this agrees alſo with the Teutonick, wherein Treo or Thre is uſed in the ſame ſenſe, as alſo Mare, anciently to denote the whole Species of that Noble Animal. But afterward the ſame Authour affirms theſe Galls, in their Language, to have termed their Shields, Tyran, and a Target now with the Welſh is no other than Tariam. Farther Athenæus writes, that the Remainders of the Galls under Conduct of Bathanatius, ſeated themſelves upon the River Iſter, and afterwards divided themſelves into two Parts, whereof one named Scordiſci planted in Hungary, and the other ſeized by the Name of Brenni on part of the Alpes near the Mountain Brennerus in the Countrey of Tirol; and Appian calls all theſe by the Name of Cymbri. Now Bathynad in Welſh ſignifies a Formed Judge; for Bath is Form, and Ynad a Judge that obtains the ſecond place from the King himſelf, for Brennus being dead, this man they choſe for their Captain. Beſides, Yſcar in Britiſh is to Separate, and Yſcaredic is the ſame as Separated, whence that part of the Galls which ſeparated it ſelf, and departed from the reſt, was called Yſcaredic, and thence came the Name of Scordiſci. The other preſerved the Name of their former Leader Brennus. Now Brynn in Britiſh ſignifies an Hill or Mountain, whence he had probably his Name, and ſo had Brennerus the Mountain in the Alpes. It's reported that the Gatheli or Iriſh, when from Cantabria they wandred up and down the Seas to find them out new Habitations, called all Britains by the Name of Brennach, from that Famous Captain, and ſo ſtill by that very Name they call them. Yet can I not believe that Brennus was a Britain, though he and his followers be called Cymbri, and this word agrees with that very Name whereby the Welſh at this day call themſelves, as ſome learned men of that Nation would have it. But this ſtrengthens the opinion we have elſewhere delivered, that the old Gallick and Britiſh Languages differed not except in Dialect.

In ſeveral words it doth appear.

Lhuydus quo prius, fol. 45 & 46. At vero in præf. ad Davieſii Gram. dicitur nonnullos exiſtimaſſe Britannos ſeſe Cymro & Cymry, h. e. Aborigenes indigitare ſolitos. Apud Panvinium.

And in the beginnings of them.

52. We ſhall onely make two or three more Remarks upon this Language, and ſo diſmiſs it, as is agreeable to our general Deſign. One Letter it hath peculiar, which commonly they write with LL two of theſe, but the more learned Lh, or L with a point under it, which is better. The Spaniards indeed uſe a double LL, and the Germans Lh, as in the Names of Lhodowick and Lhothair, but neither of them hath the force of that whereof we write. Poſſibly the Inhabitants of Mexico have had it, the Spaniards expreſſing it by ll, but this is but a Conjecture, and uncertain; however this of the Welſh is pronounced with a ſharp kind of hiſſing, the Letter L being pronounced with a ſtrong aſpiration, the Tongue being with ſome violence thruſt upon the Teeth half ſhut, and the Lips remaining unmoved, a matter not to be learnt but by long practice. For V Conſonant they uſe F, as in the Teutonick Language they are uſed promiſcuouſly. Beſides the five Vowels which the Latines had, they have two others, therein imitating the Greeks; hereof one is written with a double V by the Vulgar, or with a ſingle prick underneath by the Learned, and hath a ſound not much different from the Roman V; or rather is pronounced in the ſame manner as the more ſimple ſort were wont to pronounce the Latine O. The laſt both of Vowels and Letter is Y, and hard to be pronounced. Q, X, and Z, are not neceſſary to write their words; and inſtead of K, they uſe C. They have many Diphthongs, in which, both the Vowels, or three together, as ſometimes it happeneth either retain their full ſound, or at leaſt ſome part of it.

53. As to the peculiar Idiome of the Tongue, this is very remarkable, that as the Greek and Latin have their Variations of Speech, and Caſes at the ends of their words; on the contrary, this of the Britains ſuffers this change of Letters at the beginning; whereby it hath happened that in the Names of Provinces, Regions, and other things, very learned men have erred by reaſon of their ignorance in the Language. Every word whereof the firſt Radical Letter is, P, T, or C, hath three Variations in the Contexture of Speech, to avoid a diſagreeable ſound. As P, is turned into B, into Ph, and Mh; ſo T, into D, into Th, and Nh, and C, into G, Ch and NGH. For Example, with them Pen is an Head, from the Head, O ben, or, his Head (Maſculine) Ben: With the Head, à phen: or, her Head, i phen: My Head, Fy mhen. So that of this Word Pen, there are all theſe Variations, ben, phen, and mhen. So Fire, in Britiſh, Tan, begets, from Fire, O dan: with Fire, a than: my Fire, Fy mhan. And for C, Cariad, Love: From Love, makes O gariad, with love, a chariad: my love Fy nghariad. Farther, B, with D, and G, being Radicals, have their Variations alſo: as Bara, Bread; from Bread, O fara, (where F hath the force of V Conſonant) my Bread, fy mara. And as B is changed into F and M, ſo is D, into D, DH, and N, as Duu the Name of Almighty God, and pronounced as the French pronounce their Dieu, makes from God, O Duu: my God, Fy nun. But for G, in the firſt place it fails, and in the ſecond, is turned into NG: as Gur ſignifying a Man, makes from a Man, O ur: my Man, Fyngur. Beſides theſe, L, M, and Ph, ſuffer but one Mutation: as Lyfur, a Book, hath from a Book, O lyfyr. Mon, the Iſland Mona, or Angleſey, hath from Mona, O Fon: and Rufayn, Rome, makes from Rome, O Rufayn. The reſt either are never Radicals, as D, F, Th, L, R; or elſe are never changed, as Ph, Ch, N and S. Thus much may ſuffice to ſpeak of the genius of the Language, and thus much the rather to put ſome upon enquiry, whether any ſuch footſteps of Variation may be found of the ancient Gallick, which if it may, would abundantly confirm us in this belief, that they were the ſame. That this Language received ſome Impreſſion and Alteration from that of the Romans, we muſt not doubt, conſidering how many hundreds of years they lived in the Iſland, although not ſo much as thoſe of ſuch Countries as were neareſt unto Italy. This is clearly to be perceived ſtill in ſeveral words, as Cariad, Duu, Gur or Ur, and Lyfur, lately mentioned, Tair Tri, that word whereby they expreſs the Eaſt and many others. And that as it received ſome Impreſſion from the Latin, ſo likewiſe did the Latin from it, and a barbarous Latin was here of both made in Britain, as the Modern French or Gallick Baſtard Latin in the Countrey of Gall, and the Spaniſh and Italian in the other Countries. But the diſtance of the Romans from the Iſland, and conſequently the weakneſs of Commerce, were cauſes that it could not be ſo conſiderable, (as neither the Impreſſion made upon the Britiſh) and their departure ſo clearly out of the Iſland, procured the extinguiſhment thereof.

Davieſius in Gram. Cambric. ait Britannos habere novem literas mutabiles quas umbratiles vocant, quia ut umbræ cedant & mutentur: Omnes iſtæ literæ in principio Dictionis atque aliis etiam in locis ob mollitiem variantur.

Ex Ludd fit Lund.

Aix eſt loci terminatio ut Prydain Brydain, Rhufain Mechain Cedewain Lundain.

54. Thus in our Comment upon the Text of Gildas, have we ſeen the Britains baniſhed to the Mountains, and a little conſidered their condition there. We muſt remember he writes how ſome committed themſelves to the mercy of the Sea, and ſought for ſhelter and habitation beyond that Element. It's the general Opinion that they ſeated themſelves in Armorica in Gall. That that Countrey was ſeized by Britains, a Colony as it were of the Inhabitants of this Iſland, both the Name of Britain the Leſs, and the Language of that People ſufficiently demonſtrate (for that this Britain was denominated from that, is an idle Dream and deſerves not confuting) but at what time, and upon what occaſion, it's not ſo eaſie to determine. The firſt mention we find of the Britains in Armorica, is about the year CCCCLXI, about thirty years after that the Anglo-Saxons were called out of Germany into Britain; for at that time Manſuetus, a Biſhop of the Britains, ſubſcribed to the firſt Council of Tours amongſt other Prelates of France and Armorica. In the ninth year after this, theſe new Inhabitants of Gall perceiving the drift of the Weſtern Goths to ſeize the moſt fertile Provinces of Anjou and Poictou, were ſo reſolute as to make head againſt them, and to them the Franks were much beholden, for they chiefly hindred the Goths from poſſeſſing themſelves of the whole Countrey. For againſt them they ſided with Anthemius the Emperour, and Arnandus was condemned of Treaſon for giving Council by Letter to the King of the Goths, to ſet upon the Britains dwelling upon the River Loir, and diſſwading to make Peace with the Greek Emperour, whereby they might divide Gall between the Goths and Burgundians. Sidonius Apollinaris to Riothenius his Friend (whom Jornandes nameth King of the Britains) complains that theſe Britains were a kind of People witty and ſubtile, Warlike, Tumultuous, and in regard of their Valour, Number, and Intelligence with one another, ſtubborn. Riothenius being afterward ſent for by Anthemius, went to him with a power of twelve thouſand Men, but before he could joyn with the Emperour's Forces, was defeated by the Goths, and fled to the Burgundians, at that time confederate with the Romans.

Another part of the Britains ſeated themſelves in Armorica in Gall.

Vide Cambdenum in Britannia de Britannis Armoricanis.

Sidonius Apollinar. in ep. ad Vincentium. Hæc ad Regem Gothorum charta videbatur emitti, pacem cum Græco Imp. diſſuadens, Britannos ſuper Ligerim ſitos impugnari oportere demonſtrans.

55. We find them therefore at this time in Armorica, but ſtill the Controverſie remains undecided, how firſt they came there. One who was born in that very Countrey, lived near to that very Age, and wrote the Life of St. Wingalof the Confeſſour, committed this alſo to writing, that A Progeny of the Britains imbarked in Flotes, arrived in that Land on that ſide the Britiſh Sea, at ſuch time as the Barbarous Nation of the Saxons fierce in Arms, and uncivil in Manners, poſſeſſed their Native and Mother Soil. Then (ſaith he) this dear Off-ſpring ſeated themſelves cloſe within this Nooke and ſecret Corner. In which place, wearied with travail and toil, they ſate quiet for a while without any Wars. But our Engliſh Writers report it as a truth, that long before this time our Britains ſeated themſelves in this Tract of Gall, and particularly at ſuch time as Maximus uſurped the Roman Empire. The Monk of Malmsbury relates, that Conſtantinus Maximus being ſaluted Emperour by the Army, carried away with him a great Power of Britiſh Souldiers, through whoſe Courage and Induſtry having attained the Empire, ſuch of them as were paſt Service, and had done bravely, he planted in a certain part of Gall Weſtward upon the very Shoar of the Ocean; where at this day, ſaith he, their Poſterity remaining, are wonderfully increaſed even to a mighty People, in Manners and Language ſomewhat degenerate from our Britains. True it is that Conſtantine concerning Military men made this * Edict, Let the old Souldiers, according to our Precept, enter upon the Vacant Lands, and hold them for ever freely; and poſſibly here theſe might be placed to help to reſtrain the then frequent Inrodes of the Saxons. Yet doth he alſo affirm a Colony of Britains to have been planted in Armorica by Conſtantine the Great; and another will have the ſame thing done by Conſtantius Chlorus his Father. Generally thoſe that write the Britiſh Hiſtory, are confident that Maximus there placed his Britiſh Souldiers; but others as earneſtly contend, that there was no Plantation there till after the coming of the Saxons.

Vita S. Wingualoei, M S. in Bibliotheca Cotton. apud Camdenum & Uſſerium in Primord. p. 421. Hic vetus ſcriptor Armoricanus; qui Tricanum conſobrinum Coronii Regis Britannici, cum filio ſuo Wingualoeo (Winwaloco & Galnutio aliis dicto) è majore Britannia in Armoricam tranſmigraſſe oſtendens, de tempore Britanniæ Coloniæ eo deductæ præmittit iſta.

* Cod. Theod. l.7. tit.20.

De Geſtis Reg. l. 1. c. 1.

Radulph Niger in Chronic.

56. This indeed makes ſomething againſt the other Opinion, that Gildas ſpeaking how Maximus drained the Iſland of its Men, mentions nothing of his planting them in Armorica. But neither doth he ſpeak of this Countrey when he tells us how the diſtreſſed Britains were driven beyond the Seas, though it was above forty years from the Victory at Badon Hill, to the time of his writing his Epiſtle, and conſequently the Colony, or Commonwealth of the Armorican Britains, muſt have been grown up to that eminency, as provokes him to make mention of them; if any thing could divert that angry and querulous Writer from his Theme. Some might be planted there by Maximus, as others think, and the Children of theſe old Souldiers might gladly receive theſe diſtreſſed Britains that fled out of their Countrey under Conduct of Rional; but the truth is, ſuch Authours as fix the time of the Britains ſetling there after the Invaſion of the Saxons, are rather of better credit and more conſiderable. Whenever they came thither they turned within a little time the edge of their Weapons moſt ingratefully upon thoſe their Friends that gave them harbour, as evidently appears from other Teſtimonies, and by theſe words of Regalis Biſhop of Vennes, We living in Captivity under the Britains, are ſubject to a grievous and heavy Yoke. The Native Armoricans being by little and little ſubdued, the Name of Britains grew ſo great where they were newly ſeated, that generally all the Inhabitants paſſed by degrees into their Name (as of other parts of Gall into that of the Franks) ſo that the whole Tract was called Britannia Armorica, and by the French Writers Britannia Ciſmarina. In the firſt times they courageouſly maintained themſelves under petty Kings, and afterward under Dukes and Counts againſt the Franks, as we have already ſhewed out of their Writers, particularly Gregory the Biſhop of Tours, in which Authour we meet with the Britains in Gall, but never before the time of Childerick the Firſt, who began his Reign much about the ſame time as did Hengiſt in Kent, over the Saxons. It ſeems their Quarter was not much better than what their Countreymen obtained, whom they left behind them in the Iſland. For their Wealth, as one writes, was onely Immunity from publick Taxes, and plenty of Milk. And if you will believe our Monk of Malmsbury. "A kind of People they were, needy and poor in their own Countrey (in his "time, and he lived ſome 550 years agoe) being hired by foreign Money, and purchaſing a laborious and painfull life. If they be well paid, they refuſe not ſo much as to ſerve in Civil War one againſt another, without all regard of Right or Kindred, but, according to the quantity of the Money, ready with their Service, for what part ſoever you would have them.

Hoc neque ſolus neque primus Johannes Leidenſis ſed & ante & poſt illum tradiderunt alii, vide Uſſerium quo ſuprá.

Rionalus vel ut apud Sidonium Apollinar. Riothumus, vel ut apud Jornandem Riothimus.

Who deſtroys moſt of the Natives.

Whence the Countrey is called after their Name.

Lib. 2. c. 18.

Their Character.

Gleter Rodolphus.

57. This Deſcription of them as to their Manners and Diſpoſition ſuits well enough with what Gildas and others write of their Countreymen. However ſo Induſtrious and Valiant they were, as to bring under all the Inhabitants of that Tract, and had they had as conſtant Supplies out of Britain, as the Saxons had out of Germany, might have done as much for the reſt of the People of Gall, and been before-hand with the Franks. In this they equalled them, that as they gave Name to the places they conquered, ſo did they. But herein they exceeded them, that whereas the Language of the Franks being German, was ſwallowed up, and devoured by that, then ſpoken by the Provincials, or by the Baſtard Latin, we now call improperly French. Theirs either quite conquered and overcame that of the Armoricans, or finding it much the ſame with it ſelf, as we ſaid the Britiſh and ancient Gallick were the ſame, preſerved it ſelf and it unmixt and uncorrupted. Our Welch men hence prove that the Corniſh, and the Armorican Britains were the ſame Nation, becauſe the Names of their Kings were alike to both, as Conanus, Meriadoc, (by which Name a part of Denbighſhire in North-Wales, is ſtill ſo called) Howel, Alan, Theodore, Rywallon, and the reſt; and almoſt all their words are the ſame, although they differ a little in Syntax of Speech, as often it happens in the ſame Countrey. The Countrey it ſelf is by our Britains called Lhydaw, which Cambden interprets, coaſting upon the Sea, and ſo ſignifying the ſame in Britiſh, as doth Armorica. But it ſeems it's no proper Britiſh word; for Lhuid thinks it came from the Latin word Littus, as being a Region of the Gallican Shoar. For as the Latin Writers in our words (ſaith he) turn D into T, ſo our Conntreymen in like manner change T into D, and L in the beginning of words they always write with an aſpiration. For Example, Lhadron with us ſignifies Robbers, the word being borrowed from the Latines.

They preſerve their Language unmixt and uncorrupted.

Lhuydas f. 9. 6.

58. But as ſome of our diſtreſſed Britains fled over Sea into Armorica, which they called Little Britain; ſo we are told that others of them went into Holland, where at the Mouth of the Rhine, as it falls into the Sea, near to Catwyck, they divided their Sails: and there they built a moſt ſtrong Caſtle, which they called Britain, and ſubdued unto themſelves the Neighbouring People. This Caſtle in the Teutonick Idiome, as we are told by the ſame Authour, is called Die burch te Britten, as if you ſhould ſay, Britains Burge, or, the Caſtle of the Britains; being in the ſame ſenſe at this day, by the Neighbouring Hollanders called Het Huys te Britten, or The Houſe of Britain. This Caſtle was placed in the Batavian Shoar, at the middle Mouth of the Rhine, and the Ruines thereof are to be ſeen at a very low Water. It was built four-ſquare, and took up the compaſs of two Roman Acres. And that it was indeed a Roman Fort, beſides other things, the ancient Coins, Stones and Bricks, which here were found with Inſcriptions, do demonſtrate; with the view which Hadrianus Junius in his Batavia, and Petrus Scriverius in his Tabulary of Holland Antiquities hath preſented us. As therefore it cannot be granted this Chronographer that the Britains built this Caſtle, (which might be called Britten Huys, becauſe it ſtood over againſt Britain) ſo might it, being now left deſolate by the Romans, be ſeized by the Britains, who might alſo, as he writes, ſubdue the Neighbouring People. That this may not be thought incredible, a place of Procopius is cited, who in the time of Juſtinian wrote, that Brittia, diſtinct from Britain, was inhabited by three moſt numerous Nations, the Angles, Triſſons, and the Britains, who had the ſame Name with the Iſland. And if what he ſaith be true, that it was placed in the Ocean juſt over againſt the Mouth of the Rhine, this could be no other than the Iſland of Batavia.

Another Company of the Britains plant themſelves in Holland.

Joan. Gerbrand Chron. Belg. lib. 1. c. 13.

Vide Cambd. in Brit. Uſſer. in Primord. p. 418.

59. Neither ought it to be wondered at that here the Triſones inhabited; foraſmuch as it's certain, that not onely in the time of Pliny, and Tacitus, the Friſii here had their Seats, but in later times part of Friſia, the Province of Utretcht was alſo accounted, and the Weſtern Holland, which ſtill retains the Name of Weſt Freiſeland, and in time paſt gave to the Earls of Holland the Title alſo of Lords of Friſia or Freiſeland. But whence the Angli or Angili ſhould thither come, is to be conſidered. * One Hiſtorian of that Countrey reports out of their Annals, as a certain truth, that a great Number of Angli came out of Britain into Friſia under Conduct of Hengiſt. † Another from the like Authority relates, that the City of Leiden was firſt founded on the Bank of the Rhine by Hengiſt, the Son of the King of Friſia, being beaten out of Britain, and having built a Caſtle upon the Eaſtern Bank of the ſaid River, made Governour thereof or Borchgrave one Dibald, to procure ſafe Paſſage to Travellers, with free Acceſs and Receſs to Merchants; whereupon the City in the Vulgar Tongue had the Name of Leiden. But John Gerbrand, Uſſer. ibid. p. 419.

* Suffridus Petrus de Orig. Friſiorum, l. 2. c. 11.

† Corn. Kempius Rer. Friſic. l. 2. c. 1.

brand, who himſelf was born at Leiden, relates the Original thereof with more Circumſtances. Having ſaid, that Hengiſt gathered Military men together out of the Lower Saxony or Friſia, his own Countrey, and with the Sclavenſes or Hollandenſes, having paſſed into Britain, after this relates what was done by that part of the Army which returned home. The Saxons Friſons with the Sclavenſes, that is, the Hollandenſes being returned home, the reſt being diſmiſſed, when they had now no employment, neither knew what to doe, nor whither to turn themſelves; they went along to the Feirce Wood with a ſtrong hand, and there at the Courſe of the River Rhine, built a great Caſtle, which now is called Leids. In the ſame Caſtle of Leide, by conſent of the Elders, they ordained and appointed for the Cuſtody of the Foreſt, a certain Burchgrave or Caſtellane, a Valiant man, with many others like himſelf, to defend and ſecure the Merchants going and coming from the ſaid Caſtle to that of Wiltenborch and Slavenborch: And therefore that Caſtle was called Leyden, that is, Ductio or Leading. The common Chronicles of Holland relate the ſame alſo concerning the Burg De Burch, built by Hengiſt. For we muſt not be ſo injurious to that Noble City, as to conceal that Lugdunum Batavorum was much ancienter both from Ptolemy, and the Itinerary Table.

In Chronic. Belgic. l. 1. Cc. 9. 10.

60. That a conſiderable part of Hengiſt's Army, after the defeating and diſperſing of the Inhabitants, returned out of Britain, we have already ſhewn from more ancient Authours, as Gildas and Beda. But whereas ſome will have Hengiſt, a Dane by Original, (which we ſhall hereafter diſcuſs) it would if it could be known whether he being beaten out of Britain with his Angli (as the Britiſh Hiſtories affirm) or being Victour, and purſuing the flying Britains, planted here a new Colony, and built a new Caſtle to keep in awe and bridle that which they had formerly ſeized. For Procopius doth not ſay that theſe three ſorts of People, viz. The Friſians being Indiginæ, and the Angli and Britains being new Comers made up one People, but ſignifies that each of them was ſubject to their own Kings: and indeed from Brittenburg or Huys te Britten, that Burgh is diſtant but about two hours Sail, (ſo they of theſe Countries reckon, and not as we, by Miles) from which the Bargraves of Leiden of old had their Title. Yet another * Authour will have it not built by Hengiſt, but by one Mandeth the Son of Lemaun, the firſt of that Name King of the Batavi. Philip † Cluverius alſo thinks it was built by the Romans, the Stones of it ſeeming as ancient as thoſe of Brittenburgh. And || others think it to have been the work of the Normans. But theſe ſeem more ſingular in their Opinions. However, finding that our diſtreſſed Britains were, by Authours of this Countrey, ſaid hither to have fled for Refuge, and ſetled themſelves; we thought our ſelves to let the Reader know ſo much, whom we leave Judge of what on all ſides hath been ſaid.

* Corn. Haemrodius in Batavia.

† Antiquit. German. l. 2. c. 36.

|| Johan. Latius in Deſcript. Holland. c. 5.

61. We thought we had now done our part as to the Text of Gildas, (the beſt courſe we could take to write the Hiſtory of theſe obſcure Times, ſmall credit being to be afforded to other Britiſh Writers) but due favour and reſpect both to the dead and the living violently calls upon us to take ſome conſideration of that part alſo of his Epiſtle which ſo vehemently inveighs againſt the Manners and Diſpoſitions of the ancient Britains. What he ſays of the Layety we have already ſeen of late, and how he paints out the Manners and Behaviour of thoſe of his own Rank, the Reader may ſee in the Account we give of Eccleſiaſtical Matters. Moſt profligate he makes both ſorts, as well the one as the other, and as to thoſe we have at preſent to deal with, he charges upon them breach of truſt and perfidiouſneſs, perpetual Emulations, Factions, and Tyranny over one another, makes them to be of a ſleepy Nature, as eaſie to be beaten as ready to rebell, given up to all manner of Riot and Debauchery, and what he ſays ſeems not to be meant onely of that time when he wrote, but of their general temper and demeanour in all precedent Ages, whereof he pretends to have the knowledge, viz. as far as, the Invaſion of Julius Cæſar. Hereupon ſeveral modern Authours have been emboldned to vilifie the Britiſh Nation, Polydore Virgil in particular, who taxeth it as mean and cowardly in the general courſe of its Actions and Concernments: And ſome learned Men of that Original are very much concerned to wipe off that dirt he throws upon it. In this endeavour they urge that Cæſar found them at his landing ſo courageous and Martial, that they put him ſore to it, forced him to contain himſelf in his place, and indeed put him to flight, which he in his own behalf cunningly expreſſeth, by drawing back the Legions to their Camp; for that a flight it was, they thence prove, that a little after Midnight being paſt, he ſtole to his Ships and ſo departed. But here was not the ſtrength nor

An Aſperſion upon the Britains.

Which is largely confuted from the beſt of Authours.

Cæſar ad laceſſendum hoſtem & Committendum prælium alienum eſſe tempus arbitratus, ſuo ſe loco continuit, & brevi tempore intermiſſo legiones in Caſtra reduxit.

As to their Courage.

nor courage of all Britain employed, onely a ſmall Company of thoſe of Kent haſtily gathered together. From Cæſar himſelf it's evident, that they fought with great earneſtneſs from their Chariots, fell with violence upon his Camp, and ſo diſcouraged the Roman Cohorts, that having loſt Labienus the Tribune, it's ſaid, they made a ſafe Retreat. Now what doth this Retreat ſignifie, but that they eſcaped away by flight? He confeſſes that Caſſivelaun when he ſent Ambaſſadours to him about Peace, was thereto moved by the Revolt of Mandubratius and others his Countreymen.

As to their Manners.

A Compariſon betwixt the Galls and Britains.

Βουνδουίκα apud Xiphil.

62. They farther uſe the Teſtimony of Diodorus Siculus, who writes, that the Britains being Aborigenes, and living after the manner of the Ancients, uſed Chariots in Fights, as the ancient Greek Heroes are reported to have done in the Siege of Troy. That as to Manners they were ſimple and upright, being far remote from the craft and cunning of thoſe to whom he was related. That they contented themſelves with ſimple and mean food, being abſolute Strangers to the delitious living of Rich men. Tacitus, they plead, doth wonderfully extoll the Acts of Caratacus, and confeſſes, that after his Captivity the Romans were often beaten by onely one Nation of the Silures. He writes that Venuſius (whom he calls fierce, and an utter Enemy of the Romans) beat not onely the Romans, but the Britiſh Auxiliaries alſo. He denies not that the Queen Boadicia (by Dion Caſſius called Bunduica) being exaſperated, put to the Sword ſeventy thouſand of the Romans: And both he and Dion with long and evident Speeches celebrate and extoll the more than Manly courage of this Woman and her Facts, which may be compared with thoſe of the moſt famous Emperours. In the Life of Agricola, his Father-in-Law, having told us, that the Galls and the Britains were very like in their Ceremonies and Superſtitious Perſwaſions; and that their Language differed not much; he adds, that betwixt them there was the like boldneſs in courting and ſetting upon dangerous Enterprizes; when Dangers were come, like fear in refuſing: But that the Britains made ſhew of more Courage, as being not then mollified by long Peace; for the Galls (ſaith he) were once alſo as we reade, famous in War, till ſuch time as giving themſelves over to Idleneſs, Sloth crept in, Shipwrack was made both of Valour and Liberty together, which alſo befell to thoſe of the Britains that were ſubdued of old, the reſt remain ſuch as the Galls were before. Their Military ſtrength conſiſteth in their Foot, ſome Countries fight in Waggons alſo; the more conſiderable Perſon guideth the Carriage, and his Dependents fight. In former times they were governed by Kings; now by their great men they are drawn to Factions and Parties: Neither is there any thing that more benefits us when we have to doe with the moſt powerfull Countries, but that they do not unite and conſult together. Seldom it hapneth that two or three States agree together to propulſe the common danger; ſo whilſt each fight for themſelves apart, all are overcome. A little after he adds: That Britains indure Levies of Men and Money, and all other Burthens impoſed by the Empire, patiently and willingly, if Injuries be forborn; theſe they cannot endure, being ſubdued to remain as Subjects, not as Slaves. Again; The Noble Mens Sons, he (meaning Agricola) took and inſtructed in the Liberal Sciences, preferring the Wits of the Britains before the Students of the Galls, as being now deſirous to attain to the Roman Eloquence, whereas they had lately rejected the Language. After that our Habits began to grow into Eſteem, and the Gown was much uſed among them; and by little and little they proceeded to the Provocations of Vices, to Galleries, Baths, and exquiſite Banquettings; which things the Ignorant counted Civility, being in reality a part of Bondage.

An account of their Valour.

63. They urge farther, that Dion Caſſius in the Account he gives of Cæſar's Expedition into the Iſland, delivers ſuch things as make for the honour of the Inhabitants; and namely this, That they did not accept of Peace before they had oftentimes experienced adverſe Fortune; that he ſo ſet forth his Actions at his return to Rome, with Gloſſes and Flouriſhes, that a Supplication was decreed upon this account, for twenty days together; elſewhere this ſame Authour reports Paſſages tending to the repute of the Nation. So doth Herodian, giving this Character of it, that it was moſt Warlike and greedy of Slaughter, contenting it ſelf as to Arms with a narrow Target and a Lance. Eutropius in like manner ſpeaking of Cæſar's Adventure, ſaith he was tired out with bitter fighting, and being ſeized by a Tempeſt, returned into Gall, whence returning again into the Iſland, at the beginning of the Spring following, his Horſe at the firſt Incounter was routed by the Britains, and there Labienus the Tribune was ſlain; and in a proſperous Fight at length, but with great loſs of his own men, he beat and put them to flight. Suetonius farther tells how Veſpaſian conquered two moſt powerfull Nations in point of War, and fought no fewer than thirty times with the Enemy; ſigns not of cowardly and effeminate, but of a moſt valiant People. And Eutropius writes, that Carauſius the Britain having been in vain attempted by Arms, at laſt, as the greateſt defence againſt a man moſt skilfull in War, a Peace was made. Sextus Rufus reckoning up the Legions of the Roman Empire mentions the Britanniciani and Brittannici; the ſecond the Britiſh Legion, and amongſt the Legions of the Magiſter Equitum of Gall: the Britones twice; with the Comes Hiſpaniarum Invictos juniores Britones, and with the Comes Britanniarum Vectores juniores Britannicos. But what need is there, ſay they, to turn over the Writings of ſo many learned Men to diſcover the glory of Britain? When ſo many moſt valiant Kings, ſo many Invincible Captains, ſo many famous Roman Emperours iſſued from the Britiſh bloud, have abundantly evinced what kind of men this Iſland brings forth. To what purpoſe ſhould I, ſaith Lhuid, make mention of Brennus that Conquerour of Romans, Greeks, and of almoſt all the ſtouteſt Nations of the whole World? Why Caſſivelaun, to whom, as Lucan expreſſeth it, Cæſar ſhewed his affrighted Back? Why, Caratacus that diſtreſſed the Romans by a War of nine years continuance? Or Bunducia that moſt valiant Virago, who procured the deſtruction of 70000 Romans, with the terrour of which Woman Rome and Italy were ſo mightily ſtruck, that as one writes, they were not ſo much concerned for the coming of Brennus or Hannibal? Or Arviragus, that unconquered King of Britain, preſerving his Liberty in deſpight of the Romans, the Lords of the World? Or thoſe moſt courageous Captains who thirty times ingaged in Battel with Veſpaſian, and broke the heart of that valiant Emperour Severus, becauſe he could not bring them under? Why (ſaith he) ſhould I make mention of theſe, when Britain beſtowed upon the World Conſtantine the Great, not onely a moſt valiant and moſt happy Captain, but what is more, the beſt Man and the firſt Emperour of the Chriſtian Religion, in which he was inſtructed by his Mother Helena a Britiſh Woman?

Territaquæſitis oſtendit terga Britannis.

Strabo Geogr. l. 4. & Euſtathius ad Dionyſium.

Δὶς δὲ φασὶ διαβὰς ἐκεῖ ἐπανῆλθε διὰ ταχέων οὐδὲν μέγα διαπραξάμενος οὐδὲ προελθὼν ἐπὶ τὸ πολὺ τῆς νήσου.

64. How much do Gall and Italy owe to Britain for this man born in this Iſland, being freed from the rage of cruel Tyrants by his means? And much Chriſtian Religion, thus he proceeds, all do well know, except one Polydore and his Maſter Gulielmus Parvus, lately publiſhed by ſome ill willers of Britain, although unworthy to ſee the light. And becauſe a late Frenchman, and an ancient Greek Authour, of a greater Name, affirm Conſtantine born at Dyrrachium, I will produce the words of a moſt ancient Panegyriſt, ſpoken in the preſence of Conſtantine himſelf: "O fortunate Britain, and now " more happy than other Countries, who firſt ſaweſt Conſtantine Cæſar. De" ſervedly hath Nature endowed thee with all good things belonging both " to Air and Soil, in which is neither too great cold in Winter, nor heat in " Summer; wherein is ſuch abundance of Corn, that it hath ſufficient of the " Gifts, both of Ceres and Bacchus; in which are Woods without Savage " Beaſts, Land without noxious Serpents: On the other ſide an Innumerable " Multitude of gentle Cattle diſtended with Milk, and loaded with Fleeces, " with other things deſireable for Life; very long Days and no Nights with" out ſome light. For that extreme Level of the Shores doth not raiſe Sha" dows, and the view of Heaven and the Stars tranſcends the limits of " Night, ſo that the Sun, which with us ſeems to ſet there, appears onely " to paſs by. Good God what means this, that always from ſome laſt end " of the World, new Divinities of the Gods deſcend to be worſhipped by the " whole World! Why ſhould I mention (now Lhuid proceeds) Bonoſus, who from a Duke of the limits of Rhætia, became a moſt valiant and fortunate Emperour? why Carauſius Auguſtus, who ſeven years together, though ſore againſt the wills of Jovius and Herculius, wore the Purple? And why Allectus Cæſar, for the Conqueſt of whom Mamertinus ſeems to prefer Maximian before Julius Cæſar. After him, was Emperour Maximus a Britain, the Kinſman of Helena, a valiant and honeſt man, and worthy of the Title, had he not ſpoiled Britain of its Youth, by which he overthrew Gratian.

The ſeveral Emperours of the Britiſh Nation.

65. He by his Wife Helena, Daughter of Euda, left a Son Victor Auguſtus. Britain alſo, as writes Paulus Diaconus, owned Marcus and Gratian for Emperours. Conſtantine alſo with Conſtans his Son, were made Emperours in Britain, (Gratian their Countreyman being kill'd) againſt whom their Captain Gerontius (concerning whoſe death moſt ancient Britiſh Rithms are extant) ſet up another Maximus for a Rival. After theſe the laſt Emperour of the Britiſh bloud

And other famous Men.

Ambroſius Aurelius is reckoned by Panvinius. Beſides theſe twelve Emperours, Britain produced to the World Arthur that moſt invincible King, whoſe unmatchable glory and moſt illuſtrious Acts, our Leland by infinite Teſtimonies, and moſt invincible Arguments, hath made more eminent againſt the ſnarling and Vatinian hatred of doting Polydore, and the great gutted Monk of Rhicvall, more converſant in the Kitchin than in the Hiſtories of the Ancients. Neither do our Countreymen alone, but the Spaniards, Italians, French and Swedes, (as one relates out of their Hiſtories) ſound forth his Acts in their Books. Cadvaun alſo made from a Prince of Guynedhia King of the Britains, and his Son Cadwalla (whom Beda ſtyles a Tyrant) becauſe he purſued the Saxons with cruel Wars in the declination of the Britiſh Government, moſt valiantly reigned. And after the deſtruction of Britain it ſelf in Cambria or Wales there were men not to be defrauded of due praiſe; as Roderick the Great and his Nephew by his Son Howel, ſirnamed the Good, both of them famous for matters relating to War and Peace. Graffith alſo the Son of Lewelin, the Son of Geſyl, moſt valiantly defended their Wales. And after him Owen Prince of Guynedhia, reſiſted Henry the Second, the moſt potent King of the Engliſh, who had thrice invaded Wales, and his Son being ſlain in Angleſey, a great part of his Army he deſtroyed. Lewelin the Great, was his Nephew by his Son, whoſe innumerable Triumphs as writes Mathew Paris an Engliſh man, require particular Treatiſes to ſet them forth according to the exigency of their worth.

66. Neither onely theſe but the Remainders of the Britains in Cornwall, as they are the moſt robuſt of all the Britiſh People, ſo are they to this day famous for Military Exploits. Neither have the Britains in Gall the Off-ſpring of the ſame Nation degenerated from their Anceſtours, having not onely defended their Poſſeſſions obtained amidſt valiant People for many Ages, but overthrown the Goths and Franks in moſt bloudy Battels. They valiantly reſiſted Charles the Great, that moſt potent Prince. The Army of his Son Lhodowick, the Emperour ſent againſt them under Conduct of Murman, they put to flight; Charles the Bald in like manner, Emperour and King of France, in open Battel they defeated twice, and cauſed to run away, leaving his Pavilion and all his Royal Furniture behind him, when Numenius was their King. Heriſpons the Son of Numenius compelled the ſaid Charles to make an ignominious Peace with him, whom Salomon the Son of Heriſpons, a Courageous and skilfull Warriour, compelled to retreat as he marched againſt him. This Salomon being dead, the Britains (as writes Sigebert) out of deſire of reigning, waſte themſelves with Inteſtine War, and ſo unwillingly they ceaſe to doe miſchief to Gall. Wherefore ſhould I make mention (ſaith Humphrey Lhuid) again of Vrſand that moſt invincible and moſt ſtrenuous Captain, his Acts againſt Haſting the Norman, and Paſtquitan the Britain? Wherefore Judicael and Alan, who repelled the Normans from their Borders, as they miſerably waſted all France? Wherefore ſhould I inſiſt upon the Wars which long after being aſſiſted by the Aids and Supplies of the Engliſh, they waged againſt the French Kings, when as to all men it is evident that this was ever a moſt valiant Nation? Thus much Lhuyd by way of Teſtimony out of his great, and to be commended, Zeal for the Reputation of his Countrey. He cloſes all with a direct anſwer in reference to the Perſon of that Authour, whence ſo much matter and evidence for the Accuſation of his Countreymen is uſually fetch'd.

67. That at laſt (ſaith he) I may ſtop the Mouth of Polydore with his Gildas, this I ſay, that this man, if indeed the Work be his, was not an Hiſtoriographer, but a Prieſt and a Preacher, who are ever wont too ſharply to inveigh againſt the Vices of their People. If therefore with Polydore we fetch Authorities from Sermons, what Pariſh, what City, what Nation, what Kingdom ſhall eſcape Infamy? What hath Bernard written of the Romans? He calls them Impious, Infidels, Seditious, Immodeſt, Traytors, Braggers of much, but ſmall Doers. Theſe things ſay Divines, that theſe Vices might be ſhunned, and life be reformed, not that indeed the Romans or Britains were the ſame, although according to the Cuſtome, ſuch they be called out of the Pulpit: Neither doth any man, except he be an impudent Sycophant, make infamous any Society, City, or People, by reaſon of the Speeches of Prieſts, their words being wreſted to the worſt. Avant therefore all curſed Detractours, and let the true glory of Britain appear to the World: Neither (Good Reader) account my Tongue too ſharp. For (ſo let God love me) neither Envy to another Man's Name, neither the deſire of a little pittance of glory, neither hatred to any Nation, but the love of my Countrey, which undeſervedly is ill ſpoken of, and the deſire of illuſtrating the truth, have cauſed me to write what I have written. In ſuch like words, and very modeſt, doth Humphry Lhuid of Denbigh end his Epiſtle to Ortelius, or his Fragment of the Deſcription, a Piece the Authour of which deſerveth what the Publiſher hath put into the Title Page, that The Reader will admire his Diligence and Judgment, and pity it is that with it he ended his Life, and had no longer time to ſtudy and publiſh more, which he ſeems to promiſe. His Zeal is to be commended, and if it cauſed him to believe ſuch Stories, as perhaps upon another Subject he never would (for he uſeth the ſilence of Roman Writers to confute the Fables which Beothius uttereth, and never conſiders this in his own Arthur, and other Paſſages of his Britiſh Hiſtory) his love to his Countrey, and his Virtues lately mentioned, may eaſily procure his Pardon.

68. As to that work of Gildas, and this Perſon's indeavours to beget a contrary Opinion of his Nation; Prudent and Moderate Perſons, as in all ſuch Caſes, will ſcarcely chuſe either of the Extremes but the middle way. That Age whereof Gildas wrote, was undoubtedly very corrupt, effeminate, and debauch'd, and made way for the Ruine, which is ever uſhered in by ſuch Practices. But that Gildas was a Prieſt and a Preacher, and uſed ſuch a Pious Art as others of his Profeſſion for the amendment of their lives, to whom he wrote, we can eaſily yield and add, not of what another Countreyman of Lhuid hath written, though not of the general deſign of his Book. He (viz. Gildas) ſeems to have propoſed this onely thing to himſelf in this little Book, that he thought at leaſt his Britains would bluſh and repent, if he rather collected all that was blame-worthy in them, and ſet it before their eyes, than if he ſhould mind ſomething worthy of Commendation, which either they themſelves or their Anceſtours had performed. Therefore he partly overwhelms them with all ſorts of Accuſations, partly ſmites them with the Divine Oracles, that none might ſuſpect he did it out of hatred to them. And if the Ghoſt of Lhuyd will permit the Name and Teſtimony of Polydore Virgil here to be uſed we ſhall add what he himſelf ſaith in this Caſe as to the decay of Religion amongſt the Britains: That a few retained the true ſenſe of Chriſtian Religion, whom Gildas calleth Good Men, the reſt of them, and eſpecially the Prieſts erring ſo through the iniquity of the Times, he chaſtiſeth and labours to reduce into the way. This was to be ſaid in this place, that every one might know that Britain did not beget evil Prieſts, but that the Cruelty and Impiety of men was the cauſe; foraſmuch as this firſt of all Provinces received the Chriſtian Religion, and at all times (ſaith he) and even at this time, hath had and hath a moſt Religious People. Thus far Polydore aſcribing this decay of Religion amongſt the Britains, to the ancient Perſecutions of the Romans. Here now we muſt leave our poor Britains in the Mountainous places of Wales and Cornwales, or elſe ſhifting for themſelves in ſtrange Countries, and now come to thoſe Intruders who poſſeſſed themſelves of their Countrey, and drove them out, whom retaining the old word they ſtill call Saiſſon, and their Language Saiſſonaeg, not knowing what Engliſhman or England means. Firſt therefore let us ſee what theſe Saxons and others that invaded Britain in Conjunction with them, were. Then let us come to a view of the ſeveral Kingdoms they erected in the Iſland. And of theſe in their places.

Priſæus Hiſtor. Britannic Defenſ. C. ult.

Unde venit quod Noſtrates primum retinentes nomen, Anglos omnes Saiſſon & linguam eorum Saiſſonaeg appellant, nec quid ſit Anglus aut Anglia nôrunt. Lhuyd ubi ſupra. fol. 11. b.

The Countrey called Saiſſon, and that Language Saiſſonaeg.

SECT. II.

SECT. II.

The Original of the Saxons, Angles and Jutes, which planted themſelves in Britain.

Sect. 2.

Their firſt Seats.

1. THE Getes or Goths, as we have formerly ſhewed out of Scandia, in moſt ancient times, not onely made Inrodes into the Cherſoneſus, and the Iſlands of the Baltick Sea, and the more Northern Parts of Germany, but into ſeveral Parts both of the Aſian and European Sarmatia, and Scythia, whence driving out the Inhabitants, they there ſeated themſelves, as well as in Thrace and ſeveral other Provinces. In the Aſiatick Scythia or Sarmatia, was there a City called Aſgard, as the Northern Writers tell us, the Inhabitants whereof Agardiani are by ſome thought the ſame with thoſe whom the Greeks knew by the Name of Aſpurgiani, both ſorts of Authours placing them near to the Lake Mæotis, where the River Tanais, with great fury empties it ſelf into it, and if ſome have not wrongly apprehended him, Ptolemy the Geographer himſelf, called the City by the very Name of Aſcard or Aſgard. The Countrey in which this City ſtood was in a peculiar way called Aſia by Strabo, and the People thereof Aſæi, and Aſiota by the other Writers. As for the Names of Asgard and Aſpurg they denote but the very ſame thing, Gard to the Goths ſignifies the ſame which Purgos did to the Greeks, viz. a Tower or Caſtle. Such of the Goths, as inhabited this Countrey were alſo called Turcæ or Turks, as Mela witneſſeth, who makes them the ſame with the Tyrſagetæ, thoſe that at this preſent bear that Name having long time after entred into theſe Quarters deſerted by the Goths, after they returned back into Europe. Theſe Aſpurgiani had their Kings, the Dominions of whom extended to the farther Mountains of Scythia, within Imaus, where the Saſones, Syebi and Iotæ inhabited, whom Strabo comprehends under the very Name of Aſpurgiani.

Lib. 2.

Turcas quaſi Tauricas à monte Tauro; ad cujus Radices habitabant, eos dictos putat non nemo.

Apud Stephanium.

Woden their King.

2. Of this Aſpurgia or Aſgardia was King, amongſt the reſt, one Othin, as an ancient Chronicle of Norwey calls him, though he has many other Names different in ſound yet eaſily to be apprehended of the ſame Original, for Gothick they all are though variouſly written, and pronounced according to the ſeveral Gothick Dialects. The Reader will find him called Othin, and Othen, Oden and Voden; Godan and Guodan, Eowthen and Euoden; ſometimes conciſely written Wode, Ode and Othe, Gode and Guode, Woen and Goen, but moſt commonly we find him Woden, and from him is the third day of the week named Wodenſdach, (our Wedneſday) as alſo Woenſdach and Gorenſdach, neither are there wanting other Names and Epithetes, whereby he is known. He is reported to have been a ſtout and expert Captain, aſwell wiſe and cautious, as hardy and daring, and famous for the Art or Faculty of foretelling. Some will tell you, that he was expert in the Art Magick to ſuch perfection, that he would change his ſhape into that of a four footed Beaſt, Bird or Fiſh as often as he liſted; in the twinkling of an Eye could remove himſelf into what place he pleaſed, with his word alone could reſtrain the heat of Fire, the fury of the Sea, and doe many other things which far exceed the Power and Capacity of Man, whereby he procured to himſelf no ſmall Eſteem, and Reverence; even aſmuch as was attributed to the higheſt Deity. This well fitted him for the place of Chief Prieſt, which he bore in his Countrey, where very frequent Sacrifices were offered to Idols. Twelve of the chiefeſt Senatours he choſe from amongſt the reſt which excelled in Goodneſs and Wiſedom, and made them Overſeers not onely over Religious matters, but Miniſters of Juſtice to the People. They were called Diar, that is Gods or Divine, and Drotuar or Lords, and the People by turns were bound to aſſiſt and ſerve them in their Miniſtration. While they governed the People at home, he conquered many Kingdoms and Countries abroad; being ſo proſperous in all his Enterprizes, that in none he failed. When to his Captains he committed any Expedition or other ſort of Service, he laid his hands on them, and as it were conſecrated them to that Affair, who thereby concluded, that as by a certain Spell they were rendred uncapable of any

Who chuſes 12 Senatours to be Overſeers in ſacred and civil Affairs.

any Miſfortune, eſpecially if at time of danger they made but mention of his Name.

He makes war upon the Scythians.

Who after ſeveral Battels deliver Hoſtages on both ſides.

3. He had two Brothers, the one called Ve, and the other Velir or Vuli. He being abroad and buſied in his Wars, they preſided over the Kingdom of Aſgardia, and took care of all publick buſineſs, as of his Wiſe Frigga. He returning, they reſtored to him his Wife and Government, which he preſently again leaving in the ſame hands, undertook an Expedition againſt the Scythians of Tanais, called Vaner, who made Valiant Reſiſtence, notably defended their Countrey, and making his Victory often very ambiguous, retreated ſtill with ſafety to their places of Succour, and conſtrained him not ſeldom to procure ſafety by a ſeaſonable return. Many damages did they receive on both ſides, whereof at laſt being weary, they gave Hoſtages mutually, and came to an agreement, which ended in a firm and laſting Peace. The Scythians gave up to Woden two notable men, Niord, Sirnamed the Rich, and his Son Troi: And the Aſiani were not below them in their choice, delivering to them in exchange one Heiner, a Perſon fit for the management of all matters relating both to Peace and War, and Mimer the moſt wiſe of all Mortals, whereat the Scythians were ſo touched, that out of a ſenſe that they were overcome in this particular, they delivered up to balance him another Heroe called Quaſir, who to them ſeemed the wiſeſt of all living Men. Heiner preſently obtained the Sovereignty over the Scythians, and having at his Elbow ſo able and faithfull a Counſellour as Mimer, did nothing without his advice, who taught him Rules and Methods which he ſhould uſe in all publick buſineſs; but afterwards wanting him when Cauſes were brought before him, which he was not able to decide, he would often ſay, do you agree amongſt your ſelves, and adviſe together ſuch of you as are ſkilfull, for from me you can have no aſſiſtence. The Scythians now perceiving themſelves deceived by the Aſiani, in an unequal exchange of Hoſtages, cut off the Head of Mimer and ſent it to them, which Woden receiving, cauſed it to be preſerved with Balſam, with Magick Rhimes made it Vocal, ſo that it would reveal to him any ſacred or concealed thing. Niord and Troi he reckoned amongſt the Aſiatick Deities, together with Treia the Daughter of Troia, who having learnt Magick and Inchantments of the Aſiaticks, therewith wonderfully pleaſed the Scythians her Countreymen. As for Niord, he returning home, married his own Siſter, which their Laws allowed, where amongſt the Aſiaticks it was eſteemed the greateſt wickedneſs for any to joyn in Wedlock, which were ſo near in bloud.

He goes into Saxony, and ſubdues it and Denmark.

He makes a League with Gyluo Governour of Swethland.

4. But, very high and craggy Mountains, running in length from North to South, ſeparate the greater Scythia, as it were by a natural Fence and Limit, from the adjoyning Countries, whereof ſuch as lay toward the South were all ſubject to the command of Othin. At this time the Romans being Maſters of all, had ſubdued Innumerable Nations, far and wide, with their Victorious Arms having reduced under the Yoke of their Empire, moſt vaſt Kingdoms, moſt Valiant People, moſt flouriſhing Cities, and famous Commonwealths; whereupon many Princes and Governours, forſaking their own Countries, delivered up their Subjects into their Hands. But Othin being a famous Magician, and endued with an eſpecial faculty of Divining, and thereby knowing that he and his Poſterity ſhould for a long time Reign in the Northern Parts of the world, committed to his two Brothers, Ve and Veler, the Government of Aſgardia. He himſelf went into Ruſſia, and thence proceeded into Saxony, which having ſubdued, he delivered it over to his Sons, of whom, Skiold he ſet over Dania or Denmark, wherein he made Lethra his Regal Seat. Othin after this having diſcovered that Gothia Suetica, or Swethland, over which preſided one Gyluo, with Royal Authority, was a Countrey fertile, and able to entertain numerous Inhabitants, he betook himſelf to Gyluo, and having made a ſtrict League and Alliance with him, obtained leave to plant himſelf, and as many as he pleaſed in theſe Quarters, for the other was afraid leſt by refuſal, he ſhould irritate and provoke the Aſiaticks, to whom he ſufficiently knew himſelf to be inferiour in power. Now do Gyluo and Othin ſtrive who ſhall excell in Magical Inchantments, in all which conteſt, yet Othin bore away the Victory, and this done, went and Inhabited on the River Loger, where he adorned the City Sigtun (of which name ſaith our Authour, there was a Town in Sweden in the days of our Anceſtours) and built a moſt magnificent Palace, where he ordained a courſe of Sacrifices, according to the Rites and Cuſtoms of the Aſians. Having ſeized on all this Region, he planted as it were a certain Colony of their Deaſtri, to which he aſſigned certain Places and Chapels, ſo to Niordſell Moalum, to Frey Upſal, to Theron Truduanger, to Heiner Hundbierg and to Balder Broedeblick. At length Othin with a Troop of his Idols, going back to the Northern Parts of Suedia, exerciſed himſelf in working wonders by his Magical Art; and thereof, as it were, ſet up a publick School, there being formerly no uſe of it in this place.

His character and cunning in Magick.

5. As for this Perſon, his countenance, words and carriage, ſhewed him to be chearfull, pleaſant and facetious to an high degree, moſt agreeable to his friends, but terrible in all reſpects to his Enemies; for, Proteus like, he could change himſelf into all forms and ſhapes. He had ſuch a perſwaſive Tongue, ſo eloquent as could not be reſiſted, and the more for that with his Oratory, he mixed Rhimes and Sonnets, whereupon he and his Companions were called Schialdri and Poets. By his Magick, he was wont to deprive his Enemies of all ſenſe, and ſtrike them with a pannick fear; nay, joyning Battel with them by his Charming Verſes, he could dull the edge of their Swords, inſomuch that his Souldiers, without either Shield or Breaſtplate, like ſo many fierce Dogs or Wolves, would wound, tear, and rend their Enemies, which were but like ſo many Sheep before them, they themſelves in the mean time being utterly out of danger. Thence was this kind of fierceneſs, afterward called the Onſet of the Berſerkers. Farther, then this Othin was ſo cunning in deceiving the Eye, that he would caſt himſelf down as dead, and his Body would ſeem to be changed into the ſeveral ſhapes of Fiſhes, Birds and Serpents. Returning to himſelf, he would affirm he had been viewing Countries far diſtant, and knew exactly what was therein done. With one word he could extinguiſh Fires, lay Tempeſts, ſtop Inundations, and command the boiſterous Winds. The Spirits of dead Men he could fetch out of their places, and confine them unto certain Hills, whereupon he was named Dronga Drotten vel Hunga Drotten, the Lord of Hobgoblins. He had two Crows which he had taught to ſpeak, which would fly into other Regions, and relate to their Maſter what Accidents had happened. By his Magick he would open Mountains, and thence from the Veins of the Earth, fetch as much Gold and Silver as to him ſeemed convenient, and without any ones telling find out Treaſures that had been hidden. In ſumm, Othin by his Rhimes, Songs and Inchantments (called Caldran, Seid, Liod and Frolkinga) did ſuch incredible things, that his Name became Famous, and the Renown of his Wiſedom and Power, as alſo of his Aſians, reached all Countries and Nations. By this means he ſo afrighted his Enemies, that they dared not to attempt any thing againſt him; on the contrary, he ſo retained his Allies and Friends in their Fidelity, that ſeldom or never, did they revolt from him.

6. Thence came it to paſs, that the Sueci and other Northern Nations ſolemnly ſacrificed to him and his twelve Aſſociates, and paid to him that Duty and Devotion, which was due to the Lord of Heaven and Earth alone. Their Names they gave to their Children newly born, calling ſome of them Audun and Oudun from Othin, Thord, Thore, Toraren, Stemtor and Haſtor from Tor, ſome of which ſaith the Chronicler are ſtill in uſe amongſt the Norwegians. Othin, farther, made many Laws, amongſt which theſe are reported the moſt memorable. The Bodies of the dead or ſuch as were ſlain in War, he ordained ſhould be conſumed with Fire, together with their Choice Goods and Ornaments, the Aſhes either buried in the Earth, or caſt into Rivers. That Hillocks ſhould be raiſed in memory of Great and Noble Perſons with Monuments upon them, to tranſmit the fame of their Actions to Poſterity. That thrice every year they ſhould offer ſolemn Sacrifice; in Winter for the Happineſs of the year, in Mid-winter for the fruitfulneſs of it, and at the end of Winter for Victory. The Scythians every year paid him a Denarius a Head in way of Tribute, he being to protect them from their Enemies, and propagate Superſtition amongſt them. Niord had to wife one Skade, which leaving him married a little after to Othin, and by her he had many Sons, the Name of one of which was Semming. Then did new Scythia, viz. Suecia get the Name of Manheim, and the Great Scythia of Gudheim. At length, Othin, when he had lived long enough, died in Suecia. Being near his end, he commanded all his Members and Limbs to be marked with nine Scars, which the Ancients called Geirs Odde. He farther commanded, that ſuch as were beaten down in Battel ſhould be ſacrificed to him, as the moſt acceptable oblation that could be. After his death he appeared to many, eſpecially if ſome conſiderable Battel was at hand. For many he obtained Victory; others he invited into the Palace of Pluto, called Valhalden. His Body was ſolemnly burned, and a Funeral Banquet together with Sacrifices were inſtituted to the Honour of the deceaſed. Such is the Account we have concerning the Life and Death of this Woden, and his Expedition out of Agardia into into Saxony, from an Ancient Chronicle ſaid to have been written by Snorro, the Son of Sturlay, an eminent Man in Iſland, about the year of Our Lord 1220. And with this Relation, for the main, agrees the Edda of Iſland a moſt Ancient Monument, Johannes Martini an Ancient Writer alſo, as Joh. Meſſenius hath it, and another old Sueo Gothick Chronicle publiſhed by the ſaid Meſſenius, from ſeveral Manuſcripts which agreeth in all things almoſt with the Relation made by Snorro the Son of Sturlay.

He dies.

7. The Edda makes mention of Odin his making a long ſtay in Saxony, that he poſſeſſed the Countrey far and wide, and diſtributed it amongſt his Sons, whereof Vegdegg obtained the Eaſtern Saxony, Begdeg Weſtphalia, and Sig Francia. It adds that having done this, he himſelf went into another Countrey called then Reidgotoland, afterward Jutland, of which he had to himſelf as much as he pleaſed, and over it ſet his Son Skiold, who was Father to Fridleif, whoſe Poſterity was called Skioldungar or Skioldrades, from whom the Kings of Danemark are deſcended. Afterwards relating how he went into Suithiod or Suecia, it adds that he built the City from him called Sigtun, and now enjoying Royal dignity, called himſelf Niord. Therefore in the Annals it is found, that the firſt King of Suecia, was Niord, becauſe Odin the moſt magnificent King there reigned, though before him other Kings there ruled. Laſtly it relates how Odin conſtituted twelve Perſons, for adminiſtring of Law to the People according to the Turkiſh Cuſtoms, in imitation of what was done at Troy. Johannes Martini tells the Story how Woden, with twelve Judges of the Kingdom called Drotnarii, his Wife Frigga, and Children, and a great Army went into Ryſland, over which having happily conquered it, he appointed Governour his Son Bo. His Affairs having ſo proſperouſly ſucceeded in Ryſland, he ſailed over the Sea into an Iſland of Denmark, called Oden Soo, which to this very day ſaith he from Woden his inhabiting there keeps its Ancient Name. Having alſo made ſome ſtay in the Dukedom of Sleſwick, and from a certain Cunning woman called Geſion, learnt how fruitfull and beautifull a Countrey was Suecia, having left Hilſatia under the Rule of ſeven of his Sons, he departed thither and a long time lived at Sigtun, where he obtained great Fame and Veneration amongſt the Sueones, who were amazed at the things formerly related which he did by Magick, aud particularly at this, that he could paſs vaſt Seas in a little Skin or Pelt which he was wont to fold up together like a Bag. Dying at laſt at Sigtun, he was with much Honour, and no ſmall Quantity of Gold and Silver burnt, and by how much higher the ſmoke aſcended from the kindled pile by ſo much they eſteemed him placed in an higher degree, in the other World. The Saxogothick Chronicle relates, that Woden being Prince and alſo Prieſt of Aſgardia, killed and offered Men aſwell as other Animals unto Idols. That coming with all his Diarii, and a great multitude, of other Men into Ryſland, thence he proceeded into Saxony, which he committed to the Government of his Sons, and by Sea paſſed to a certain Iſland called Odenſæa in Fronia, at the writing of that Book. Having underſtood, that there was a good Land near Lagere, thither he went with his Diarii, and took a piece of ground to himſelf which he called Sigtun. Niord placed himſelf at Nuburg, Freyar at Vpſal, Hymdel at Hymburg, Thora at Trundwagn, and Balder at Bredeblike, where they introduced the Cuſtome of ſacrificing. Here is to be underſtood, that after Woden and his Diarii came into the Northern Parts, Art Magick came in uſe, but prevailed eſpecially in Finmark. Concerning his wonders performed by this Art, his death and honours, he relates the ſame with Snorro the Son of Sturlay.

His Body is burnt.

8. Such is the Account we have of the return of the Getes or Goths into Germany, under Conduct of Woden, from theſe moſt ancient Northern Writers: a ſtory the Reader cannot but a little ſtartle at, as ſavouring of ſuch Poetick fancy, and Romantick humour, as uſually covers the Originals of Nations, under the Veil of Obſcurity. That ſuch fancy and humour is prevalent in this Story cannot be denied, eſpecially as to the Perſons and Practices of our wonderfull Woden. We muſt confeſs, that theſe Northern Parts have abounded with Tales inſerted into their Magical Songs and Incantations, and that Edda the ancient Monument, we have cited, was no other but a Store-houſe of Allegories and Fancies, a ſhop out of which Poets were to gather materials, and furniſh themſelves with fit Conceits, for their Superſtitious Ditties. And to ſpeak the utmoſt, it's to be feared that theſe ancient Chroniclers from it and Tradition had their greateſt Collections. Indeed as Kranzius obſerves in his Hiſtory of theſe Northern Countries, it's difficult for any Man to write the Original of any Nation, and not to touch upon ſome Fables; not onely the Greeks, but each other People have their Heroick Story. Yet as in theſe of the Greeks as moſt think, is involved much alſo of truth, and real things covered with fictions, which may be diſcovered to have been real, by conſent of other Circumſtances of times and places; ſo perhaps upon diſquiſition we may find the ſame in this Subject, whereon we now inſiſt. In the firſt place, to grant ſuch Stories as are told of Magick to have been general Fables and Rumours of the People; yet this we muſt ſay, that to any one who has either travelled into theſe Parts or hath been converſant in the Hiſtories of theſe Northern Nations, it will appear, that they have been in former time (whatever they are at preſent, and let this be conſidered) moſt propenſe to Inchantments, direfull Imprecations and other Magical Charms and Tricks. Many Monuments of their ancient places of burial with their Runick Inſcriptions, ſufficiently teſtify enough of this matter at this very day.

Magical Inchantments much uſed.

9. But to put our velitary or weaker Arguments in the Front of our Ingagement, that Woden and his Companions came from Aſia, bears ſome reſemblance of truth; becauſe his ſirname is Aas, and they have that of Aſiani. Æſer in the plural is the ſame as Aſiaticks, whereof the ſingular is As or Aas, given to Woden, in an extraordinary manner with too great an Adjunct, as Den Almegſte Aas. This is more evident from that ancient form of an Oath, which in old time was uſed in Norwey, So help me Frier, and Niordar, and that omnipotent As, meaning Woden, whom they ſacrilegiouſly elevated into the place of the higheſt Divinity. Hereupon the Ancient Goths to witneſs their deſcent from theſe their Deities, Woden, Thor, Skiold, and the reſt, were wont to add the word As unto the Names of their Children, it ſignifying with them as much as Divine or Saint. As Asbiorn (or as the Danes write it Esberne (we Osborn) St. Beare or As Beare, Asgeir, As-Speare, Asgrimur, Aswalſe, Asketil, Asdog, Aslakur, (the Danes call it Axell) that is Dius Famalus, or As ſeruant, and as theſe and others belong to Men, ſo ſome there were that appertained to Women. Farther, that in Sarmatia Aſiatica, there was really ſuch a place called Asgardia or Aspurgia, and People known by the Name of Aſiotæ, and Aſiani a Countrey by Strabo expreſly and peculiarly called Aſia, we have already ſeen. Hence when Woden and his Followers came into Germany, was the Name of Aſciburg, or as now it is called Asburg, given to an ancient City there mentioned by Tacitus, this being far more probable than that it ſhould be founded by Vlyſſes, it being the Cuſtome of theſe Gothick Nations, to give the Names of the places from whence they came, to their newly acquired Conqueſts. In the Preface to the Edda, the Countrey whence Woden came, is called Turcia, and Mela witneſſeth that the Inhabitants of Aspurgia, were ſome of them called Turcæ; being the ſame with thoſe Goths called Tyrſagetæ, who from the Mountain Taurus might receive ſome denomination. And as ſuch like Denominations, when they come to be fixed upon Nations or Families commonly ſtick; ſo probable it is, that after the Saxons came into Britain, the Name of Turk ſtill continued, though the reaſon of the Name might be in the dark. For in the County of Lincoln upon the Trent, ſome four or five Miles from Gainsborough, there is a Town now called Torkſey, which the Saxons in their Language called ꞇuꞃceꞅiᵹᵹe or the Iſland of Turks. But as we ſaid before the preſent Turks came into theſe parts of Aſia long after, when the Goths returning into Europe had forſaken them.

His Sirname was As.

His Countrey Aſpurgia.

Part whereof was called Turcia.

10. Farther, that Woden came into Ryſland, is made probable from the proper Names of ſeveral Places there. In the Borders of Livonia, formerly accounted part of Ryſland, was a Province from him called Odenpoe, as much as to ſay, Vpon Woden, denoting as ſome think, that all their Hope and Expectation was upon him. In the Bay of the Sarmatian Sea, is alſo a certain Iſland from him called Wodeſholm, by the Danes Odesholm, and Vodeſholme. Woden leaving Ryſland, left King over that Countrey, his Son Bo, as both Saxo Grammaticus, and Johannes Magnus relate, calling the ſaid Bo King of the Rutheri, the Land of whom by the Goths was called Ryſland, Roxilania in the Latin Tongue, and in times paſt Ruſſia extending from the Mouth of the River Viſtula, as far as the Bank of Mæotis, and Tanais with the Riphean Mountains, in the Circle of which are at this day contained Pruſſia, Livonia, and a great Part of Muſcovy, with other Countries. Now that from Ryſland, Woden by Sea came into the Northern Parts of Germany, beſides what is ſaid by Johannes Martini, other Circumſtances render very probable. Firſt it has been the conſtant opinion and tradition of the Saxons themſelves, that thither they came not by Land but Sea. Then as in other Places, ſo in theſe Quarters of Germany, Woden left ſeveral marks of his Name. From him otherwiſe called Wodan and Godan, Sialand formerly called Wetallaheeth, received the Name of Vide Sheringhami Diſcept. de Orig. Gentis Angli, c. 13.

Settles his Son Bo in the Kingdom of Ryſland.

Godanonia, or Codanovia, as alſo all the Straits beſet with Iſlands, that of Sinus Godanus or Codanus, the Bay of Godan or Codan. Then it ſeems very probable, that Woden brought Poetry and the Runick Letters in uſe with the Goths, becauſe of old they called the Runick Speech by the Name of Aſmal, or the Aſian Language; which is preſerved in Iſland more pure, than in other places. Fimbul, who is reported to have been the Scribe and Prophet of theſe Aſæ, is indeed ſaid to have invented the Runick Letters or Characters; but Woden is ſaid to have cut them, and taught the People the uſe of them, for which reaſon he was called Ranhofdi, or the Head, Principal or Chief of the Runæ, which were imagined to have wonderfull Power and Operation in Prayers and Imprecations. But of theſe more, in a more proper Place.

Stephanius in Præf. ad Saxon. Grammaticum.

11. The Removals and Travels of the Goths out of the more Northern Parts into Germany, and the adjacent Iſlands are farther made out by the Inſcriptions in Runick Characters, which are extant both in the ſaid Iſlands, and in Sweden, as well as by the conſent of the Annaliſts of theſe Quarters. Great Pillars were in Sweden, not long ſince to be ſeen, which the Inſcriptions upon them manifeſted to have been erected by them in memory of their Worthies, which had loſt their lives in Greece, Thrace, or other places. From Woden and his Companions who were Scythians, came Sueica to be called Nova Scythia, and the Inhabitants of the Cherſoneſus, or the Cimbri to be called by the Greeks Celtoſcythæ, being firſt to them known by the Name of Cimmerians, and why by this, but that becauſe they were firſt in Scythia called Cimmerians, and into Germany, and thoſe Parts travelled from Boſphorus Cimmerius. But to come near to our matter, we know that our Anceſtours came out of Germany, conſiſting of Jutes (Gutes or Getes) Saxons and Angles, three of the moſt valiant People of that Countrey. Now from Ptolemy it appears that in Scythia or Cimmeria, there were three ſeveral People which were known by the very ſame Names. He ſpeaks of Jotæ, lying upon the Sea of the Rhymmii. Of the Saſones, under the Maſſæan and Alan Mountains. Now though he mentions not the Angles, yet the Suebi he doth, or Suevi, part of which Nation the Angli are rationally thought to have been; being ſo called from the Angle or Corner on which they ſeized in Germany. This is accounted no ſmall Argument, that theſe People came into the Maritime Parts of Germany, at no other time, nor under any other Conduct than that of Woden, becauſe before the time of his Expedition, no ſuch Names as theſe do occur in Northern Writers, but after this they became famous, eſpecially the Saxons. In the Sueogothick Annals, thoſe of Norwey and Danemark their Memory flouriſhes, but amongſt the ancient Greek and Roman Writers, the Saxons are known; as alſo the Jutes by the Name of Cimbri, though the Suebi by that of their own.

The Jutes, Saxons, and Angles, came into the Northern Parts of Germany, under Conduct of Woden.

12. In Sarmatia are many Towns, eſpecially in Livonia, which it appears plainly to have borrowed their Names from the Saxon Tongue. Reſſuel ſignifies a place where two Seas meet, Riga, Riches, and others there are whoſe Terminations are plainly Saxon. And as for the Maritime Parts, there they ſpeak that Language to this very day, which are preſumed manifeſt ſigns, that theſe Countries were formerly ſubject to Woden and his Saxons, part of whom ſuch as there took not up their abode, paſſed over the Seas into Germany. Let that farther be conſidered that the Peninſula, when Woden came thither had the Name of Reidgothaland, but afterward received that of Jutia, and whence ſhould this change come but from the Goths, Jotes or Jutes, who came and ſeizing on this Countrey inhabited, eſpecially the Weſtern Promontory thereof? But we had almoſt forgot what in courſe ſhould before this have been remembred, that not onely our Anceſtours, viz. the Jutes, Saxons and Angles, but others the Principal Nations of Germany, had their Name Jutes in Scythia. Strabo places the Macropogones or Longobards in Cimmeria, about Syndica, near to which Woden is ſaid to have reigned in Aſpurgia; it may be true indeed that other Colonies did afterward go out of Scandia, but yet before theſe Migrations, that ſuch of this Name inhabited part of Germany, both Tacitus and Ptolemy may aſſure us. All know that in Gerwany there are the Treres, Trevirenſes, or thoſe of Triers in Saxon die Trerer, and ſuch there were in Scythia alſo. The Chatti lied in Germany, under the Mountain Relibotus, not far from the Suevi, Angli and Camani, and Ptolemy places them alſo in Scythia, next the Maſſagetes, without the Mountains Imai.

The Names of their Towns the ſame.

13. Yet ſtill this doth mightily (eſpecially in conjunction with the other Arguments) inforce the probability of this Plantation, that the Gothick Nations or Cimbri in their manners, and Inclinations much ſuited with the Aſiatick Scythians. Both the one and the other eſteemed it Noble to dye in war, but diſgracefull to Being very much alike in all things.

De his omnibus vide Sheringhamum ubi prius. c. 15.

be ſent out of the World, either by Old Age or a Diſeaſe. By bloud (drunk or ſprinkled) both entred into Leagues and Confederacies. Their Women with both, together with the Men, ingaged in battel, and fought againſt the Enemy. The Amazons themſelves were the Off-ſpring of the Scythians in Aſia. And ſuch Goths as inhabited in Europe on this ſide Tanais, and the Riphæan Mountains as far as Germany, called with ſome variety Gothones, Gottones, Samogetæ and Sauromatæ, and part of them Alans, had their Amazons alſo, which for warlike enterprizes, equalled the Men themſelves, and as thoſe in Aſia had their Right Breaſt burnt off, whereupon from the Greeks they received the ſame Name, and were not ſuffered to marry till they had killed three Enemies. Women both of warlike Diſpoſitions and Actions, like to theſe, Saxo Grammaticus relates Danemark once to have bred. Another though barbarous Cuſtome both agreed in, and that was to make Cups of the Skulls of their Enemies, and drink out of them; this being accounted by the Goths the Sum of all Felicity, that after death in ſuch kind of Veſſels they ſhould drink Nappy Ale with Woden. But nothing more evinces the thing we are about to prove, than the mixture of the Greek Language, and others of the Aſiatick Tongues with the Saxons, viz. Armenian, and thoſe of the Turks and Perſians. Now how could they reach ſo far as into the Cimbrick Cherſoneſus, but as they were tranſmitted by ſuch as were once Neighbours to theſe Nations, and afterward travelled into theſe Quarters? Moreover the moſt ancient Names both of places and Perſons were the ſame, and many of them to this day continue amongſt us, Erick, Berig, Filmer or Fulmer are frequent enough in England. And as for the proper Names of the Grand Aſæ themſelves, as Woden, Thor, Siggo, Skiold or Scyld, they are here alſo ſufficiently known, and of them we have the Names of Towns compounded, as Wodensbury, Thorsby (not to ſpeak of days) Sigſton, Shilton or Shelton; and many others an induſtrious Man might find.

Hippocrates de Aere, &c. ſect. 3.

Lib. 7.

14. Such are the Arguments brought for this opinion, that the Aſiatick Goths with Woden, came back into Scandia, and ſetled part of them in Germany. And though ſome of the Books out of which they are fetcht abound with Fables, yet we muſt needs confeſs ſeveral things there are which laid all and conſidered together, will at leaſt inforce a Probability. Likeneſs of Speech argues ever the ſpeakers to have been of one and the ſame deſcent, and where two ſeveral People bear the ſame Name, a vehement ſuſpicion it is, that though at preſent they are yet, they have not ever been ſeparated from each other. A Tradition it was amongſt the Saxons, that by Sea they came into thoſe Quarters of Germany, but no Footſteps of any other Invaſion or Migrations, are to be found beſides this of Woden. Let this Opinion then ſtand at leaſt as Probationer, and let him receive his deſerved thanks of all that affect Letters, who has lately taken ſo much ingenious pains to make it out. What ſhall we ſay as to the time of this Migration? Some make it to have happened four and twenty years before the birth of Chriſt, about the time whem Pompey waſted Syria. But Woden is ſaid in the Preface of the Edda, to have delivered over the Government of Jutia to his Son Skiold, whence the Kings of Danemark were anciently called Skioldinger, now this Skiold according to the Daniſh Chronology, lived almoſt a thouſand years before Pompey; and accordingly Woden with his Saxons, Sueves, Getes, and other People of Scythia, muſt about the pretended beginning of the Daniſh Empire have entred the Cherſoneſus, and the adjacent places, and to Saxony, Suevia and Jutia, have given theſe as their proper Names. And one there is who will have the Saxons, to have given occaſion to the riſe of the Daniſh Kingdom, and to have invaded the Danes, who then endeavoured to ſhake off the Gothick Yoke, with whom the Danes not able to graple, were conſtrained to crave aid of Howel King of the Goths, who ſent them for King his Son Dan (from whom Dania received its Name) who by his Valour repreſſed the Saxons. But theſe things are uncertain.

Both Nations proceed from one Original.

Sheringhamus ubi ſuprà.

The time of their Migration 24 years before Chriſt.

15. By this laſt Account the beginning of the Daniſh Kingdom, ſhould fall into the 2910 year of the World, and Woden muſt have been ſomething Ancienter than Homer. But how will this conſiſt with the Genealogies of our Engliſh Saxon Kings, the Founders of the ſeven Kingdoms, all which are derived in deſcent from Woden? Hengiſt and Horſa his Brother are ſaid by the Monk of Malmesbury, to have been but the Abnepotes or fourth in deſcent from Woden, and Cerdick, the Founder of the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons, the Tenth; but how could this be? For this Chronology will have Woden, live and flouriſh 1038 years before Chriſt, and Hengiſt came not into Britain, till about 449 years after his Birth, the Great Grandfather, Grandfather and Father of Hengiſt, muſt at this rate have been nigh as long lived as Methuſalah, ſuppoſing them to have generated in the 2910 Mundi.

1038

449

Three that bare the Name of Woden.

Brynolphus Suenonius Epiſcopus Scalhaltenſis in Conjectaneis ad Saxon. Grammat. ex vetuſtiſſimis tabulis Genealogicis Eccleſiæ Cathedralis Anholtini.

middle of their Age. Some therefore tell us, that as amongſt the Greeks there were ſeveral that bore the Name of Hercules, but that they were all confounded together, and what was done by all was aſcribed to one; ſo alſo it fell out as to the matter of Woden. There is one that thinks there were three of this Name all deified: the firſt deſcended from Saturn and the Trojan Kings, called Aſianus, and Odin hin Gamle, or Woden the Ancient, who never came into Carpoe, but his Name and Rights were hither brought by others. The ſecond of Upſal, to whom in Suedeland was a Temple dedicated, which was very ſumptuous ſhining with Gold, who was alſo called Aſianus, but a ſtranger of the Scythians. The third was called Methodinus, or Middle Woden, of whom Saxo Grammaticus maketh mention, who, the other Woden being abroad, took occaſion to feign himſelf a God, but after his return relinquiſhing his Preſtigiatory tricks fled away into Phaonia, there to lurk; but was ſlain by the Concourſe of the Inhabitants. Another produces a fourth Woden, who being beaten by Pompey out of Aſia, into the Northern Parts, taught the People the Arts and Laws of the Aſiaticks, and was therefore had in eſpecial Honour. But his flight is from the Romans alſo aſcribed unto him of Upſal, although they are reported to have lived in far different Ages. In theſe obſcure matters it's difficult where to fix. If ſuch was the Deſcent of our Saxon Conquerours, there muſt be a Woden, much later than that firſt we have ſpoken off, nay later than the laſt of all theſe mentioned. But it's a uſual thing with Ethnicks to father ſuch upon their Gods as they are at aloſs with, as to their Pedigrees. Or ſome notable Warriour, the more to aggrandize his Name, might aſſume to himſelf or have given to him that of Woden.

Amgrinus Jonas.

16. Let us admit then of this ſtory of Woden, and the great Army of Saſons, Getes and Suebi, that came with him into Germany. Now let us ſee what there they did, let us take a view of theſe ſeveral ſorts of People, there ſuppoſed to be planted. Nicholas Ciſner, a Learned Lawyer of Spira, in his Preface to Krantzius his Hiſtory of Saxony; having brought the Sacæ and the Saxons (ſprung from them) out of Aſia, whence from the Eaſt they betook themſelves Northward, and from the North by Degrees into Countries nearer to theſe parts of the World, is of opinion, that moſt of the People of Germany, as the Suevi, Catti, Alani, Cimbri, Daci, Dani, Getæ and Goths almoſt in the ſame method and manner, powered themſelves into Europe; ſo that what Neighbourhood was amongſt them in Aſia, the ſame almoſt continued with them in Europe. But, the old Saxons, or thoſe that firſt invaded Germany, ſeated themſelves in that Countrey, which at preſent contains Holſatia, properly ſo called, Dithmarſh, Stonnar and Wagria: the breadth of it lies from the City of Sleſwick to that of Hamborough (placed in the utmoſt part of Saxony) the length from the Weſtern to the Eaſtern Sea, or from the German Ocean to the Baltick, having old France adjoining to it, between the Mouths of the Elbe, and the Rhine. For Ptolemy places the Southern Border of Saxony, betwixt the Mouth of the River Altis (now Elbe) and Chaluſus (or Trane, which runs by Lubeck) the Northern Border as Adamus Bremenſis fixeth it was the River Egdom, which ſeparated the old Saxony (from lying North of the River Elbe, called Nortalbingia) from Dania. Of the People inhabiting this Saxonia Tranſelbiana, the ſame Authour makes this diſtinction. Of the Tranſelbian Saxons, there are three People: the firſt are the Dithmarſi upon the Ocean, whoſe Church is Mildenthorp. The ſecond are the Holſati, ſo called from the woods where they inhabit, being watered by the River Stare: their Church is Sconenfeld. The third and more Noble are Stormarii, ſo called becauſe that Nation is alſo toſſed by Seditions: their Metropolis is lofty Hanburg. With this diviſion agrees Helmoldus, in his Sclavian Hiſtory. The old Saxony was not therefore Weſtphalia, as Krantzius, and ſeveral others were of opinion, but that which at this day is called the Dukedom of Holſatia.

The Situation of old Saxony, being the ſeat of our ancient Saxons.

The ſorts of the Tranſelbian Saxons.

Adamus Bremenſis Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. l. 1. cap. 9.

Holtſaten etiam Krantzio dicitur ab Holts Sylva & Saten Incolis, tanquam eſſent Sylveſtres Incolæ. Alii dicunt Regionem Germaniæ fuiſſe dictam Oltſaxen veterem Saxoniam, in antiquis ſcil. manuſcriptis Chronicis.

They inlarge their Territories.

17. But afterward by their Conqueſts our Saxons ſo inlarged their bounds, that ſeveral other Diviſions came in uſe. For all theſe Maritime Parts as far as the River Scheld and Flanders, were called Saxony; then came up Names of Saxonia Ciſſrhenana and Saxonia Inferior, as for new Saxony, or that which bears the Name at this day, it's but a ſmall Pittance of the other. All theſe though diſtinguiſhed enough amongſt themſelves in Germany, were firſt known to the Greeks and Romans by the name of Cimbri, as the Sea from the Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, as far as Flanders, having been called Mare Cimbricum. Though the Saxons brought their Name out of Aſia with them, and were by it ſufficiently known at home, yet Ptolemy is the firſt Authour that makes mention of it; and after it became known,

and

The Seats of the Angli where.

Malmesb. Lib. 2. c. 2.

De Angliꝭ Copioſè agit Ciſnerus in Præf. adKrantzium.

and famous to Greeks and Romans, by it they underſtood that Part of the Cimbri inhabiting betwixt the Rivers Rhine and Elbe, which had been conquered by our ancient Saxons. So much for the Seats of our ancient Saxons, now let us ſee if we can find that of the Angles, and we are pointed to it by Ethelward, and our own Monk of Malmsbury, who tell us, that Old England was ſituate betwixt the Saxons and Giotes, having its Capital Town, in the Saxon Tongue called Sleſwick, but Haithaby by the Danes. Betwixt an Arm of the Baltick, of old called Slia and the Bay of Fleteſtoicke, did this Countrey lie; which ſtill, by its Inhabitants is called Anglen; by Krantzius and others that write in Latin Anglia. The Inhabitants were more anciently called Suevi, being part of the Nation which Cæſar witneſſeth in his time to have been the greateſt and moſt Warlike of all the German Nations. Ptolemy, though others mention more, diſtinguiſhes them into three ſorts of People, viz. The Suevi Longobardi, the Suevi Semnones, and the Suevi Angili, whom Tacitus and other Hiſtorians contractedly call Angli. But ſome make a great doubt, others deny that the Saxones Angli, and theſe Suevi Angli, were the ſame Nation; and upon this ground, becauſe Beda calls the Angli, Saxons, but the Saxons and Suevi were not the ſame Nation, being Nations diſtinct both as to Name and Place. To this others anſwer, that ſo it was indeed at their firſt coming into Germany; but afterward part of the Suevi, with their Seat about the Elbe was conquered by the Saxons, and after this retained both their own Name, and yet got that alſo of Saxons. So the Normans and Britains retain their old Names in Gall, and yet in a general acceptation, are called French. And as we ſaid before, the Saxons paſſing over the Elbe, pierced as far as the Rhine, nay, the Scheld and all People in this compaſs obtained the ſirname of Saxon, eſpecially ſuch as lived within the two former Rivers. Now that part of the Suevi were ſeated betwixt theſe two Rivers, Strabo is a ſufficient Witneſs, who alſo teſtifies that the Suevi were a reſtleſs People, and wont often to change their Seats. Therefore though the Suevi Angli in the days of Tacitus and Ptolemy, inhabited the Inland Countrey, yet ſome time after they might remove, being not wont in Cæſar's time (as he aſſures us) to ſtay any longer than a year or two in a place.

Vide Suffridum Petrum de Orig. Frizior. lib. 1. c. 11. Sheringhamum quò ſuprà, c. 2.

The Seats of the Jutes.

18. Being invited by the Saxons to joyn with them in War againſt the Danes, they mixed with them in the Cherſoneſus, or in Jutia, the Danes being ejected, who ſometimes again recovered their ground and expelled them. But hence the Angli received the Name of them under whoſe Patrociny they were, being when amongſt the Suevi, called Anglo Suevi, when amongſt the Saxons, Angli Saxones, in Pomeravia, Angli Pomeravi, in Friſia, Angli Friſij, and ſome were called Angli Germani; but the Angli Saxones became moſt eminent, becauſe they came over into Britain in Conjunction with the Jutes and true Saxons, the Name of which Beda gives to both the other, which argues this People to have been then under their Juriſdiction. This doth much make for this Opinion of their changing their Seats, that neither Ptolemy nor any after him till they came into Britain makes any mention of the Angli in the Cherſoneſus or Jutia, and when they come to be mentioned as inhabiting the Cherſoneſus, none ſpeaks of their living upon the Elbe, a great ſign they were thither removed. Neither after this time doth any Geography ſpeak of two ſorts of Angli ſeparated as to the place of their Habitation. But, in making this diſcovery of the Place of the Angli, we have light upon that of the Jutes too, who inhabited Jutia, which ſtill retains its Name being a moſt known and remarkable Member of the preſent Daniſh Kingdom. A Geographer ſpeaking of the Parts of the ſaid Kingdom, tells us, that Gothia is moſt ſpacious and Populous, in the place of which Name, the former Syllable being vitiated, one near to it is retained, and it is called Jutia: But that the Name of Jutia or Jutland was ancient, not onely Adamus Bremenſis, but Saxo Grammaticus witneſſeth, as alſo Beda, who more than once calls the Inhabitants thereof by the Name of Jutæ. For a very learned man affirms to us that all the Manuſcript Copies of that Authour which he conſulted, ſo read it, and not Vitæ, wherewith alſo concur, Florentius of Worceſter, William of Malmſbury, Henry of Huntingdon, Matthew of Weſtminſter, Ralph of Cheſter and others. Fabius Ethelward the Saxon Writer calls the Countrey Giota and the People Giotæ; the Saxon Annals of Peterburg ᵹeaꞇum and ıoꞇum. Agreeable to this is the mention which Aſſerius Menevenſis makes of Oſlac the Grandfather of King Ælfred by the Mother, that He was a Goth by Nation being iſſued from the Goths

Uſſerius de Brit. Eccleſiar. Primordiis, pag. 391.

Saxonica Regis Aluildi verſio habet ᵹeaꞇum

Chronologia Saxonica ⁊ ꞇum.

Sect. 2.

Goths and Jutes, for it ought to be read Jutis, and not as it is moſt vitiouſly printed, Judis. In reſpect of thoſe Jutes it is that the King of Danemark retains ſtill the Title of King of the Goths; and with reference to their Progeny may that of Beliſarius be interpreted in Procopius, which has put ſo many to a plunge, where in his Treaty with the Ambaſſadours of the Goths, he tells them, we alſo permit the Goths to have all Britain, being far better than Sicily, and though it was in times paſt ſubject to the Dominion of the Romans.

De Bello Gothico. lib. 2.

The Name whence.

19. But be it that ſome Copies have it Vitæ, this might eaſily be changed for Juitæ, the firſt Letter being taken away or omitted; and J might eaſily be changed into G, as in the Laws of Edward the Confeſſour they are called Gutæ, by reaſon of the nearneſs there is in the force of theſe two Letters. Be they Jetæ, Jutæ, Juitæ, Jotæ, Jotuni, Getæ, Geatuni, Giotæ, or Gutæ, it's the ſame Name as well as thing, the Orthography and Terminations according to the diverſe fancy of People, and their pronunciation being onely various, as happens uſually in all other Names, ſcarcely any Nation or Town being written and called every whit the ſame in any two Languages. Some therefore ſeem to approve of the preſent Copy of Beda, calling them Witi, whereof one tells us, that at ſeveral times going out of their own Countrey, ſome came into Britain, others paſſed the Rhine, and ſeized on part of Helvetia, being afterward called Suiti and Suiceri, which Name ſtill continues; but to ſpeak impartially, the Suicers with more probability ſome derive from the Suevi, but Abbo Floracenſis in the Life of King Edmund, calls the Jutæ by the Name of Viti, and this is not to be neglected that the Grandfather of Hengiſt is called Vitta; and Sir Henry Spelman upon other Quotations, approves the reading of the Word Witi: W and Gu being ordinarily uſed for each other, as in the Word William and Guilielmus. The Jutæ therefore being the ſame with the Gutæ or Getæ, the ſame Original of Name, whether from ᵹeaꞇ a Gyant, or from their Goodneſs the Reader may call to mind what we have ſaid in another place. Theirs was far more ancient than either that of the Angles or Saxons. As for the Saxons, Iſidore was ſo good a Latiniſt, and had ſo little skill in the Teutonick Tongues, as to derive their Name from Saxum a Stone, becauſe they were an hard and robuſt Nation, excelling all others in Piracy. Others fetch'd it from Aſchanes the Son of Gomer, but with what tolerable Reaſon we are to ſeek. Doubtleſs the Name as well as the People was Gothick, and as to this, ſeveral there are who would have them called Saxones as Sacaſones, viz. the Sons or Children of the Sacæ, deriving them from this People, which they ſay made Incurſions into Bactriana, Armenia, Cappadocia, the Hercinian Foreſt, and alſo into Germany. But of their Inroad into Germany they can bring no proof, and as for the word ꞅaex is the Name of a Saxon, not ꞅeaxꞅon in the Singular Number, whereof ꞅaexen is the Plural. Others fetch the Name from the ſlaughter of the Thuringi, with whom this People having War, hid their long Knives under their Clothes, and with them called ꞅeaxen when they were at a Treaty baſely cut the Throats of the Thuringi, who expected no ſuch Treachery, and thence being before called Cimbri, obtained this Name of Saxons.

Fabricius Chemnicenſis de orig Saxon. Lib. 1.

The Saxons Derivation.

Vide Ciſnerum in Præf. ad Krantzium. Sheringhamum ut prius, c. 11.

20. It's to be imagined that he that firſt mentioned this had read of Nemeꞇ coun ꞅeaxen, what the Saxons did with the Britains on Saliſbury Plain, and it's well his Learning was not ſo Britiſh, as to make them firſt called Saxons from that baſe Action here; but it was not much better, for they had that Name, as ſeveral Learned Men have evinced, long before this Thuringian War, or the Name of the very Thuringians was heard of. Moſt therefore and with moſt Reaſon take their Name from Saex, which ſignifies a Knife, or a crooked ſort of ſhort Sword, having teeth like to a Saw, or from Seiſon or Saiſon, which ſignifies a Sickle, for that ſuch like Swords were in uſe with the Getes is very manifeſt, and the ancient Arms of Saxony (as Pontanus tells us, were two ſuch little Swords placed acroſs, the one over the other. This Derivation is as probable as can be brought in Matters that are conjectural, it were to be wiſhed we could ſatisfy our ſelves ſo well about the Original of the Name of Angli. Saxo Grammaticus derives it from Angulus Son of Humblus King of the Danes, but what it ſignifies, and of what Language it is, he doth not tell us; neither do we hear any thing of the Angles being in Denmark in theſe ancient times, we find ſeveral Marks of them, ſeveral Towns which took Names from them in Germany, as Ingolſtadt, Engleburg, Engelrute; and Ingelheim famous for the Birth of Charles the Great, but no footſteps of them in Denmark. Widiſcind a Saxon will have the Saxons called Angli from a certain Iſland placed in a Corner or Angle of the Orig. Francic. Lib. 2. cap. 2.

The original of the name Angli.

the Sea, which they ſubdued: Others more truly (ſaith Ciſner) interpret Anglia or England as an Angle or Corner of the World (but what is this to the purpoſe) and all theſe fetch the Derivation rather from the Latin than the German Tongue. Aventinus and Goropius Becanus will have it of German Extraction. Aventinus acquaints us, that Angel or Engel in this Language ſignifies three things, an Hook or Sling, an Hinge, and a Border or Limit, and hence in a general ſenſe, he thinks that Ptolemy calls them Anguli, and Tacitus Angili. Goropius makes choice of the firſt Interpretation, whereby is ſignified a Fiſhing or Angling Hook, as we even at this day call it, and he is of Opinion that the Saxons ſo called themſelves as Hooks which caught all that was in the Sea: And as for the Suevi Angli, they might well alſo have this Name, becauſe living near to the Sicambri and Ubii, they hook'd in all they could ſnatch from their Neighbours. Amongſt theſe Opinions (if one may interpoſe) I cannot ſee any Reaſon why the Names of other German Nations ſhould be German or Gothick, and this of theirs onely taken from the Latin; certainly this is no common, but an extraordinary thing; and I believe they were called Angili or Angli, before the Romans had much knowledge of theſe Parts, for certainly Tacitus did not give them the Name but found it before his time faſtned on them. In ſo Conjectural a matter where it is free for any one to declare his Opinion, I muſt confeſs I ſide with Ciſner, who believes the word to be German, but modeſtly rather agrees with Aventine, who deduces it from a general rather than a ſpecial ſignification and force of the word, leaving the choice thereof to the pleaſure of the Reader. From ſome accident in reſpect to their Habitation, they might be called Borderers at ſome certain place and time, and this might ſtick by them afterwards; or rather being, as we find, a Roving, Wandering People, it was not for nothing they roved and wandered, but for their advantage, to ſeek, doubtleſs, what they could farther ſnatch or hook in to themſelves. It's no ſtrange or unordinary thing for Nations, from their Preying and Rapine to receive Names.

21. So much for their Places and Names after theſe three People came into Germany. We muſt now look upon them all under the general Name of Saxons awhile, and ſee what they did till ſuch time as they Invaded Britain. For a long time we find them ſtrugling with the Danes, for the Cherſoneſus, or that Countrey called Jutia, in which Conteſt they had ſuch ſucceſs as War affordeth, ſometimes coming off with loſs, and otherwhiles driving out their Enemies; but at laſt they were quite driven out themſelves, and forced to leave that about which they had ſo long contended. But the very firſt Quarrel betwixt them was not about Jutland, but a Love buſineſs, if we give heed to what Krantzius writes, but what ſcarcely himſelf believed. One Sirublus King of Phinus or Finland, had a very fair Daughter, and on her Gram the King of Denmark and Sweden was ſo enamoured, that he muſt needs quit his former Wife, the Daughter of the late Swediſh King, whom he had conquered, and marry her. Yet was he not in ſuch haſte but that he could ſtay from Conſummating any Marriage quickly, you muſt know he was contracted to her now, and then departed into Norwey, whither his Military Affairs called him. Being there intangled in ſuch Difficulties as was judged he would hardly maſter, Sibdas began to repent him of what he had done, and Married his Daughter to Henry King of the Saxons, a People he knew to be fierce and Warlike, which would preſently be upon his Back, in caſe he Invaded Finland. But Gram was aware of the Plot, and having timely notice of what they were about, came upon them unexpectedly and quite ſpoil'd their ſport, killing the Bridegroom e'er he could enjoy the Bride, which he took inſtantly from her Father. This is the firſt mention made of the Saxons in the Daniſh Antiquities, and I aſſure you upon a very ſad occaſion. But this Feaſt, and eſpecially the laſt Courſe ſtuck in their Stomachs, they would ſpoil Gram's ſport alſo in Norwey, where they joyned with the Natives againſt him, and within a little time made him paſt mocking, ſending him after their good King Henry. Neither was it difficult for our Saxons, who long before this were potent at Sea, from Jutia to paſs into Norwey. But how, ſaith our Authour, doth time change all things! Then did the Saxons there Wage War, and Intermarry, whither now, a vigorous trade on the Coaſts of Germany flouriſhing in the hands of the Saxons, ſcarcely any would vouchſafe to Sail, who got their living upon the remoteſt Seas. But hence you may take a ſcantling of the greatneſs and ſtrength of this Nation by its Warring abroad, and thus being courted to Marriage and Alliances.

Sic Saxoniæ ſuæ Præfatur. Gentis Saxonum primordia & origiginem & (quas putant) Antiquitates, apud noſtros relegentem pudor occupat & confuſio faciei: ita puerilibus fabulis & anilibus deliramentis omnia ſcatent ut nihil in his ſibi conſtet, nihil quadret. Una eſt omnibus ſententia, aliunde profectam gentem, navibus à mari adventaſſe: Sed unde & quo tempore, non inter ſcribentes convenit, &c.

Henry their King kill'd on his Wedding day by Gram King of the Danes.

22. The

They loſe the poſſeſſion of Juteland.

And are beaten at Sea by the Danes.

22. The next King of the Saxons mentioned by Krantzius, is Sifrid, who lived in the time of Hadding King of the Danes, with whom he had ſome Skirmiſhes, but ſtill he kept poſſeſſion of Jutia, which was loſt by Hundinck his Son, who was worſted in a ſingle Combat, to which he was provoked by Roe the Daniſh King, who founded Roſchild a Town once famous in Danemark. From this time the Saxons never had the entire poſſeſſion of Juteland, though ſometimes the Dukedom of Sleſwicke, the principal part of it was in their Dominion. The next Adventure made by our Saxons was about another Love buſineſs, liking it ſeems in ſuch to intermeddle. Hother, you muſt know, the King of Sweden had a Miſtreſs he much affected, and a Rival one Balder, his Subject by Birth, and ſo in this reſpect his Inferiour; but Superiour to him in the Opinion of the People, which for his Magical tricks, as it ſeems, had fanſied him to be a God. To War they went, a ſuppoſed God, for a Mortal Woman; and he did not ſo confide in his Divinity, but that judging himſelf too weak for his King, he ſought to Gelder the King of the Saxons for aid, a Perſon that very readily complied with his Demands. Though the Saxons had now loſt Jutia, yet their Ships they had not, which had tranſported them into Sweden, but that that King's Fleet met them by the way and ſtreight ingaged them. Now, as our Authour obſerves, a ſuppoſed Divinity could not prevail againſt the Arms of poor Mortals. Balder is beaten and runs away. The Saxons ſtick to it, and are ſlain every Mothers Son: Which the Enemy perceiving, made a fair Funeral Pile of their Veſſels, and therewith moſt nobly and gently conſumed them. A Fact, doubtleſs to be compared with that Generoſity which Hannibal the Carthaginian ſhewed towards ſlain Marcellus. The next Act of the Saxons ſhewed but little of Generoſity. They would have hector'd Wermund the King of Danemark out of Jutia, being now very old and blind, and having a Son, in whom for his reputed Stolidity, he had no pleaſure. The Ambaſſadours in a jeering way offer a Combat betwixt this Son and their Maſters, which contrary to all expectation, the Fool accepts; nay, offers to meet in the Field both him and his Squire, and that with ſuch ſucceſs, that he firſt doughtily ſlew the Squire, and then his Maſter.

Another defeat.

23. By this means the proud Saxons were forced to ſubmit their own Necks to the Yoke which they had been fitting for others, though not long they continued in that condition. For ſhaking off the Yoke of Servitude again, in the days of Dan, the third of that Name, King of the Danes, they ſent another proud Challenge to them, either to pay Tribute, or to expect them to come and fetch it; but in this Adventure our daring Saxons were once again beaten. Here Krantzius ſatisfies the wonder of his Reader, why he ſhould ſo much hear of Sea Expeditions, and nothing of the Mediterraneous Parts; why the Danes ſhould ſtill come off with Victory, and the Saxons ever with loſs and diſcredit, a thing which did not ſo fall out in after times. He tells him there's no Body has written of theſe Matters but Saxo Grammaticus an Iſlander, one who made it his deſign to extoll the Danes, as all other Writers Greek and Roman have done by their Countreymen; had Saxo been a Saxon by his Countrey as well as by Name, he would have done the quite contrary, and not obtruded theſe Fables upon the World, but perhaps others as bad on the contrary ſide. Doubtleſs he is very fabulous and partial, and for that cauſe we refer the Hiſtory of theſe Northern Kingdoms to another Period, when he may have ſomething certain whereon to fix; but when we have certain footing as we have in the caſe of the Britains, Saxons, and others, then judge we it neceſſary to give the Reader an hint of Fables, though Fables, which by that habit we dreſs them in, and that diſtinction we put upon them he may eaſily diſcover from rational and probable Stories. Then comes Krantzius to write the Hiſtory of the Cimbri, which made War in Italy, and other places, which we have heretofore diſpatched in the Accounts we have already given of thoſe Nations, againſt which they made War. We have already told the Reader, that unto the Greeks and Romans the Saxons were firſt known, as well as others, by the Name of Cimbri; but ſo were all down to Gall, and even the Galls themſelves, of which Nation theſe Cimbri that invaded Italy and Greece, ſeem to have been. And whereas Krantzius ſaith they were Saxons, we ſhall grant them ſo to have been, in a large acceptation, as their Name was alſo communicated to all that inhabited, even as far as the Scheld.

24. After this he reaſſumes his Story of the War betwixt the Saxons and Danes. They paid Tribute to Fronte the Great, who reigned when our Saviour was born, and to his Son Fridleve as valiant and victorious as himſelf, but grudged to doe ſo to his Son Frotho a Child of but twelve years old. They rebell, and

Sect. 1.

They have the worſt again.

De Orig. Hamburgi vide Ciſnerum in Præf. Krantzio & præcipuè Lambecii Origines Hamburgenſes.

the Armies meeting, the Controverſie is referred to another Duel between one Starcater on the ſide of the Danes, and one Hama on the Saxon part, who came by the worſt, having his head cloven aſunder, from whom the Writer gueſſeth the Town of Hamburgh might receive its Name. Yet ſtill would not the Saxons reſt, but ſhortly after paſſing the Elbe (for they had loſt to the Danes all lying beyond that River) they were again overcome and loſt their Captain Hanef, from whom he thinks Hanofer might alſo receive its Name; and truly one as likely as the other. But for all this Swerting the other Captain of the Saxons would not be diſcouraged, and preſuming he ſhould doe nothing by force, betook himſelf to Wiles and Craft. He invites the King of the Danes to his Houſe, and then ſets it on fire, willingly therein periſhing like another Decius or Samſon, that thereby he might deſtroy his Enemy. The Sons of this Swerting took off his Son and Succeſſour from revenging his death, by giving to him their Siſter in Marriage, which procured ſo good an underſtanding betwixt them, that they lived lovingly with him in his Court for a long time, till ſtout Starcater returned thither. He (you muſt know) ſo rated the poor young King for harbouring theſe Snakes in his boſome, that to prevent ſtinging he knock'd them on the Head, notwithſtanding what their Siſter and her Children could doe to preſerve them. Yet could not he get any Tributes from the Saxons, who now ſtood upon their guard and ſtoutly defended their Liberty.

25. What was done in the mean time in the Iſland Countries by the Saxons, Krantzius complains that we are ignorant, blaming Tacitus for being too much tacitus in this Particular. He then mentions in ſhort what was done in Germany by Druſus and Germanicus in the time of Auguſtus, concluding, that thoſe they had to doe with were Saxons, although ſuch they be not called. After this he tells us another Tale of one Siwar a Nobleman amongſt them, who had got the conſent of the young Queen of the Danes; but one Haldan of Norway who had had a Months mind to her, but was diverted, by ſome Wars he waged with the Ruſſes hearing of the Wedding, came as Gram had done upon them on the very day, and cruelly ſlaying the Bridegroom, took the Bride away with him: And theſe are the Saxon Antiquities (and goodly ones they are) which Saxo the Daniſh Writer (in Name alone being Saxon) hath communicated to us; the reſt are buried in Oblivion. From theſe goodly Antiquities he paſſeth to what was done againſt the Batavi in the time of Veſpaſian, but inſiſts on this Subject but little, as unproper by his Confeſſion. Next he falls into a grievous Complaint that none hath tranſmitted to Poſterity the Actions of the Saxons in the Inland Countries, not doubting but that ſuch as had been ſo ſtout at Sea, would not be Cowards at Land, but have acted ſomething againſt or with the Turingi and Vandals. He doubts not but they had an hand in that War of the Marcomans, in the days of Marcus Antoninus, which affrighted the Romans no leſs than the Carthaginian Wars had done. But neither any of the Marcomans nor Saxons committed any thing relating hereunto to writing; we onely enjoy what the Romans wrote, which they did, as all other Stories, for the advantage and grandeur of their Empire, onely being ſilent as to the valiant deeds of their Enemies. We ſee a Man hath plainly the advantage of a Lion, becauſe a Man was the Painter. Could a Lion have painted, we ſhould have ſeen another kind of Picture. Of theſe things we may complain, but cannot amend them. Thus Krantzius Wittily.

They pay for their Leachery once more.

26. He farther obſerves, that till about three hundred years after the Birth of Chriſt, there is no mention made of the Saxons in any Roman Writer. The firſt that mentioned them, is Eutropius, and after him Oroſius, in the Reigns of Diocletian and Maximian. Eutropius relates how Carauſius being appointed to clear the Coaſts of the Armorican and Belgick Seas, which the Franks and Saxons infeſted, though he often took many Barbarians, yet neither gave up the Booty to the Provincials, nor ſent it to the Emperours, was ſuſpected for favouring of the Pirates, that he might rob them as they paſſed by, and for this reaſon being commanded to be ſlain by Maximian, took upon him the Purple at Bononia or Bulleign in Picardy. This is related by Oroſius in well nigh the ſame words, and by Beda in his Britannia, as he calls it. Here our Authour inſults upon two ſorts of Writers, as well he may; Firſt, ſuch as fetch the Franks from the Lake of Mæotis, in the time of Valentinian the Emperour, who was not yet born; then over thoſe who deduce the Original of the Saxons, from the times of Theodorich King of the Franks, who was neither in being two hundred years after: This is to be taken ſpecial notice of, that in thoſe days the Saxons exerciſed Piracy upon all theſe Coaſts, and that as well the Britiſh, as the Gallick; ſo falſe is that which ſome have affirmed, that before the coming over of Hengiſt, they were unknown to the Britains. For Claudian the Poet, inveighing againſt (a) Eutropius, about the year of our Lord 400, makes mention of their Inſeſting the Sea in general, (b) in another place of the Orchades, and in (c) another introduces Britain, ſpeaking how Stilico had Fortified her both againſt the Invaſions of Picts, Scots and Saxons. Moreover, (d) Sidonius Apollinaris, about the time of their coming into the Iſland, deſcribes moſt elegantly their Piracy, both in his Epiſtle to Lampridius, and in his Panegyrick to his Father-in-Law.

27. Moreover, in the Notitia of the Dignities of the Weſtern Empire, we have mention made of the Comes litoris Saxonici per Britannias, of the Count of the Saxon Shore throughout Britain. Now the Saxon Shore was all that Tract from the Cambrica Cherſoneſus on that ſide the Sea, as far even as the Weſtern Part of Gall, where the Saxons were wont both to rove and rob upon the Sea, and alſo land and make depredations on the Continent; and from this Shore it is, that a very Learned Man of our own will have the Count of the Saxon Shore throughout Britain, to have received his Title, denying that this Shore of Britain could be called the Saxon Shore, becauſe here they never landed, but onely robbed off at Sea. In a matter of truth we muſt be impartial, and affirm him ſtrangely overſeen when he ſaith that, * We reade not any where that the Saxons had at that time, either ſetled themſelves upon the Shores of Britain, or were wont to ſail thither, or that they infeſted any thing of Britain, except the Sea. From the verſes of Claudian lately cited, it ſufficiently appears that Britain, as he brings her in, did not fear the Saxon roving, but the Saxon coming, and how could he properly be ſaid to come to her except he landed? But Ammianus himſelf, whom that Learned Man ſo often cites, ſufficiently clears the controverſie, where he relates that a meſſage came, how Britain was extremely vexed by Conſpiracy of Barbarians, that Nectaridius the Count of the Maritime Tract was ſlain, and Buchobandes the Duke was circumvented by their Hoſtile lying in wait; now what Barbarians theſe were, is evident from his words which follow, that the Saxons were at this time wont to Conſpire with the Attacotts and Scotts; and in another place he writes, that as the Allemans did depopulate Gall, and Rhætia, and the Sarmatæ and Quadi Pannonia, ſo the Picts, Scotts, and Attacotts, vexed the Britains with continual miſeries. Can we imagine that theſe Rovers would not land any where, where they could get booty; and that Britain ſhould be ſo poor and beggarly, that it ſhould not afford them Incouragement, as well as the wateriſh places of Holland, and the barren Coaſts of Brabant? their aim, if they rightly underſtood their Trade, ſhould be to prey at Sea upon the Batavians, whoſe ground could ſcarcely maintain them, as at this day, and plunder the Land of Britain more fruitfull, affording more incouragement than the other. We find by Claudian they landed in the Orchades, and were the Orchades Iſlands more tempting than the Iſland of Britain? As for the opinion of Pancirollus, that the Britiſh ſhould be called the Saxon Shore, becauſe the Saxons were before called in by Vortigern to aſſiſt the Britains, and there inhabited, in thoſe times, it is a mighty overſight alſo, the Saxons being called in long after there was a Count of the Saxon ſhore throughout Britain in the times of the Romans. But it was but an overſight not worthy to be ſo charged with ignorance by that Learned Man, Pancirollus being ſufficiently known to have been excellently skilled both in Hiſtory, the ſeries of Times, and other Learning.

Infeſting Sea and Land.

28. That our Saxons then were great Pirates and Rovers at Sea, it's granted on all hands; but as one of our Learned Men denies they landed or made any abode in Britain, ſo another as eminent in things of this nature alſo, will not yield that before the coming of Hengiſt, they had ſo much as paſſed the Elbe, and ſeated themſelves upon that Shore betwixt it and the Rhine, ſo commodious for Riding of Ships and Navigation. He grants that in the time of Domitian, through the Tract of Belgica and Aremorica, they infeſted the Sea, as Eutropius witneſſeth, and, that the Saxons were a Nation active, in Piracy on all the Coaſt from the River Rhine to the City Donia, now called Danemarc, at ſuch time as they were called into Britain, as Fabius Ethelwerdus affirms in the ſecond little Book of his Annals. He denies not that they exerciſed Piracy in that Maritime Tract: but cannot yet, he ſaith, find that they fixed any where in the Continent of that Tract: For, whereas it is read in Zozimus, that the Quadi Part of the Saxons ſeized upon Batavia, having thence beaten the Franci Salii, and that Julian taking upon him the defence of the Salii, reduced the Quadi into obedience, he cannot aſſent

(a) Quantum te Principe poſſum
Non longinqua docent, domito quod Saxone Thetis Mitior.

(b) De 4o Conſulatu Honorii
—Maduerunt Saxone fuſo
Orchades.

(c) Me quoq; vicinis pereuntem gentibus inquit
Munivit Stilico.
Illius effectum curis ne bella timerem
Scotica, ne Pictum tremerem, ne littore toto
Proſpicerem dubiis venturum Saxona ventis.

(d) Iſtic Saxona cœrulum videmus,
Aſſuetum ante ſalem ſolum timere
Cujus verticis, &c.
Quin & Aremoricus piratum Saxona tractus
Sperabat, &c.

* Seld. in Mar. Clauſ. Lib. 2. c. 7.

Lib. 27.

Lib. 26.

Uſſerius in Primord. Eccleſ. p. 399.

Hiſt. lib. 9.

aſſent to it firſt, becauſe the Quadi were no part of the Saxons, and then becauſe (a) Eunapius Sardianus (whoſe Hiſtory (b) Zozimus rather tranſcribed than wrote one himſelf) neither ſaid they were Quadi, neither Canchi (whom Cluverius would ſubſtitute in their Rooms) nor Saxons, but Chamani; (c) Julian himſelf in his Epiſtle to the Senate and People of Athens, ſetting forth what he had done to the ſame purpoſe. But to this may be oppoſed, firſt, that they made many Inrodes, and theſe Inrodes made by them were not ſmall and contemptible, but to ſome extent; for (d) Ammianus Marcellinus writes, that in the days of Valentinian and Valens, the Coaſts of Gall were waſted by the Franks and Saxons, bordering upon them, each making excurſions as far as they could by Land or Sea, with grievous plunderings, firings, and ſlaughters of ſuch as they took Priſoners. And farther, the Saxones Baiocaſſini, or the Saxons of Baieux, are mentioned by Gregory of Tours, as ancient Inhabitants upon the Shore of Aremorica. It's not the opinion onely of Krantzius, that the Saxons long before their coming into Britain, had inlarged their Borders from Holſatia, on this ſide the Elbe, almoſt as far as the Rhine, but Aventinus placeth the Saxons between theſe two Rivers, even in the days of Auguſtus Cæſar. Some Eaſtward extend their Dominions through all the Sarmatian Sea, even almoſt as far as the River Tanais, which ſeparates Europe from Aſia. And an ancient Chronicle in Rhime alledges from other Books, much more ancient, that all the Countrey beneath Neomagus, was in old time called the lower Saxony, and that the River Scheld taking in its Waters from the Meuſe and the Rhine, was its Weſtern Border. To be ſure that after the removal of the Franks into Gall, by degrees they ſetled themſelves in their Seats, and not onely poſſeſſed the Maritime Coaſt betwixt the Elbe and the Rhine, but pierced into the inward Parts of Germany, on all hands is agreed. Theſe things ſpeak the extent of the Saxon Power; which indeed was ſo terrible both at Land and Sea (wherever they planted) that amongſt all other Nations, in the decay of the Empire, they by the Romans were moſt fear'd.

(a) In Ecleg. legat. ab Hæſchalio Edit. p. 8.
(b) Phot. biblioth. num. 98.
(c) Oper. Julian. par. 1. pag. 514.
(d) Lib. 27.

Lib. 5. c. 26.

Boior. Annal. lib. 2.

Vide apud Sheringham. cap. 2.

Are chiefly feared by the Romans.

29. We have now preſented our Saxons ready to take Ship, or their Keels for Britain, to which Voyage they were ſufficiently inclined, doubtleſs from the knowledge they could not but have of the Iſland. And ſo great inclination they had, that ſome there are who ſpeak nothing of an Invitation, but ſay like unwelcome Gueſts, as they proved, they came abſolutely without ſending for; yet partly becauſe they could not ſtay at home. For Ninius will have them driven by their Relations out of Germany, which another limits unto Friſia, as the Galls of old when their Countrey was not able to maintain their growing Multitudes, ſent out as to travell, three hundred thouſand of their Brood, to ſeek out new Habitations; ſo Geoffrey of Monmouth would have us believe it to have been the Cuſtome in Saxony, to ſend out their Numbers by Lot, to free themſelves from a ſuperfluous Multitude. But we have good ſecurity from Gildas, Beda, Paulus Diaconus, and many others, that they were ſent for over by Vortigern, whom Gildas calls a proud and unlucky Tyrant, and Witichind makes a formal Embaſſy to be ſent, as we have before related. Therefore William the Monk of Malmesbury will have both Cauſes to have concurr'd, which is not improbable. It pleaſeth them all (ſaith he) to ſend for the Saxons and Angli out of Germany, being valiant at their Arms, and a wandering People. Hereby would accrue double profit, for being invincible, they would eaſily beat back their Enemies; and hitherto being uncertain where to fix, they would take it for a mighty favour, if they might have but ſome rough and barren Soil, ſome dry and hungry Heath to inhabit. They never imagined they would act any thing againſt their Countrey, the freſh memory of this favour would ſo oblige them and ſoften the fierceneſs of their Diſpoſition. This Advice being approved, Ambaſſadours are ſent into Germany, men really of quality, who would worthily diſcharge themſelves of that publick Character. The Germans hearing they were courted to a thing which they themſelves a thouſand times had deſired, quickly condeſcended; the pleaſure they took in the Enterprize, ſpurring them on to all expedition imaginable. Bidding therefore farewell to the Places that bred them, and renouncing the Affections of their Parents, they commit themſelves to the favourable Gale of Fortune and the Winds, which in three long Ships, which they call Ciules or Keels, waft them into Britain. Now at this time and afterward they came from three ſorts of People in Germany, viz. The Angles, Saxons and Jutes.

Joh. Gerbrand Chronic. Belg. l. 1. c. 9.

Hiſt. Britan. l. 6. c. 1.

They take Ship for Britain being invited by Vortigern.

De Geſtis Reg. Angl. l. 1. c. 10.

30. For, almoſt all the Land which lies under the Northern Pole, becauſe it doth germinate ſo many Men (ſo the Monk plays with the word) is not undeſervedly called Germany, though diſtinguiſhed by many Limits of Provinces. Wherefore in like manner, as they whoſe work it is, are wont to cut off the Luxuriant boughs of a Tree,

Caſting Lots who ſhall goe.

Hengiſt and Horſa arrive with a ſmall, but valiant Company.

Tree, that it may have Juice enough wherewith to keep in Life the remaining; ſo do the Inhabitants by the Expulſion of ſome of their Number eaſe their Mother, leſt by feeding ſo numerous an Off-ſpring ſhe ſhould be exhauſted; but to prevent grudgings and diſcontent, they uſe Lots for deciding the Controverſie, who ſhall be ſent away. Thence is it, that the Men of that Land have made a Vertue of a Neceſſity, that ſuch as were driven from their Native ſoil, might by their Arms make themſelves room in foreign Countries, as the Wandals who formerly overran Africk, the Goths who poſſeſſed Spain, as the Lombards which ſtill inhabit Italy, and the Normans poſſeſſing that part of Gall, which they had won with their Arms, have called it Normandy. Out of this Germany then came firſt into Britain a ſmall Band of Men, but ſuch as made good its ſmalneſs by its Valour, two brothers of hopefull Inclinations, and not ignoble in their Countrey, viz. Hengiſt and Horſa, being their Captains. For they were the Abnepotes, or Great, great Grandchildren of that moſt ancient Woden, from whom almoſt all barbarous Nations derive their Pedigree, and whom the Nations of the Engliſh, madly fanſying to be a God, have by a perpetual Sacrilege conſecrated to him the fourth day of the week to this very time, and the ſixth day to his Wiſe Frea.

31. This is to be obſerved from what we have formerly ſaid, that ſuch as came over into Britain were of the Ancient Saxons, viz. thoſe peculiarly ſo called whoſe ſeats we have ſhewn, and of the Jutes and Angles. Ninius will have Hengiſt to have come out of an Iſland called Oghul, whether by it he means the whole Cimbrick Peninſula, or as Learned Uſher found in one Copy Angul, that is that part of the Cherſoneſus, which at this day is called Angleu, and gives a certain repreſentation of the whole Peninſula. But (a) others from the Chronicle of Leyden, will have Hengiſt a Friſian. John (b) of Leiden, in his Belgick Chronicle, affirms him to have been King of Friſia or Freiſeland, which he ſays was called Lower Saxony. Suffridus (c) Petrus contends, that he was the Son of Udolph Haro, the ſeventh Duke of the Friſians by Suana, the Daughter of Vetgiſt Prince of the Saxons; and adds that he led forth two ſeveral Colonies: the former in the two and twentieth year of his Age into old England near Jutia, where for ſixty two years he continued ſuſtaining his Company, partly by Tillage, and partly by a piratical kind of War: the ſecond in the eighty fourth year of his Age from that England into Britain, where he laſted not above four years dying in the eighty eighth year of his Age, which was of our Lord the four Hundred fifty third. But whatever he fondly talks of Books written in thoſe days upon theſe ſubjects by the Father of Hengiſt, and two I wot not what Dukes, our Learned Primate very rationally concludes, that if Hengiſt and Horſa were Friſians, they were born rather in the Daniſh Friſia, than in that which borders upon Holland. For in Danemark there is a Freiſeland, which in reſpect of the other Saxo Grammaticus calls the leſs in the beginning of his Hiſtory, being the moſt Southern Part of Southern Jutland, having on the Eaſt Old England or old Anglia, and on the South the Ancient Saxony, and ſeparated from both by the River Eidore, from which its Inhabitants are called Eiderſteds, as from the ſhore they inhabit Strand Freiſelanders. That theſe People were a Colony of the Friſians, the Agreement both of their Name and Language do teſtifie, as the ſame Saxo writes, and Ubbo Emmius affirms, that ſtill they retain through ſo many Ages their Speech uncorrupted, having ſo much affinity with the Engliſh Tongue, that it comes not nearer any Language of their Neighbours.

(a) Vorper Thaborit. Hiſtor. Friſ. l. 1. c. 8.
(b) Johan. Gerbrand.
(c) In Apol. pro Antiquit. Friſ.

In Primord. p. 397.

A ſupply from Friſia.

Hiſt. lib. 14.
Hiſt. Friſic. lib. 2.

32. Now if theſe Friſians were of one and the ſame Original, and agreed in their Speech both betwixt themſelves and the Engliſh, it's the leſs to be wondred ſaith the Primate, that the Friſones are alſo with other Nations, which gave Original to the Engliſh Saxons reckoned by Beda; the other are, beſides the Ancient Saxons, the Rugini, Dani, Hunni and Boructuarii, ſome of which might poſſibly come over amongſt the conſtant ſupplies which were ſent to Hengiſt, and the reſt out of Saxony; for that the main Body of the Colony conſiſted of the three Nations, Saxons, Angles and Jutes is univerſally accorded. Neither is there any other Teſtimony beſides this of Beda, that the Angloſaxons were of Friſian deſcent, for as for that which Emmius produceth out of Marcellinus, in the life of Suidbert, this Marcellinus is a forged Authour, diſcovered to be ſuch by Stephen White (one moſt knowing not onely in the Antiquities of his own Iſland, but of other Nations alſo) as Mailew the Great Patron of that Book himſelf confeſſed. But he produces another Proof out of Procopius, who writes that the Iſland of Britain was inhabited by three moſt numerous Nations, over each of which commanded its own King, theſe are called Angili Friſones, and Britones, having a Name near a-kinn to the

Lib. 1. Hiſt. cap. 10.

UMI

Iſland it ſelf. And what can you now farther require ſaith Ubbo? But Procopius meant nothing leſs than Britain; he wrote of Brittia, which in the ſelf ſame place in plain words he diſtinguiſheth from Britain, placing it betwixt Britain and Scandonavia, which he calls Thule. This ſhews us how to correct that Paſſage of Iſaac Tzetzes, the Scholiaſt upon Lycophron, which ſaith, that in the Ocean is the Iſland of Britain placed betwixt Britain which lies Weſtward, and Thule towards the Eaſt. And whatſoever the two Tzetzes Brothers, John upon Heſiod, and Iſaac upon Lycophron, have fabled concerning the Souls of the deceaſed, they being carried into Britain (as we reade it,) Procopius writes all this with Relation to Brittia.

When they landed.

33. We land therefore our Saxons in Britain, being ſuch as were deſcended from thoſe properly ſo called from the Angles and Jutes, though ſome of other Nations might poſſibly intermix in ſome of their ſupplies, and now let us enquire what time it was they were ſent for over. Thoſe of Holland and Freiſeland, ſay their 385 Paſſage happened in the three hundredth and eighty fifth year of Our Lord. Out of the Ancient Welſh Chronicles, Price in his defenſe of the Hiſtory of Britain, preſents us with this Chronology: From the time of Guorthigirn, till the Battel of Badon, when Arthur fought with and vanquiſhed the Saxons, paſſed 128 years: then from the Battel at Badon, to the Battel of Camilan, wherein Arthur was ſlain 22 years more are reckoned. Now the death of Arthur in the Britiſh Hiſtory is placed 392 at the Year 542, out of which Number firſt 128 and then 22 being deducted, 392 will remain to have been the Year of our Lord. But at this time the Britains were under the Command of the Romans, the yoke of whom though Zozimus writes that they caſt off, and made themſelves a free People; yet if ſo it was, this was but a rebellious fit of theirs ſuitable to what Gildas writes of them, for the Saxons came not to their aſſiſtence till they had petitioned again the Romans for Relief, and wholly ſubmitted themſelves to them again, and yet they were forſaken by them, and left to ſhift for themſelves. This is certain whatever Irenicus a German hath written, that the Engliſh Saxons on a ſudden paſſed over into England (Britain he means) in the Days of Valentinian, and killed the Romans every Mothers Son of them; their opinion is abſolutely to be allowed, who write that under Theodoſius the younger, or elſe of Martian his Succeſſour, this great Alteration happened in Britain.

Vide Uſſerium ubi ſuprà. p. 401. Germanic. Exeg. lib. 6. c. 37. Proſper, in Chronic.

On heoꞃa Daᵹum Henᵹeꞅꞇ ⁊ Hoꞃꞅaꝼꞃom ƿẏꞃꞇ ᵹeoꞃne ᵹelaꝺoꝺe Bꞃeꞇꞇa Cẏninᵹe ꞇoꝼulꞇame ⁊ hia, &c. Hiſt. lib. 1. c. 15.

The laſt Edition is mended by Mr. Wheelock, according to the beſt Copies, and the Saxon Tranſlation of King Alured, which runs thus,

Ða ƿæꞅẏmb ꝼeoƿeꞃ hunꝺ ƿinꞇꞃa ⁊ niᵹon ⁊ ꝼeoƿeꞃꞇiᵹ ꝼꞃum, uꞃeꞅ Dꞃihꞇneꞅ menniꞅcẏꞅꞅe ꝥ Maꞃꞇianuꞅ Caꞅeꞃe ꞃiceonꝼenᵹ ⁊ ꞅeoꝼon ᵹeaþha ꝼꝺe. ----ꝺa Anᵹeþeꝺ ⁊ Seuxna ƿæꞅ ᵹelaþoꝺ ꝼꞃam ꝺam ꝼoꞃꞅpꞃecenan Cẏninᵹe ⁊ en Bꞃeoꞇone com on þꞃẏm mẏclum ꞅcẏƿum ⁊ on eaꞅꞇ ꝺæle ꝺẏꞅeꞅ ealonꝺeꞅ eaꞃꝺunᵹ ꞅꞇoƿe on ꝼenᵹ, &c.

34. Therefore an Interliner of Ninius, who ever he was, hath placed the coming 428 of the Saxons in the year CCCCXXVIII, at the Conſulſhip of Fœlix and Taurus, in which Conſulſhip the Franks their Neighbours loſt to Ætius, the Count, part of Gall lying upon the Rhine, on which they had ſeized. To paſs by other foreign Accounts, which deſerve no credit, becauſe they contradict what Gildas clearly hints, that before the third Conſulſhip of Ætius, the Saxons were not called hither, Sigebert placeth their coming in the very year of his third Conſulſhip, of our 446 Lord CCCCXLVI. But the Latin Saxon Annals left by Cambden to Cotton's Library, 448 refer it to the year CCCCXLVIII. Fabius Ethelward, and with him the Annals written in the Engliſh Saxon Tongue, publiſhed by Wheelock lately, and by him called a Saxon Chronology, William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntingdon, Alanus de 449 Inſulis, Matthew Florilegus, and others aſſign it to the year CCCCXLIX, induced as Uſher believes by thoſe words of Beda, that in the year CCCCXLIX, from the Incarnation of our Lord (ſo the Manuſcripts have it, not as the Printed Books CCCCIX) Martian being the forty fourth from Auguſtus, together with Valentinian obtained the Empire, and held it ſeven years. Then the Nation of the Engliſh or Saxons, invited by the foreſaid King (Vortigern) paſſed over into Britain in three long ſhips. But it being evident, that Martian came not to the Government till the year following, their coming is either to be referred (as Florentius of Worceſter doth 450 it) to the Conſulſhip of Valentinian and Avienus, that is to the year CCCCL, or as it is in the Common Chronicle of Marianus Scotus to the Conſulſhip of Herculanus 452 and Aſperatius, which, as appears from the Faſti, fell into the year CCCCLII.
For Beda doth not mean, that juſt in the year that Martian was advanced, but within the compaſs of the ſeven years he reigned, the Saxons arrived in the Iſland, or rather within the five years, wherein he jointly governed with Valentinian.
For in the Epitomy of his Hiſtory, Beda ſignifieth, that in their times the Engliſh were ſent for by the Britains.

Where they landed.

35. What number they were which Hengiſt firſt brought over with him, is no where told us, but coming over but in three Veſſels by them called Ciules, by us Keels, by the Freiſlanders Schieulen, they could not be very many. They firſt landed, or as Gildas ſays, ſet their terrible Claws, on a place called Hip-wines-fleot, as both the Saxon Annals or Chronology, and Ethelward do call it, thought to have been Ebſfleet in the Iſle of Tanet, which Iſle being the Eaſtern part of Kent, as Kent is of Britain, ſeveral Authours affirm to have firſt been given up into their Hands. They ſhew'd themſelves ſo valiant againſt the Picts and Scots, againſt whom the Nation intended them, and ſo cunning withall for their own ends, that by the means and methods we have formerly ſhewed, they got ſuch footing in Britain, that of Friends they turned Enemies, and from Gueſts would be Maſters and Owners of all; and driving the poor Britains up into the Mountains, and barren places of the Iſland, or forcing them upon Rocks, or beyond the Seas into foreign Parts; the beſt part of the Countrey they ſeized, where their Poſterity at this day continueth, notwithſtanding what alteration was afterward made by the Danes and Normans, in its poſſeſſion of their however got Inheritance, their very Language, notwithſtanding too much altered by ridiculous affectation of worſe words, ſtill ſurviving. Having for a time conſidered them all as Saxons, now we ſhall diſtinguiſh them again, and acquaint the Reader what parts of Britain were ſeized and planted by each ſeveral People. Firſt then the Jutes, or ſuch as came out of Jutia, poſſeſſed themſelves of Kent, the Iſle of Wight, and part of Hamſhire lying over againſt that Iſle, where the River Vmble enters the Ocean; for though afterward it fell to the Province of the Weſtſaxons, yet in the firſt times of theſe Engliſh Saxons, the Inhabitants were called Jutnacynn or of the Nation of the Jutes. The Saxons, or ſuch as came out of Saxony, properly and anciently ſo called, came to be diſtinguiſhed into Southern, Eaſtern and Weſtern. The Southſaxons poſſeſſed themſelves of Suſſex, which ſtill bears their Name; not that they were ſo called in their own Countrey, but from the Situation of their newly acquired poſſeſſions. The Eaſtern Saxons obtained for their ſhare Eſſex, which ſtill bears their Name, with Middleſex, and that Southern Part of Hertfordſhire. The Weſternſaxons anciently called Genniſſi, got to themſelves that which we now call Surrey, all Hamſhire, that part excepted which we ſaid was ſeized by the Jutes, Berkſhire, Wiltſhire, Dorſetſhire, Somerſetſhire, Devonſhire, and ſome part of Cornwall; for, moſt part of it is ſtill retained by the Remainders of the ancient Britains.

S 2 to

Sect. 2.

The Poſſeſſion of the Jutes.

The Poſſeſſion of the Saxons.

The Poſſeſſion of the Angli.

36. The Angli, or thoſe that came out of Anglia (which Beda calls Angulus and ſaith it was ſo exhauſted by this Plantation, that to his time it remained deſolate, but it was afrerward repleniſhed by the Jutes, as we may perceive by Adamus Bremenſis) had the greater ſhare, and therefore it was reaſonable they ſhould give denomination to the whole, though there might be another occaſion. They gave Original to four ſorts of People, viz. the Eaſtern Engliſh, the Midland Engliſh, the Mercians, and Northumbrians. The Eaſtern Engliſh poſſeſſed theſe Provinces called afterward Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridge with the Iſle of Ely, and, as ſome think, part of Bedfordſhire. The Midland Engliſh inhabited Leiceſterſhire, which was ſubject to the Dominion of the Mercians. The Mercians by the River Trent, were divided into Southern, and Northern. Within the extent of the Southern Mercians were comprized the Counties of Lincoln, Northampton, and (what was once a Part of it) Rutland, Huntingdon, Bedford, the Northern Part of Hertford, Buckingham, Oxford, Gloceſter, Warwick, Worceſter, Hereford, Stafford and Salop. Within that of the Northern Mercians, the Counties of Cheſter, Derby and Notingham. Laſtly the Northumbrians, were they that lived beyond the River Humber, who were diſtinguiſhed into the Deiri and Bernicii. The Deiri dwelt in Lancaſhire, Yorkſhire, Weſtmorland, and the Southern Part of Cumberland, on this ſide the River Derwent. The Bernicii were Maſters of Northumberland (which at this day onely bears the Name of that large Kingdom,) the Northern Part of Cumberland with ſome Portion of Weſtmorland, contiguous to it, with the Biſhoprick of Durham, and the Southern Part of that we now call Scotland, lying betwixt the River Twede, and the Frith of Edenborough. For though the Name of Scotland came afterwards impoſed upon that Countrey, yet that the People inhabiting there, and poſſibly farther Northward were the Off-ſpring of the Engliſh is evident from their Language, which being Engliſh Saxon could not have conquered and over-powered the true Scotch, but by the great Multitudes of them that ſpake it.

An account of the Britains, that were expelled by thoſe New-comers.

37. Now laſt of all before we take our leave of this Subject, what Britains were expelled, by what other ſorts of New-comers, whether Jutes, Saxons or Angles, we ſhall inform the Reader, that of his own Countrey he may receive as full information as we can give him. Know then that Kent retains the old Name, being by Cæſar as well as others called Cantium, and as Cambden gueſſeth from a Gallick word, ſignifying a Corner, which the French ſtill call a Canton; for, a certain Nook or Corner in Scotland is called Cantir, the Inhabitants of another part of the Iſland are by Ptolemy termed Cantæ, the Canganæ in Wales were poſſeſſed of another Corner, and the Cantabri in Spain amongſt the Celtiberians, dwelt in another Angle. Certainly Kent is a Canton or Angle of Britain, looking toward Gall. And to take the reſt rather as they lay in the Iſland, than as we have named them in reſpect of their New poſſeſſours, Cornwall and Denſhire were before inhabited by the Damnonii or Danmonii ſo called in Britiſh, either from the Mines of Tinn, called by them Moina, or from their dwelling under Hills. Dorſetſhire belonged to the Durotriges, ſo named poſſibly from Dour or Duor water, and Trig an Inhabitant, the Coaſt lying for about fifty Miles full of turnings or windings upon the Britiſh Sea. Somerſetſhire, Wiltſhire, Hampſhire were the Poſſeſſion of the Belgæ, who as moſt hold paſſed over from the Belgæ, a People of Gall into Britain, being originally Germans, having paſſed over the Rhine. The Iſle of Wight adjoining, was probably peopled by them. The Atrebatii, who came alſo from the Atrebates in Gall, were Maſters of Berkſhire. The People called Regni of Surry (or Southrey from its Situation Southward from the River) Suſſex (or Southſex) and the Sea Coaſt of Hampſhire. The Dobuni of Gloceſterſhire and Oxfordſhire, ſo named from Daffen, ſignifying low places lying under Hills; their Succeſſours the Engliſh were termed Wiccii from Wic in Saxon, ſignifying a Creek, for they inhabited round about the Mouth of Severn, which is very full of ſmall Creeks and Reaches. The Cattieachlani, being as is rationally conjectured firſt called Caſſii, inhabited the Counrties of Buckingham, Bedford and Hertford. The Trinobantes, thoſe of Midleſex and Eſſex, rationally thought to have taken their Name from Tre Nant, or Towns in a Vale by the ſide of the River Thames.

The Trinobantes Cæſari; Trinoantes Tacito & Ptolomæo.

38. Next to the Trinobantes lived the Iceni (poſſibly ſo called from Iken a wedge in Britiſh) and poſſeſſed what was afterward called Eaſt-England, viz. the Counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge and Huntingdon. The Coritani ſpreading themſelves very far through the Mediterranean Part of the Iſland, inhabited as far as to the German Ocean, the Counties of Northampton, Leiceſter, Rutland, Lincoln, Nottingham and Derby. The Cornavii dwelt in Warwickſhire, Worceſterſhire, Staffordſhire, Shropſhire and Cheſhire. The Brigantes whoſe Territories were afterward contained within the Kingdom of the Deiri, held Yorkſhire, the Biſhoprick of Durham, Lancaſhire, Weſtmorland, Cumberland. The Oſſadini (who rather ſhould have been called Offatini, for that they lived beyond the River Tine) had their Habitation in Northumberland. The Gadeni were next to them, and were ſeated in that Countrey, which lies betwixt the Mouth of the River Tweed, and Edenborough Frith. All theſe were by degrees diſpoſſeſſed by theſe reſolute and hardy Incomers, and either killed or driven out of the Iſland, or forced up into Cornwall or Wales, which once ſignifyed all lying beyond the Severn, but afterward was much contracted, and when the Romans ruled in Britain, was inhabited by three ſorts of People, the Silures, Dimetæ and Ordovices, who held not onely the twelve ſhires as they now call them of Wales, but thoſe two alſo beyond Severn, viz. Herefordſhire and Monmouthſhire, which have been now long reckoned amongſt the Counties of England. What ſorts of People were diſpoſſeſſed by Jutes, Saxons or Engliſh properly ſo called, the Reader may diſtinguiſh by comparing what has been ſaid, and may farther underſtand by that to which we have now brought him, viz. a particular Deſcription of the ſeveral petty Kingdoms, theſe New Planters founded in the Iſland. Of which ſeverally according to the meaſure of our Intelligence.

SECT. III.

The Kingdom of the Jutes in Kent, from the firſt founding of it by Hengiſt, to the Conqueſt of it by Egbert King of the Weſt-Saxons.

The ſpace of three hundred ſeventy four Years.

Sect. 3.

Hengiſt made King.

456

455

1. Hengiſt the Son of Victigiſke, whoſe Father was Vitta (Veta, Wehta, or Withar) the Son of Woden, after the death of his Brother Horſa, was made King of Kent by his Followers, in the year of our Lord CCCCLVI, as Mathew Florilegus writes, or as all the Engliſh Saxon Annals conſent in the year CCCCLV; the ſame wherein the Battel was fought betwixt them and Vortigern the Son of Vortigern, about the very ſame time that Childerick the Firſt, King of the Franks, of the Race of the Merovingii, or the Son of Meroveus began his Reign; the Affairs of the Romans now every day more and more going down the Wind in theſe Parts, and the Goths and Suevi being together by the Ears about the ſhares of that Countrey.

Is beaten to his Ships by Vortimer.

But in another Battel he beats the Britains quite out of Kent.

407

2. This ſame year he is ſaid thrice to have fought againſt the Britains; but as the ſaid Flowergatherer tells us, was not able to reſiſt the skill and proweſs of Vortimer, but was glad to flie to the Iſle of Thanet, where being daily vexed with Sea Fights, at length the Saxons being ſcarcely able to recover their Boats, leaving their Wives and Children, returned into Germany. Henry of Huntingdon writes, that once he fled to the Iſle of Thanet, and once to his Ships, and ſent into his Countrey for ſuch as were gone away. If theſe Writers ſay he was beaten, we may be aſſured Ninius the Britain will ſwear it, who plies you with his Verbs Concluſit, Obſedit, Percuſſit, Comminuit, Tenuit, meaning Vortimer, (or Guorthemir as he calls him) his Welſh Bloud being up, as it had reaſon to flie out againſt theſe Infidels, theſe that were wretched Unbelievers themſelves, and like Miſcreants had broken all Faith and Covenants, and of Hirelings and Servants turned Tyrants and Maſters; who being called to protect, were now turned Deſtroyers, and with Fire and Sword proſecuted the Britains, the true and right Proprietours of the Countrey. But being thus beaten, he ſaith, they ſent Meſſengers into Germany to bring more Keels full of a great number of ſtout and luſty Warriours, and afterward fought againſt the Kings of our Nation. Sometimes they overcame and enlarged their Borders, other whiles they were worſted and driven back. And Guorthemir greedily fought four Battels againſt them, whereof the laſt was by Lapis Tituli upon the Shore of the Gallick Sea (ſtill called Stonar, as we ſaid, in the Iſle of Thanet) where the Barbarians were overthrown, and he remained Conquerour. They ran away to their Keels, and got fearfully into them like ſo many Women, and he died not long after. He of Huntingdon agrees with him as to the death of Gortimer (ſo he calls him) with whom, he adds, that the hope and ſucceſs of the Britains died. After this, Hengiſt, and Æſc his Son having received freſh Supplies out of their Countrey, and being much incouraged by the death of Gortimer, prepare themſelves for another Battel at Creganford. The Britains bring forth againſt them four Bodies of men, each conducted by a moſt valiant Captain; but coming to the Ingagement, find themſelves over-matched by the Numbers of their Enemies. For thoſe that were newly arrived being freſh, and all of them choice men, with their Axes and Swords ſo laid about them, that they made great ſlaughter of the Britains, who yet left not off till they ſaw their four Captains dead upon the place. Then being frighted and diſcouraged beyond belief, fled from Kent as far as London, and never after durſt come thither for to fight. That this Battel fought at Creganford (a Village in Kent, ſo called, becauſe ſituate upon the River Creke or Crey, about a Mile and an half from Dartford, in the Bailywick of Sutton Dartford, Hundred of Little and Leſneſs, lately of Sutton at Hone, Weſt Diviſion of the County, and at this day called Creiford) was fought in the year CCCCVII, wherein Leo the Elder began his Reign. Fabius Ethelward alſo teſtifies, beſides Florence of Worceſter, the Saxon Annals both of Chriſt-Church in Canterbury, and the other of Peterbrough continued, although in others it be referred to the preceding year.

A Maſſacre.

3. But Ninius tells us another kind of Tale of what happened after the death of Guorthemir, and after the Return of Hengiſt with his Troops. The Saxons then began to conſult how they might craftily circumvent King Guorthigirn and his Army. They ſent their Ambaſſadours to make a Peace and a perpetual League and Amity with them. Hereupon Guorthigirn called his Council, and conſulted what was to be done; the Reſult whereof was, that they would accept of a Peace, and with this Anſwer the Meſſengers returned. After this a friendly Meeting was agreed on, and Caution was given, that neither Britains nor Saxons ſhould come to the meeting with their Arms; the more to ſuffer their Minds and Affections to unite and ſtrengthen. But that moſt wicked Hengiſt commanded his Followers, that each of them ſhould carry his ſhort * Sword with him, ſaying, when I call to you and ſay Nemet cour Saxes, then draw your Knives (or Swords) and fall upon them courageouſly. But kill not their King, but for my Daughters ſake, whom I gave him to Wife, keep him ſafe, that he may redeem himſelf. The place was appointed, and they met together. The Saxons cunning Foxes ſeemed very kind, giving marvellous good words, and they ſate down man by man very ſociably. But Hengiſt, as he ſaid, gave the word, and all the three Hundred Noblemen (Seniores † he calls them) of Guorthigirn were ſlain, he alone being taken Priſoner and put into Chains. And for his life he was conſtrained to give them large Countries, viz. Eaſtſex, Southſex and Middleſex. Geoffrey of Monmouth tells us, that this Meeting was near the Convent of Ambriſis, not far from Saliſbury, where ‖ four hundred and ſixty Perſons were ſlain, the Bodies of whom were buried by Eldade the Biſhop of Glouceſter, with Chriſtian Burial, not far off in the ordinary place. The Chronicle of Leiden mentioned but three hundred Princes of Britain to have been ſlain, which account another of that Countrey follows in his Chronicle of the Low Countries, though he mentions in another place twelve, whom he calls Duces Britanniarum, as being the chief in Place and Dignity. But theſe Outlandiſh Writers confound the Affairs of Britains and Saxons. What they ſay concerning Hengiſt his being beaten out of Britain, and his founding the City or Caſtle of Leiden upon the Bank of the River Rhine, let the Reader remember what has been ſaid before, that we may not here again repeat it.

4. In the year CCCCLXV, Hengiſt and Æſc his Son again ingaged with the Britains at a place called Wippedsfleet, and therein indeed ſlew twelve Captains of their Nation, as both Fabius Ethelward, Florence of Worceſter, and the Engliſh Saxon Annals do teſtifie, theſe they might miſtake, for having been ſlain in the Maſſacre. But ſtill about that Maſſacre there is more variety of Stories. Geoffrey of Monmouth talks of Hengiſt his having aſſociated himſelf for this Enterprize, or Evil Merry-day, no fewer than three hundred thouſand men. As to the number of the ſlain, our Caxton and Johannes Major in his Scotch Hiſtory will have Hengiſt to have entered Britain with fifteen thouſand men, and John Harding will have the Saxons to have kill'd there near Saliſbury treacherouſly, one thouſand and threeſcore of the Britiſh Noblemen. A certain Scotch Chronicle agrees with Geoffrey in the number of four hundred and ſixty; and William of Malmsbury ſides with Ninius in the ſmalleſt number of three hundred. As for Hengiſt he having been the death of ſo many Britains, at length was ſlain himſelf at Coningsburgh near the River Dun in Yorkſhire, as we have told already, if that be true which the Britiſh Writers relate of him. There is a great ſuſpicion he came to ſome ſuch kind of end, becauſe the Engliſh Saxon Writers ſay nothing of his death, as neither of any of the Victories obtained by the Britains; what made againſt the honour of their Countreymen they conceal, but are zealous to publiſh their Conqueſts and Trophies. Matthew the Flowergatherer placeth his death in the year CCCCLXXXIX, and from him Ethelward and the Engliſh Saxon Annals differ but in one years computation. According to both their Accounts he reigned then thirty and three, or as Florentius Wigornienſis hath it thirty and four years; ſo falſe is that which Suffridus Petrus writes of his being but four years in the Iſland. He was by conſent of all, a moſt ſtout Warriour; cruel enough, and as cunning as courageous, knowing very well, in caſe the Lion's skin was too ſcant, how to piece it up with the Fox's. As his Brother had his Name from that Noble Creature we ſtill call an Horſe, ſo he from the Male of that Species intire as Nature leaves him, without any mutilation of Members. And he being a man deſerving Honour in his Countrey, from that great Planta-

Hengiſt is ſlain at Coningsburgh in Yorkſhire.

Pro veteri voce Hors utuntur hodierni Batavi Paerd, at equum integrum quem Franci vocant un cheval entier, nos Ston'd Horſe, dicunt Hengiſt.

---

* Ninio artavus, i.e. Cultellus, jubet Hengiſtus ut in medio ficonis ſui poneret. Fico verò theca eſt quæ Græcis barbaris etiam φικάελον eſt. Quippe brevis gladius apud illos Saxa vocatur. Unde ſibi Saxo nomen traxiſſe putatur.

† Ex Senior Lat. Signior Ital. Sennor Hiſpan. & Signieur Francic.

‖ Vel 480 ut alia exemplaria habent quæ Johannes Tinmuthenſis in vita S. Dubricii eſt ſequutus. Vide Uſſerium in Primord. p. 415.

Sect. 3. Plantation he ſettled in this Iſland, his Countreymen the Saxons might poſſibly give in memory of him that Animal for their Arms, which formerly were two little Swords or Seanes born croſs or Salter-wiſe.

Oſeric his Son ſucceeds.

5. To Hengiſt ſucceeded his Son Oeric or Oſeric ſirnamed Æſc, as Beda informs us, from whom the Kings of Kent, ſaith Matthew, to this day are called Æſc-kynges. Geoffrey of Monmouth tells a ſtory, how when Hengiſt was taken and killed in Coniſburgh, Oeta his Son ſhut himſelf into York, but was forc't to yield himſelf up to Ambroſe, who granted to him, and to Eoſa his Kinſman, who had alſo fortified the City of Alclud or Dunbritton, a Countrey near to Scotland; but though Oeric, Oſeric and Oeta being ſomething, yet this ſeems not the ſame with the Eldeſt, who came into Britain with his Father, with whom he was invited by Vortigern, as Beda writes, and who is ſaid to have begun his Reign alſo together with his Father over the Saxons (Jutes who by a general Name were ſo called) in the Kingdom of Kent. There is little or nothing more ſpoken of him, than that he reigned twenty four years, though ſome add ten to this number. The Monk of Malmesbury ſays he reigned quietly, Florentius of Worceſter, glorioſly, being content with the Dominions his Father left him, rather than ſtriving to inlarge them, though Henry of Huntingdon ſaith he did this too; but moſt dark are theſe times whereof onely the main things, as great Battels and notable Succeſſions are mentioned, ſo as Memory and Tradition could tranſmit them from one Generation to another. For who ſhould relate the many and conſiderable Actions which happened in this great Revolution? the poor Britains were maſſacred and driven from Houſe and Home: the Saxons were Heathens, nothing of humanity, nothing of civility or letters amongſt them. They took care how to get and hold their Poſſeſſions, nor thought at all how to tranſmit the method and courſe of their Exploits to Poſterity. They thought they ſhould doe bravely if they but leſt goodly Inheritances to thoſe that ſhould come after them; how they came by them they cared not whether ever they knew, ſeeing they ſhould leave them poſſeſſion, nine points of the Law, and a title written by the Sword's point.

Ethelwardus ſic, denique Æthelbyrht Eormenrices filius fuit, cujus avus Ochta qui prænominabatur Æſc, propter quod poſtea Reges Cantuarii Eſingas ſunt nomen ſortiti, ut à Romulo Romani, & Cecrope Cecropidæ, & à Tuſco Tuſci. Æſc quippe pater fuit Hengiſt qui primus Conſul & Dux de Germania fuerat Gentis Anglorum, cujus pater fuit Wightgels, avus Witta, proavus Wither, atavus Wothen, &c. Chron. li. 2. c. 2.

After him reigned Otha and Ermerick.

6. To Oſeric ſucceeded his Son Otha, to whom Sir Henry Savil in his Faſti gives twenty years, although William of Malmesbury tells us that Oſeric had for Succeſſours his Son Otha, and Otha's Son Ermerick more like to him than to the Grandfather and great Grandfather: that to them both are aſcribed fifty three years in the Chronicles; but whether they reigned apart or jointly together it's uncertain. But the Faſti now mentioned give to Ermerick nine and twenty years.

Then Ethelbert.

After them followed Ethelbert (or Egilbert, or Æthilbyrht, as ſome Copies reade him) who at his firſt coming to the Government was very contemptible in the eyes of his Neighbours, and ingaging in War with ſome of them, was once or twice worſted, particularly by * Ceaulin and Cutha, who beat him back into Kent, and ſlew, in a place called Wibbandune, two of his Noblemen, Oſlac and Cnebban, and with much adoe could defend what was leſt him by his Anceſtours. But when he grew older, and came to more experience in the World he grew more ſkilfull in military matters, and ſo plied his buſineſs, that he obtained Victory where-ever he engaged, and quarrels ariſing betwixt him and the other petty Kings, as one gave occaſion unto another, he ſubdued them all one after another, and by continual ſucceſs brought under all the Engliſh Saxon Nations except thoſe of Northumberland. This made him ſo conſiderable abroad as well as at home, that ſeeking for Alliances he was not denied, but obtained Bertha the Daughter of the King of the Franks, ſay ſome, or rather one that was of the Bloud-royal of that Nation. Now had he and his Court by more acquaintance with the World, and eſpecially by converſation with the Nation of the Franks, which had been civilized before, began to relinquiſh their barbarous manners, and the Queen being a Chriſtian, and having a Chriſtian Biſhop, by name Letard, attending upon her, by this means he became more ſuſceptible of that Impreſſion which was made upon him hy Auguſtine the Monk and his followers, who being ſent hither by Gregory the Biſhop of Rome, and finding better acceptance, no doubt, by reaſon of the Intelligence he might hold with the Queen, without much adoe brought him over to the Chriſtian Religion. Having aboliſhed Paganiſm, and brought in true Religion, that his Subjects might grow into a more civilized Body, like to the other poliſhed Nations of the World, he ſet upon making Laws, ſuch as moſt fitted their Temper, and ſuited with the preſent occaſions of the State. In making theſe Laws, Beda tells us that he followed the pattern of the Romans, and compiled them in the Engliſh Tongue, in the firſt place making proviſion for reſtitution Ethelwardo Æthelbyrht.

* Chronol. Saxonic. ad An. ᵹlxvii Ƕep Cƿeatin ⁊ cuꞅa Beꞅuhꞇon ƿiꞅ Ædelbẏꞅhꞇ ⁊ hinc in Cenꞇ ᵹeꞅlẏmꝺon ⁊ꞇƿeᵹen ealꝺ oꞅmen on ƿibbanꝺune oꞅꞅoᵹon Oꞅlac ⁊ Cnebban.

Who was converted to the Faith,

And made Laws in favour of the Church.

Juxta exempla Romanorum. l. 2. c. 5.

ſtitution to be made, in caſe a Church, Biſhop, or others in Orders were indamaged, reſolving to protect thoſe the Doctrine of whom he had received. He died on the twenty fourth day of February after he had reigned ſix and fifty years, in the one and twentieth year after the receiving of the Chriſtian Faith, the year of our Lord DCXIII, as the preſent Copy of Beda hath it, but as the Saxon Tranſlation of King Alfred about the year DCXVI, it being placed by the Faſti above mentioned, in the year following, which was the ſeventh of Heraclius the Emperour, and the firſt year of Boniface the Fifth, the Roman Biſhop, in the days of Clothair King of the Franks.

Then dyes.
613
616

Ða ƿæꞅẏmb ꞅẏx hunꝺ ƿinꞇꞃa ⁊ ꞅyxꞇẏne ƿinꞇeꞃ ꝼꞃam ꝺꞃih-ꞇneꞅ men-nẏꞅeneꞅꞅe, &c.

Edbald ſucceeds him.

7. To Ethelbert ſucceeded Edbald or Eadbald his Son, unlike him both in his Diſpoſition and Succeſs. He caſt off the Chriſtian Yoke and inceſtuouſly polluted himſelf by the Marriage of his Father's Wife, which was followed by a defection of thoſe People which lately had obeyed his Father. Yet by means of Laurentius the Succeſſour of Auguſtine in the See of Canterbury, he was reduced to the Faith, and left the Bed of his Step-Mother, but never could reduce thoſe Nations which had faln off, not being able to prevail with the Citizens of London to receive back Mellitus their Biſhop, whom out of an Heatheniſh Rage they had expelled. He was forced therefore to be content with his Kingdom of Kent, and never could recover that height of Power from which he was faln. He reigned, according to William of Malmsbury, four and twenty years, and was then, or is as ſome Copies, ſucceeded by Ercombert his Son begotten of Enima Daughter to the King of the Franks, who reigned the ſame number of years, and with better fortune; being famous for his Religion towards God, and his goodneſs towards his Countrey. He is indeed much commended upon the account of Religion, the Reformation whereof he much perfected, as we ſhall ſhew in its proper place. He Married Senburg the Daughter of Huna King of the Eaſt Angles, and having governed with great Commendation (though by ſome he is noted to have fraudulently uſurped upon his Brother Ermenred, whoſe Right was precedent to the Crown) four and twenty years and ſome odd Months, then left this World and his Kingdom to Egbert his Son, his death being uſhered in with an Eclipſe of the Sun on the third of May, and a grievous Peſtilence. Egbert either cauſed to be ſlain, or winked at the Murther of his Uncle's two Sons Elbert and Egelbright, and being not famous for any thing done (onely infamous for doing or ſuffering this) died after he had held the Royal Seat nine years. He being dead, Lotharius his Brother ſeized on the Kingdom, though he left a Son called Edrick, with ill luck as it happened. For Edrick for eleven years together would never ſuffer him to take any reſt, but perpetually vexed him with Stirs, Inſurrections, and Battels upon his own account, in one of which Lotharius received his Deaths Wound; for being pierced with a Dart he died as the Wound was dreſſing. Both he and his Brother were cut off after a ſhort continuance, as ſome obſerved, for their Uſurpation, Injuſtice and Cruelty. For Egbert as we ſaid procured the innocent Sons of his Uncle to be murthered: And Lothair is taxed for abuſing and deriding the Martyrs, (ſo they are termed) though he repented of the deed, and in way of ſatisfaction, granted to their Mother, part of the Iſle of Thanet, whereon to build a Monaſtery.

Lege Bedam in Hiſt. Lib. 2. c. 6. & Willielm. Malmesburienſ. de Geſtis Regu. Anglorum. c 1.

Then Ercombert.

After him Egbert.

Next Lothair.

Edrick follows, who was deprived of Life and Kingdom by Cadwalla King of the Weſt Saxons.

8. Lothair being removed out of the World in that manner, Edrick then enjoyed the Power, but onely a ſhort time, for before two years were well at an end he was both ſpoiled of his Life and Kingdom, and left his Countrey expoſed to the Luſt and Tyranny of his Enemies. Theſe were Cadwalla King of the Weſt Saxons, and Millo his Brother, who finding the Kentiſh Affairs all in a confuſion and out of order, reſolved to take the opportunity offered of invading it: But he found not the People ſo unprepared as he imagined, for they made a very ſtout reſiſtence, and after their Houſes had been burned, and their Countrey depopulated, gave them Battel with great Indignation. They had the better of them, and forcing Cadwalla to run for his Life, drove up his Brother Millo into a little Cottage wherein ſhutting up himſelf, and not daring to break through, fire they ſet to the Cottage, and therein burnt him alive. This did very much provoke Cadwalla, who, as appears from the Chronology or Saxon Annals, either ſtaid in Kent well onward of two years, or elſe invaded it two years together, and the later of them twice, to which they add, that he waſted not onely Kent, but the Iſle of Wight too, which was under the Juriſdiction of the Kingdom of the South Saxons. To revenge his Brothers death he raged with all manner of Depopulations and Cruelties againſt them, and ſo deſperate was the condition of Kent, that for ſix years it had no King except it were Foreigners that intruded.

Chronol. Saxon. ad An. Ꝺclxxxvi Heꞃ Ceaꝺƿalla ⁊ Mul Cenꞇ ⁊ ƿiᵹhꞇ ꝼoꞃheꞃᵹeꞇon.

Who being bought off, Withred Reigned.

intruded. In the ſeventh year Withred the Son of Egbert having by his great pains and induſtry taken off the Envy and Prejudice which lay upon himſelf and Family, and by Money bought off the publick Enemy, obtained to be King, and much ingratiated himſelf with his Subjects, who conceived extraordinary hopes of him. At home in his own Houſe he ſhewed all manner of reſpect and civility to his People, Religion he every way countenanced and promoted. Abroad he was famous for having inlarged the extent of his Dominions, and after three and thirty years continuance in his Government, dying full of Age and Honour, left three Sons behind him as his Heirs in due time and place, if need ſhould ſo require; the greateſt felicity which uſually is accounted can happen to Mortals.

To whom ſucceeded Edbert. Then Edilbert and Alrick.

After whoſe Death ſeveral Uſurp the Government.

But are driven into Baniſhment by Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons.

9. Of theſe his three Sons Edbert the eldeſt ſucceeded him, of whom nothing ill is recorded, though nothing good. After he had reigned twenty and three years he gave way to his Second Brother Edilbert, who reigned other eleven, his Reign being onely unfortunate in the accidental burning of the City. He dying after theſe eleven years, Alrick the youngeſt Brother took his place, and held it for four and thirty, the luſtre of his Reign, as his Brother's by the fire, being much obſcured by an unfortunate Battel, which he fought againſt the Mercians. So ſaith Malmsbury, if any ill Accident happen, it ſhall be ſure to be mentioned, but if any good luck or accident, it will be forgotten in Chronicles, whether ſo it be done on purpoſe and by deſign, or it ſo falls out through the badneſs of our Nature, through which it comes to paſs that the memory of good things quickly is obliterated, but any thing that cauſeth ſmart and ſorrow is never forgotten. But though this may be true as to matters that happened among themſelves, yet the Monk's Obſervation is much amiſs in reference to the Wars betwixt them and the Britains, their Annal talking aloud of their Victories, but wholly ſilent as to their Defeats. But in theſe three Brothers the Royal Kentiſh ſtock quite withered, the generous bloud was extinct, ſaith our Authour, and every impudent Fellow, whoſe bold Tongue had procured him Wealth, or Faction and Turbulency had rendred formidable, would aſpire after Tyranny, and dare to aſſume the Royal Diadem. Of theſe Edilbert or Pren having governed the Kentiſh men two years, to ſhew himſelf a King indeed would attempt greater things againſt the Mercians than he was able to perform, and being taken Priſoner by them was kept in cuſtody, whence not long after he was yet diſmiſſed by them, but could obtain no entertainment from his late Subjects, and to what end he came is utterly uncertain. After him one of the ſame Faction ſucceeded to his pitifull condition, and was King onely in Name for eight years more. The laſt of all was Baldrede, whom Malmsbury calls an Abortive Brat of the Royal Dignity, who after he had rather beſieged than governed Kent, for other eighteen years was by Egbert the King of the Weſt Saxons driven into Baniſhment. So this Kingdom of Kent, which from the year CCCCXLIX had ſtood for the ſpace of CCCLXXIV years became ſubject to another Juriſdiction. So writes William of Malmsbury. The end of the Kingdom of Kent is noted in the Faſti to have faln out in the twenty fourth year of the Reign of Egbert, the third year of the Reign of Michael Traulus Emperour in the Eaſt. The tenth of Ludovicus Pius who bore that Title in the Weſt. A. D. DCCCXXIII.

SECT. IV.

SECT. IV.

The Kingdom of the South Saxons in Suſſex. From the founding of it by Aella to the Ruine thereof.

Sect. 4.

1. THE next Kingdom that was founded by theſe New Planters in Britain, was that of the South Saxons in Suſſex by Aella, who as we have already ſaid with his three Sons landed in that Countrey, and for ſeveral years fought with various ſucceſs againſt the Britains. The place where he firſt landed is by the Saxon Annals called Cyrnenes ora, and Cambden tells us, that near to the Haven of Chicheſter is a place called Witering, where, as the Monuments of the Church teſtifie, Ælla the firſt founder of the Kingdom of Suſſex arrived. How he and his Sons cunningly drove off the Britains, who flocked to him at his landing, we have already ſaid, and ſtill inlarged their Bounds, till nine years after their Arrival, when another Battel was fought at a place called Merix desburnanſtede; where, though the Victory is ſaid to have been doubtfull, and the Saxon Annals are very unwilling to let him go out of the Field but with flying Colours; yet that his Victory was none, or ſuch as did much weaken him, appears in this that he ſent for new Supplies out of Saxony. Whereas he is ſaid in his firſt Ingagement with the Britains, to have beaten them into a Wood called Andreſleage; by the Annals the Reader muſt know that this Countrey in old times was hardly paſſable by reaſon of Woods. For the Wood Andradſwald, or Andredſleage, in the Britiſh Language Coid Andred, having its Name from Anderida, the City next adjoyning, took up in this Quarter an hundred and twenty Miles in length and thirty in breadth. Of this vaſt Wood are (or lately were) Remnants toward the Weſt, the Foreſt of Arundell, St. Leonard's Foreſt, Word Foreſt, Eaſt Grenſted, Aſhdown Foreſt, and Waterdown Foreſt.

The Countrey very full of Wood.

Cantiani & Suith-Saxones locum ſylvæ ad huc Walden appellitant: Neſcientes tamen unde hoc dimanavit Nomen; cum alii Welden, alii Wylden, ſed falſò vocitent: Nam Anglo Soxones Sylvam Walden ut nunc Germani, Wolden verò planitiem ſive arboribus appellitabant; ut in nominibus Cotteſwalden & Pothewolde apparet. Hæc Lhuydus f. 13. b.

Ælla King of the South-Saxons.

2. Ælla found it ſeems ſo much oppoſition, and was ſo long in ſubduing ſuch an Extent of Ground as would brace the Title of a Kingdom, that ſome Fourteen years he ſtaid without the Title of King, which at laſt he took by the Name of King of the South Saxons, in the fourth year of Eſc King of Kent, firſt of Anaſtaſius the Emperour, A. D. CCCCXCI. In the third year after the death Hengiſt, Huntingdon tells us, that new and great Supplies came to him out of his own Countrey, with which he went and beſieged a moſt ſtrong City called Andredeſwaſter, ſuppoſed to be that now called Newenden in Kent, in Latin Anderida, as in the Notitia of the Provinces, and in Britiſh Caer Andred, being that we now find to have given Name to the Wood of Andredeſleage. For the conſtant Tradition of the Inhabitants teſtifies it to have been an old Town and Haven, whereof they ſtill ſhew the Plot. Then is it ſituate by the Wood Andredeſwald, that took the Name from it, being ſeparated from Suſſex but by the River Rother. And laſtly becauſe the Engliſh Saxons ſeem to have termed it Brittenden, (as they alſo called Segontium an ancient Town of the Britains) or the Vale of the Britains, whence the whole Hundred adjoyning is named Selbrittenden. The Romans to defend this Coaſt againſt the Saxon Rovers, placed here the Band and Captain of the Abulci. Hengiſt after his Arrival being reſolved to drive the Britains quite out of Kent, and thinking it would much quicken his work to increaſe his Numbers by new Supplies out of his own Countrey, ſent for this Ælla out of Germany with a ſtrong power of Engliſh Saxons, and while he gave a violent Aſſault to this Town Anderida, the Britains out of the adjoyning Wood where they lay in Ambuſh, ſo fiercely fell upon him, that at length, after much loſs on both ſides, when he had divided his Army and routed the Britains in the Wood, and at the ſame time forced the Town by Aſſault, his Cambden in Cantio.

Sect. 4. his barbarous heart was ſo inflamed with deſire of revenge, that he put all the Inhabitants to the Sword, and levelled the Town with the very ground. The place lying thus deſolate was ſhewn (as ſaith Henry of Huntingdon) to thoſe that paſſed by many Ages after. Till the Friars Carmelites newly come from Mount Carmel in the Holy Land, who ſought for ſuch ſolitary places, built them here a little Priory in the time of King Edward the Firſt, at the Charges of Sir Thomas Albuger Knight, and preſently after there roſe up a Village, which in regard of the old Town demoliſhed, began to be called Newenden, or the New Town in the Vale. Thus Cambden in his Chorography of Kent.

3. Who when he ſpeaks all in one courſe of Speech of Hengiſt his ſending for Ælla out of his Germany, and his laying Siege to this Town, is to be underſtood with that diſtinction of time we have lately mentioned, not that after his coming he ſet preſently upon it, as the uninterrupted courſe of words would ſeem to intimate; for that it was after the Auxiliaries came to him, which arrived in the third year after Hengiſt's death, Huntingdon plainly affirms, and the Saxon Annals do confirm. The ſaid Writer tells the Story with ſome Circumſtances, but ſuch as well ſuit with a People unwilling to be turned out of their ancient Poſſeſſions, to be utterly ruined. He tells us the Britains upon notice of his coming flocked to the place like Bees; by Day they overmatched the Beſiegers by Wiles and lying in wait, by Night with Onſets; there was neither Day nor Night wherein ſome ſorrowfull Meſſage did not afflict the Saxons. But by each loſs they were but the more provoked, and the City they plied with continual Allarms and freſh Attacks; though the Britains were ſtill upon their Backs, and gored them with their conſtant Showres of Darts and Arrows. The Pagans therefore were conſtrained to intermit their work at the Siege, and retire back upon them, who then being more nimble of Body than their Enemy, betook themſelves into the Woods, and as the Saxons retired again toward the City, failed not to fall upon their Rere. By this means were the Beſiegers tired with their work, and great Slaughters were made of them, till ſuch time as they divided themſelves into two Bodies, that while one plied the Siege the other might divert and keep the other Britains in action. Hereby they did their work vigorouſly in both places, no interruption being given, but each Party ſolely intending what it was about, till the poor Beſieged being weak with hunger, and more violently than ever charged, could not endure another ſhock, were with their Wives and Children all pitifully butchered, inſomuch that not one eſcaped. And the Strangers becauſe they had received ſo much loſs, would not ſuffer the Town a Monument of their diſgrace to ſtand, but ſo deſtroyed it, that it was never after rebuilded: Onely the place of a moſt noble City is ſhewed to ſuch as paſs by; ſo the Archdeacon of Huntingdon, who calls this Town a moſt fortified City, a moſt Noble City, though the Tranſlatour of the Chronology or Saxon Annals hath interpolated the word Urbeculam, for which he had no ground in the Text.

Ad An. CCCCXC, Hær Ælle ⁊ Ciſſa ẏmbſaton Andredeſceſter, ⁊ ofſlogon ealle þa ðe ðar inne earðe ðan, ne wearð ðære forðon an Bryt to lafe.

Beſieges Andredeſceſter.

Which is taken and raced.

4. By the violence and ſeverity in this place uſed by Ælla, we may conclude there was vigorous oppoſition made by the Britains, who it ſeems, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of Hengiſt, kept ſome footing ſtill in theſe Quarters till after his death. This evidences that they were not eaſily beaten out of their Inheritances, nor ſheepiſhly quitted their Countrey, though perpetual Supplies to the very exhauſting of the places from whence they came, at length overpowered them: And pity it is we have ſo ſmall intelligence of ſo great and famous a Revolution. But, to return to Ælla, as he began his Reign with ſo terrible a blow to the Britains, ſo he followed on the courſe of valour and victory with ſuch ſucceſs, that as Beda teſtifies he had under his Power and Command all the Dominions of the Engliſh Saxons, being the firſt of theſe ſeven Kings he mentions who extended their Authority over all the Southern part of their Provinces, which was limited by the River Humber and the places adjacent. He Reigned twenty four years as the Faſti have it, or twenty ſeven as writes Henry of Huntingdon, and was then ſucceeded by his Son Ciſſa, or Sciſſa as ſome call him, who being mentioned the laſt of his three Sons which came over with him, it ſeems was the onely one that ſucceeded him, or elſe for his Courage and Prroweſs was appointed his Succeſſour, being indeed ſtill named with him by the Annals in any great or dangerous undertaking. After his Fathers death there is little memorable of him, but that from him a little Village or Hill, called Ciſbury in Suſſex, took it's

Lib. 2. c. 5.

Ciſſa ſucceeds him.

it's Name, where there is a Fort compaſſed about with a Bank rudely caſt up, wherewith the Inhabitants are perſuaded that Cæſar entrenched and fortified his Camp ; but the Name of the place ſufficiently teſtifies it was the work of this Ciſſa; and that he built the City Chicheſter, which though in Latin it be called Ciceſtria, and in Britiſh Caercei, in Saxon is read Ciꞅꞅanceaꞅꞇeꞃ or the City of Ciſſa. It lies in a Nook of Suſſex in a Champion Countrey. Yet before the Conqueſt it was of ſmall or no Name, known onely by a Monaſtery of St. Peter, and a ſmall Nunnery. But in the Reign of William the Firſt, as witneſſeth Dooms-day Book in the Exchequer, there were in it one hundred Hages; it was in the hand of Earl Roger of Montgomery, there being in it threeſcore Hages or Manſion Houſes more than there were before. Fifteen Pounds it paid to the King, and Ten to the Earl. But afterwards a Decree being paſſed in the days of the ſaid King, that the Sees of Biſhops ſhould be removed out of ſmall Towns to Places of greater Note and Reſort, it was honoured with the Reſidence of the Biſhop of the Dioceſe, which formerly was at Selſey, and by this and other helps began to riſe to ſome degree of eminency, which had been greater but that the Haven is bad, and ſomewhat at too great a diſtance.

Who builds Chicheſter.

Vide Cambdenum in Suſſex.

5. After Ciſſa Reigned ſome of his Poſterity, but through the Viciſſitude of Humane Affairs, or ſome defect in him or them, loſt quite that Power and Reputation, to which Ælla their Predeceſſour and Founder of the Kingdom had arrived. By degrees their Dominions leſſened, and after the Reigns of ſeveral inglorious Perſons, few of whoſe Names are now extant, they became a Prey to their Neighbour Kings, and were for the moſt part either ſubject to thoſe of Kent, or of the Weſt Saxons. Indeed the ſecond King that after Ælla had Dominion over all the other Engliſh Saxons, as far as Humber, was Ceaulin King of the Weſt Saxons, by whoſe greatneſs and Neighbourhood it's more than probable that the Fortune of theſe South Saxons was curbed and much abated. Then when the fortune of Ceaulin abated, grew Ethelbert the Kentiſh King, and their Neighbour on the other ſide, to that great Power whereof we have ſpoken, that Beda makes him the third, whoſe Arms and Authority extended as far as to Humber. By this means lying betwixt ſuch potent Neighbours, the Kingdom of Suſſex ſo dwindled, that after Ciſſa ſcarcely is any of their Kings mentioned, except Adelwold, whoſe memory continues upon this Account, becauſe he was the firſt King that imbraced the Chriſtian Religion. After him Brentius is mentioned: And Aldwin was the laſt, whom Ina King of the Weſt Saxons deſpoyled both of his Life and Kingdom. For after the decay of Ethelbert's greatneſs, and that his Son had made Shipwreck of that great Power he had, and could hardly defend what Hengiſt left them; this Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons got ground, and though it received ſome Checks and Rebukes, at length prevailed over all the reſt, as in due time and place will be diſcovered.

Cæteros penuria ſcriptorum vel fama obſcura recondit præter Regem Adelwold qui jure adhuc nomen habet, quia primus nomen Chriſti agnovit. Henric. Hunting. lib. 2. in fine, Qui autem Huntingdonenſi Adelwold aliis Adilwalch.

Aldwin the laſt King, deprived of Life and Kingdom by Ina King of the Weſt Saxons.

SECT. V.

SECT. V.

The Kingdom of the Eaſt Saxons in Eſſex, Middleſex, and part of Hertfordſhire. From the founding of it by Erkenwin, to the conquering of it by Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons.

The Space of Three Hundred and One Years.

Sect. 5.

Erkenwin. Slede. Sebert. Sextus. Seward. Sigbert. Sigebert.

1. THE next Kingdom in order after that of the South Saxons, was the other of the Weſt Saxons; but, foraſmuch as this ſwallowed up all the reſt at length, though we aſſign it here its place, it's moſt convenient in the laſt place to ſpeak of it. The next after it was the petty Kingdom of the Eaſt Saxons, in Eſſex, Middleſex, and part of Hertfordſhire. It was begun by Erkenwin, in the ſixteenth Year of Otho King of Kent, the firſt year of Juſtinian the Emperour, the Conſulſhip of Mavorſius, and the year of Our Lord DXXVII. This Erkenwin was the Son of Offa, he of Biedcan, he of Sigewolfe, Sigewolfe of Spoewz, he of Geſac, Geſac of Andeſc, and Andeſc of Saxnat. After Erkenwin ſucceeded his Son Slede according to Huntingdon, who by the Monk of Malmesbury, is made the firſt of theſe Eaſt Saxon Kings, and the tenth from Woden. He married Ricula the Daughter of Ermerick King of Kent, and Siſter to Ethelbert, by which Lady he had a Son named Sebert. This Sebert firſt received the Chriſtian Faith at the preaching of Mellitus, and his Monument they ſhew to Paſſengers in St. Peter's Church at Weſtminſter. He dying, his two Sons Sextus and Seward (Beda ſaith he left three) being always Pagans in their Hearts, baniſhed Mellitus from his Cure, but not long after ingaging with the Geniſſi, or the Weſt Saxons in Battel, they and all their Men were cut off. Sigbert ſirnamed the Little, the Son of Seward, ſucceeded them; and dying, left the Kingdom to Sigebert the Son of Sigebald, who was Brother to Sebert. This Sigebert being in amity with, and often uſing to viſit Oſrei King of Northumberland, was perſuaded to relinquiſh his Idols and be baptized, which done, he cauſed the Chriſtian Religion to be reſtored in his Kingdom.

Swidhelm. Sigher. Sebba. Sighard. Snefrede. Offa. Selrede. Swithede.

2. Having imbraced Chriſtian Religion, he was murthered by two of his Kinſmen (two Brothers) for obeying the Chriſtian Doctrine, which bids us paſs by Injuries, and forgive our Enemies, they which confeſſed had angred and provoked them to commit the Fact. After him reigned Swidhelm, the Son of Secbald, ſaid by Malmeſbury to have been his Brother, who alſo was baptized by Biſhop Ledda. He being dead, Sigher the Son of Sigebert, ſirnamed the Little, and Sebba the Son of Seward, held the Kingdom jointly together. Sigher died firſt, and left Sebba ſole King, who reigned thirty years, and at his death took the Habit of Religion upon him. He left two Sons, Sighard (who by Beda it ſhould ſeem was a Monk) and Snefrede, both who ſucceed him, though how long they reigned, or what they did we are ignorant. They both being dead, Offa the Son of Sigher, a young man of a pleaſant Countenance, ſprightly wit, in the flower of his Age, and extraordinarily believed by the People, for ſome time governed this Kingdom; but as Beda writes, left his Wife, his Lands, Kindred and Countrey, and going to Rome, there lived and died in Monaſtical life; Malmesbury ſaith, that by the Counſel and Advice of Kineſwitha, Daughter of King Penda, whom he had ſought in Marriage, being taught to breathe after Celeſtial loves, he went to Rome with Kenede, King of the Mercians, and bleſſed Egwin, Biſhop of the Wictii, and there being ſhaven, at his time paſſed to the heavenly Kingdom. To him ſucceeded Selrede Son of Sigebert, ſirnamed the Good, and reigned thirty eight years. He being ſlain, one Swithede reigned over the Eaſt Saxons, and in the ſame year that Egbert, King of the Vide Bedam in Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. c. 22.

Al. Sebbi.

Beda l. 4. c. 11. Nam ſubitò aſtante Epiſcopo & filio Regis ejuſdem ac monacho Sighardo qui poſt illum cum fratre Snefredo regnavit, &c. Lib. 5. c. 20.

the Weſt Saxons conquered the Kingdom of Kent, was by him alſo driven away and outed of his Royalty. Yet was London, and the parts about it, ſubject to the Kings of the Mercians ſo long as they continued. But ſuch end had this petty Kingdom of the Eaſt Saxons, which moſt commonly was under command either of the Mercians or Weſt Saxons, in the ſame year that the Kentiſh Kingdom was ſubdued, as writes the Monk of Malmesbury, but the Faſti continue it four years longer, and make it to be united to that of the Weſt Saxons, in the year of our Lord DCCCXXVIII. ſo that according to this account it muſt have continued (in this mean condition) the ſpace of three hundred and one years. Of the extent of the Reigns of the Kings there's little certainty, as alſo of thoſe of the Kingdom of the Eaſt Angles, therefore it is that no certain years can be aſſigned.

SECT. VI.

The Kingdom of the Northumbrian Angles in Britain. From the Founding of it by Ida to the Conquering of it by Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons.

The ſpace of Two Hundred Eighty One years.

1. THE Kingdom of the Northumbrians was founded by Ida, in the one and twentieth year of the Emperour Juſtinian, in the days of Childebert King of the Franks, the ſixteenth of Ermerick King of Kent, and the thirteenth of Kenrick King of the Weſt Saxons, A. D. DXLVII. His Anceſtours are thus reckoned, Eope (or Coppe) Eſc (or Eſe) Inguim, Angenwit, Alock, Beonock, Brand, Beldet, Woden, Fredlelaf, Fredeulf, Fin, Godnulf, Heata.

2. It muſt be remembred that Hengiſt after he had fixed his footing in Kent, ſent to Otha his Brother and Ebuſa his Son, Men of tried experience in military matters, under a ſpecious pretence of repelling thence the Picts and Scots, to ſeize upon the Northern parts of Britain. They being there arrived, at length with much labour and travel performed that for which they were ſent; for very often ingaging with the Britains in Battel, at length they brought them under, and forced them quietly to ſubmit unto their yoke. But if theſe two were Octa and Eoſa the Son, and Brother (for ſo it ought to be, and not the Brother and Son as we reade it in Malmesbury) of Hengiſt, of whom Geoffrey of Monmouth writes, that at ſuch time as Ambroſe took and ſlew Hengiſt at Coningsbourgh ſhut themſelves up in the Cities of York and Dunbritton, others tell other Tales concerning them. Geoffrey writes that after they had ſurrendred themſelves, Ambroſe granted to them part of the Countrey lying near to Scotland. Matthew of Weſtminſter, from thoſe Britiſh Writers, ſaith, that Ambroſe having laid ſiege to York, Octa being of opinion that he could not hold the place againſt ſuch a multitude, took advice with thoſe that were with him, and with the Nobility that accompanied him, came out of the Town and ſpake to this purpoſe. My Gods are overcome, and I am content that thy God reign who compells ſo many Noblemen to come to thee. Take us, and if thou wilt ſhew no mercy, bind us and uſe us as thou wilt, for we are willing and ready. With theſe words Ambroſe was moved to pity, and ſhewed himſelf mercifull to them: And by this pattern Eoſa and the reſt were moved to come in and ſubmitted to Ambroſe, who gave them a Countrey near to Scotland, and made a League of Friendſhip with them. Though he tells us of this Countrey beſtowed upon them here, yet in another place, and nineteen years after, he tells us another ſtory, that their Keepers being corrupted, let them out of Priſon, where they had led a miſerable life, and fled with them into Germany, whence with a great Fleet they returned, to the deſtruction of Britain. Hereupon his Uther Pendragon committed the Army of Britain to one Loth, a Conſul and a moſt valiant Man. But though he often gave Battel to theſe Strangers, inſtead of driving them out, they got ground of him; for the Britains would not obey him.

Galfrid. Monmuth. l. 8. c. 9. Ad An. 490.

Idem ad An. 509.

3. After this Uther Pendragon falling ſick, theſe Rovers ranged about the Iſland and made havock of all things without controll. This exceedingly provoked the King, who grieving that Church and State ſhould thus goe to ruine, ſent for the Nobles, and accuſing them of pride and idleneſs, vowed he would lead them againſt the Enemy though in that condition wherein he then lay. He cauſed a Litter to be provided, and marched with the Army towards Verulam, where the curſed Saxons at that time lay. Octa and Eoſa having word brought of the approach of the Britains, and how their King was carried in a Litter, they diſdained to go out and fight him becauſe he came in ſuch a poſture; they betook themſelves into the City, and out of ſcorn left the Gates wide open. Uther preſently cauſed the Town to be beſieged and the Walls battered, by which entring, his Men made great ſlaughter of the Saxons till they unbethought themſelves. In the Morning they came out in order of a Battel, challenging the Britains to fight, who courageouſly grappled with them, and many fell on both ſides, but after much contention and bloudſhed the Victory fell to the King of the Britains, and they that ſcorned him in his Litter, found his Orders and Commands ſo effectual and deadly that there they two loſt their Lives, and when they were dead, their Men fairly betook them to their Heels. With this Victory the King was ſo overjoyed (and well he might) that whereas before he was not able to ſtir Hand or Foot he could now riſe with a very little help, and was in a manner recovered. This Story ſuits not very well with what Malmesbury and others write, that ſo good an account was given of their pains in ſubduing the Northern Parts of Britain. But whether this end befell them, or that the Britains were forced to quit to them that Countrey near Scotland, which ſeems to be inwrapped in the Story of Ambroſius, their endeavours, or the labours of their followers at length effected what they intended, at leaſt in a good meaſure.

4. For, the Captains of the Saxons in theſe Countries ſtill more prevailed againſt the Natives, yet notwithſtanding would they not doe any injury to the Name of Kings by aſſuming that Title, but ſtill devolved the power in the ſame form of Mediocrity, ſaith Malmesbury, upon their Succeſſours; and in this kind of eſtabliſhment they continued for an hundred years lacking one, ſatisfying themſelves with the common name of Captains or Dukes, and truckling under the patronage and command of the Kentiſh Kings. But no longer would Ambition be ſtinted; either for that humane nature ever inclines to the worſt, or for that this Nation naturally was high and lofty. Therefore in the year of our Lord DXLVII and LX after the death of Hengiſt, the Dukedom was changed into a Kingdom, to which Ida was firſt promoted; a Perſon doubtleſs of moſt noble extraction, and in the flower of his age and ſtrength; but whether he invaded the Sovereignty, or by the conſent of others came to the Government I determine not, ſaith the Monk, becauſe the truth it ſelf is obſcure. But it's certain that his Deſcent was high and very ancient, and that by his unſpotted Life and excellent Morals he added much to the luſtre of his Birth. In War he was unconquerable, yet at home tempered his Royal ſeverity with an uncounterfeited mildneſs and ſerenity of mind. I could (ſo he proceeds) in this place ſet down the lineal deſcent both of him and others, but I am unwilling by the harſh ſound of barbarous words to diſguſt the Reader. But thus much I ſhall note, that whereas Woden had three Sons, Weldeg, Withleg and Beldeg, from the firſt the Kings of Kent derived their Pedegree, from the ſecond the Kings of the Mercians, and from the third the Kings of the Weſt Saxons and the Northumbrians, beſides two which we ſhall name hereafter. So this Ida, as I abſolutely find, being the ninth from Beldeg, and the tenth from Woden, continued fourteen years King of the Northumbrians.

Ida the firſt King.

His character.

5. Thus much William of Malmesbury concerning Ida, by which we may obſerve the incertainty of the Pedigree derived from this Woden, for whereas he will have him but to have had three Sons, the Continuatour of Florentius Wigornienſis mentions ſeven, from whom he draws the Genealogies of our Engliſh Saxon Kings, which the Reader may there conſult if he think it worth his while to attend to theſe incertainties. And whereas he writes uncertainly concerning his advancement, the Archdeacon of Huntingdon delivers it for a truth, that he was choſen to this Dignity by conſent of the great ones. He reigned with great commendations for the Vertues lately mentioned, and for his courage and diligence, twelve years, and built a Town called Bebanburgh, which firſt he fenced with a Palliſado, and afterward with a Wall. From Beda, it ſhould ſeem, that he called it ſo from his Wiſe, for he writes that it had its name from one Queen Bebba. It

Pag. 688. Edit. Francofurti MDCI. qua præter Matth. Florilegum continetur Florentius Vigornienſis.

He builds Bebanburgh.

Hiſt. l. 3. c. 6.

Cambden.

It is at this day called Bamborough in Northumberland (not Dunſtaburg, as ſome have imagined) being in the days of Honeden, as he writes, a moſt ſtrong City, but ſmall, containing the ſpace of two or three Fields, having one hollow entrance raiſed with ſtairs, in a wonderfull manner, on the aſſent of an Hill. It had a very fair Church, and Weſtward on the top there was a well ſet out with marvellous Art, ſweet to the Taſte, and moſt pleaſant to the Eye. At this day it is counted a Caſtle rather than a City, yet ſo big and large, that it may ſeem to match with ſome Cities. In it did William Rufus Beſiege Mowbray, who lurked in it, and at length eſcaped. It was much defaced in the Civil Wars by Breſſy a Norman, who ſided with the Houſe of Lancaſter, and ſince that has been almoſt quite ruined, partly by time which conſumeth all things, and by the Winds which have driven an incredible deal of Sand of the Sea into the Fortreſs. To it adjoyneth Humildon, where was born John Duns, by miſtake called Scotus, the ſubtile Doctor, who falling into a fit of an Apoplexy, and in his Man's abſence buried for dead, came again to himſelf, and daſhed his Brains out againſt the ſtones, being hence ſaid to have been twice dead, but once buried.

The Kingdom divided into Deiri and Bernicii.

The ſeveral Kings.

6. Ida by his Wife had ſix Sons, Adda, Ethelrick, Theodorick, Ætherick, Oſmer and Theofrede, and by his Concubines other ſix, viz. Oga, Alrick, Eccha, Oſbald, Segor and Segother, all who came into Britain (Matthew Florilegus tells us) with forty Ships, and landed at a place called Flemsburg; ſo that according to him, this Ida muſt not have been the Son of any of theſe Captains that Governed Northumberland before it had a King; but a mere ſtranger choſen for his Merit. The ſame Matthew writes, that after the death of Ida, the Kingdom of the Northumbrians was divided into two, whereof that next to England, and on this ſide the River Tine, as we have already ſaid, was called Deira, or the Inhabitants thereof Deiri, and the other lying beyond that River as far as Edenbrough Frith had the name of Bernicia, as the Inhabitants Bernicii. In Deira, or the hithermoſt Province, Ælla ſucceeded, the ſon of Iſſi of the ſame ſtock originally, but in a * ſeveral Line deſcended from Woden: In Bernicia ſucceeded Adda the Son of Ida, where he Reigned ſeven years, being as little memorable as moſt of thoſe Princes that came after him. Ælla was a very induſtrious Man, and by his great Labour much inlarged thoſe Territories, to the Government of which he was promoted for the ſpace of thirty years. After his death, as Malmesbury writes, Ethelrick the Son of Ida, having ſpent moſt of his Age in poverty, and now gray, obtained the Kingdom, but therein continued not long, dying when he had Reigned but five years a miſerable Prince, and who would abſolutely have been buried in Oblivion, had it not been for the eminency of his Son Ethelfrid a young Man in years, but old in diſcretion and behaviour. In this mean time in the Kingdom of Bernicia, another informs us that Adda, the eldeſt Son of Ida, Reigned ſeven years, after him Clappa five, Theodulf one, Freothulf ſeven, Theodrick ſeven, and Ethelrick two, Ælla yet living. He being dead, and his Son Edwin driven out of the Kingdom, he Reigned five years over both the Provinces.

* Stemma ejus apud Florent. Wigorn. ſic ſe habet: Ælla filius iſti cujus majores Walſefrea, Wilgelſus, Watena, Seomelus, Suearta, Sæpugelus, Seabaldus, Siggeotus, Suebdegus, Siggarus, Weadegus Wodenus. Florentius Wigorn. ad Ann. 559.

Next Æthelfrid.

MathFlorileg. ad Ann. 595.

Florent. ad Ann. 593.

Who fights with Eda King of the Scots.

De geſtis Regum Angl. lib. 1. c. 3.

Beſieges Cheſter.

7. Æthelrick once dead, Æthelfrid his Son ſucceeded him in both Provinces, as both his Birthright and his Pains required; for by his Valour and Conduct, Eadwin the Son of Ælla was expelled, who lived in exile with Redwald, King of the Eaſt Angles, till ſuch time as by his means he was to be reſtored. The ſame Authour tells us, that Æthelfrid Married Acca the Daughter of Ælla, and by her had ſeven Sons, viz. Eanfrid, Oſwald, Oſwin, Oſlack, Oſwide, Oſa and Offa; to which Sons another adds a Daughter named Ebba. Æthelfrid, having obtained the Kingdom firſt with earneſtneſs, defended and ſecured his own, then fell upon what belonged to others. Many Wars did he prudently undertake, and as ſucceſsfully end, being neither given to lazineſs nor yet temerity; but keeping a Mean betwixt the Extremes, yet ever acted by a deſire of Glory. Of this is witneſs ſufficient, ſaith Malmeſbury, Degſeſtan, or the ſtone of Degs, a place famous in thoſe Quarters wherein Eda the King of the Scots, who envying the proſperity of Æthelfrid, forced him even againſt his mind to Fight, was not without great danger of the Conquerour himſelf, beaten and driven to flight. For Tedbald the Brother of Ethelbert, out of deſire to approve his Induſtry and Valour to his Brother, putting himſelf into extreme danger, left him a ſorrowfull Victory, being ſlain with his whole Party. The City Legio, now ſimply called Cheſter, is witneſs, which being to this time poſſeſſed by the Britains, harboured a People full of Pride and Contumacy againſt the King, which when he reſolved to Beſiege, the Inhabitants reſolving to endure any thing rather than a Leagure, and truſting, to their Numbers, went out thick and threefold to give him Battel, but fell into the Ambuſhes he had laid for them and were defeated; but the Monks eſpecially felt his Rage and Fury, who had flocked thither to pray for the ſucceſs of the Army. Of their incredible number ſtill in our Age, are ſufficient marks, the ruinous Walls of the Churches of the Neighbouring Monaſtery, ſo many turnings of Cloyſters, ſo great heaps of Beams and Rafters, as can ſcarcely be ſeen in any other place: It's called Banchor, at that time a famous receptacle of Monks, and now turned into a Biſhoprick. Ethelfrid, having all things ſucceeding thus according to his wiſhes, and deſirous to remove all occaſions of domeſtick Broils and civil Quarrels, baniſhed Edwin the Son of Ælla, a young Man of good worth, who wandering up and down, and in his adverſity, as generally it happens, finding but ſmall incouragement, at length came to Redwald King of the Eaſtern Angles, to whom deploring his preſent condition, he was kindly received; but preſently after him arrived the Ambaſſadours of Ethelfrid, requiring the Fugitive to be given up, or upon refuſal, War was denounced. Redwald, being by his Wiſe earneſtly moved never to break his Faith given to the diſtreſſed Prince, got ready an Army, and unexpectedly fell upon Ethelfrid, who abſolutely ſurprized was ſlain, while he manfully made reſiſtence, and ſold his life at a dear rate, killing Reiner the Son of Redwald before he fell. To this end came Ethelfrid, after he had Reigned twenty four years, a Warriour inferiour to none of the higheſt eminency, but utterly ignorant of the true Religion. By Acca his Wife, the Daughter of Ælla, and Siſter of Edwin, he had two Sons: Oſwald, a Child of twelve years old, and Oſwin but four; who when their Father was ſlain, were by the care of thoſe that brought them up ſpeedily conveyed out of the way, and carried into Scotland.

Baniſheth Edwin.

Who flying to Redwald King of the Eaſt Angles, is protected.

Thence a war wherein Ethelfrid is ſlain.

8. Thus much Malmsbury tells us of Ethelfrid, in ſhort, which as he confeſſeth he had from Beda. This Authour indeed calls him a moſt Valiant Prince, and one moſt deſirous of Glory, who more than all the Captains of the Engliſh, haraſſed the Nations of the Britains, ſo that he might ſeem comparable to Saul the King of Iſrael, onely he was ignorant of the true Religion. For no Captain, no King ever ſubdued more of their Countrey, and by rooting out or conquering the Inhabitants, made them either be poſſeſſed by the Engliſh, or Tributary to them. To him might that be applied which the Patriarch when he bleſſed his Son, ſpake as to the Perſon of Saul, Benjamin is a ravenous Wolf, in the morning he ſhall devour the Prey, and at night he ſhall divide the Spoil. Hence by his ſucceſſes, Edan King of the Scots, which inhabite Britain, being moved, came againſt him with a vaſt and ſtrong Army, but being overthrown, fled away onely with a few in his Company. For in that moſt famous place which is called Degſeſtan or the ſtone of Degſa, almoſt his whole Army was cut in pieces. And in this Fight Theodbald (Malmsbury hath it Tedbald) the Brother of Ethelfrid was ſlain, with all the Party of which he had the Conduct. This War was finiſhed by Ethelfrid, in the DCIII. year, from the Incarnation of our Lord, and of his Reign, which continued twenty four, the twelfth; the firſt of Phocas, who was then Emperour of the Romans. Neither from this time forward to this very day, durſt any of the Scotiſh Kings offer to fight againſt the Nation of the Engliſh. So much Beda, concerning this War betwixt Ethelfrid and Edan, as for what he writes concerning the Siege of Cheſter, and the ſlaughter of the Monks of Bangor, we muſt ſpeak of it in our Eccleſiaſtical matters, becauſe of a queſtion wont to be moved about it concerning Auguſtine the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. As for what he ſays, that none of the Scotiſh Kings durſt fight againſt the Nation of the Engliſh, to that day, it is to be underſtood till the year of our Lord DCCXXXI, where at ending his Hiſtory in another place thereof, he alſo ſignifies that the Scots which inhabited Britain, being content with their own limits, practiſed nothing againſt the Nation of the Engliſh, by craft or fraud. But farther, as to the death of Ethelfrid, Matthew of Weſtminſter, writes that Redwald challenged him to fight, and they met in the Countrey of the Jutes, Eaſtward of the River, which is called Idle. Thence ſaith he, came a Proverb at this very day in uſe, that the River Idle was defiled with the Bloud of the Engliſh. He adds, that Edwin had lived in exile with Redwald ſeventeen years. As for the place of the Battel, it was fought upon the ſaid River Idle; which ſpringing in the Foreſt of Shirwood runneth into the Trent, near to Idleton in Notinghamſhire. And whereas Matthew the Flowergather placeth this River in the Countrey of the Jutes (which we know not how it ſhould be ſo called, except the Brother and Son of Hengiſt, when they were ſent into the North, here planted ſo[illegible]e Colony)

the

Qui plus omnibus Anglorum Primatibus gentem vaſtabat Britonum. Eccleſ. Hiſt. lib. 1. c. 14.

Gen. 49. 27.

Ad Ann. 617.

the Archdeacon of Huntingdon writes, it was on the Borders of the Mercians, which ſuits well with this place in Notinghamſhire now mentioned.

Edwin King.

9. Ethelfrid being ſlain, Edwin came to the poſſeſſion of his Hopes and Wiſhes, viz. the two Kingdoms of the Deiri and Bernicii, in the ſeventh year of Heraclius the Emperour, in the days of Clothair the ſecond King of the Franks, in the firſt year of Eadbald King of Kent, A.D. DCXVII. Being of ſufficient years, and taught large Experience by his long Afflictions, he firſt ſetled his matters very well at home, and then began to look towards his Neighbours, all whom he compelled to truckle under him, and ſo far extended his Power or Authority, that of theſe ſeven Princes, which during the Heptarchy till the time of Beda, commanded the Southern Parts from the River Humber, he is reckoned the fifth in order, being in this reſpect ſuperiour to them all, as well as others hereafter to be mentioned, that whereas Limits or bounds to their Power were ſet by the River Humber, the Border of his Paternal Dominions, and they never pierced into his Power, reached through the extent of their Territories. Beda, to explain what he ſaid of the extent of his Power, affirms, that with greater might than any other before him, he ruled over all the People which inhabited Britain, as well Britains as Engliſh, theſe of Kent excepted; he ſubdued to the Command of the Engliſh Nation, the Mevaniæ Iſlands of the Britains, which lye in the Sea betwixt Britain and Ireland. Now whereas the preſent Copies of Beda reade it, Nevaniæ, Camden tells us, that Menaviæ is the right reading, and that Beda calleth two Iſlands by that Name, whereof one he terms Menavia Prior, which is Mona or the Iſle of Angleſey, and the other Menavia ſecunda, which is the ſame with that called Mona by Cæſar, Monoeda by Ptolemy (that is as one would ſay Moneitha, or the more remote Mona, to put a difference between it, and the other Mona, viz. Angleſey) by Pliny Monabia, and by Oroſius Menavia, the ſame which we call the Iſle of Man, being known to the Britains by the Name of Menow, and by that of Maning to the Inhabitants. As for what Beda writes of their ſituation, betwixt Britain and Ireland, The firſt Mona, or of theſe Menaviæ now called Angleſey, ſince it was conquered by the Engliſh, but anciently Mona by the Romans, by the Britains, Mon and Tir-Mon, or the Land of Mon, and Ynis Dowil, that is a ſhadowed or dark Iſland; and by the ancient Engliſh Saxons Moneȝ, lyeth over againſt the County of Caernarvan (which took Name of the chief Town therein, as the Town from the Iſland) being ſeparated from the Continent of Britain, but by a ſmall narrow Strait, and on all parts elſe is beaten upon by the ſurging and boiſtrous Iriſh Ocean. As for the other, or the Iſle of Man, it is ſtretched out juſt in the Mid-level, as Giraldus Cambrenſis deſcribes it between the Northern Coaſts of Ireland and Britain, and about it, namely to whether of the Countries it ought of Right to appertain, there aroſe no ſmall controverſie amongſt the Ancients, which was decided at length by this evidence, that it foſtered venemous wormes carried thither for trial, whereupon by a common cenſure it was adjudged to belong to Britain. Yet do the Natives both in Language and Manners come nigheſt to the Britains, yet ſo as therewith they alſo ſavour of ſomewhat derived from thoſe of Norwey.

Beda, lib. 2. c. 5. & 9.

Who adds to his Dominion the Menavian Iſlands.

The Situation of the Iſland Angleſey.

Of Man.

De iis Beda lib. 2. c. 9. Quarum prior quæ ad Auſtrum eſt & ſitu amplior, & frugum proventu atque ubertate fœlicior, nongintarum ſexaginta familiarum menſuram juxta æſtimationem Anglorum, ſecunda trecentarum & ultra ſpatium tenet.

10. But more of theſe Iſlands upon farther occaſion, let us farther inlarge upon what Beda ſaith in ſhort, concerning the Greatneſs and Power of King Edwin. The Monk of Malmesbury tells us, that the ſtiff-necked Northumbrians having ſubmitted themſelves, the ſudden death of Redwald was added to the heap of his felicity. For the People of Eaſt England, during the time of his Exile among them, having had good experience of diligence and vigour, unanimouſly ſwore obedience to him, who ſuffered the Son of Redwald (as leſs he could not doe out of gratitude) to enjoy the bare and empty Title of King, but he managed all things at his pleaſure. At that time all the Hope and Help of the Engliſh were in him, neither was there any Province in Britain, which obſerved not his Orders; and were ready to obey him, but onely thoſe that inhabited Kent. Them he ſuffered to enjoy their freedom and repoſe becauſe he had a great deſire to marry with Ethelburga, the Siſter of Eadbald their King, which Lady having long been a Suitour to, at length he obtained, whereby the two Kingdoms became moſt like, both as to Government, and the manners of the People. For upon this occaſion by the preaching of Paulus Edwin, after mature Deliberation, as we ſhall ſhew in its proper place, imbraced the Chriſtian Religion, and procured it to be received by his own Subjects. After this ſo great Bleſſings were heaped upon him, that not onely the Nations of Britain, as the Engliſh Saxons, Picts and Scots, but the Iſlands Orchades, and the other called Menaviæ, both feared his Arms, and adored his Power.

The Eaſt Angles ſwear obedience to him.

And with Ethelburga and his Wife Kent, and the neighbouring Provinces obey him.

er. Then was there no publick Robber, no domeſtick Thief, all ſuch as laid wait for the violation of conjugal Modeſty were removed afar off, the Invader of another Man's Inheritance was not to be found, a thing extraordinary, as to his Commendation, and in our Age. His Empire was ſo far propagated to this effect, that Juſtice and Peace flouriſhed together, and moſt happy might the State of the Commonwealth have continued, if immature death, the Step-mother, as the Monk terms it, of temporal happineſs, after a kind of ugly Sport, had not deprived his Countrey of him.

A Rebellion.

In which Edwin is ſlain.

His commendation.

11. His ſudden death as we are informed by Beda himſelf, was brought about upon this occaſion. When he had ruled the Nation both of Engliſh and Britains, moſt gloriouſly for the ſpace of ſeventeen years, whereof five of them he had fought under Chriſt his Banner, Caedwalla the King of Britains rebelled againſt him, who had drawn into his aſſiſtence a moſt ſtout Captain, viz. Peuda then King of the Mercians. They ingaged in a great and bloudy Battel at a place called Hethfield, where Edwin on the fourth day of the Ides of October, in the year of our Lord DCXXXIII. was ſlain, being ſeven and forty years old, and his whole Army was either ſlain or routed. In the Battel before him a moſt courageous Son of his called Offrid * fell, another called Eadfrid, neceſſity compelling him, went over to Peuda, who afterward in the Reign of Oſwal ſlew him, contrary to his Oath. To this end came this moſt valiant and prudent Prince, being as Malmeſbury writes a miſerable Spectacle of humane Variety, or that Viciſſitude which is incident to humane Affairs, a Prince whom the Courſe of his Actions and great Succeſs, ſpeak great both in the one Capacity and in the other. As for the Halcyon times which this People enjoyed under his Government; it will not be amiſs to note what Beda himſelf obſerveth of them. At that time, ſaith he, ſo great a Peace is reported to have been in Britain, whitherſoever the Empire of King Edwin reached, that (as yet the Proverb is) If a Woman with a Child in her Armes newly born would travell through the whole Iſland from Sea to Sea, ſhe might doe it without any Let or Moleſtation. The ſaid King moreover ſo much conſulted the Good of his People, that whereever he beheld any Fountains or Springs by the High-ways, there for the refreſhment of Travellers he cauſed Poſts to be erected, and brazen Diſhes to be hung upon them; neither would any body touch them except for their preſent uſe, either for the greatneſs of the fear they had of him, or of the Love they bare unto him. He was of ſuch eſteem in his Kingdom, that not onely in Battel were Banners born before him, but in time of Peace as he rode through the Cities, Towns or Provinces together with his Attendants an Enſign-bearer was wont to goe. Nay when he paſſed along in the Streets in all places, that kind of Banner which the Romans call Tufa, and the Engliſh Thuuf, were wont to be born before him.

* Cum Godbaldo Rege Orchadum, inquit Math. Florilegus Ad Ann. 634.

Lib. 2. c. 16.

The Conquerour's Cruelty.

12. Edwin being ſlain in Battel, the Provinces of the Northumbrians were in a moſt ſad Eſtate. Of the two Captains that overthrew him, the one being a Pagan, and the other as he terms him a Barbarian, both Religion and all things civil went to wreck; while the one raged againſt the Church, and the other againſt the Laity, of which he ſpared neither any Sex nor any Age or Condition, ſubjecting as well Women as Men, innocent Babes, as thoſe of ripe years to death, and moſt cruel Tortures, which continued no ſmall time; for Cadwall ſtudied how together with their deſtruction, he might root the whole Engliſh Saxon Nation out of Britain. And though a Chriſtian he was himſelf, yet did he not ſhew any reſpect to their Religion, the Cuſtome of the Britains, ſaith Beda, being at this very day to ſet at nought the Faith and Religion of the Engliſh Saxons, neither will they have any thing to doe with them more than Pagans. The head of the ſlain King was brought to York, and there depoſited in the Church of St. Peter, which he himſelf had begun, and Oſwald his Succeſſour perfected. All things being in confuſion in thoſe Parts, and no refuge or ſafety any where to be expected. Æthelburga the Queen returned by Sea into Kent, together with Paulinus the Archbiſhop, that brought her where ſhe was very kindly and honourably received by Eadbald her Brother. With Baſſus alſo a moſt valiant Souldier of Edwin's, went Eaufleda the King's Daughter, as alſo Vſcfrea his Son, and Iffi the Son of his Son Oſfride, whom their Mother afterward for fear of Eadbald and Oſwald, the Kings, ſent into France, to the King her friend to be brought up; and there they both died in their Infancy.

Beda lib. 2. c. ult.

Beda Hiſt. lib. 3. c. 1.

13. But after the death of Edwin, Oſrick the Son of Elfrick his Uncle by the Fathers ſide, obtained to be King of the Deiri, from the Province of whom he was iſſued, and had received his Royalty as well as Birth. On the Kingdom of

the

In Bernicii Eaufred obtained to be King.

Both ſlain by Cadwalla the Britain.

Who was afterward kill'd by Oſwald their Succeſſour.

the Bernicii ſeized Eaufrid the Son of Edelfrid, who in like manner was iſſued out of this Province. For during the Reign of Edwin, the Sons of Edelfrid, with many more of the younger ſort of Nobility lived in Exile, either with the Scots or Picts. Both theſe Kings abjured the Chriſtian Religion, which they had learnt, and profeſſed in baniſhment, and were ſhortly after cut off by Cadwalla the Britain, who now thinking the time might be come to drive the Engliſh Saxons out of their once unjuſtly obtained poſſeſſions, and to reſtore the Iſland to its ancient Owners, omitted nothing that might rationally tend to the bringing of this about. In the very Summer following the death of Edwin, he fell ſuddenly upon Oſrick, when he never expected him, and cut him off with his whole Army. After this he raged like a cruel Tyrant in theſe provinces for a year, at the end whereof, when Eaufrid came to him, but with twelve in his Company to treat of peace, he treated him in the ſelf ſame manner. That year, ſaith Beda, is ſtill at this day accounted unlucky and hatefull to all good Men, both in reſpect of the Apoſtacy of theſe Engliſh Kings, who renounced their Baptiſm, as for the leſs Tyranny of this Britiſh King. Whereupon it was agreed by all, that computed the times of theſe Princes, to aboliſh the memory of theſe perfidious Kings, and to aſſign the ſaid year to the Reign of bleſſed King Oſwald, who after the death of his Brother Eaufrid, coming with a ſmall power of Men, but fortified by faith in Chriſt, that curſed Captain of the Britains, with his vaſt Army which he boaſted nothing could reſiſt, was ſlain in a place which in the Language of the Engliſh is called Deniſesburna, or the Brook of Denis. The place, ſaith our Authour, is ſhewn at this day, and had in great Veneration, where Oſwald being to fight erected the ſign of the Croſs, and kneeling down, beſought Almighty God that he would Succour his Servants in this day of their Neceſſity. He himſelf laboured at the Erection of the Croſs, which finiſhed, he ſpake aloud to the whole Army: Let us kneel down and jointly pray unto the Omnipotent living and true God, that he would mercifully defend us from the proud Enemy, for he knows that we undertake a juſt War for defence of our Nation. The place is in the Engliſh Tongue called Heofonfeld, or Heavenly Field, lying near to the Wall which the Romans built from Sea to Sea, for the reſtraining the inſolent Inrodes of Barbarians.

Vide dicitur lædes Cadwallæ Diviſi curſus coercuit. Huntingd. l.3.

14. It's ſtill at this day for the ſame reaſon, as ſome would have it, called Haledon near to Sciliceſter, in the Wall in the County of Northumberland, where was a Church built in Honour of St. Cutbert and Kind Oſwald, but the Name of the King hath ſo obſcured the light of the other Saint, that the old Name being quite gone, it's now known onely by that of St. Oſwald. For the place where Cadwalla was ſlain, the preſent Printed Copy of Beda hath it Deniſesburna, and King Alfrede's Tranſlation Ðeniſſeſbuꞃna, but Camden read it in Beda, Devilesburn, a little River running into Tine, which gave to a Manſion Houſe upon it, the Name of Divelſton, as in old Records it's found written, now called Dilſton, belonging in his time to the Ratcliffs. After this Victory atchieved, Oſwald governed his Dominions with great Juſtice and Tranquillity, being ſo humble, ſo tender hearted, and bountifull to the poor, that he behaved himſelf indeed as a true Father of his Countrey. This his Goodneſs is ſaid to have been crowned with remarkable Succeſs, ſo that his Empire, he extended farther than any of his Predeceſſours; for as ſome write all the Nations * of Britain ſubmitted to his Command, not onely the Engliſh and Britains, but the Picts and Scots themſelves, which good Fortune did not puff him up, but he continued as humble and mercifull as ever. But that neither he nor any other good man might place his happineſs in this world, at laſt an alteration was made, and an end happened to him, contrary to his beginning. By his Induſtry and Prudence the Provinces of the Deiri and Bernicii, which formerly had diſagreed were lovingly and faſt united together. But in reference to his Neighbours abroad, matters ſtood in another poſture, who, however they might for a while ſubmit unto him, and acquieſce under his moſt mild Adminiſtration, yet it ſeems either counting this ſubjection, how mild ſoever it was, a ſlavery, or provoked by the Rulers of the Britains, and eſpecially Peuda the King of the Mercians, they were perſwaded (a great Party at leaſt) to revolt from their profeſſed obedience. The matter flew ſo high, that Peuda led his Pagan Subjects the Mercians forth againſt him, and they met at a place called Maſenfeld, where a great and moſt bloudy Battel being fought, he had the ſame ill fortune his Uncle Edwin had (whoſe Nephew he was by his Siſter Ava) being with Multitudes of his followers ſlain upon the place on the fifth day of Auguſt, in the thirty eighth (or the thirty ſeventh, as King Alfred's Tranſlation hath it) of his Age, when he had reigned nine years, as the Ancient Annaliſts reckoned, but Peuda and his Mercians rebell.

In the conflict Oſwald is ſlain.

Denique omnes Nationes & Provincias Britanniæ, quæ in quatuor linguas, (id eſt Britonum, Pictorum, Scotorum, Anglorum) diviſæ ſunt in ditionem accepit, &c. Beda.lib.3.c.6.*

Unde dicitur Campus Meſafeld ſanctorum canduit oſſibus. Huntingd. l.3.

but in this Number muſt be included that year which, as we formerly ſaid, the Apoſtaſie of the Engliſh Kings, and Tyranny of the Britiſh rendred ſo odious to them, as that they would not aſſign it to them, but rather aboliſh its memory. Peuda the cruel Pagan after he had ſlain him, contented not himſelf with his bare death, but having killed him, tore his Body in pieces and fixed it upon three Stakes as a Spectacle of terrour. The Place is at this day called Oſweſtre or Oſwalſtre, in Britiſh, Croix Oſwalds, a little Town upon the Weſt Frontier of Shropſhire, not far from the River Severn. It was not long ſince incloſed with a Ditch and a Wall, and it had very good Traffick, eſpecially of ſlight and thin Welſh Cottons. It ſeems to have had its firſt Original from Devotion to this King and Saint. But it was built by Modoc the Brother of Mereduc (as Caradoc of Lancarvan wrote) and the Fitz Allans being Normans and Earls of Arundell, who afterwards came to be Lords of it, walled it about. The Eclipſes of the Sun in Aries have been moſt dangerous unto it, for twice when that Luminary was in that Sign, did it ſuffer very great Calamity by fire.

Apud Cambdenum in Shropſ.

In Bernicia Oſwi.

In Deira Oſwin ſucceeds.

Who differ.

And Oſwin by the others command is ſlain.

His Character.

15. Oſwald dying in this manner, Oſwi his Brother ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of Bernicia, a young Man of about thirty years of Age; but Oſwin the Son of Oſrick obtained that of Deira in the third year of Ercombert King of Kent, in the Reign of Dagobert King of the Franks, A.D. DCXLIII. Theſe two Kings being thus as it were Partners in the Throne, agreed, as is uſual in ſuch Caſes. Differences were ever ariſing betwixt them, and at length grew to ſuch an height, as one could not ſubſiſt if the other continued. They raiſed Forces on each ſide; but Oſwin perceiving he was overmatched in Number, thought it not fit to fight, but to reſerve himſelf to better times; he therefore Disbanded his Army, commanding every Man to repair to his own Home from a place called Wilfares Dun, or the Hill of Wilfare, about ten Miles South-Weſt from the Village Cataracto. He himſelf withdrew, with one onely faithfull Souldier in his Company called Tondhere, to the Houſe of a Count named Hunvald whom he eſteemed as moſt ſure to him; but it proved far otherwiſe, for by him he was betrayed, and ſlain by command of Oſwi together with his truſty Tondhere, on the thirteenth of the Calends of Semptember in the ninth year of his Reign in a place called Ingerlingum. This Oſwin was a Man of a beautifull Aſpect, tall of Stature, Affable, Courteous, and very Bountifull, which Endowments both of Mind and Body procured him ſuch Reputation, that he was by all men beloved, and many moſt Noble Perſons out of all the Provinces thought themſelves happy if they could but get into his Service; but above all, his Humility and ſingular Modeſty were remarkable, whereof Beda gives us this Inſtance. “ Oſwin beſtowed an ex“ cellent Horſe upon Aidan the famous Biſhop of Lindisfarne, but the Biſhop
“ when a Poor Man asked Almes, gave him the Horſe with all the rich Furniture “ upon him. The King hearing of this, as they were going in to Dinner, ſaid to “ him: My * Lord Biſhop, Why would you give that Royal Horſe that was for “ your own Saddle, to a Poor Man? Have we not many worſe Horſes and other “ things which would ſerve the Poor, inſtead of this Horſe I made choice of
“ for your own Perſon? The Biſhop inſtantly replyed, King, what do you ſay?
“ Is that Son of a Mare more dear to you than that Son of God? With that they “ went in to Dinner, the Biſhop to his Seat; but the King being come from “ Hunting, ſate him down by the Fire with his Attendants. But remembring “ what the Biſhop had ſaid, he roſe ſuddenly up, and giving his Sword to “ his Servant, went haſtily to him, at whoſe feet he fell and beſought him “ not to be angry, affirming he would never after ſpeak or concern himſelf, “ whatever he gave of his Money to the Children of God. The Biſhop was “ wonderfully amazed, and riſing haſtily, raiſed him up; telling him he was “ very well pleaſed if he would but ſit down to Dinner, and be chearfull. The “ King then at his Requeſt began to be merry, but the Biſhop began to be “ very ſad, ſo as he ſhed Tears, of which his Prieſt taking notice, in their own “ Language (they were both Scots) which neither Oſwin nor his Servants under“ ſtood, demanded the reaſon. I know (ſaith he) that the King will not live “ long: For till this time I never beheld an humble King; whence I apprehend, “ that he will ſpeedily be taken away by Death; for this Nation is not worthy of “ ſuch a Governour. Not long after was this ſad Preſage of the Biſhop fulfilled in the Murther of Oſwin. And Aidan lived but till the twelfth day after his Death, dying himſelf on the laſt of Auguſt.

Lib.3. c.14.

* Domine Antiſtes, quod Rex Alfredus vertit; Min Domne Biſceop. Batavi hodie ſimiliter Sacerdotem titulo Domini ſalutant. Min Hlaford adhuc non erat in uſu, quæ compellatio in hodiernam, My Lord, tranſiit.

Sect. 6.

Oſwi and Peuda quarrel.

16. Oſwi having removed his Equal, whom he much grudged, yet did not find himſelf freed from trouble by that unworthy Act. He found continual fears and trouble from the Mercians, Peuda their King never ceaſing to caſt one Rub or other in his way. Yet paſſed there ſeveral Acts of kindneſs and indearment, as one would have imagined betwixt the Families. Peuda had a Son called Peada, who being a young man, for his good Endowments accounted worthy of a Kingdom, was by his Father appointed to the government of their Nation. He came into Northumberland to Oſwi, deſiring his Daughter Alkflede in Marriage, which he could not obtain except he and his Subjects received the Chriſtian Religion. He upon hearing what was preached concerning the promiſe of an Eternal Kingdom, the hope of a Reſurrection and Immortal Life, profeſſed himſelf a Believer, though he never ſhould obtain the young Lady, being much induced to this Belief by the Perſwaſions of Alfrid the Son of Oſwi, his Friend and Kinſman, who had Married his Siſter Cyniburg the Daughter of Peuda. Notwithſtanding theſe Alliances, Beda tells us, that Oſwi ſuffered frequent, moſt bitter and Intolerable Eruptions from the ſaid King of the Mercians who had ſlain his Brother. Neceſſity often inforcing him, he often preſented him with Gifts innumerable, therewith to purchaſe Peace, and prevent the utter ruine of his Dominions. The perfidious Prince did not conform himſelf to his Deſires, but reſolved to root out and deſtroy all his People little and great, which Oſwi perceiving, betook himſelf to Divine aſſiſtence, vowing, in caſe he obtained the Victory over him, to Conſecrate his Daughter as a Nun to perpetual Virginity, and to paſs over twelve Poſſeſſions for the building of Monaſteries. Armed more by Faith than any Carnal Hope he could have of Victory, he gave Battel to the Enemy, who is ſaid to have brought into the Field thirty times as many men, thirty Legions whereof each was headed by a skilfull Leader. Theſe Forces he and Alckfrid his Son ingaged with a very ſmall Army. He had another Son Egfrid by Name, who was at this time an Hoſtage in Mercia with Cinoiſe the Queen.

Beda, lib. 3. c. 21.

Ibid. lib. 3. c. 24.

17. Ethilwald the Son of Oſwald who rul'd in Deira, though he ought to have been aſſiſting to them, as good Beda obſerves, was at this time on the contrary ſide, and commanded a Party which was to ingage againſt his Countrey and his Uncle, but when they came to fight he withdrew himſelf, and in a ſafe place expected the event of the Battel. When they joyned, thirty Pagan Captains were ſoon ſlain or routed, and all the Auxiliaries in a manner cut off; amongſt whom was Ædilhere the Brother and Succeſſour of Auna King of the Eaſt Angles, who had blown the Coals betwixt the two Kings, and been the great Cauſer of the War. The Battel being fought near the River Viaved, which then through exceſs of Rain was overflown, it happened that more periſhed by the Waters than by the Sword. It was fought by King Oſwi in the Countrey of Loidis on the ſeventeenth of the Calends of December, and the thirteenth year of his Reign, to the great advantage of both the Nations. For he both freed his own People from the Hoſtile Invaſions of the Pagans, and the other of the Mercians and the Neighbouring Provinces, Peuda their Head being now cut off, he reduced quickly to the Chriſtian Faith. This Loidis is that eminent Town in the Weſt Riding of Yorkſhire, now called Leeds, which became an Houſe of the Kings when Cambodunum was burnt to the ground, a rich Town (ſo lately it was) by means of clothing. The very place of the Fight Writers call Winwidfield, which Name we may ſuppoſe was given it of the Victory; like as a Place in Weſtphalia where Quintilius Varus with his Legions was ſlain, is in the Dutch Tongue called Winfield or the Field of Victory, as Ortelius hath obſerved. The little Region or Territory about it, which Beda mentions, was in old time called by the Name of Elmet: and was conquered by Edwin the Son of Ælla King of Northumberland, after he had thence expelled Careticus the Britiſh King in the year of our Lord DCXX.

A Battel enſues in which Peuda is ſlain.

Regi Alfredo Ƿinƿæꝺe.

In Regione Loidis, on ðam lanꝺe ða Loidiꞅhaꞇꞇe.

Cambden.

To the joy of all men.

18. The death of Peuda, who had been the death of ſo many Kings, cauſed in all places out of his own Territories very great rejoycing, which as well the Affinity and Conſanguinity wherein ſeveral were conjoyned to them he had ſlain, may perſwade us to believe, as the Song that was made upon this occaſion. Oſwi ſo plied his buſineſs and followed on the ſtroak of his late Victory, that he brought to his beck all the Kingdom of Mercia for three years after the death of Peuda, together with all the other Southern Provinces (as his Brother before him had done) and the greateſt part of theſe belonging to the Picts. Yet was he ſo good natur'd as to beſtow on Peada the Son of Peuda, becauſe he had Married his Daughter, and was his Kinſman, the Kingdom of the Southern Mercians ſeparated from the Northern Mercians by the River of Trent, whereof the Southern in thoſe days contained five thouſand Families, and the Northern ſeven. But the Eaſter following Peada was murthered, and that as was reported by Conſpiracy of his Wife. Three years being completed after the death of Peuda, Immin, Eaba, and Eadberht, advanced to the Throne Wulfhere his Son a Youth whom they hid from danger, which done they revolted from Oſwi, whoſe Governours driving away, they valiantly defended the Liberties of their King and Countrey. Of Oſwi there's not much more remarkable. His good demeanour to his People in great meaſure obliterated that bloudy Crime of murthering Oſwin; but this Beda teſtifies of him, that with very great pains he maintained his Dignity, which is not onely applicable to the great Induſtry he uſed for attainment of that power, at which he arrived (he being the ſeventh of the moſt powerfull Kings amongſt the Engliſh Saxons, as his Brother Oſwald is by Beda reckoned the Sixth) but in relation to the perpetual troubles and dangers he underwent, not onely brought upon him by Peuda the Mercian King, but by Æthilwald the Son of his Brother, who by ſome is ſaid to have ſucceeded Oſwin, nay his own Son Athfrid; this being the ordinary Lot and Portion of men of bloud. He reigned moſt painfully twenty and eight years, and died on the firſt of March in the fifty eighth year of his Age.

In Winwed amne vendicata eſt cædes Aunæ, cædes Regum Sigeberti & Egrici, cædes Oſwaldi & Edwini. Sic Math. Florileg. ad Ann. 655. at vero Huntingdon hoc modo; In Winwed amne vindicata eſt cades Aunæ, cades Regum Sigbert & Ecgnice, cades Regum Oſwald & Edwine.

Peada his Son murthered.

Oſwi Dies.

Tranſlato ergo ad cœleſtia Regna Oſwaldo, ſuſcepit Regni terreſtris ſedem pro eo frater ejus Oſwi Juvenis triginta circiter annorum, & per annos viginti octo laborioſiſſimè tenuit, &c. Beda, *lib.*3. c. 14.

Florentius Wigorn. ad An. 673.

19. Oſwi being dead, Egfrid his Legitimate Son ſucceeded him in the third year of Conſtantine the Emperour of Conſtantinople, the ſeventh of Egbert King of Kent, during the Reign of Childerick the Second, King of the Franks, A. D. DCLXXI, or the year before, as Beda placeth it. His Father being ſickly toward his latter end, could not proſecute Wulfhere, who had ſet up for himſelf in Mercia, and therefore left to him a War as Hereditary, which he ſo proſecuted, as that he drove Wolfhere out of Lindſey, and recovered it again to his Paternal Territories. Thus much is onely hinted to us by Beda; how long he kept it is utterly uncertain. For Malmsbury falling foul upon him for his Impiety, ſhewed in the malitious proſecuting of Biſhop Wilfride, adds, that towards humble Suppliants he was proud and harſh, a Diſeaſe wherewith all Tyrants are infected; that on the contrary againſt Rebels he was ſluggiſh and lazy, and defacing the Triumphs of his Father loſt the Empire of the Mercians, and being beaten in Battel by Ethelrede the Son of Peuda, loſt alſo his Brother. In the ſecond year of the Reign of Egfrid, there was a wonderfull great Fight of Birds, many thouſands of them being killed, and the Foreigners ſeemed to be worſted. This might ſeem to betoken that great Fight which was fought eight years after near the River of Trent, betwixt Egfrid and the ſaid King Æthelrede; where, as the ſame Authour Beda tells us was ſlain, Eſewin the Brother of Egfrid, a young man very much beloved by the People of both the Provinces, whoſe Siſter by Name Oſtrith the ſaid Æthelrede had married. This Battel it ſeems did not, together with the young Prince's life, put a Period to the Controverſie. For Beda writes that more new matter of a more ſharp War and longer enmity aroſe betwixt the angry Kings and their People, till Theodore the Biſhop by his Diligence and Interceſſion took up the Quarrel, and prevented the dreadfull miſchiefs which thereupon would have followed; making this Agreement, that Bloud ſhould not be required for the Bloud of Elſewin, but his Brother ſhould be contented with a certain Sum of money to be paid by Æthelrede. And the Peace made upon this occaſion continued a long time betwixt theſe Kings and their Kingdoms.

Egfrid ſucceeds.

Who chaſtiſes Wulfere the Mercian for revolting.

Lib. 4. c. 12. Cum quibus & Edhadus in provincia Lindisfarorum, quam nuperrimè Rex Egfridus, ſuperato in bello & fugato Wulfhero detinuerat, ordinatur Epiſcopus.

Math. Florilegus ad Ann. 671.

Fights Æthelrede the Mercian King.

*Lib.*4. *c.*21.

An Agreement made betwixt them.

20. But though Egfrid had peace with the Mercians, and on this ſide the Sea, he was of ſo reſtleſs an humour, that finding no work in Britain, he muſt needs transfer his Arms over into Ireland, in the year of our Lord DCLXXXIV. under Command of one Berht, he ſent an Army over thither, and miſerably waſted that Nation, which was both innocent, and always moſt friendly to that of the Engliſh, neither Churches nor Monaſteries being any whit ſpared. The Ilanders or Scots did what they could, both by repelling force with force, and putting up their Prayers to Heaven for Divine Aſſiſtence. And although, ſaith he, Curſers cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, yet was it believed that they who were now deſervedly curſed for their Impiety, were ſuddenly puniſhed by the juſt judgment of Almighty God. For in the year following this King Egfrid, without any mature advice, leading out his Army to waſte the Countrey of the Picts, though

He Invades Ireland.

And is there ſlain with his whole Army.

To the ruine of the Engliſh.

Ex quo tempore, ſpes cœpit & virtus Regni Anglorum fluere ac retrò ſublapſa referri. Beda, l. 4. c. 26.

though his Friends earneſtly laboured to diſſwade him, and amongſt others, St. Cuthbert, who was newly then ordained Biſhop, he was by the cunning Enemy, who counterfeited a flight drawn within the ſtraits of unpaſſable Mountains, and with the greateſt part of the Forces he brought along with him, cut off, in the fortieth year of his Age, and the fifteenth of his Reign, on the thirteenth day, before the Calends of June. As I ſaid, ſaith Beda, his Friends adviſed him againſt this War, but as the foregoing year he would not hear the moſt Reverend Father Ecgberht, when he dehorted him from offering violence to Scotland, which had nothing hurt him, as a puniſhment to him for that ſin, it came to paſs that now he would not hear them who ſtrove to prevent his utter overthrow. And from this time it was that the hopes and valour of the Engliſh Empire began to decay and dwindle. For both the Picts recovered the Land of their Poſſeſſion, which the Engliſh and Scots, that inhabited Britain, held, and ſome Part of the Britains obtained their Liberty which they ſtill retain for the ſpace of forty ſix years. Amongſt many others of the Engliſh Nation, which were either ſlain by the Sword, condemned to bondage, or fled for their lives from the Land of the Picts, Trumwin the moſt Reverend Man of God, was one who had been a Biſhop amongſt them, but now came back with thoſe that belonged to him in the Monaſtery of Ebbercurnig, which ſtood indeed in the Countrey of the Engliſh, but bordered upon the Frith, which ſeparated their Territories from thoſe of the Picts. Theſe be the words of Beda, who diligently diſtinguiſhes in ſeveral places, the Scots that inhabited Scotland, from the Scots that inhabited Britain, but when he mentions Scotia or Scotland, he means onely one Countrey thereby, and that is Ireland.

Alfride ſucceeds him.

The occaſion of Egfrid's invading Ireland.

21. Egfrid being ſlain, Alfride or Aldfrid his Brother, and the Son of Oſwi, ſucceeded him, in the firſt year of the Emperour Juſtinian the younger, the firſt of Edrich King of Kent, in the Reign of Theodorick King of the Franks. A. D. DCLXXXVI. Malmsbury writes, that Oſwi had but two Sons, whereof the ſpurious being rejected, the legitimate ſucceeded him in his Kingdom, which was Egfrid; yet a little after, he tells us that Egfrid in the Battel fought with Ethelrede, the Son of Peuda loſt his Brother, and after this he writes, how the news of his Death flying all over, at laſt came to the Ears of his Brother Alfrid, who being baſe born, although the elder, was by the Nobility thought not fit to Reign, and either by conſtraint, or out of indignation, went into Ireland, where being ſecure from the hatred of his Brother, and having leiſure ſufficient to follow his Studies, he much bettered his mind by the precepts of Philoſophy. If he retired in this manner into Ireland, then from all theſe paſſages we may gueſs that the indignation and jealouſie of his Brother follow him thither, and hence it is that we may fetch the account of his ſending an Army into that Iſland. Therefore they who formerly refuſed him, now when they had need of him, and conſidered his worth, betook themſelves to Intreaties, ſo well ſatisfied was he with the preſent condition of his Life. But when he had once undertaken what was offered, he gave them no cauſe to repent them of their choice, being a Man mighty in the Scriptures, and ſo carefull of the Duty incumbent upon him, that for nineteen years he Governed his People in great Peace, and with as great Applauſe, having no other flaw in the whole courſe of his Adminiſtration, but what they find concerning his Perſecution of Biſhop Wilfride. Yet was his Kingdom contained within much narrower Bounds, than in the days of his Father and Brother. For the Picts making an inſolent uſe of their Victory, ſet upon the Engliſh, whom long quiet and eaſe had rendred leſs fit for reſiſtence, and made bold to juſtle them out of ſome of their Territories lying toward the North, or to ſubdue and bring them under their Yoke, though they ſtill inhabited theſe Countries. And never after could they recover their liberty, and reunite themſelves with the Engliſh their Brethren, by the Picts coming to be ſubject to the Scots, though their Language at this day ſufficiently diſcovers their Original.

Oſrede made King.

Is very debauch'd.

22. After Alfrede his Son, Oſrede was made King in the ſixth year of Tiberius Apſimarus Emperour; the twelfth of Withrede King of Kent, in the days of Childebert the ſecond King of the Franks, A. D. DCCIIII. He was but a Child of eight years old, but ſhewed himſelf ſoon enough to be of ſufficient Age to be vitious. He Reigned but eleven years, and was famous for nothing, infamous for his uncleanneſs, which could not be kept within the bounds of ordinary voluptuouſneſs, but extended to the very Cloyſters, where he violated the Virginity of thoſe that were, as their Relations imagined, ſecured againſt ſuch attempts by a Religious

Sect. 6.

And at laſt Murthered.

Kenred ſucceeds.

Then Oſric.

Next Ceolwulf.

Who turns Monk.

Veil. Theſe courſes brought him into ſuch hatred, even of his own kindred, that to prevent one ſin, they committed a greater by taking away his Life, when he hoped he had ſcarcely ſpent one quarter of it. Yet had they that removed him out of the way to take his place, ſupplied as well the want of Eminence and Vertue, as of Royalty, they might have been more excuſable, at leaſt it would have partly covered and concealed the blackneſs of the Parricide; but Kenred, who went after him took the Throne, and therein ſate for two years, and after him Oſric, who Reigned eleven, did nothing memorably, or which could call them worthy of that Dignity to which they advanced themſelves. Oſric indeed in this, had the advantage of the other, that he did not firſt leap into the Chair of the murthre'd Prince, and before his death, adopted Celwulf or Ceolwulf the Brother of Kenred for his Succeſſour. This is that Ceolwulf to whom Beda dedicates his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, at the end whereof he ſignifies, that this King was embraced with great difficulties, and how he would extricate himſelf, or what end they would have, was utterly uncertain. What theſe Difficulties were, he tells us not, either becauſe he would not burn his finger by medling with matters of his own time, or for that his deſign was to write an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory onely, which ſeems to have been his drift, for elſe he might doubtleſs have given up a more large account of what he has left, but a mere ſcantling, a few remarks, and thoſe but by the bye, as they were neceſſary to be brought in for making way to, or Illuſtrating ſome other matters relating for the moſt part to the Cloyſter. As for Ceolwulf, we are told he was ſo edified with what he read in the Hiſtory of Beda, that deſirous to be of the Number of thoſe Kings who had exchanged their Crowns for Cowls, he at length reſigned his Kingdom and betook himſelf to a Monaſtery. Or rather he was wearied with theſe difficulties he found in reigning, and however his Crown ſeemed glorious to the eyes of the Beholders, felt the weight of it ſo great, that he was not ſatisfied till he was eaſed of his burthen, which he caſt off from his Head after he had governed eight years, and in the Monaſtery of Lindeſfnare, took upon him the Monkiſh Habit. He was not deſcended from the Loins of the late Kings of the Northumbrians, but in another Line deſcended from Ida. He was the Son of Cutha, whoſe Fore-fathers were Cuthwin, Lethewold, Egwold, Aldelm, Oga and Ida.

Math. Florilegus, Henricus Huntingd.

Egbert made King.

Huntingdon Egbricht. Florilego Eadbert.

23. But he quitted not the Government before he had provided his People of another King. This was Egbert his Uncles Son, as Malmesbury calls him, but Huntingdon tells us he was the Son of Ecca, who was Son to Lethwold or Ledwold; and as he, as the Flowergatherer hath it, was Son to one Ceolwolf, ſo that he could not be of that Line, but now mentioned, yet he calls him his Kinſman too. Whoever he was, he began his Reign in the two and twentieth year of Leo Iſaurus the Emperour, the thirteenth of Edbert King of Kent, the thirtieth of Selrede King of the Eaſt Saxons, in the days of Theodorick King of the Franks, A. D. DCCXXXVIII. We can tell the Reader that he Reigned, but what he did particularly in his Reign, he as well as we muſt ſtill be ignorant, Beda having told us but little of theſe Civil Matters; but after his time no one of any tolerable Abilities, having taken any care to tranſmit any thing of moment to poſterity, ſo that we have little more than the bare Names. But that he laudably governed, Malmesbury tells, treading in the ſteps of good Princes. He had a Brother baſely born it ſeems, and of his own Name in his time Archbiſhop of York, who as Alcuin the Schoolmaſter of Charles the Great left in writing, did very much for the advancement of learning, and others add, that it was in Conjunction with, and by the aſſiſtence of, the King his Brother. The King did ſo well agree with the Archbiſhop, and ſo emulated him in Religion, that needs he muſt be Religious too, and more Religious, having his Crown ſhaven and turn Monk after he had Reigned twenty years, leaving his Kingdom to his Son Oſwulfe. He being not able to ſteer the Helm, was, though an Innocent, thrown over-board to make way for Mollo, when he had born the Name of King little more than a year. Mollo held it ſtoutly and laboriouſly eleven years; but was then ſerved in the ſame manner, as he or others for him had uſed his Predeceſſour, by the Devices of Alrede who got his Place. Alrede ſo ingratiated himſelf with the People, and ſo plied his work that he held it for nine, but in his tenth was compelled by them that now ſaid they were not his Subjects to give way to Ethelbert the Son of Mollo. But he was but a King of the ſecond Head neither; in the fifth year they Loyally failed again, and out they drove him.

Habuit fratrem æquivocum Archiepiſcopum Eboraci, qui & ſua prudentia & germani potentia ſedem illam in genuinum ſtatum reformavit, &c. Malmesb. Lib. 1.

Who turning Monk leaves his Kingdom to Oſwulfe.

He is ſucceeded by Mollo.

Then Alrede Reigns.

Next Ethelbert.

Then Celwold.

To whom ſucceeded Oſrede.

Who was outed by Ethelbert.

An Interregnum for thirty odd years.

At length Egbert is made King.

24. Then was Celwold proclaimed King, who was Brother to Alerede, and he made a ſhift for eleven years to make good his Hold. But the People were now ſo uſed to making and unmaking Kings, that after theſe years he taſted of their perfidious humour being with Innocency ſent to Heaven as his famous Sepulchre at Hagulſtade, and the Miracles which they ſaid they ſaw ſufficiently teſtified to that then repenting Age. To his merit ſure it muſt be aſcribed, that his Nephew Oſrede the Son of Alerede ſucceeded him, but being got in, he could not keep Poſſeſſion; for ſcarcely had he enjoyed his Royalty one year, but Ethelbert (or Athelrede, or Ethelwald) the Son of Mollo drove him out, and recovered his Seat after twelve years of exile, which he held for four more, which once paſt, he could not eſcape the common calamity of his Predeceſſours, but was miſerably ſlain. Some ſaid he was juſtly puniſhed for the unjuſt putting of Oſrede to Death, with whoſe Reſignation he ought in conſcience to have been contented: but many Biſhops, and Noblemen who had more ſenſe than their Neighbours, were ſo weary of theſe perpetual Diſturbances and Murthers, that they left thereupon their Native Countrey. Nay, Charles the Great was ſo incenſed, that as Alcuin wrote, having delivered Letters and Preſents to Meſſengers, to be delivered to this Ethelrede when he heard how he was murthered, he exclaimed againſt this perfidious, perverſe Nation, the Murtherers of their Lords, affirming they were worſe than Pagans; and if Alcuin had not interceded, whatever good he could have hindred, or miſchief he was in a capacity to doe, would have been performed againſt them. So great a terrour did this curſed cuſtome ſtrike in all the Nobility, that he being dead, no Candidates appeared for the Kingdom; for conſidering the freſh example of others, they choſe rather to ſleep in a whole skin and live in obſcurity, than venture upon ſo dangerous, nay pernicious Royalty; moſt of the Northumbrian Kings having come to an untimely end. Therefore was the Countrey without a King, for the ſpace of thirty and three years, and became a deriſion and a Prey to all the neighbours. The Danes had before this begun to make Inrodes and Depredations in thoſe parts, and ſuch as had once been in them, ſhewing the great booty they carried back to their Countreymen, and telling them of the baſeneſs and ſluggiſhneſs of the Inhabitants, ſo ſtirred them up with the greatneſs, yea eaſineſs of the enterprize, that the Barbarians flocked thick and three fold, and ſeized on thoſe Quarters untill the time lately mentioned. For they had a King (rather a Regulus) of their own ſeveral years, who yet truckled under the King of the Weſt Saxons: and the forementioned thirty three years being over, King Egbert obtained this together with the other Countries.

The limits of the Kingdom of Deiri, and Bernicii.

Vide Uſſerium in Addend. & Emendand. Primord. P.p. 1003. 1003.

25. Thus have we preſented the Reader with what the Hiſtories of theſe Times afford concerning this Kingdom of Northumberland; more we could not, except inſtead of a true Account of things, we ſhould take the trade of Writing Romances. Concerning the limits of this Kingdom in general, and the Deiri and Bernicii betwixt themſelves to that ſhort Account we have already given, we ſhall farther add that as to its Northern Border it was terminated by that Southern Part of Scotland, which on the Eaſt and Weſt is limited by the German, and Iriſh Seas, on the South by that Bay called Æſtuarium Solviacum, or Solway Frith, and the River Tweede. Northerly by the Frith of Dunbrittan, and that of Edenburgh; for that this Kingdom extended it ſelf to both theſe Friths, whereof the one limited the Kingdom of the Scots, and the other that of the Picts, is moſt evident both from the Writings of Beda, and other moſt certain Teſtimonies. But to the Diſtinction of the Provinces of Deira, and Bernicia, amongſt themſelves Authours do very much differ. Ralph of Cheſter from Alphred of Beverly affirms, that the Kingdom of the Deiri reached from the River Humber to that of Tyne; and the Kingdom of the Bernicii from the River of Tyne, as far as the Scotiſh Sea, with whom agrees the Monk of Malmeſbury, onely adding to the Scotch Sea this note, Where now ſtands the Town of St. John of St. Johnſton. But Richard the Prior of Hagulſtade, in the beginning of his Book concerning the State of his Church, hath theſe words. Deira beginning at Humber, ended at the River Tees: and of this opinion was Humphrey Lhuyd that excellent Antiquary. Cambden ſometimes aſſigns the River Tees, ſometime the River Tyne, as the common limit of theſe Provinces; and John of Tinmuth in the Life of St. Oſwald ſeems to reconcile the Controverſie in this manner. The Kingdom of the Deiri anciently extended it ſelf from the

Sect. 6.

River Humber, to the River Tyne*: that of the* Bernicii from the River Tyne (rather Tees) as far as the Scotch Sea, which in the Scotch Language is called Forth. For all the ground which lay between the Rivers, Tyne and Tees in thoſe Days was onely a waſte or Deſart, and therefore was under the Juriſdiction of neither, being onely a Receptacle, and Habitation of Wild Beaſts. The ſame thing is obſerved in the Scotch Chronicle of John Fordon.

26. Indeed we we reade in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Beda, That Eata who governed the Province of the Bernicii had his Epiſcopal See in the Church of Haguſtald or Lindisfarne. Therefore that not onely the Church of Durham (to which after the death of Beda the See of Lindisfarne was tranſlated) but that of Haguſtald on this ſide the River Tyne may not be removed out of the Province of the Bernicii, wherein Beda, and not he alone placeth it; we are forced to aſſign the River Tees rather than Tyne, as the common limit of theſe two petty Kingdoms. By this means the Biſhoprick of Durham, and that we now call the County of Northumberland, muſt be aſſigned to the Eaſtern Part of Bernicia; and to the Weſtern, all that Kingdom of Cumberland, which after the Everſion of this of the Northumbrian Angles, was ſettled betwixt the River Derwent, and the Frith of Dunbrittan, by the Cambrobritains or Welſhmen. For Cumbria, or Cumberland took the Name of the Inhabitants who were true and Natural Britains, and called themſelves in their own Language Kumbri and Kambri: and Hiſtories teſtifie that here they remained a long time in deſpight of the Engliſh Saxons, however they fretted and ſtormed thereat. Marianus himſelf teſtifieth as much, who terms this Countrey Cumbrorum terram, or the Land of the Cumbri, or Britains, and to it bear mention the Britiſh Names, which in this Tract very many places ſtill bear, as Caerluel, Caerdronoc, Penrith, Penrodocke, and the like. Late it was, as we ſaid, e'er it was ſubject to the Engliſh Saxons, and when their ſtate became ſore ſhaken by Daniſh Wars, and was run to ruine; it had peculiar Governours called Kings of Cumberland, till the Year of our Lord DCCCCXLVI, at what time King Edmund by help of Lealin Prince of Wales (who herein was unnatural) waſted all Cumberland, and having put out the Eyes of both the Sons of Danmail King thereof, granted it to Maleolin King of Scots, whereupon the Eldeſt Sons of the Kings of Scotland were under the Engliſh Saxons, and Danes, both called Prefects, or Deputy Governours of Cumberland. But this is by way of Anticipation. To put a period to our Diſcourſe of the Kingdom of Northumberland, King Egbert reduced it under his obedience in the DCCCXXVIII. Year of our Lord, and the eight and twentieth of his own Reign, in the ſeventh of Michael Traulus Emperour of the Eaſt; the fourteenth of Ludovicus Pius the Weſtern Emperour, the year preceding the like fate of the Kingdom of the Eaſt Saxons.

Lib. 4. Cc. 12. 27.

SECT. VII.

SECT. VII.

The Kingdom of the Eaſt Angles in Britain. From the firſt Founding of it by Uffa to the Conquering of it by Edward King of the Engliſh Saxons.

The ſpace of Four Hundred Forty One years.

1. NExt after the Kingdom of the Northumbrians, followed that of the Eaſt Angles, which was begun by Uffa, in the tenth year of the Emperour Juſtin the younger, the fifteenth of Ethelbert King of Kent, the ſeventeenth of Alla King of the Northumbrians, about the beginning of the Reign of Chilperick King of the Franks, A. D. DLXXV.

Uffa began the Kingdom.

Sect. 7.

2. Of Uffa there is little or nothing more extent than that he begun this Kingdom, (how and in what manner is utterly unknown) and that from him the ſucceeding Kings were called Uffingæ. After him his Son Tityllus or Tytulus, of whom there is onely remarkable, that he was Father to Redwald, the moſt potent King of the Eaſt Angles, the ſame who received Edwin, and upon his account ſlew Ethelfrid King of the Northumbrians. The Monk of Malmesbury, as contrary to the ſenſe of others, he makes this Kingdom to have begun before that of the Weſt Saxons, though after the other of Kent, mentions this Redwald, as the firſt King being the tenth from Woden. Of theſe ſeven Princes ſaid by Beda, to have had Dominion over all the Southern Parts lying on this ſide the River of Humber, him he mentions as the fourth. In another place he tells us, that he was Noble as to his Birth, but Ignoble as to his Actions. For being perſwaded by Edwin to receive the Chriſtian Faith, he was baptized; but returning home was perſwaded by his Wife and others about him to fall off again, ſo that he living betwixt two, like the old Samaritans, ſeeming to ſerve both Chriſt and Idols, having in the ſame Chapel an Altar for Chriſt, and an Altar for Divels, which Chapel Adulf King of that Province, who lived in the time of Beda, teſtified that he himſelf had ſeen when a Boy. But Eorpwald his Son, being perſwaded alſo by Edwin, was not onely almoſt but altogether a Chriſtian, and was ſlain by a certain Pagan called Richbercht. Three years after the Province lay in confuſion and errour, till Sigbercht or Sigebert obtained the Kingdom, a Man, ſaith Beda, moſt Chriſtian and moſt Learned throughout, who while his Brother yet reigned living in exile in Gall, was there baptized, and when he came to reign made all his Province partaker with him of his Faith. As a means to propagate and confirm Religion, aſwell as to cultivate otherwiſe the minds of his People, he erected Schools by the aſſiſtence of Fœlix the Biſhops, and furniſhed them with Maſters and Teachers, according to the Cuſtome of thoſe of Kent. At length he relinquiſhed his Kingdom to Egrick his Kinſman, who before that held ſome part of it, and took upon him the Monaſtical Habit.

After him reigned Tytulus his Son.

Then Redwald.

Lib. 2. c. 15.

Next Eorpwald.

Afterwards Sigebert.

Vir per omnia Chriſtianiſſimus ac Doctiſſimus.

Idem. lib. 3. cap. 18.

Who turning Monk left his Kingdom to Egrick.

3. When he had for a good ſpace continued in that condition, it happened that the Eaſt Angles had war with Peuda, that common Enemy of Chriſtians, then King of the Mercians. Finding themſelves too weak for their Enemies, to incourage the Souldiers, they deſired Sigebert to be preſent at Fight, and when he flatly refuſed, they drew him by force out of the Monaſtery, and placed him in the Battel, preſuming that the Souldiers under the Eye of him, who had lately been a moſt valiant and Martial Captain, would not dare to think of Flight. But he being mindfull of his profeſſion, and in the midſt of great Arms would onely bear a Rod in his Hand, and in that poſture was ſlain, together with Egrick the King; and their whole Army was either ſlain or diſperſed by the purſuing Pagans. In the Kingdom ſucceeded Anna the Son of Enus (Brother to Radwald, as ſome write, but Beda onely ſays he was of the Royal Race) a Perſon good himſelf, and

Who were both ſlain in a Battel with Peuda King of the Mercians. After him Anna, who had the ſame fate.

and a Father of as good an Off-ſpring. Of him Beda ſaith he ſhould ſpeak more afterward, but we do not find him ſo good as his word, it's well he tells us at preſent, that he alſo was ſlain by that furious Peuda. By the Off-ſpring he means the three Daughters that this Auna left, whereof Etheldritha was married to two Husbands yet died a Virgin, Edelburga was firſt a Nun, and then Abbeſs of her Houſe at Brigæ or Bruges a Monaſtery in Gall, as Malmesbury terms it, and Sexburga was the Wife of Ercombert King of Kent, after whoſe death ſhe took the veil in the ſame Monaſtery with her Siſter Ethelreda, being accounted a Saint. It ſeems he had no Son, for his Brother Ethelberius ſucceeded him, who (by neceſſity doubtleſs was forced to doe it; for we cannot think he would doe it of choice) joined with Peuda the Mercian, againſt Oſwi the King of Northumberland, and was ſlain with him in the Battel heretofore mentioned. Ethelwald his Brother took his Seat, and by continued Succeſſions devolved the Kingdom upon the Sons of Ethelberius.

Next Ethelwald.

4. Theſe were Adulph and Elwold, after whom one Beorna was King, to whom ſucceeded one Ethelrede. His Son was Saint Ethelberht, whom Offa King of the Mercians deceitfully ſlew, and adjoined this Kingdom of the Eaſt Angles to that of the Mercians. After this time ſaith Malmesbury, few great Men reigned in Eaſt England, becauſe of the violence of the Mercians to the time of St. Edmund, who in the ſixteenth year of his Reign, was ſlain by Hinguar the Pagan. From that time for the ſpace of fifty years, the Engliſh ceaſed to reign in this Countrey. For during nine years, the province was without any King ſtill expoſed to, and haraſſed by the Pagans. Afterward in Eaſt Saxony, as he calls it, Guthrum the Daniſh King, reigned twelve years in the time of King Alfrede. Guthrum had for his Succeſſour a Dane too called Eoleric, who when he had governed or tyrannized fourteen years was ſlain by the Engliſh, for the incivilities he offered them. Yet could they not for all this recover their Liberty, the Daniſh Officers either oppreſſing them themſelves, or uſing them againſt the Weſt Saxon Kings, till Edward the Son of Alfride, expelled the Danes, and delivering the Engliſh from their Tyranny, joyned both Provinces to his Weſt Saxon Empire, in the fiftieth year after the death of St. Edmund the King and Martyr, and of his own Reign the fifteenth. This is the ſhort Account we have of this Petty Kingdom of the Eaſt Angles, for which we cannot but complain of the lettered men of thoſe times, whereof we write, that they ſhould not take notice of, and tranſmit to poſterity thoſe ſeveral remarkable Paſſages, tranſactions of very great weight, of which we have ſcarcely the Mens Names. This they omitted out of heedleſneſs, or rather becauſe they were ſo mightily taken up with Monaſtical lives, that little elſe could they think on, nothing elſe ſeemed worth their while. But by the Hiſtory of the Mercians and Weſt Saxons, ſeveral things may be more largely explained which have relation to this Kingdom.

Then Adulph and Elwold. After them Ethelrede.

Next St. Edmund.

Then 'twas governed by Guthrum a Dane. After him Eoleric.

Laſt of all Edward who expelled the Danes, and joyned it to the Weſt Saxon Empire.

SECT. VIII.

SECT. VIII.

The Mercian Kingdom of the Angles in Britain, from the firſt completing of it by Peuda, to the Conqueſt of it by Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons.

The Space of Two Hundred Forty Nine Years.

Sect. 8.

Peuda King. 1. THE Kingdom of the Mercians was completed by Peuda, a moſt valiant and hardy Souldier, but as Malmesbury terms him, a Fanatick and impious Perſon, after he had till the fiftieth year of his Age, conquered ſeveral places, and continually warred againſt his Neighbours, in the CXXXIX. year after the death of Hengiſt, in the ſixteenth year of Heraclius the Emperour, the tenth of Eadbald King of Kent, and the tenth of Edwin King of the Northumbrians, when Sigebert the Little was King of the Eaſt Saxons, and Eorpwald of the Eaſtern Angles, His pedigree. A. D. DCXXVI. The Saxon Annals derive thus his Pedigree. He was the Son of Wibba, who had theſe Anceſtours, Crida, Cunewald, Cnebba, Icele, Eomere, Angelgeat, Offa, Weremund, Wightleag, Woden.

2. This Kingdom as we ſaid was completed by Peuda, but others laid the Foundations of it, though he, for the cauſe alledged, be generally accounted the firſt King of this Province. For both Matthew of Weſtminſter, and others write, that Ad An. 585. the firſt beginning of it was effected by Creodda a Saxon, whom in the Genealogy he calls Crida. The Archdeacon of Huntingdon names him Crida, who having, as far as can be known by any writings, firſt, ſaith he, obtained the Kingdom of Merce, died and left for his Succeſſour his Son Wipha. This Wipha or Wippa, was followed by one Cherle or Keorle, who was not his Son but his Kinſman, but he either dying, or which is yet unlikely, relinquiſhing the Kingdom to him, Peuda ſucceeded when he had now conſumed the beſt of his Years, as having completed the Number of Fifty. This Kingdom being by him inlarged and ſtrengthened, obtained the Name of Myꞃcnaꞃic and Meaꞃelonꝺ, but for what reaſons is not agreed, a pair of the greateſt Antiquaries differing about it. Humphrey * Lhuyd is of opinion it was named from the River Merſe, which indeed running betwixt Cheſhire and Lancaſhire, was the North-Weſtern Bound of the Mercians. But Cambden † deriveth it from Meaꞃc an old Engliſh word which ſignified a Limit, for though it was by far the largeſt Kingdom of all, yet all the other bordered and confined upon it. Neither of theſe opinions are improbable, whether the River took Name from it, or it from the River; yet are not they ſo probable, but that of Wolfgangzius Laus is as ridiculous, who in that work of his concerning the Migrations of Nations, affirms theſe Mercians to have been Marcomanni, and their Kings Peuda, Offa, and all the reſt to have reigned in the lower Germany; whereas nothing is more certain by conſent of all Hiſtories than that never was there any ſuch Kingdom there, and that theſe Kings and People inhabited that part of Britain, which we formerly aſſigned them. But the good Man going about to declare the Genealogies of the Kings of England, of the Norman Race doth it ſo pitifully, ſo confuſedly, ſo falſly, that it appears, he neither ever in any good Authours either read the order of them, their Actions or their very Names, but received his home Intelligence from ſome ſilly fellow, as a certain eminent Mathematician in the Geographical Chart of this Iſland alſo did to their no ſmall diſparagement. And beſides them Jeronymus Rigcellus in his Ptolemy, printed at Venice an hundred years agoe, labouring to reconcile the ancient Names of places to the new, confounds ſeveral, that are an Hundred Miles diſtant from each other. Of theſe Strangers therefore the Reader is to take notice, and beware. As for this Kingdom of the Mercians he may obſerve, that it being ſetled, all the ſeven Kingdoms of the Engliſh Saxons were now begun.

---

* Sextum Anglo-Saxonum in Britannia Regnum quod à flumine Merſe Merciorum dicebatur conſtitutere, fol. 23 b.

† In Cornaviis

3. Peuda

Sect. 8.

3. Peuda, as we ſaid, had ſpent the beſt of his time before he came to be King, but the great things he performed afterward ſhewed, that the greateſt of his Labours and Travels he had not paſſed. No ſooner had he got the Power into his Hands, but he improved it for the Moleſtation of his Neighbours, thinking it no fault at all to diſturb the World, to ruine Families, overturn Kingdoms, and deſtroy a Multitude of innocent Souls, and all to gratify the humour of one ſingle Man, to tickle his fancy with the pitifull thought of domineering; the true account of the Actions of Conquerours, (or as that little one told the greateſt of them) thoſe publick Pirates who rob with whole Armies and Fleets, whoſe Power makes their Murthers and Robberies lawfull, and alone diſtinguiſheth them from thoſe puny ones, to which the Halter is appropriate. About the fourth or fifth year of his Reign, he undertook a War againſt Kinegils and Kichelm the Kings of the Weſt Saxons, and with very great Forces on both ſides, they met at a place called Ciranceſtre, as we read it in Huntingdon, where they fought a moſt bloudy Battel, both the Armies as he ſays having abjured Flight, and were not to be parted, but by the darkneſs of the Night; and with the next Mornings light, were about to renew their malitious fury, but that more conſiderable thoughts interpoſed, and they came to an Agreement. The next Adventure he made, was with better (too good) Succeſs, againſt Edwin the King of the Northumbrians. Herein he joyned with Cadwalla the Britain, and ſhewed that he no more regarded his own Lineage than Strangers themſelves, neither yet was moved by any Religious pretences, aſſiſting one Chriſtian againſt another, and making uſe of that great Antipathy which their Religion could not remove, to gratify his ambitious and bloudy Deſigns, which were prevalent in him, even, above all other things, which others as Heatheniſh as he have accounted Sacred. This appeared in his perfidious killing Edfrid the Son of Edwin, who had fled to him for Succour.

Ingages with the Kings of the Weſt Saxons.

Then with the King of the Northumbrians.

Killing his Son that fled to him for Succour.

Ptolemæo Corinium, Antonino Durocornovium, Britannis Caer Cori & Caer Ceri, Anglo-Saxonitus Cẏꞃen-ceaꞅꞇꞃe hodie Circeſter & Circiter in Gloceſterſhire, ait Cambdenus Peudam hîc à Cinegliſo fuſum fuiſſe dum urbem copiis maximis obſideret. Marianus refert eum à Brittannis cepiſſe Ceaulinum Weſtſaxonum Regem.

4. Moreover Eorpwald the Son of Redwald King of the Eaſt Saxons, whom others write to have been killed by Rickbercht, is ſaid by the Archdeacon of Huntingdon, to have been ſlain by him. How he killed Oſwald the King of the Northumbrians, in the Battel of Maſerfeld, we have ſhewed already. Raging thus, and breathing nothing but ſlaughter, even where he wanted Provocation, no wonder if every little fault committed againſt him was a Crime, it was ſo at leaſt as to the meaſure of its Puniſhment inflicted by him. Cenwalch the King of the Weſt Saxons, having his Siſter to wife put her away, of which opportunity glad, after two or three Attempts he drove him out of his Kingdom, not being able to reſiſt him as his Father had done, and in exile he forc't him to continue for three years. But this Proſecution extended not to bloud, after which he thirſted aſmuch as after drink in the greateſt extremity of Summer, having one would think, as Malmesbury expreſſes it, a ſenſe of ſome imminent ſlaughter, and the quality of a Raven which follows Armies, as having ſome preſent ſenſe and ſmell of the dead Carkaſſes which ſhortly are to fall. Therefore ſet he upon Egbert King of the Eaſt Angles, and made a ſtout meal of Royal bloud, at this bout killing both this King and Sigebert formerly King, though now a Monk, who would not by taking a Sword into his Hands defend himſelf, but like a Monk died in the Crowd without reſiſtence. Another meal yet he made, and that was upon poor Auna King of the Eaſt Saxons, his Sword making but one bit, in one moment Huntingdon words it, devouring him and his Army, of which ſcarcely one Man remained. Yet ſtill he had not done, with the ſame Eaſe he deſtroys alſo Edelhere his Brother and Succeſſour, as the Archdeacon relates, though elſewhere believes another Account of this Prince which we have already communicated to the Reader. Having ſoundly Plundred the Countrey, being now fleſhed with the ſlaughter of ſo many Kings, he went into Northumberland to hunt after another, but there at the River Winwed met with his match, being dealt withall by Oſwi as he had dealt with others, being ſlain in the place after he had Reigned thirty years. A ſtout Souldier he was, and well deſerved the Sirname of Strenuus which was given him; yet is he not reckoned by Beda amongſt thoſe ſeven Princes which Reigned in effect over all the Kingdoms on this ſide Humber. But his Power muſt have been Great in the ſeveral Kingdoms of Northumberland, and Eaſt England, the Kings whereof he ſlew, as alſo in Weſtſex, whereof he drove the King into exile. This they obſerve of him with much regret, that his Arms be onely turned upon his own Countreymen, ſuffering the Britains to enjoy what they had left, nay aſſiſting Cadwalla in the Attempts

And ſeveral other neighbouring Kings.

At laſt is ſlain by Oſwi King of Northumberland.

tempts he had made to recover Britain, ſo ſtrong is Intereſt, or Humour and Malice, ſtronger than the ſtrongeſt Bonds of Conſanguinity.

Peada ſucceeds.

Chronicon Joh. Bromton in Regno Merciorum.

Malmeſ. Huntingdon. Chron. Johan. Bromton.

Who is made away by his Wifes Treachery.

Oſwi Governs.

Then Wulthere.

Who Routs the King of the Weſt Saxons.

Taking from him the Iſle of Wight.

De Sacro fonte levavit, inde Suſceptor dictus.

In cujus adoptionis ſignum inſulam dedit ſibi Vectam & etiam ingentem Parorum provinciam occidentalium Saxonum Chronic. Joh. Bromton.

Lib.* 4. c. 13.

5. Peuda being Dead, his Son Peada ſucceeded to the Title, in the Sixteenth year of Ercombert King of Kent, and the Fourteenth of Oſwi, King of the Northumbrians, A. D. DCLVI. Betwixt his Family, and that of Oſwi there was a double Match. He Married his Daughter the Siſter of Alfrid, and Alfrid the Son of Oſwi Married the Siſter of Peada, and Daughter of Peuda, which yet could not bridle the extravagant humour of this Furious Pagan, who refuſed all offers made him, having reſolved utterly to exterminate the Nation of the Northumbrians. Yet what if we ſay there was ſome Generoſity in the Pagan, and that what he did was to reſtore Ethilwald the Son of Oſwald to his Father's Kingdom? For this Ethilwald, as Beda calls him, or Dilwald as others, the Son of Oſwald, who as they ſay ought to have aſſiſted his Uncle, was on the other ſide, and having led an Army of Pagans againſt his Countrey when the Battels joined, drew off, and expected the iſſue in a ſafe place. But how little ſoever Peuda was moved by the Alliance we now mentioned, Oſwi ſhewed how great a ſenſe he had of it, when having now Conquered the Kingdom of the Mercians, and held it for three years, after his Death, as ſome ſay, he beſtowed on Peada his Son-in-Law the Southern Mercians, which as we have formerly ſaid were ſeparated from the Northern by the River of Trent. However kind he was, his Daughter was as unnatural, for Peada when he had ſcarcely Reigned two years, was by his Wife's means they ſay made away, after which for three years more the Mercians were ſubject to Oſwi, and by him brought over to the Chriſtian Faith. Theſe years being expired, the Nobility Rebelled againſt him, and ſet up for King Wulthere the Son of Peuda. He is ſaid to have Inherited his Father's Valour, and being endowed with excellent Qualities both of Body and Mind, to have by all means laboured to diſcharge himſelf well of the expectation the People had of him. At the beginning of his Reign he was hard ſet by Cenwald King of the Weſt Saxons, whom at length yet he overpowred, and after a great overthrow in a pitched Field invaded, waſted his Kingdom, and marching through it with a great Army, took from him the Iſle of Wight, which he kept not long in his hands, giving it to Ethelwald King of Suſſex, whom having perſwaded to embrace Chriſtianity, he took up from the Font,as the Phraſe of the Ancients was, or, as we ſay, was Godfather to him. One tells us, that together with this Iſle of Wight, he gave him in token of this Adoption a great Province of the Pari belonging to the Weſtern Saxons as one now hath it, whereas in * Beda, from whom he took it, is read, The Province of the Meanvari, or as ſome Copies have it, the Mevari But Meanvari ſeems to be the better Reading, theſe being a People that Inhabited a Part of Hampſhire, not far from Portſmouth, but farther within the Land. Their Habitation as yet having ſcarcely changed the Name at this day, is divided into three Hundreds, called Meanſ-borow, Eaſt-mean, and Weſt-mean: and amongſt them there mounts up an high Hill, invironed on the top with a large Rampire, and they call it Old Wincheſter; at which by Report there ſtood in Old Time a City, but now nothing remaineth of it: ſo as a Man would eaſily judge it to have been a Summer-ſtanding Camp, and nothing elſe.

Marries.

Is accuſed of Symony, and Dies.

Ethelrede ſucceeds.

6. Wolfere Married Ermenilda the Daughter of Ercombert King of Kent,by his Wife Sexburga the then Heir apparent of her Father's Kingdom; and by her pious Care and Inſinuations two good things were brought to paſs, viz. the Jutes of Kent, and the Angles of Mercia became in Friendſhip as it were one People after her Father's Death, though we know another ſucceeded in the Kingdom, and the Paganiſh Superſtition was aboliſhed throughout their Territories. By her he had a Son named Kinrede,and Werburg a Daughter, who became a Nun. He Reigned nineteen years, and had gone with a clear report from off the ſtage, but that he is noted to have been the firſt King of the Engliſh Saxons that committed Symony, having ſold the Biſhoprick of London, (which at this time therefore was in his Power) though Seated in the Kingdom of the Eaſt Saxons, to one Wina an ambitious Man. To Wolfere ſucceeded Ethelrede, or Adelrede another of Peuda's Sons, in the Second year of Lotharius King of Kent, and the fifth of Egfrid King of Northumberland, A. D. DCLXXV. Malmsbury Writes, that he was more famous for Religion than Fighting, contenting himſelf with one eminent Expedition into Kent, to make known his valour to the World. The reſt of his time he ſpent without Action, only Egfrid King of the Northumbrians ambitiouſly paſſing the Bounds of his own Kingdom, by a Battel, and therein the Death of his Brother Elſwin, he admoniſhed, and taught more moderation and ſobriety. So the Monk with his onely's makes notable exceptions to what at firſt he laid down, as a general Remark upon this King. The Archdeacon of Huntingdon tells us with more circumſtance, that Edelrede the New King of Mercia roſe up againſt Lotair King of Kent: that Lotair dreading his Grandfather's and his Father's Valour, turned aſide, and would not make any oppoſition, ſo that he deſtroyed the City of Rocheſter, (as we muſt take it) and ranging all along the Province of Kent, carried back with him an unſpeakable quantity of Booty. As to what happened betwixt him and Egfrid he adds, that in the Third year of Centwin King of the Weſt Saxons a Comet appeared for three Months together, ſhining every Morning like another Sun. That in the year following Egfrid (or Egferd as he calls him) and Edelrede fought a mighty Battel near to Trent, and there was ſlain Alwin, Egferd's Brother, a Young Man, much beloved in both the Provinces. This enmity roſe amongſt them though Edelrede had Married their Siſter Oſtrith; and being once riſen it was hard to get it down, this bloud adding to its vehemence, as Oil to the flame. For every day offences and miſapprehenſions were multiplied betwixt theſe two fierce Kingdoms, threatning deſtruction to them both, but the endeavours of Theodore the Biſhop at laſt took up the quarrel by this accommodation, that no bloud ſhould be required for the bloud of the King's Brother, but onely a ſum of Money paid him. This he might the better doe, becauſe as Malmesbury tells the ſtory, he was the Aggreſſour.

Who makes an expedition into Kent. And deſtroys the City of Rocheſter.

Fights Egfrid King of the Northumbrians.

7 Ethelrede after the twenty ninth year of his Reign, turned Monk in Bardney Abby, whereof at length he Died Abbat, and there was Buried. In his Kingdom ſucceeded Kenrede, or Coinrede his Kinſman, the Son of his Brother Wolfere, in the fifth year of the Emperour Tiberius Apſimarus, the eleventh of Withrede King of Kent, the ninteenth of Alfrede King of the Northumbrians, A. D. DCCIII. As he ſucceeded him in his Kingdom, ſo in the Monaſtical Life, for when he had Reigned but five years he went to Rome and there turned Monk, taking along with him Offa the Son and Succeſſour, if he had thought good of Sigebert King of the Eaſt Saxons, who alſo was enamoured of, and aſſumed the Habit. After him Reigned Ceolrede or Celrede the Son of his Uncle Ethelrede, who as he was wonderfull for his valour againſt King Ina, ſo was miſerable in his ſudden death, for having reigned no more than eight years, he was buried at Lichfield, leaving Ethelbald his Heir, his Nephew by his Brother Alwi. Ethelbald is characteriz'd a valiant and a vehement Man, yet did he govern, ſaith Malmesbury, both a long time and in great peace and quietneſs. But for all this Peace we are told by others, that Adelard King of the Weſt Saxons endeavoured by force to conquer his Kingdom, and to that purpoſe fought a Battel with his Son Oſwald, who having ſuſtained his fury a good ſpace, when he ſaw he was utterly unable to bear up againſt ſo numerous Forces betook himſelf to a fair Retreat, and thereby preſerved his Father's Territories. After this Ethelbald the moſt valiant King of Mercia with a terrible Army laid ſiege to the Town of Somerton, the inhabitants whereof receiving no ſuccour he quickly became Maſter of it, and from this time forward became ſo eminent for his Arms amongſt his Contemporaries, that he cauſed to ſubmit to him all the Provinces Southward of Humber, with their Kings. This Somerton ſtanding upon the River Parret had indeed formerly a Caſtle of the Weſt Saxon Kings, through the Walls of which Ethelbald is ſaid to have forced a Breach. But now Time hath ſo gotten the Maſtery of it, that there is no appearance at all of it, and the very Town it ſelf would have much adoe to keep the Name, were it not for a Fair of Oxen and other Cattel, there kept from Palm Sunday till the midſt of June, with good Reſort of People, the Countreymen thereabout being very great Graſiers. Yet being famous in Ancient times, and of all others moſt frequented, it gave Name to the Shire which Aſſerius every where calls Somertunenſis. Some indeed have thought it called Somerſetſhire, becauſe the Air is Mild and Summer-like there; and in that ſenſe the Welſh Britains at this Day call it Gladerhaf. But this Name they borrow from the Engliſh Tongue: and however in Summer time it may be a Summer-like Countrey, in Winter it may as truly be called Winterſet, ſo wet, ſo miry and mooriſh it is, as Travellers to their very great trouble and inconvenience do find.

Turns Monk, and is ſucceeded by Kenrede.

Who aſſumes the like Habit.

Then Celrede.

Who was buried at Lichfield. Next Ethelbald.

Chronic. Joh. Bromton quo prius.

Who Beſieges Somerton, and takes it.

Cambden in Belgis.

8. But Ethelbald growing proud upon his ſucceſs, and preferring Violence before Juſtice, between ſuch time as Ceolwulf King of the Northumbrians had forſaken his Crown for a Cowl, and the ſucceſſion of Egbert, took his opportunity, and in an hoſtile manner invaded that Kingdom, whence having got vaſt plunder, he returned, finding none to reſiſt him. This proud Ethelbald again, ſaith our Writer, when Adelard the King of the Weſt Saxons was dead, often diſturbed his Succeſ-

Invades the Northumbrians.

ſour

Sect. 8.

Quarels with Cudrede King of the Weſt Saxons.

But is worſted in the firſt Battel.

In the next ſlain.

Secandune, where.

Repandune.

ſour and Kinſman Cudrede, ſometimes with open hoſtility, and otherwhiles by ſtirring up his Subjects to Seditious Attempts. Various was their ſucceſs in the Field, ſometimes the one and now the other having the advantage, and now would they conclude a Peace, and then again violate it by hoſtile Acts. At length in the fourth year of Cudrede, they ſeemed ſo heartily accorded, that with joint force they ſet upon the Britains, and defeated them, though their multitudes were innumerable. Yet again they fell at variance, and Cudrede not able to bear the Exactions and Inſolence of Ethelbald, in his thirteenth year took courage, and met him at Bedford, truſting much to the skill and courage of Edelhim a ſtout Captain he brought along with him. Ethelbald the King of Kings, beſides his Mercians and other Forces, brought along with him the Eaſtern Saxons, the Angles, and the Kentiſh Men. The Battels being formed and ready to join, Edelhim leading on the Weſt Saxons, and bearing the Standard of Cudrede which was a Golden Dragon, called upon the Standard Bearer of Ethelbald, challenging him it ſeems to a Combat. Hereupon the Weſt Saxons ſhouted and were much encouraged, and the Armies joined. A moſt bloudy Conteſt began and a long time continued, the ſucceſs being doubtfull. But God who reſiſteth the Proud, as our Authour obſerves, was pleaſed to abate the haughtineſs of Ethelbald, inſomuch that he himſelf firſt of all ran away, and from this time to his Death ſuffered he nothing he undertook to proſper. Yet in the ſecond year after this Battel having recruited himſelf, he would again try his fortune, and fought another moſt bloudy Battel with the Weſt Saxons at a place called Secandune, where being ſorely diſtreſſed, and diſdaining as formerly to flye, he was ſlain, and Buried at Repandune. And ſo ſaith Bromton, this moſt valiant King when he had Reigned one and fourty years (not in ſuch profound Peace ſurely as the Monk of Malmſbury writes) was puniſhed for his exceſſive Pride, and from this time the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons became ſtronger. This Secandune though it flouriſhed in the Times of the Saxons is now almoſt quite gone, and at this time is called Seckinton in Warwickſhire. Repandune from a great and fair Town is alſo become a poor and ſmall Village, at this day called Repton upon the River Trent, where it takes in the Rivolet Dove. This it is, though in former Ages it was famous both for the Burial of Ethelbald, of other the Mercian Kings, and the Calamity of Burthred the laſt of them, who here was deprived of his Kingdom, as we ſhall ſee in its due place.

Beared Uſurps.

Upon whoſe Death Offa is made King.

Who engages with Alrick King of Kent.

And takes Binſington from Kinwulf King of the Weſt Saxons.

Vide ſi placet in Annal. Saxon. ad An. DCCLV. in Huntingdonenſi & Chronic. Joh. Bromton.

Heꞃ Cẏneƿulꝼ ⁊ Oꝼꝼa ᵹeꝼuhꞇon ẏmb Bẏnꞅinꞇun ⁊ Oꝼꝼa nam ðone ꞇun.

9. But whereas by the Chronicle of Bromton it would appear that Ethelbald was ſlain by his Enemies, it is generally affirmed by other Writers, that being a good King he loſt his Life by the Treachery of his own bad People, for he was in the Army ſtabed by Beared or Beornrede, who immediately uſurped, taking the title of King upon him. But not long he enjoyed the title. For as he began, ſo he continued his Reign like a Tyrant, which ſo incenſed the People, that Noble, and Ignoble together, they united themſelves, and under conduct of Offa a moſt valiant young man preſently unking'd him, ſome ſay by driving him away, others by taking away his Life, and bringing him to ſuch an end as the murther of Ethelbald had deſerved. Offa for his pains was made King, in the eighteenth year of Conſtantinus Copronymus, the tenth of Edilbert King of Kent, the firſt and laſt of Oſulf King of the Northumbrians, A. D. DCCLVIII. He was the fifth in deſcent from Peuda, as Malmesbury writes, yet others in his Pedegree, which they derive from Woden, make no mention at all of Peuda. He was a Prince of extraordinary conduct, courage and ſucceſs, which for a long time he managed and enjoyed together. The firſt Action of him we meet with was his ſubduing by Arms a certain People called Heſtings, concerning whom we know nothing, and therefore can ſay nothing farther. Much about the ſame time he fought with Alrick King of Kent, at a place called Ottanford, now Otford, in Kent upon the River Darent, more famous afterward for an overthrow of the Danes, and longer after that for an Houſe of the Kings. What ſucceſs he had at this place the Annals do not tell us, but it ſeems it was ſuch as encouraged him the year following to engage againſt Kinwulf King of the Weſt Saxons at a place called Binſinton, which Town he took. It is that which is now called Benſon, ſtanding upon the Thames in Oxfordſhire, by Marian, ſaid to be a Royal Village, who reports that Ceaulin took it from the Britains in the year DLXXII. and that the Weſt Saxons held poſſeſſion of it for two hundred years, till Offa thinking it would be both for his commodity and honour that they ſhould have nothing on this ſide the River, wone it and ſubjected it to his own Kingdom. At this day it goes for a Village onely, and not long ſince had an Houſe of the Kings hard by, called of certain

Elmes,

Sect. 8.

Elmes, Ewelme, commonly New Elme, ſometime a fair place, but ſuffered to go to ruine, being not very wholſome by reaſon of a foggy Air ariſing from a ſtanding Water adjoining.

10. As to the reſt of the Actions of Offa, we may take that obſervation of the Monk of Malmesbury, who when he compared them with thoſe we have related, and with others, remained doubtfull, whether he ſhould approve of or diſprove his courſe in general. In one and the ſame man, ſo many vices were palliated with vertues, and ſo many vertues ſucceeded vices, that you would think you had to deal with a very Proteus. Ingaging with Kinwulf, King of the Weſt-Saxons, in open War, he eaſily obtained the Victory, though that Prince was no contemptible Warriour. This ſame man, ſaith he, imagining that treachery would doe him moſt ſervice, having by great allurements of fair promiſes, drawn to his Court King Ethelbirht, on a ſudden, and when he never could imagine ſuch Villany, cauſed him to be cut ſhorter by the Head, and unjuſtly ſeized on his Kingdom of the Eaſt Angles, wherein he built a Caſtle for bridling the Inhabitants, the Ruines whereof may be ſeen upon a clay Hill, at the Town ſtill from him called Offton in Suffolk. After this he commends him for ſhrining the Reliques of St. Alban, and blames him for robbing ſeveral Churches, and amongſt others, that of Malmesbury, which makes the Authour not a little concerned. Finding his carriage in theſe affairs, and his handling of his People to be of perilous conſequence, to fence himſelf againſt the worſt occurrents, he courted much his Neighbour Princes. To Brithrick King of the Weſt Saxons, he married his Daughter Ethelburga, Charles the Great alſo, King of the Franks, with frequent Embaſſies he made his Friend, though diſficultly could he bring him to what he deſired; for formerly there had been miſunderſtanding betwixt them, and ſo high it had flown, that commerce was forbidden on both ſides. The Engliſh in theſe times travelling to Rome, were very much moleſted, not onely by the Saracens, who poſſeſſed the ſtraits of the Alpes, but the Subjects alſo of Charles inhabiting both Gall and Italy. Hereof he complained, and with much adoe procured a Peace and friendly correſpondence, which the ſumm of Charles his Letter, wherein he ſtiles himſelf King of the Franks and Lombards, and Patritian of the Romans, directed to the Reverend man, and his moſt dear Brother Offa King of the Mercians, doth ſufficiently teſtifie; in what year written it's uncertain, but probably about the time of Offa's death.

Bebeads Ethelbert, and ſeizes on the Kingdom of the Eaſt Angles.

His Alliances.

Apud Malmesb. de Geſtis Reg. Ang. lib. 1. & Spelman. Concil. p. 315.

11. “Herein after thanks given to Almighty God, for the ſincerity of the Catholick Faith which he found in his Papers, he gives leave to ſuch as go on Pilgrimage to Rome, to paſs freely and peaceably through his Dominions. But in caſe any be found among them, who go not upon a Religious account, but for that of gain, at convenient places, they muſt pay their Tolls. He grants alſo that Merchants have lawſull Patronage, promiſing them Redreſs of their grievances upon application to him or his Miniſters. And his Epiſtle he concludes with acquainting him, what * gifts he had ſent to the Churches in his Dominions, together with one Belt, an Hunniſh Sword, and two ſilken Veſts unto himſelf. Such was the kindneſs at laſt procured betwixt Charles and Offa, which ſtood him in ſuch ſtead, that notwithſtanding, he had many Enemies, who ceaſed not to attempt much againſt him, yet he ſpent his time in great eaſe and proſperity, and made his Son Egfrid, whom he left his Succeſſour, to be accounted King before he died. But of all his Actions, none is more memorable than the making of a Ditch, which with admirable work and labour, he cauſed to be caſt from the mouth of Dee unto Weymouth, for the ſpace of fourſcore and ten Miles, to ſeparate the Britains from his Angles or Engliſh Men. Hereupon in Britiſh it is called Claudh Offa, or Offa his Ditch, and a † Town ſome ſeven Miles from Radnor, from this Ditch which lies under it, had the Britiſh Name of Trefy Claudh, afterward changed into Trebuclo, in Engliſh called Knighton. To what we have already ſaid of this Work, we ſhall add, though by way of anticipation, what John of Salisbury writes in his Polycraticon. Harold ordained a Law, that what Welſhman ſoever ſhould be found without a Weapon on this ſide the limit he had ſet them, that is to ſay, Offa's Dike, ſhould have his right Hand cut off by the King's Officers.

Makes his Son Partner in the Kingdom.

He is famous for making a Ditch.

* Munera ſic expreſſit & interpretatur Priſcus quidam.

A Carolo dona data ſunt Offæ, mucro, zona,

Cingat ut imbelles Clemens, feriátq; rebelles.

Pallia donantur, velut his ſecreta legantur.

Tyro mucrone ſed & utens munere zonæ,

Indomitos punit, pronos ſibi nectit & onit.

Palliat arcana, ne ſignent pallia vana.

† Cambden. in Silur.

12. For the main, Offa ſo carried himſelf, that he may be accounted of the firſt Rank of theſe Engliſh Saxon Kings, during the Heptarchy. The grand flaw in his Eſcutchion, is the Murther of Ethelbert King of the Eaſt Angles, and yet Authours of good credit ſay, that coming to woe his Daughter, he was ſo baſely made away by the procurement of Queendred, Offa's Wife, a Woman that more valued the Countries of Eaſt England, than the honeſt and honourable match of her Child. But by his Martyrdom (ſuch it was eſteemed) great acceſſion of Wealth and Reputation came to the City of Hereford, for being regiſtred in the Catalogue of Martyrs, there he had a Church built and dedicated to him by Milfrid, a petty King of the Countrey, wherein when a Biſhops See was eſtabliſhed, it grew very rich, firſt through the devout liberality of the Mercians, and then of the Weſt Saxon Kings, who at length came to be poſſeſſed of it.

His Character.

Was buried at Bedford.

Oſfa being dead, after a Reign of thirty nine years, was buried at Bedford, in a Chapel without the Town, on a Bank of the River Ouſe, in a Royal manner. But it's a conſtant Tradition, ſaith Matthew the Flowergatherer, of all the Countrey to this day, that the ſaid Chapel, by long wearing, and the violence of the River, was overthrown, and by its rapacity, together with the King's Sepulchre, thrown down into the water. Whereupon, till this preſent time, the ſaid Sepulchre, by ſuch as waſh themſelves in that place, ſeems to appear deep in the water, and yet at another time, although it be moſt diligently ſought after, as if the thing was fatal, cannot be found.

Ad Ann. 797.

Egfrid Reigns alone.

Egfrid his Son, who had been Partner with him in the Kingdom, for the ſpace of eight years, upon his death became ſole Poſſeſſour of it, being commended by Churchmen for treading in his Father's ſteps. For he confirmed whatſoever he had given to pious uſes, and what out of covetouſneſs he had taken away, he freely cauſed to be reſtored. And more he had done, had he continued any longer time.

Dies.

For on the hundred and forty firſt day after his Father's deceaſe, he departed this life, to the exceeding great grief of all his Subjects. Being ſo well inclined, and dying in the flower of his Age. Alcuin a Man famous in thoſe days, an Engliſh Man, and the moderatour of the Studies of Charles the Great, in an Epiſtle to Oſbert a Patritian or Nobleman, wrote that he did not believe he died for his own ſins, but becauſe his Father had ſhed much bloud to eſtabliſh his Kingdom.

Malmesb. quâ ſuprà.

Kenulſe ſucceeds.

13. To Egfrid ſucceeded Kenulſe or Ceolwulſe, as the Saxon Annals call him, deſcended in the fifth degree from Kenwalch the Brother of Peuda, in the laſt year of Conſtantinus Porphyrogenitus the Emperour, who was depoſed, and had his Eyes put out by command of his Mother Irene, the firſt of Cuthrede King of Kent, the ſecond or third year after the death of Ethelrede, the laſt (in reality) King of the Northumbrians, A. D. DCCXCVI.

His Character.

The Monk of Malmesbury deſcribes him to us as a great Man, as one whoſe Vertues were greater than his Fame, who never did any thing which malice could juſtly tax, was at home Religious, in War victorious, a man whoſe Praiſe deſervedly will mount on high ſo long as there ſhall be found a fit Judge thereof in England, to be commended not onely for the ſublimity of his Throne, but the humility of his mind, which in his greateſt proſperity was eminently remarkable.

He invades Kent, ſeizing the King and Countrey.

Againſt the Inhabitants of Kent from Offa he received a ſucceſſive Enmity, which cauſed him in the firſt year of his Reign to invade that Countrey, wherein after much waſte made, he took Edbright ſirnamed Pren, and carried him bound along with him. To this Relation of Malmesbury Roger de Howden adds, that he commanded his eyes to be plucked out, and in great Pride and Cruelty his hands to be cut off: This done, he laid the Kingdom of Kent to his own Dominion, ſetting upon his own Head a Crown, and holding a Sceptre in his Hand. Yet Malmesbury affirms, that not long after being touched with mercy to the Captive King, he ſet him at liberty. For at Winchelcombe (ſaith he) where he built a Church, which at this day ſtandeth, on the day of the Dedication thereof, he manumitted or ſet free the Captive before the Altar, there exhibiting a memorable Spectacle of his Clemency. At the Solemnity was Cuthrede preſent, whom he had made King over the Inhabitants of Kent, and then and there applauded his Royal Munificence.

His Munificence.

The Church was filled with Applauſe and rejoycing, and the Streets were thronged with People. Foraſmuch as in a Meeting of thirteen Biſhops and ten Dukes, none that deſired to taſte of his bounty was rejected, all went away with their Pouches full. For beſides the Gifts he gave to the Nobles, which both for value and number were ineſtimable in Utenſils, Garments, and choice Horſes, to ſuch as had no Land he gave a Pound of Silver, to Prieſts a Mark of Gold: To Monks one Solidus a piece, and many things to all the Inferiour Multitude. And when he had indowed the Monaſtery with ſo great Revenues as at this time may ſeem incredible, in the twenty fourth year of his Reign he honoured it with his own Funeral.

Kenelme his Son murthered and buried at Winchelcombe.

His Son Reuelme a very Child and Innocent being murthered by his Siſter Quendrida, obtained both the Name and Honour of Martyrdom, and there alſo reſteth. So much Malmesbury.

Cambden.

The place he mentions is Winchelcombe, a great Town and well inhabited in Gloceſterſhire. Indeed a Man would ſcarcely believe how much this Abby was frequented in ancient times for the Relicks of this Kenelme, a Child of ſeven years old, whom his own Siſter, to get the Inheritance unto her ſelf, ſecretly made away, and our Fore-fathers regiſtred in the Rank of Holy Martyrs. The Territory adjoyning was of old reckoned a Sheriffdom or County of it ſelf, till ſuch time as Edric, ſirnamed Strecna, that is the Getter or Gainer, who firſt under King Ætheldred, and afterward under Cnute or Canute governed as Viceroy the whole Kingdom of England, adjoyned it to the Shire of Gloceſter.

An Account of the Murther.

14. Kenulſe by his Wife Alfritha had this Son, thus murthered by his own Siſter Quendrida, and another Daughter called Burgenilda. The manner how the Murther was committed, and how it was diſcovered, was this, which you muſt take upon the truſt of William of Malmesbury and Matthew the Flowergatherer. "The Boy was committed to an Attendant, who carrying him into a Wood under pretence of Hunting, cut off his Head and hid his Body in the Thickets. "A wonderfull thing it was that a thing done ſo privately in England, ſhould be "known at Rome, but ſo it came to paſs by Divine Revelation. For upon the "Altar you muſt know of bleſſed Peter Prince of the Apoſtles, a white Dove let "fall a certain Paper, which in order diſcovered both the death of St. Kenelme "King and Martyr, and alſo the place of his Burial. The Schedule being written "in Engliſh in Golden Letters, the Clerks that were preſent at the Command of "the Pope attempted to reade, but in vain. But as it happily came to paſs an Angel ſtood by and Interpreting it in Latin, cauſed the Roman Prelate by an Epiſtle to give notice to the Engliſh Kings of their Compatriot Martyr. Amongſt other things this was found written in the Paper. In Clenc kon bath Kenelm kynebearne lith under thorne heaued by reaued: That is, In the Cow-paſture Kenelme Son of the King lies under a Thorn beheaded, by the head. The Body of the bleſſed Martyr being thus miraculouſly diſcovered to the Engliſh Kings, in a great Aſſembly of Clerks and Nobles, was taken out of the Hole and carried to Winchelcombe. The Paricide (ſaid he) or rather Fratricide (his Siſter) being vexed at the ſinging and noiſe of the People which rejoyced at the finding out of ſo great a Martyr, put her head out of a Window, and by ſaying a Pſalm backward indeavoured to inchant and diſturb them, but as ſhe was ſinging both her eyes fell out of her Head upon the Book ſhe held in her hand. Still to this day, he adds, the Pſalter it ſelf ſet in Silver, and beſmeared with the bloud of the Eyes, gives teſtimony of this Puniſhment. So much of this Boy, King, and Martyr. Thus much we may be certain of, that the Murtherer, however the Villany was diſcovered, reaped not the fruit of her Ambition as ſhe intended. For after this Kenelme, Ceolwulfe his Uncle, the Brother of Kenulſe, ſucceeded in the Kingdom of the Mercians, which henceforth was in a tottering condition, and little or nothing memorable, or which deſerved notice, afterward is to be found concerning it, beſides the mere Names and Succeſſions of a few Kings. Ceolwulfe reigned but two, ſome ſay but one year, and then was driven away by Bernulſe. This Bernulſe in the third year of his Reign, yet durſt adventure to graple with Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons, with whom he fought a bloudy Battel at a Place called Ellandune, but was defeated. This Ellandune is now called Wilton, ſituate upon the River Willey, whence it hath taken its latter Name, and imparted it to the whole Shire, called Wiltſhire, of which it ſome time was the Head. In the Saxon times it mightily flouriſhed. The Danes ſorely diſtreſſed it, yet fell it not ſo much to decay till the Biſhops of Salisbury turned another way the common Road, which formerly lay through it into the Weſtern Countries. Then by degrees fell it to ruine, and now is but as it were a ſmall Village, having nothing to boaſt of but a Mayor and a very fine Houſe of the Earls of Pembroke, raiſed out of the Ruines of the old Monaſtery. But moſt overtopped it was by Sorbiodunum, and now by Salisbury, which aroſe out of the Ruines of this laſt mentioned City. But as for its Name of Ellandune, one rationally conjectures, that this River Willey is the ſame with Alan, which Ptolemy mentions in this Coaſt of the Countrey.

Apud Simeon. Dunelm. hoc modo: In Clent, in Condale Kenelm Kingis Bern, lith undir thorn hed by rened.

Ceolwulfe made King.

Then Bernulſe.

Who was defeated at Ellandune by Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons.

Sax. Annal ad An. ꝺCCCXXIII. Ellenꝺune.

Cambden.

15. The defeat received by Bernulſe at Ellandune, was but a prelude to a greater Miſchief, which happened to him the ſame year. Offa as we have ſaid had ſeized on the Kingdom of the Eaſt Angles, whither he now repairing as to part of his Dominions, the Inhabitants met him in the Field and ſlew him, then doubting what might be the Conſequence, for fear of the Mercians they ſubmitted themſelves both King and People to the Sovereignty of Egbert. After him was King one Ludecan, who keeping in his mind the Inſolence of the Eaſt Angles, after two years Reign prepared to be revenged on them, but failed in the attempt, being ſlain with his five Captains, or as the Saxon hath it, his Aldermen. To him ſucceeded one Wiglaf or Withlaf, who was preſently expelled by Egbert, and three years continued in Exile. At the end thereof being touched with Compaſſion, Egbert ſuffered him to return, but to hold the Kingdom of him as his Tributary Vaſſal, paying him and his Son the thirteen years he reigned a ſum of money. In the ſame Capacity reigned Berthulfe his Succeſſour, and juſt ſo long a time, who at laſt by the Daniſh Pirates was driven beyond the Seas. After this Burhede having Married Ethelſuida the Daughter of King Athulfe the Son of Egbert, by ſo great an Alliance comforted himſelf both againſt his Tributary Eſtate and the frequent Depredations of the Pirates. But after two and twenty years he was conſtrained by them to quit his Countrey, whence he betook himſelf to Rome, and there died, and at the Engliſh School in St. Mary's Church was buried. His Wife he left behind him, but ſhe afterward followed him into Italy and died at Pavia. Then was the Kingdom of the Mercians by the Danes delivered to one Selwulfe the Servant of Burhrede, but during pleaſure. After a few years Alfrede the Nephew of Egbert obtained it. He Married Elfleda Siſter to Edward the Elder, who after her death laid the Kingdom of the Mercians to his own Dominions; Then this Principality which (ſaith Malmeſbury) by the madneſs of a Pagan man ſuddenly flouriſhed, through the miſerable ſluggiſhneſs of half a man utterly withered and came to nought: In the Eight Hundred and Seventy Fifth Year of our Lord.

Next to him reigned Ludecan.

Ƕeꞃ Lutecan Meꞃcna Cẏning ⁊ hiꞃu ealꝺoꞃmen mon oꝼꞅloh miꝺ him. ⁊ ƿigleꝼ ꝼenꝫ to ꞃice. Ad Ann. ꝺCCCXXV.

Then Wiglaf.

Berthulfe.

Burhede.

Alfrede.

SECT. IX.

The Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons. From the beginning thereof by Cerdick, to the Death of Egbert the firſt Engliſh Monarch.

The ſpace of Three Hundred and Eighteen years.

1. THE Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons, than which (ſaith Malmeſbury) Britain never ſaw any more magnificent or of longer continuance received its beginning from one Cerdick, and preſently arrived at an high pitch of Greatneſs. This man being by Birth a German, and Nobly deſcended, as the Tenth from Woden, having by homebred Conflicts molded his Mind to a warlike Temper, reſolved to quit his Countrey and become famous by his Arms abroad. Having fully ſetled his Reſolutions, he communicated his mind to his Son Cynrick, who was in all glorious Actions no farther behind him than that treading in his ſteps he ſeemed to tread upon his Heel. He eaſily conſenting to the Expedition into Britain, they came with their Forces in five Keels, in the Four hundred and ninety fifth year of our Lord, which was the fifth of the Emperour Anaſtaſius, the eighth of Esk King of Kent, the fifth of Ælla King of the South Saxons, in the days of Clodoneus the Firſt King of the Franks, in the Conſulſhip of Æmilius and Viator. His Pedigree is thus drawn from Woden; Bealdeag, Brandi, Fithogar, Freawine, Wig, Gewiſs, Eſla, Eleſæ, Cerdick or Certick.

Cerdick and his Son Cynrick arrive.

2. What entertainment they found at their Landing we have already told the Reader, and how by degrees they advanced and got ground. But this is to be farther obſerved, that the place where he Landed was not within the Bounds of that Kingdom which he afterward founded, and whereof we write. For Cerdiceſore, or Cerdicſhore, which is ſtill by the Inhabitants called Cerdikeſand, lay near to the old City Garianonum, which being decayed, and no Garriſon lying

The place where they Land.

Thence they Sail Weſtward.

Portſmouth, whence ſo called.

He overthrows the Britains at Cerdicksford.

there, as formerly to defend the Coaſt, Cerdick there landed, and after he had made ſore War upon the Iceni, or that part of this people eſpecially which inhabited Norfolk, ſailed thence to the Weſtern parts, where he erected the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons. And not long after, the Saxons getting ground every where, inſtead of Garianonum founded a new Town in that moiſt and wateriſh ground near the Weſt ſide of the River Yare (by the Britains called Guerne, by the Engliſh Saxons Gern and Jere) which from it they named Caꞃmuð and Lieꞃmuð. After the arrival of Port and his two Sons, which was in the ſeventh year, and not till then, Cerdick ſeems to have quitted theſe Eaſtern parts, and incouraged by intelligence received from him of his ſucceſs to have bent his courſe Weſtward; to be ſure the Battel fought with Nazaleod the Britain, Authours place after the coming of Port. But whereas it's ſtoried that Portſmouth from this Port received its Name, this was founded upon often erring Tradition. That famous Creek near which it ſtandeth being by Ptolemy termed Μέγας Λιμὴν, or the Great Haven, in reſpect of its wideneſs, like as that Portus Magnus in Africk, as Pliny witneſſeth. Yet probable it is that thereabout Port landed, who poſſibly might take a Sirname, or Nickname from the place, and not the place from him. This makes it more probable that as Portſmouth is in that Province we call Hantſhire, the landing of Cerdick in the Weſtern parts, after he had quitted the Eaſtern, was alſo in this ſame County. For hard by its Weſtern bounds, where the River Avon entreth into the Shire, it meets with the Ford of Cerdick, or Cerdicksford, afterward called Cerdeford, and now by contraction of the word Chardford, ſo named of Cerdick that valiant Engliſh Saxon. For here, ſaith our Antiquary, in a ſet Battel he ſo daunted the Britains, that he not onely inlarged the bounds of his Empire, but alſo delivered an eaſie War to his Poſterity, having in the year of our Salvation DVIII, after great Conflicts in this Tract, vanquiſhed the moſt mighty King of the Britains Natanleod, called alſo Nazaleod by others, with many of his People. Of whoſe Name likewiſe a ſmall Region reaching to this place was termed Natanleod, as we reade in the Annals of the Engliſh Saxons: which I ſought very curiouſly for, but hitherto could not find ſo much as any ſmall ſign or token of that Name, neither can I gueſs who that Natanleod ſhould be. But moſt certain it is, that Aurelius Ambroſius at the very ſame time fought in this Tract with the Saxons, with alternative Fortune, and yet theſe Chronicles of the Engliſh no where made mention of him; as who (a thing that I have obſerved) being overmuch affectionate to themſelves, reported onely their own fortunate Battels and Victories, but never mentioned their Foils and Overthrows. Thus Cambden.

Ceꞃꝺiceꞅ
hoꞃa Ceꞃ-
ꝺiceꞅ ꝼoꞃꝺ.

3. Concerning this the Reader muſt call to mind what we have already ſaid, and farther take notice that Cerdiceſhore and Cerdicesford are two ſeveral places at a great diſtance, the one in Norfolk and the other in Hampſhire, when he reads of them in the Engliſh Annals. And where he finds the Saxon Annals, and from them the Archdeacon of Huntingdon relating how Stuf and Witgar the Nephews of Certic arrived at Certiceſore, he may conclude that Certicesford is rather to be read, for e'er their coming he had quitted the Eaſtern parts and had fought the great Battel with Natanleod, except we imagine that they knew not of his quitting the Coaſt of Norfolk and came thither to find him, which not being able to doe, after a Victory obtained over the Britains they betook themſelves again to their three Keels, and followed after; but Huntingdon writes as if by the Victory they obtained over the Britains, at their landing, made the Name of Cerdic terrible, ſo that it muſt have been fought in conjunction with him. However, after this their uniting with him he became much ſtronger and victorious, and got ſuch ground of the Neighbouring Britains, that at length the Territories he had conquered ſeemed to him capable of receiving a Royal Title; yet was not this till three and twenty years after his coming into the Iſland; ſo valiant, nay pertinacious were the Britains, that they did not eaſily quit their Counties nor give them up, being not diſcouraged by one or two Defeats received, but were overpowered at laſt by Numbers, however the Saxon Writers have concealed the particulars from us. But then did he by aſſuming the title of King, which was devolved upon his Poſterity, begin the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons, ſo called from their ſituation in the Iſland, as Geᵹuẏꞅiꞅ from Gewis his great Grandfather, a Kingdom which at length became the Kingdom of Kingdoms, conſtraining all the reſt to ſubmit unto it. The beginning thereof fell in the ſecond year of Juſtin the Elder Emperour, the Conſulſhip of the Emperour himſelf and Eutharicus Cilica, in the days of Childebert King of the Franks, the Eighth of Otha King of Kent, A. D. DXIX, ſeventy one years after the firſt coming of the Engliſh Saxons into Britain, twenty ſeven after the begin-

Aſſumes the Title of King.

⁊ ꞅiþþan ƿicꞅaðon ƿeꞅꞇ ꞅeaxa cẏne beaꞃn oꝼ ðæm
dæᵹe.
Chronol. Sax.
ad An. DXIX.
Gevisſi.

beginning of the Kingdom of the South Saxons, ſeven before the beginning of that of the Eaſt Saxons, eight and twenty before that of the Northumbrians, and an hundred and ſeven before the beginning of Peuda the firſt King (worth notice) of the Mercians. By degrees it grew upon all, and at length ſwallowed up the reſt; though by its Antiquity therefore it preceded ſeveral of them, yet thought we fit to cloſe their number with it, together with this caution to the Reader.

And gives it to his Son Cynric.

Hence another Engagement with Cerdic and his Saxons.

4. Though Cerdic had aſſumed the title of King, and gave it as appears from the Saxon Annals, to his Son Cynric, yet were not the Britains therewith affrighted, but more provoked to diſpoſſeſs him of what they thought they had a better right than he. In the very ſame year they endeavoured to unking him, for though the Annals tell us that he fought againſt the Britains at Cerdicesford, yet it ſhould rather be ſaid that the Britains fought againſt him, for they came to him, not he to them, this being the place of his firſt landing in theſe Parts. Henry of Huntingdon tells the Story with great advantage on the ſide of the Saxons, though upon what ground we know not, the Annals onely affirming that from this day forward, Royal Off-ſpring (meaning his) reigned over the Weſt Saxons, and indeed that he had the better is probable enough, as that thereby he made ſit faſt on his head the Diadem, which he had aſſumed in the City of Wincheſter, as tells us the greater Chronicle of Thomas Radburn. Seven years he ſpent, for any thing we can find, in fortifying the Places he had already gained; but in the year that followed he fought another Battel with the Britains, in another place from him alſo called Cerdicks Lea, with what ſucceſs we are ignorant, but good ground there is to believe the Britains here victorious, becauſe where the Saxons had the better, their Annals never uſe to be ſilent. Yet this muſt make us think on the other ſide, that ſometimes they are modeſt, becauſe after this Battel he very much inlarged his Bounds. For after two years he and his Son conquered the Iſle of Wight, and ſlew many men in the place called Wihtgarabirig, as the Annals or Saxon Chronology affirms. Others tell us from theſe Annals, that being the firſt Engliſh Saxon, that ſubdued the Iſland, he granted it unto Stuffa and Whitgar, who jointly together ſlew well nigh all the Britiſh Inhabitants (for few there were of them remaining) in Whitgaraburg, a Town ſo called from Whitgar, and now by Contraction ſhortned into Caresbroke.

Lib. 2. c. 1.

A Third.

After which he conquered the Iſle of Wight.

Ad An. DXXX. Cambden.

5. But as the Annals call the Iſland by the Name of Wiht, and this Man Wihtgar I cannot but ſuſpect this Name to have been the Name of his Office, and that he was made by his Uncle Cerdic the Keeper or Guarder of the Iſland, firſt, and then four * years after, and that wherein he died beſtowed it on him, and his Brother Stuffe (his two Nephews) as a Legacy, for this gift they mention the very year they ſpeak of his death. From him this Town which ſeems to have been the place of his Reſidence, received its Name as he had his Title from the Iſland. This ſame year Cerdic died, after he had reigned ſixteen years, leaving all his Kingdom except the Iſle of Wight, as Malmesbury obſerves, to his Son Cynric. This Cynric the Annals ever join with his Father, ſo that he ſeems to have reigned jointly with him before, but now came to the ſole Management of that Power, he left him in the ninth year of Juſtinian the Emperour, in the Conſulſhip of Beliſarius, the fourth year of Iremerick King of Kent, and about the ninth year after that Erkenwin had begun the Kingdom of the Eaſt Saxons, A. D. DXXXV. For matters of War he is ſaid no whit to have been inferiour to his Father, yet at his beginning do we hear little of him, his great care being to preſerve what he had, his Father had got already rather than by ſtriving for more, when what he had was not yet confirmed, he being in danger of loſing all. In his fourth year the Annals mention an Eclipſe of the Sun, which fell out on the fifteenth of February, whereon that Luminary was darkened from Morning to Evening. Two years after it was ſo darkened again on the fifteenth of June, that Stars appeared till paſt three of the Clock. Four years after, died Wightgar in the Iſle of Wight, and by his burial there gave Name to Wightgarabirig, as in thoſe days they called it.

Beſtows it on his Nephews Wihtgar and Stuffe.

Dies.

Cynric reigns alone.

2 Eclipſes of the Sun.

Ad An. DXXXIV.

Ad An. DXXXVIII.

Iidem ad An. DXL.

He overthrows the Britains at Salisbirig.

6. At length we hear again of Cynric at the eighteenth year of his Reign, of his giving battel then to the Britains, as a place called Seaꞃobẏꞃiᵹ, where he put to flight the Britiſh Welſh, as the Annals now term them, they being by this time moſt of them either killed or driven into Wales, or other foreign Countries. This Searobyrig called Salesbirig, being the ſame which the Saxons alſo termed Seaꞃẏꞅbyꞃiᵹ, the vulgar Latiniſts Sarum, Sariſburia and Saliſburialia, the Name of Searesbirig, having proceeded from Sorbiodunum, by addition of the Saxon word Bẏꞃiᵹ, which ſignifies a Burge or Town inſtead of Dunum, which the Britains and

Ad An. DLII.

* Meæ ſententia accedit illud Henrici Huntingdonenſis: Eandem autem Inſulam, quæ ſcil. Latinè dicitur Vecta dederunt quarto poſt hunc anno duobus Nepotibus ſuis Stuff. & Witgar. Wihtgar verbatim Wihtæ Cuſtos ſeu defenſor. Gard & Wardidem, non ſemper autem adjicitur id, ut in Ead-gar & multis aliis.

Galls were wont to add to places ſeated on higher Ground, ſuch as this Sorbiodunum was. For Sorniodunum is by Interpretation the Dry Hill, and upon an high Hill this City is mounted. Kinric was the firſt of all the Engliſh Saxons, that forced it after he had got a notable Victory over the Britains, which ſo much incouraged him, that four years after this he and his Son Ceaulin, ingaged with them again at a Place called Beranbyrig. The Archdeacon of Huntingdon, whereſoever he had his Collections, tells the ſtory with various Circumſtances. The Britains ſaith he to take off that War which lay with ſuch Confuſion upon them, and they had endured for five years, gathering together a numerous and well inſtructed Army, put themſelves into a poſture of fighting at Beranburi. And when they had formed nine ſeveral Battalia's, which Number in War is moſt convenient, three in the front, three in the middle, and three in the Rere, having appointed to each Body its fitting Officers, and placed their Archers, thoſe that uſed Darts conveniently with their Horſe according to the Roman Cuſtome, the Saxons in one Body fell moſt boldly upon them. Their Standards they caſt down and defaced, and breaking their Lances fought it out with dint of Sword, till the Evening approached, the Victory being ſtill very doubtfull. Neither need this ſeem wonderfull, they being Men of extraordinary Stature, Vigour and Courage, although in our Days the Armies as well of the one as the other at the firſt onſet are eaſily put to flight; conſiſting now of ſuch Men as both in reſpect of their Stature, Vigour and Courage are inconſiderable; ſo much he. As for the Place of the Battel, this Beranbyrig is that Town now called Banbury, ſituate upon the River Charwell in the County of Oxford. About this Town are found Coins of the Roman Emperours, which argue for the Antiquity of the Place. Now the fame of it is for Cheeſe, Cakes, and ſuch like things, and lately it could ſhew a Caſtle built by Alexander Biſhop of Lincoln (for to the See of Lincoln it belonged, as did many other good Houſes, and Manors now ſwallowed by the iniquity of times) who deſiring to dwell ſtately, rather than quietly, by his vaſt Structures of this kind brought himſelf into many troubles.

Gives them another defeat at Beranbyrig.

To Cynric ſucceeds Ceaulin.

7. Cynric died after he had reigned ſix and twenty years, and was ſucceeded by Ceaulin his Son in the five and thirtieth year of Juſtinian the Emperour, about the beginning of the Reign of Clothair King of the Franks, the ſame year that Ethelbert became King of Kent, the third of Alla King of the Northumbrians. A. D. DLXI. Ceaulin was a Man of ſuch metal of warlike Enterprizes, that, as Malmesbury phraſeth, it to the Engliſh Saxons he became an object of wonder, to the Britains of hatred, and to both of them the Authour of Deſtruction. Now had theſe Saxons been in Britain for the ſpace of an hundred and twenty years, all which time they had been ſo employed in chuſing and ſetling their new Poſſeſſions, that having ſpace enough (a little ſeems much to them that have none) they agreed well enough amongſt themſelves, and united upon occaſion againſt them, whom their Intereſt had made their common Enemies. But now having pretty well ſecured their new (however got) Poſſeſſions, they had more leiſure to be proud and idle, and having much, began to think they had not enough, and to envy the Conditions of one another. In the Weſt and North they had ſtill indeed work enough to defend their own, and ſtill provoked by ambition, and Covetouſneſs to wreſt more out of the Hands of the Poor diſtreſſed Britains, but toward the South-Eaſt the Coaſt was clear, not a Britain left either to diſturb or be diſturbed, ſo that theſe Princes having nothing elſe to work upon, muſt needs find work amongſt thoſe of their own Nation, not enduring to be idle while they were ſo employed, to be mere Gazers upon the Actions of others, and to hear every day of their Conqueſts, Trophies and Spoils, now began to feel and perceive they had bounds to their Dominions, and however their Clothes ſeemed to be wide in the Infancy of their Kingdoms, now they complained they were ſtrait laced. The firſt that betrayed this reſtleſs humour, was Ælla King of the South Saxons, who as Beda tells us was the firſt of theſe Kings, that commanded all the Provinces of the Engliſh, lying Southward of the River Humber. His Kingdom was not large, and his work was narrow, having quickly diſpoſſeſſed the ancient Inhabitants, ſo that having time to look about him, and leiſure enough to attempt any Enterprize, he awed the reſt who ſtill all of them except the King of Kent, had work enough, time and ſtrength little enough to be employed againſt the Britains, to win and ſettle thoſe Poſſeſſions which they had already obtained, and either convenience or ambition ſtill provoked them to obtain. They were forced to give him good words, and admit of his Superiority, obey his Commands without oppoſition. Not one blow can we find, this procured amongſt them.

Civil Wars among the Saxons in Britain.

Ælla King of the South Saxons begins.

Lib. 2. c. 5.

8. He

Then Ethelbert King of Kent.

8. He being dead and gone, and his Poſterity degenerating, ſome twenty years after Ethelbert came to be King of Kent, who receiving from his Anceſtours a quiet poſſeſſion of that Canton of the Iſland, grudged himſelf thus confined unto a Corner. Wealth and Idleneſs pricked him, and begat the Itch of ambition, which was vehemently provoked by this reflexion, that he was the Great, Great Grandchild (as we improperly ſpeak, rather he his Great, Great Grandfather) the Heir and Succeſſour of Hengiſt, that great Captain the firſt Leader of the Saxons, the firſt that gave them opportunity of obtaining this Wealth and Honour, to whoſe Sceptre it was but juſt and fit, that they ſhould truckle and ſubmit. This was a fair pretence where there was a ſharp Sword to back it, but Intereſt and preſent Poſſeſſion afford deaf Ears to matters of Right, much more of Honour and Reputation. Ethelbert could eaſily give Laws to the South Saxons, the Weſtern were the great object of his Envy, which was increaſed by that opportunity, which the nearneſs of their ſituation ſuggeſted to him. While Ceaulin was buſied in the ſettlement and inlargement of his own Kingdom, in which Employment he had now ſpent Eight years, he invades his Territories. Ceaulin his Affairs requiring he ſhould ever be in readineſs, was not unprepared for him, but ſpeedily made head againſt him, and with Cutha gave him Battel at a Place called Wibbandune, where he gave him a great overthrow, Oſlac and Cnebban, his Ealdormen or great Officers, being ſlain together with a great multitude of the inferiour ſort, and drove him back into his Kentiſh Quarters. The Archdeacon of Huntingdon obſerves, that this was the firſt War which the Kings of the Engliſh Saxons waged amongſt themſelves, the firſt Battel fought on the account of a Civil Quarrel.

Who invading Ceaulin is overthrown.

Annal. Saxonic. ad Ann. DLXVIII. Heꞃ Cƿealin ⁊ Cuƿa ᵹeꝼuhꞇon ƿiþ Æꝺelbyꞃꞇ ⁊ hine Cenꞇ ᵹeꝼlymꝺon ⁊ ꞇƿeᵹen ealꝺoꞃmen on ƿibbanꝺune oꝼꞅlogon Oꞅlac ⁊ Cnebban.

9. Ceaulin did not purſue him into Kent, or revenge the Injury and Violence at this time, his main concerns lying at home againſt the Britains. Notwithſtanding all the Attempts of him and his Predeceſſours, ſtill they continued and held many Places on every ſide him. Yet the firſt ingagement we meet with in the Annals of thoſe that happened in his time, was that of the eleventh year of his Reign betwixt Cuthwulfe, whom Huntingdon calls his Brother, and confounds him with Cutha, at Bedanford which Huntingdon interprets of Bedford, which now ſaith he is the Head of the Circumjacent Province. He came off with Victory, as an effect whereof he took in four Towns, Liganburk, Æglesburk, Benningtun and Egoneſham, that is ſuch as afterward received theſe Names from their New Maſters, for Saxon they are and not Britiſh. But Cuthwulfe ſurvived his Victory not long, dying the very ſame year that theſe things happened. For ſix years after this we hear of no Action, as if Ceaulin by his Brother's death was deſtitute of a Commander. But ſix years after he took his Son Cuthwine with him in his ſtead, and again made War upon the Britains, of whom were ſlain three Kings, Comail, Condidan and Farinmail, at a place called Deorham, which done they ſubdued three notable Cities, viz. Gleawanceſtre, Cyrenceſtre and Bathanceſter. This Deorham is a little Town in Gloceſterſhire, not far from Severn, at this day called Derham, where are yet to be ſeen huge Rampires and Trenches, as Fortifications of their Camps, and other moſt apparent Monuments here and there of ſo great a War. Gleawanceſtre is that we call Gloceſter, in Antonine named Glevum from Glaw in Britiſh, which ſignifieth Fair or Goodly, the Britains ſtill calling it Caer Glaw. Being built by the Romans as a Curb to the Silures, it was thus wreſted out of the Hand of the Britains, firſt by Ceaulin. Afterward the Mercians won it, under whom it flouriſhed in great Honour, and Oſrick King of Northumberland by permiſſion of Ethelrede the Mercian, founded there a great and ſtately Nunnery, where Kineburga, Eadburga and Eva Queens of the Mercians, were ſucceſſively Prioreſſes one after another. And Edelfleda that moſt Noble Lady of the Mercians, adorned it with a Church. Cyrenceſter, that we now call Circeſter and Circiter; called Corinium by Ptolemy, and by Antonine, Durocornovium, from the River Corin (now Churn) upon which it ſtandeth, fifteen Miles diſtant from Glevum or Gloceſter, upon the Roman High Street. Bathanceſter, is that we now call Bath in Somerſetſhire, on which we are told, the Saxons for a long time durſt not ſet, but left it to the Britains, till Ceaulin had defeated him at Deorham. Then it yielded after a furious aſſault, and within few years recovering ſome ſtrength grew up again, and therewith got a new Name of * Akmancheſter. For Osbrick in the year DCLXXVI, founded a Nunnery there, and immediately after when the Mercians had got it under them, King Offa built another Church, both which in the time of the Daniſh Broils were overthrown, and out of the Ruines of them both aroſe another Church, wherein Eadgar ſirnamed the Peace-maker, being crowned Ceaulin overthrows the Britains in two pitch'd Battels.

Ad An. DLXXI.

Ad An. DLXXXVII.

And takes ſeveral places, as Deorham,

Gleawanceſtre.

Cyrenceſter.

* Ak ægrotus. Ache eodem ſenſu hodie durat, atque optimè huic loco quadrat iis maximè ſaluber, qui artubus ſuis doloribus laborant quos nos Anglico Sermone Aches dicimus.

Sect. 9.

crowned King beſtowed upon the Citizens very many Immunities, the Memory of which they yearly celebrate with ſolemn Plays. But thus were the Britains diſpoſſeſſed of theſe Countries for ever by this King of the Weſt Saxons, though afterward all theſe three Places with the Territories about them, fell into the Hands of their Neighbours the Mercians.

Another Victory over the Britains.

Ceaulin at laſt is defeated at Wodensbeorlige.

10. No other Battel do we reade of that was fought betwixt theſe Nations, although probably many Conteſts and Skirmiſhes happened till the ſeventh year after, when Ceaulin and Cutha ingaged with the Britains, in a place called Fethanleage. Here Cutha loſt his Life, but the Annals tell us, that Ceaulin took Towns, not a few, beſides Plunder without meaſure, yet in great wrath and indignation he returned home. Here one would ſuſpect it were for the death of Cutha; but Huntingdon writes that a moſt dreadfull fight being fought, Cuthwine was oppreſſed by the multitudes of his Enemies, overpowered and ſlain. The Engliſh were overthrown and put to flight; but Ceaulin coming in, in good time, cauſed them to rally, and ſetting on afreſh, conquered the Conquerers, which done, in the purſuit he became Maſter of many Territories and innumerable Spoils. Thus flouriſhed he, ſeeming not to court but to command Victory, while all, as well Enemies as Friends, ſtood wondering and looking on. But extraordinary Proſperity cannot be called Felicity, ending moſt commonly in extraordinary Miſery. His Brother he loſt, and as Malmesbury tells us, his Son of the ſame name was killed before his face. His great Succeſs and Power, as it procured fear, ſo envy and hatred, while all that heard but of him, ſuſpected preſently their own Eſtates. This made not onely friends but foes to agree in this, to put a ſtop to his formidable greatneſs, ſo that Britains and Engliſh conſpiring together, gave him Battel at a place called Wodensbeorlige, where ſo great a ſlaughter was made of his Men that he was totally defeated, and he who ſo lately commanded all on this ſide the River Humber, was now forc't in a forlorn condition to hide his Head, and lurk in ſome obſcure place, a baniſhed Man from his own Dominions, a miſerable ſpectacle of the inconſtancy of ſublunary things. This Wodensbeorlige is now called Wodensburge, a little Village in Wiltſhire near to that Ditch of wonderfull work, which being caſt up for many Miles together, divideth the middle of this Shire from Eaſt to Weſt. The People dwelling thereabout, call it Wanſdike, and upon an errour generally received, they talk that it was made by the Devil upon a Wedneſday. But in the Saxon Tongue it is called Wodeneſdic, or the Dike of Woden, who here perhaps was worſhipped by the Pagan Saxons, or being a thing of great conſequence was dedicated to him. Malmesbury writes, that this great Battel was fought at it, not mentioning Wodensburge, and it's very probable that the Saxons made it to divide the two Kingdoms of the Weſt Saxons and Mercians aſunder, this being the very place of Battel between them, while they ſtrove one with another to inlarge their Dominions. For beſides this Battel betwixt Ceaulin and the Saxons, and Britains, who joyned together; at this Dike, to ſay nothing of other accidents, Ina the Weſt Saxon afterward, and Cealrede the Mercian joyned Battel, and departed the Field on even terms. It was their cuſtome to make ſuch Ditches, ſuch was that of Offa, of which we have already ſpoken. Others are alſo to be ſeen among the Eaſt Angles in Cambridgeſhire and Suffolk, wherewith they bounded their Territory, and defended themſelves from the Inrodes and violence of the Mercians.

Being driven into exile dies.

Ad. An. DXCIII.

Is ſucceeded by Ceolric.

11. Ceaulin being thus driven into exile, when he had Reigned one and thirty years, died ſhortly after, in the ſecond year, ſay the Annals, and together with him periſhed Cuichelme and Crida, the ſame year that Ethelfrith began his Reign over the Northumbrians. This his Cataſtrophe, was the high advancement of Ethelbert King of Kent, who for the reaſons but now alledged, having high deſigns in his Head, was hitherto hindred from bringing them to perfection by the greater abilities and ſucceſs of Ceaulin. By this time he had well ripen'd his Ambition with more general obſervation and experience in war, and what he formerly, when raw and unpractis'd, had attempted, now ſucceſsfully attained, and by degrees brought all the other Kingdoms between Kent and Humber to be at his Devotion, that of the Weſt Saxons the firmeſt of all, being now in a very low condition: this gave him the main advantage, being humbled to his hand; the reſt yielded not ſubjection, but as he earn'd it by continual Victories and the Terrour which they procured, his Reputation being farther ſtrengthened by his Marriage with Bertha, Daughter to a King of the Franks. But to return to the Kingdom of Weſtſex, in its deplorable eſtate, Ceolric the Nephew of Ceaulin, by his Brother Cutha undertook its protection, and as he could in ſo tickliſh times, ordered

Sect. 9.

Then followed Ceolwulf.

dered the affairs thereof for five years. After him followed Ceolwulf his Brother, who for all the fourteen years he governed, was perpetually employed, either againſt the Engliſh, Britains, Picts or Scots, and came off with advantage. Yet have we nothing particular concerning theſe great attempts; onely this is mention'd, that the ſame year that Ethelfrith warred againſt the Britains of Cheſter, he made war upon the South Saxons. It muſt be remembred that Ethelbert of Kent outlived him, and therefore he having all his Life the ſuperiority over all the other Kings, he durſt not attempt any thing againſt him, it muſt have been againſt his fellow Vaſſals; and as for the Picts and Scots, he lying at ſuch a diſtance from them, his warring againſt them, muſt have been in giving aſſiſtence to the Northumbrians their next Neighbours. He dying after he had Reigned fourteen years, Cynegils the Son of Ceolric (or, as the Annals call him, Ceol) ſucceeded him. The Tranſlatour of the Annals talks of his, and Quichelm taking the Government upon them in the ſame year. But the Annals themſelves ſay no ſuch thing, and Huntingdon writes, that he took his Brother Kichelm in the fourth year of his Reign, to be his Collegue in the Kingdom.

Ꝼeahꞇ ⁊ ƿon.

Heꞃ Cyneᵹylꞅ ꝼenᵹꞇo ꞃice on ƿeꞅꞇ Seaxum ⁊ heolꝺ XXXI. ƿinꞇꞃa. Cyneᵹilꞅ ƿæꞅ Ceoling. Ceol Cuþaning Cynꞃicing. Ad. An.DCXI.

Next Cynegils and Quicelm. Who Reigned joyntly.

12. Cynegils began his Reign in the ſecond year of Heraclius the Emperour, the two and fiftieth of Ethelbert King of Kent, the twentieth of Ethelfrith the fierce King of the Northumbrians, A. D. DCXII. The Monk of Malmesbury writes, that Cinegiſle and Quicelm, the Sons of Celric, put on the Enſigns of the Kingdom with equal Authority, they were both ſtout Perſons, and contend betwixt themſelves in the mutual Offices of Piety which ſhould exceed, inſomuch, that in reſpect of their Concord, not uſual among Kings, they may be propounded as a Miracle to the preſent, and an Example to future times. Many Wars they waged, one cannot diſtinguiſh whether with greater valour or moderation, either againſt the Britains or Peuda King of the Mercians, a Man exceedingly dextrous in the ſurprizing feats of War, who having paſſed beyond his own Bounds, while he labours to get Cireceſter into his hands, was not able to bear the ſhock of theſe unanimous Kings, but with a few in his Company ran away. Quicelm is not a little blamed, for hiring an Aſſaſſinate to murther Edwin King of the Northumbrians, a Man of approved wiſedom. But if that gentile ſaying be conſidered, Dolus an virtus quis in hoſte requirat, he will eaſily find excuſe having done nothing unuſual, and led by a deſire to remove out of the way by any means he could, one who ſtudied his own deſtruction. For from the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons, he had before this wreſted much, and at that time irritated by the injury recieved, the old grudges now coming to remembrance, practiſed many things which tended to their great damage. But the Kings eſcaped, to whom not long after, by the Preaching of Binnus the Biſhop, the Heavenly Doctrine was revealed, in the twenty fifth year of their Reign, and the fortieth after the coming of St. Auguſtine, the Apoſtle of the Engliſh. Cinegiſle was preſently won, and abaſing his Royal Loftyneſs, willingly ſubmitted himſelf to the Prieſt in Baptiſm. Quicelm wrinched a little, till by the health of his Body, admoniſhed that he ſhould not neglect the Salvation of his Soul he imitated the devotion of his Conſort, and died the ſame year. But Cinegiſle, for ſix years after, enjoying long quiet and repoſe, ended his Life in the one and thirtieth of his Reign.

Who beat the Britains at Beamdune in Dorſetſhire.

13. Thus much Malmesbury in general, concerning the joynt Government of theſe Kings, we ſhall add what particulars we can light upon in theſe obſcure times. The firſt is the Battel, which in the third or fourth year of Cynegils they fought againſt the Britains, at a place called Beamdune, where were ſlain of the ſaid Britains, two thouſand and ſix and forty. Huntingdon here tells us, that they were frighted at the very ſight of their Enemies, and at the firſt onſet threw down their Enſigns and fled. Others write, that it was a doubtfull and dangerous Battel, each one uſing his conjecture, rather than having any thing certain from the Monuments of Antiquity, whereon to fix this. We may eaſily believe that this Beamdune was that Town of Dorſetſhire, ſituate upon the River Frome, which at this day is known by the Name of Bindon. As for that attempt which Quichelm made to take away the Life of Edwin, we muſt remember that this Prince was the fifth, whoſe Authority extended it ſelf over all the Provinces of the Engliſh Saxons, greater in this reſpect than any of the other four, that their Territories were now ſubject to him, but his Dominions never had been in their Power, to which a bound was ever put by the River Humber. He had made bold in ſeveral reſpects, as well with the Weſt Saxons as with others, and would give Law to them all. What therefore could not be done by fair, Quichelm reſolved to effect by foul means; for foul it was, never to be excuſed or reconcileable with Heꞃ Cyneᵹilꞅ ⁊ Cƿichelm ᵹefuhꞇon on Beamꝺune. ⁊ oꝼꞅoᵹon ꞇƿa ðuꞅenꝺo ƿeala ⁊ XLVI. Ad.An.DCXV.

Bed.Hiſt.lib.2. c.9.

with generoſity, even in any Enemy. But the thing was this, as we have it from the Authentick Hiſtory of Beda himſelf. A certain Aſſaſſinate named Eumere, was ſent from Quichelm the King of the Weſt Saxons, to kill King Edwin. Pretending a Meſſage from his Maſter, he runs upon him with an envenomed weapon (that in caſe the ſteel did not, the poyſon might take effect) near the River Derwent, where ſtood at that time the King's Palace. This being perceived by Lilla a faithfull and loving Servant of the King's ſtanding by, he interpoſed himſelf and was ſtabbed, the King alſo received a little hurt by the blow through his Body. The Aſſaſſinate killed another Souldier called Forthere, and at laſt was killed himſelf and cut in pieces. The King was exceedingly diſturbed at the villany, but his grief was a little mitigated by a Daughter, of which his Queen was brought to Bed the night following. He gave thanks therefore unto his Gods, which being overheard by Paulinus the Biſhop, he expoſtulated it with him, affirming that the Queen through his Prayers had been delivered without much pain. The King well pleaſed to hear that, promiſed that he would believe in Chriſt, in caſe he would give him Victory over Quichelm, and as a pledge of his promiſe commanded his little Daughter to be Chriſtened, which was done, the Name of Eanfleda being given her, and with her were Baptized twelve others of the Family. Then did he raiſe an Army and lead it againſt Quichelm, and beginning a War, either killed all that had been of the Conſpiracy, or had them delivered up unto him. To this Matthew of Weſtminſter adds, that Quichelm he ſlew in the place, which from him is called in the Language of the Engliſh Quichelmes haune to this day. In teſtimony of the Victory he gave this Name to the Place, and ſo in triumph returned home.

They invade Sebert King of the Eaſtern Saxons.

And wage War with Peuda King of the Mercians.

14. The Paſſage concerning the death of Quichelm is ſuch as agrees not with other Authours, nor can we believe it true, being placed by the Flowergatherer before the Battel betwixt Kinegils and Peuda, at which other Writers unanimouſly affirm Quichelm to have been preſent. But he, and Florentius of Worceſter, otherwiſe alſo differ from ſome of their fellow Hiſtorians about this Perſon, he calling him Quichelm, and both of them accounting him the Son of Kinegils, whereas others ſpeak of him as of his Brother; but to ſay truth, the Annals make him his Son. Next after this Battel betwixt them and Edwin, that is placed by the Archdeacon of Huntingdon, which he affirms, they fought with the two Sons and Succeſſours of Sebert the King of the Eaſtern Saxons. He makes them to have been the Aggreſſours, ſays, that being more in number they fought boldly but unfortunately. For both of theſe young men were killed, and ſcarcely could any of their Souldiers eſcape their flight, being intercepted both by the Mountains of dead Bodies, and the Torrents of bloud. In the third year after he placeth their fight with Peuda King of the Mercians at Cirenceſter, where aſſembled very great Armies on both ſides, and (ſaith he) they fought it out with invincible Courage, till parted by the Intervention of Night and Darkneſs; and in the Morning when they were about to renew their fury, the Kings took up the Quarrel by a Truce, or ſome other Accommodation. What Circumſtances ſoever he may add concerning their Multitudes and the Intervention of Night, that ſuch a Fight there was, and a Ceſſation thereupon we are aſſured by the Annals. That firſt Kinegils, and then Quichelm was Baptized the year after they alſo confirm; and moreover, that this very year Quichelm died eight years after the fight with Peuda, and three years after the death of Edwin, who therefore could not kill him in the Battel lately mentioned, but yield himſelf he might into his Hands. Then laſtly for Cynegils, that he outlived him ſix years the ſaid Annals make manifeſt, placing the Succeſſion of his Son (for his Death they mention not) in the ſeventh year after the death of Quichelm.

Ad. An. DCXXVIII.

Ad An. DCXXXV & DCXXXVI.

Ad. An. DCXLIII.

Cenwalh begins his Reign.

Cenwalh Annal. Saxonic. aliis Kenwalh & Kenewalh, Cenwald.

Is driven out of his Kingdom by Peuda.

Returns.

Is Baptized.

15. Cenwalh the Son of Cynegils ſucceeded his Father in the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons in the third year of Ercombert King of Kent, the eighteenth of Peuda King of the Mercians the ſame that Oſwi began his Reign over the Northumbrians, A. D. DCXLII. By Malmesbury he is deſcribed a Prince in the beginning of his Reign to be compared with the worſt, in the middle, and the end with the beſt of Kings. Coming young to the Government, by Luxury he grew Inſolent, deſpiſing the Example ſet him by his Father, and lawfull Matrimony; but being by Peuda King of the Mercians, whoſe Siſter he had repudiated, ſet upon with War, he was driven out of his Kingdom, and fled to the King of the Eaſt Angles; whereby being diſciplined by Adverſity and the Perſwaſions of him that gave him Entertainment, he conſidered better of it, was fully perſwaded in the Faith, and recovered his Kingdom; where, to his Subjects, he preſented himſelf a welcome Miracle of alteration for the better, ſo valiant that he who formerly was not able to protect his own Territories, now twice overthrew the Britains, who remembring their ancient liberty fretted at their preſent condition, and therefore often plotted how they might ſucceſsfully rebell; firſt in the place called Witgeornesbrug, and again by the Hill called Pene. Upon Wulpher alſo the Son of Peuda he revenged the Injuries received from his Father, taking from him a good part of his Kingdom. So Religious he was, that firſt of all Saxon Kings he built at Wincheſter the moſt beautifull Church of that time, the pattern whereof was followed afterward in founding the Epiſcopal See, though in a more ſtately manner. So Munificent that nothing, even of his Patrimony, would he deny to his Kindred, as who beſtowed upon his Brother's Son well nigh the third part of his Kingdom. Theſe Royal Vertues of his were much excited by the Admonitions of Angilbert and Lutherius, ſucceſſively Biſhops of his Province.

Is kind to his Relations.

16. That Cenwalh was by Peuda driven away, the Saxon Annals do teſtifie, the year before he was Baptized; ſo that if he was not Baptized till his return out of Exile, as by the Annals it appears, he could not be abſent from his Kingdom three years, as both they and Beda affirm; but perhaps longer it was e'er he received Baptiſm. The King of the Eaſt Angles, to whom he fled, and who by his Advice brought him to a thorough underſtanding of himſelf was Auna, who afterward was ſlain by Peuda the Mercian, without any ſuccour or aſſiſtence received from him that we reade of. The kindneſs to his Relations appears from that great gift he gave to Cuthrede his Nephew the Son of Quichelm, and Grandſon of Cynegils, as in this place the Annals expreſly ſignifie, which was three thouſand Lands (as the Saxon terms them) by Æceſdune, which Huntingdon interprets of Villages, or poſſibly they might be ſo many Hides, as afterward were called the ordinary diviſion of Grounds; but the expreſſion uſed by Malmesbury of the third part of his Kingdom, ſeems to hint at as great a quantity as that whereof Huntingdon ſpeaks. As for the ſucceſs which after his return he had againſt his Enemies, Authours ſpeak variouſly thereof; for though Malmesbury and others talk of Victories, * Beda ſaith expreſly that he very often received moſt grievous Damages from them in his Kingdom. Four years after his Gift to Cuthrede the Annals make mention of his fighting at a Place called Bradanford upon the River Afene, but name none againſt whom he fought, neither tell they what the ſucceſs was. Cambden tells us it had the Name of Bradanford from the broadneſs of the Ford of Avon, which is there inlarged by receiving a little Rivulet; that it is now called Bradford in Wiltſhire, ſituate upon the deſcent of an Hill. Here he ſaith Cenwalh King of the Weſt Saxons imbrued his Sword with bloud in Civil-war againſt Cuthrede his near Kinſman. But he names no Authour from whom he had it. If ſo it was, either Cuthrede was guilty of much Ingratitude, or Cenwalh of much overſight and Inconſtancy.

Ad An. DCXLVIII. Heꞃ Cenƿalh ᵹeꞅealde Cuþꞃede hiꞅmæᵹe III ðuꞅendo londeꞅ be Aꞅceꞅdune. ꞅe Cuþꞃede ƿæꞅ Cƿichelminᵹ. Cuichelm Cẏneᵹilꞅinᵹ.

* Lib. 3. c. 7.

He overthrows the Britains in two ſeveral Battels.

17. As for the Battel fought againſt the Britains at Witgeornesbrug, there's none that makes mention of it beſide the Monk of Malmesbury himſelf, and upon his mere Credit it muſt lye. But there might well be ſuch a Fight; for when he was ſetled after his Reſtauration he undertook a War againſt them, or rather they againſt him, if Huntingdon may be believ'd, who writes, that they knowing full well how he had been beaten by Peuda, and driven him from his Kingdom, deſpiſed him as one not able to defend himſelf; and getting together a great number of men, in the pride of their Hearts made War upon him. And in the firſt ingagement the Britains ſeemed to make the Saxons give ground. But the Saxons deſiring rather to die than flie, ſo pertinaciouſly maintained the Fight, that the Britains were quite tired out, and their ſtrength melted away like Snow. They gave then their backs to the Conquerours, were chaſed from Pen as far as Pedrede, and an incurable wound was made in the Poſterity of Brutus in that day. Theſe are the words. The Annals confirm that he fought againſt the Britains or Welſh as they term them, and that he chaſed them as far as Pedridan. Pen, Cambden tells us, is now an obſcure Village not far from the River Juel in Somerſetſhire, though anciently famous, being ordained by deſtiny, as it may ſeem, to the overthrow both of Britains and Danes. For at this very place (ſaith he) Keniwalch a Weſt Saxon had ſuch a day of the Britains that ſcarcely ever after would they abide to enter the Field againſt the Engliſh Saxons. And many a year after that, King Edmund, ſirnamed Ironſide, gave there a notable foil to the Danes, as he purſued Canutus their King, then Uſurping the Crown of England, from place to place. Pedridan is a Town alſo in that County now of no account, except for the Market or Fair there held, but formerly the Royal Seat of King Ina, now called Pedderton from the River Pedred, (commonly Parret) which here runneth into Ivel and robbeth him of his Name.

Pedderton.

Dyes.

A ſtrange fight of Birds in the Air.

Ad. An. 672.

18. Not long after Cenwalh took occaſion to fall out with Wulhfere the Mercian, the Son of Peuda his old enemy, and gave him Battel at a place called Poſſentes Berig. Fabius Ethelward is ſingular in this ſtory, ſavouring much the Family of the Weſt Saxons, from which he himſelf was deſcended. He writes, that he took him Priſoner; But the Annals ſaying that he fought at this place in Eaſter Holydays, add that Wulfer haraſſwed all as far as Æſleſdune, the ſame year wherein died Cuthred the Son of Quichelm and King Cenbyrht. That Wulfere waſted the Iſle of Wight, and beſtowed the Inhabitants thereof on Ethelwald the King of the South Saxons, to whom he was Godfather, and that Eoppa the Prieſt by command of Wulfhere, and King Wulfhere himſelf, firſt were Authours of Baptiſm to the Inhabitants of the ſaid Iſland, which how it agrees with another affirmation of Beda, we ſhall ſee in a more proper place. We have no more to ſay of Cenwalh, than that he died after he had Reigned one and thirty years: we know not whether we ſhould take notice of what the Archdeacon of Huntingdon thinks to be worthy ſpecial remarque. The year before he died happened a mighty fight of Birds in England, which that you may believe to have been no impoſſible thing, he tells you that in his time the very ſame thing happened in Normandy, during the Reign of Henry the Firſt. About the City of Roven, ſuch Combats there were that thouſands of them were found ſlain upon the Earth, and the ſtrangers ſeemed to be put to flight. A ſign he counts it of the Battel fought betwixt the ſaid Henry then King of England, and Duke of Normandy, and the French King Lewis the Son of Philip. In which fight Henry remained Victor, and Lewis was routed and ran away. But as for Cenwalh, at his death, he left his Kingdom to the diſpoſal of his Wife Senburgh. But ſhe ſurviveded him not long, holding the Government but one year, which ended, the Nobility expelled her, diſdaining, as Matthew of Weſtminſter writes, to fight under the Banner of a Woman, though Malmeſbury ſays, ſhe ſtrenuouſly diſcharged all Offices of a good Ruler. It ſeems ſhe took it to heart, for ſhe died preſently after.

Several petty Kings.

As Sexburg.

Eſcuin.

Kentwin.

Ceadwalla.

Sets upon Edelwalch King of the South Saxons.

Seizes the Iſle of Wight.

Invades Kent.

Lib. 4. c. 12. Subreguli.

Sic Malmesb. at vero Annales Saxon. aliter eum à Cenrico derevant.

Ad. An. DCLXXIV.

Annal. ad An. DCLXXV.

Ad. An. DCLXXXI.

Lib. 4. c. 15.

Vide ejus ſtemma apud Annal. ad An. DCLXXXV.

19. Beda writes, that after the death of Cenwalh, very Petty Kings held the Kingdom divided among themſelves, and that for about ten years together, not mentioning Sexburg. Others ſpeak of Eſcuin the Son or Nephew of Cuthgiſt the Brother of Cynegils, who Reigned but two years, yet was not petty in his Actions; for he dared to grapple with Wulfhere King of the Mercians, with whom he fought a Battel at a place called Bedanhafde, and about a year after, both of them died. Kentwin the Son of Cynegils, after him aſſumed the Title, or as Beda hints, Reigned at the ſame time, being as the Monk notes as well as the other, of approved experience in War; for he defeated the Britains, as Eſcuin before him did the Mercians. Of this defeat we have no other account from the Annals than that he drove them as far as the Sea, but whence or to what Sea, we are far to ſeek. This they place five years after the beginning of Kentwin, and four years after this they tell us that Ceadwalla again began to ſeize on the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons. Thus much Beda writes concerning this Ceadwalla, that he was a moſt valiant young Man of the Royal ſtock of the Geviſſi, and being baniſhed his Countrey, came with an Army upon Edelwalch King of the South Saxons, whom he ſlew, and then cruelly with Fire and Sword haraſſed his Dominions. Malmesbury affirms, that being deſcended from Cutha the Brother of Ceaulin, he was a young Man of immoderate hope, who could not omit any occaſion of exerciſing his Valour. Having by his reſtleſs humour provoked the indignation of the Nobility, too powerfull a faction he excited againſt himſelf, and was driven to Baniſhment. Being conſtrained at this time to ſubmit to his Fortune, that he might make his County naked and defenceleſs, he took away with him all the youth, which either for love to his vertues, or in commiſeration of his ſufferings, willingly followed him. The firſt that underwent the violence of his fury, was Edelwalch King of the South Saxons, who was ſo bold as to grapple with him; but being routed with all his People, procured, as the effect of his raſhneſs, a late repentance. But Ceadwalla on the contrary, having by ſo great ſucceſs incouraged his Men, ſpeedily returned, and an unlooked for onſet eaſily drove away his Emulators. After this, enjoying the Kingdom two years, he gave many evident proofs of his Military Abilities. Bearing to the South Saxons an irreconcileable hatred, he deſtroyed alſo Edrich the Succeſſour of Edelwalch, who refuſed not, but boldly gave him Battel. The Inhabitants of the Iſle of Wight, who in confidence of aſſiſtence from the Mercians rebelled, he almoſt utterly deſtroyed. Over thoſe of Kent he often obtained Victory, and revenged ſufficiently upon them the death of his Brother. Amongſt other things memorable of him, it's hard to ſay with what Piety he was endued, even before his Baptiſm; for the Tithe of all his Spoils, he gave to Almighty God. In which thing, as we approve his affection, ſo we diſapprove his example, according to that ſaying: He that offers Sacrifice of the ſubſtance of the Poor, is as if he offered the Son in the preſence of the Father. But that he went to Rome to be Baptized, was there Baptized by Sergius the Pope, and called Peter, and as yet being in Albis (or within ſeven days after his Baptiſm) died, is more known than that it needs any relation from us.

Alkerne is chriſtened Peter, and dies.

20. So much doth Beda and Malmesbury write of Ceadwalla, which the Reader muſt take in the name of all the Engliſh writers. For the Hiſtory of the Britains and the Annals of the Engliſh do not agree about this King. The Annals ſay, he was the Son of Cenbyrht, deſcended from Ceaulin by Cutha, in the fourth degree, but the Britains affirm him the Son of Cadwallin their King, the ſame that ſlew Edwin and Oſwald, the Kings of the Northumbrians. Of this Cadwallin, they tell a ridiculous ſtory, that being ſpent with Age, after a Reign of eight and fourty years, the Britains embalming his Body, put it into an Image of Braſs, reſembling him, which they ſet upon a Brazen Horſe, over the Weſtern Gate of London, in memory of the great things he performed againſt the Engliſh: a lye which proceeded from ſome Monk of a brazen face, who could not be ignorant that London, long before this time, had been out of the hands of the Britains. Now they ſay alſo, that under the very Gate they built a Church in honour of St. Martin, wherein for him and the reſt of the faithfull deceaſed, divine obſequies might be for ever celebrated. In his Kingdom ſucceeded his Son Cadwalader, whom Beda calls Cadwalla, a young Man, whoſe Mother was Siſter to Peuda King of the Mercians, and Married by Cadwallin, after a reconciliation made with his Brother. All this as a ſtory attended with ſuch ridiculous circumſtances, we reject, betaking our ſelves to the Pedigree of Ceadwalla, which the Saxon Annals afford us, and the more ſure teſtimony of Beda, who affirms him of the * Royal ſtock of the Geviſſi. From the ſame Beda we muſt add to what we have formerly ſaid concerning his killing Ædilwalch King of the South Saxons, that though he had ſlain him, he was immediately driven away by Berchthun and Andhun, the King's Captains, who afterward held the Province of that Kingdom. Yet he farther adds, that the firſt of theſe Captains, when Ceadwalla came to be King of the Geviſſi, was killed by him, and the Province ſubjected to more grievous ſervitude than before. In the following Chapter he writes, that after Ceadwalla was poſſeſſed of the Kingdom of the Geviſſi, he took the Iſle of Wight, which before this time was wholly given to Idolatry, labouring by a tragical ſlaughter utterly to exterminate all the Natives, and to ſubſtitute in their rooms men of his own Province. From him it appears that one Arvald was at this time King of the Iſland, whoſe two Sons having taken, and reſolving to kill them, he permitted they ſhould be Baptized before they were put to death. But we cannot admit him for above a Regulus or Petty King, remembring that on this Ædilwalch King of the South Saxons, Wulfhere King of the Mercians, his Godfather, beſtowed this Iſle of Wight, whom Ceadwalla having ſlain in right of proſecution of War, entred and ſubdued this part of his Dominions, which lay ſo conveniently for him. From this time forward our Writers for a great while have not one word of Wight, till the year of our Lord, one thouſand ſixty ſix, in which Toſtie, King Harold's Brother, with certain Men of War and Rovers Ships out of Flanders, in hatred of his Brother, invaded it, and after he had fleeced the Inhabitants of their Money, quickly again departed.

Math. Florilegus ad An. 676.

De Regio genere Geviſſorum, quod Rex Alfredus ſic vertit: ƿeſt Seaxna æþeling. nunc quis ſit Ætheling omnes qui vel mediocriter Saxonicè callent ſatis norunt. idem ſcil. qui Priſcis Clyto, Cæſar, Princeps, Juventutis. Anglis hodiernis Prince. Edgar Etheling, Enlands darling, Ille cui Regnum Anglorum ante Haraldum vel etiam Gulielmum Normannum debebatur.

21. To what we have already ſaid concerning Ceadwalla, his Invaſion of Kent, (in the Hiſtory of that Kingdom) and the Death of his Brother, whom Latin writers call Mollo, but the Saxon Annals Mull, we can add nothing more that is material. He being gone to Rome to receive Baptiſm, Ina the Son of Cenred, whoſe Father was Ceolwald, the Brother of Cynegils, obtained the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons, in the third year of Juſtinian the younger Emperour, in the days of Theodorick King of the Franks, the third of Alfrid King of the Northumbrians, and the fourteenth of Æthelred (or Ædilred) King of the Mercians. A. D. DCLXXXVIII. The Monk of Malmesbury is very ſmart and pithy in his Deſcription of him. He writes, that more in reſpect of the induſtry of his inſitive Vertue than any Pedigree of a ſucceſſive Off-ſpring, he was taken to be Prince, the onely ſpecimen of Fortitude, Image of Prudence, his equal for Religion you cannot find. By ſuch like Acts, framing the courſe of his Life at home,

Beda Hiſt. lib. 4. c. 16.

Ina King of the Weſt Saxons.

Annal. ad An. 689.

he purchaſed favour and reverence abroad. And for eight and thirty years exerciſing his Function, he waxed old, all along void of the fear of Treachery, a moſt holy Pander as it were of publick Love. His firſt expedition was againſt the Kentiſh men, bearing ſtill in his mind the burning of Mollo alive. For a little while they made reſiſtence, but after their utmoſt effort, having left nothing unattempted, and finding every thing unſucceſfull, when they could find nothing in the breaſt of Ina, which might incourage ſlothfulneſs, they began to conſider of their Eſtate, and fairly yielded. With Gifts they make tryal of his Royal mind, they ſolicite him by Promiſes, and for thirty thouſand Marks of Gold, they purchaſe their own quiet by his retreat. He having received the money pardoned what was paſt, and returned home. But not onely they of Kent, but the Inhabitants of Eaſt England, were made objects of his hereditary hatred, all their Nobility being firſt driven away, and afterwards defeated in Battel. Let this ſuffice to have been ſaid of the ſucceſs of his Wars. How great a man he was in the things of God, the Laws which he made to correct the Vices of his People ſufficiently ſhew, which ſtill remain as a living Mirrour of his purity. The Monaſteries he built are evident Witneſſes, ſtructures of Royal Magnificence, eſpecically that of Glaſtenbury. At length he declares how by the ſolicitations of Ethelburga his Wife, after all his Earthly Triumphs he arrived at the height of Glory and Perfection as he eſteems it, and went to Rome, where he lived and died as obſcurely as he had deſired.

Forces the Kentiſh men to buy peace.

Invades Eaſt England.

22. As for his firſt Expedition into Kent, others write that Victred unwilling to hazard all for the raſh Act of a few, delivered up thirty of thoſe that had been acceſſory to the burning of Mollo. This expedition the Annals place at the ſixth year of his Reign, and are ſilent as to any other Act of his, till fifteen years after. Then they tell us that Ina and Nun his Kinſman fought with Gerend King of Wales, but where or how they leave us in Ignorance. With as much ſhortneſs and obſcurity, fourteen years after this they inform us, that Ina and Ceolred King of the Merciaus, fought Battel at a place called Wodensboorke or Wodensburge, the ſame we have formerly mentioned to ſtand near to Wansdike in Wiltſhire, or the Dike of Woden. Huntingdon from what Authority we have not, affirms that they fought horribly on both ſides, ſo that it could not be known, on which the greater Number of Men was loſt. But Ina, if not Victour, remained the Survivour, Ceolred dying the following year, who that year that next ſucceeded, was followed into another World by Ingild the Brother of Ina, whoſe Siſters the Annals take here occaſion to mention. They were two, Cwenburk and Cuthburk; whereof the later built a Monaſtery in a place called Winburnan; the other was married to Alfrid King of the Northumbrians, but out of deſire to be wedded alſo to a monaſtical life, was ſeparated from him while he yet lived. After this time it ſeems that Ina was vexed at home by Civil Diſcords, his Title having not been ſuch to the Government, but that others thought their right as good as his. For the Annals at the year which follows, tell us he ſlew Cynewulfe, and Florent of Worceſter gives him the Title of Clyto, the ſame with Ætheling, and given to none but thoſe of the Bloud Royal. But no ſooner was one cut off, but aſſoon if not ſooner, another appeared, one Ealdbright who ſeized on a Caſtle which Ina had built at Tantune. Whom the Archdeacon tells us Queen Edelburk beſieged, took the Caſtle and razed it, Ealdbright being fled into Surrey. He was purſued by Ina from Surrey into Suſſex, where the Inhabitants undertaking his protection were overthrown in Battel, and Ealdbright himſelf was ſlain, all which the Annals allow. Three years after they tell us that Ina went to Rome, leaving his Kingdom after he had held it ſeven and thirty years.

Ingages with Welred King of the Mercians.

Civil Wars at home.

An. DCCXXI.

23. That Ina went to Rome at the ſolicitation of Edelburk his Wife, who alſo accompanied him, we have already related from the Monk of Malmesbury, and that ſix years before his departure ſhe was his Wife, the Annals do plainly ſignifie. But elſewhere we hear another ſtory of his marrying Guala, the Daughter of Cadwalader King of the Britains, from which Daughter we are told, that Countrey was called Wallia, which in ancienter times had the Name of Cambria. Moreover with this laſt Wife he received Cambria, Cornubia, and (with her they muſt all begin) the bleſſed Crown of Britain, which belonged to Cadwalader the laſt King of the Britains. All the Engliſh which lived at that time, took their Wives from the Britiſh ſtock, and the Britains from the illuſtrious bloud and ſtock of the Engliſh, that is the race of the Saxons. For this was done by the Common Council and aſſent of all the Biſhops, Princes, Nobles and Counts with all the wiſe men, the Elders and People of the whole Kingdom, and that by Command of the aforeſaid King Ina. Yet ſome Engliſh fetcht their Wives from the Bloud and Kind of the Angles of Germany, ſome Engliſh from the bloud and kind of the Scots, and almoſt all the Scots from the beſt bloud and ſtock of the Angles of Germany. So at that time throughout the whole Kingdom of Britain, they were two in one fleſh, and ſo did he conſtitute right Wedlock, deſtroyed Fornication and Uncleanneſs out of his Kingdom, ordaining right Judgment for the ſtability of his Kingdom, the ſtrengthening of his People, with a benign Induſtry. And in this manner were they made one Nation and one People, by God's mercy throughout the whole Kingdom of Britain. Then did all call that the Kingdom of the Engliſh, which formerly had been called the Kingdom of Britain.

Unites the Britiſh and Engliſh by Marriages.

24. All theſe People ever afterward for the Common Utility of the Crown of the Kingdom, ſtood unanimouſly together againſt the Danes and Norwagians, fought moſt fiercely againſt them, and waged together moſt cruel Wars. For, the aforeſaid King Ina was an excellent Prince, bountifull, wiſe, prudent, moderate, ſtout, juſt, courageous and a perfect Souldier, both as to time and place, in the Divine Laws, in ſecular Affairs, in writings and performing of all good works very glorious. His Kingdom he governed, conſolidated and held in peace by his great wiſedom and prudence, and where the Caſe required by force and ſtrength of hand. This is the ſubſtance of a great Council, conſiſting of ſuch great Men as lately were mentioned, ſaid to be held by King Ina, a little after he had married Guala the Daughter of Cadwalader King of the Britains, with which Wiſe he obtained all Cambria, and the Crown of Cadwalader, found amongſt the Laws of Edward the Confeſſour. But notwithſtanding the Authenticneſs of the Laws among which it is found, there is no good Hiſtorian that makes mention of any ſuch Marriage of his with Guala, or any ſuch occaſion of the Origination of the Name of Wallia. Who the Engliſh Saxons and Germans were wont to call Walls or Gualls, we have already ſhewn. Neither had he any other Wife than Ethelburk, a Saxon not Britain, as her Name demonſtrates, who at ſuch time as he went to Rome turned Nun, and became afterwards Abbeſs of Barking. After this he never married, for they both continued in the monaſtical kind of life till death concluded it. As for the time of this pretended Council and its Authority, we are full as much in the dark. Some report Cadwalader to have reigned onely three years, others five, and Geoffrey of Monmouth twelve, ſo that when Ina ſhould have entred upon his Kingdom of Cambria is uncertain. Moreover he makes Ina the Nephew, Matthew of Weſtminſter, and H. Lhuyd the Son, and this Council the Son-in-Law of Cadwalader. But the Britains having feigned Ceadwalla to be their King, could not make up the Romance without this ſtory adjoined of his Succeſſour.

Goes to Rome.

25. The moſt noble part of Ina his Acts is yet behind, his Body of Laws which we muſt refer till we come to ſpeak of the Saxon Laws in general. He went not to Rome till he had provided himſelf and People of a Succeſſour. This was one Æthelheard his Kinſman, who though by the means of Ina, he firſt obtained the Royalty, yet to confirm it was put to no little trouble. The firſt that created him, this troubles was Oſwald the Son of Æthelbald King of the Mercians, to whom the Annals give the Title of Ætheling, and ſay that in the very year of Æthelheard's promotion they fought, but as to the ſucceſs they are ſilent, onely the year following they tell us of a Comet, which uſhered in the death of Oſwald in the ſucceeding year, a natural death for any thing that appears either from them or others. Malmesbury obſerves that a check by him was often given to the beginnings of Æthelheard, againſt whom he ſtirred up the People unto Rebellion. But not long after he being taken away by death, he writes that Æthelheard held the Kingdom quietly for fourteen years, and ſo left it to Cuthrede his Kinſman. Cuthrede had grievous conteſts with Æthelbald King of the Mercians. It ſeems this Enmity was too ſevere long to continue; for, two years after, the ſame Annals relate that Æthelbald and Cuthrede fought jointly againſt the Welſhmen, ſo that their private Intereſts and Grudges, at laſt they ſubmitted to publick Concernments. Here again the Annals are ſilent as to the Succeſs, but Huntingdon doubts not to aſſign them a great Victory over an innumerable multitude of Britains, uſing his ordinary way of expreſſing the greatneſs of a Fight. The courageous Kings and their moſt famous Souldiers laid ſo about them in their ſeveral Quarters, that the Britains not able to ſuſtain any more their violence, gave their Backs to the Smiters, and their Baggage to the Purſuers. Which Victory obtained theſe Princes returned home, where (no doubt) they were very joyfully received.

Makes Æthelheard his Succeſſour.

Who is diſturbed in his Government by Oſwald a Mercian.

The next King was Cuthrede.

Sect. 9.

Whoſe Son Cynric was ſlain in a mutiny of his Souldiers. Then a Civil War aroſe.

Heꞃ ƿæꞅ ofꞅleᵹen Cẏnꞃic ƿeꞅꞇſeaxna Æþelinᵹ. An. 748.

Heꞃ Cuþꞃeð cẏninᵹ ᵹefeahꞇ ƿið Æðelhunꞅon. ofeꞃmedan ealꝺoꞃmon. An. DCCL.

After which he conquers Ethelbald King of the Mercians.

Huntingdonenſem Johannes Brompton pænè ad verbum tranſcripſit in Chron.

26. The Succeſs and Proſperity of Cuthred, was three years after interrupted by a ſad Accident in his own Family. The Annals note onely, that Cynric the Etheling of the Weſt Saxons, was ſlain. Huntingdon ſays he was his Son, terms him the Glory of Arms, the deſtroyer of wild Beaſts; tender in Age, but ſmart in martial matters, little in years, but great in vigour, who ſtill preſſing upon his own Succeſſes, and ſoliciting the fortune of War too much, his extravagance of mind, was puniſhed by a death procured, by the mutiny of his Souldiers. That he was his Son we may eaſily believe, from what the word Etheling doth import, and that it proceeded from a Sedition of the Souldiers, that may as eaſily perſwade us, which is mentioned in the Annals at the ſecond year after, that King Cuthred fought with that furious Captain Æthelhun. Huntingdon in his comment upon this text, hath this inlargement upon it, that having raiſed ſedition againſt his Lord, though as to the number of his Forces he was far inferiour to him, yet long and reſolutely did he maintain his rebellion: And when now Victory ſeemed to incline to his ſide, at length a wound inflicted on his Body, and perjury in his mind procured the cauſe of the King to triumph. But this Rebellion ſeems of no larger extent than to be contained within the bounds of a Civil War. It raiſed no new one from without, this Æthelhun having no correſpondence with Æthelbald, that by virtue of that Peace and Alliance formerly made betwixt the two Kings, now again vaniſhed into nothing. But in the ſecond year after the Fight with Æthelhun, we are told that Cuthred in the twelfth of his Reign, fought again with Æthelbald, at a place called Beorgforda. Huntingdon's Copy hath it Hereford, though Authours generally agree, it was Bedford where the Battel was fought. Æthelhun he tells us being now reconciled to the King, was his Captain and Councellour in this expedition. He then tells a long tale in affected words concerning the Fight, and how the King and Conſul (as he terms Æthelhun) meeting came to a ſingle Combat, which ended in the Cowardiſe and Flight of Æthelbald, who outlived not this defeat two years, being ſlain in another Battel fought againſt the Weſt Saxons at Secandune, and buried at Repandune, as we have already in the Hiſtory of his Kingdom related.

Overthrows the Britains.

Dies.

Sigebert ſucceeds.

Heꞃ Cuþꞃeð feahꞇ ƿið ƿealaꞅ. An. DCCLIII.

Is very cruel and tyrannical.

Puts to death his beſt friend and ſubject.

Is driven from the Kingdom.

27. Cuthred being diſintangled from the attempts of Ethelbald, found himſelf concerned to give a check to the Britains, who in vain reſiſting, the Conquerour of Ethelbald ſoon ran away, and deſervedly received a great Defeat, and Huntingdon tells us that without the leaſt ground from the Annals, which are altogether ſilent as to the ſucceſs. But two years after this they acquaint us with the News of the death of Cuthred after he had reigned ſeventeen years, together with the burning of the City of Canterbury, and the ſucceſſion of Sigebert into the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons, which he held for the ſpace of one year and no longer. Malmesbury writes that he ſeized upon the Kingdom, a Man of brutiſh cruelty at home, yet abroad infamous for his Cowardiſe. Therefore incurring the hatred of all his Subjects they conſpired againſt him, and after a year depoſed him, cauſing him to give place to a better Man. But as commonly it happeneth in ſuch caſes, the greatneſs of his calamity reclaimed ſome to pity towards him, by the valour of whom he preſerved in obedience that Province called Hamptonſhire. But his Inclination ſtill prevailing againſt his Succeſs, as well as all Goodneſs and Juſtice, having by putting to death one Cumbran, a Man that of all others had been moſt faithfull to him, armed the reſt of his Followers againſt him, he was conſtrained to betake himſelf to the Dens and lurking places of wild Beaſts, whither misfortune dogging him at the Heels, he was killed by an Herdſman. And ſo the cruelty of the King, having almoſt raged againſt all the Nobility, was brought to an end by a Man of the meaneſt condition. Huntingdon calls him the kinſman of Cuthred, by whoſe ſucceſs he became ſo proud and inſolent, that he became intolerable to his Subjects. He adds, agreeable to the Annals, that abuſing them all manner of ways, forcing the Laws to countenance his unjuſt proceedings, or utterly avoiding them, one Cumbra his moſt noble Conſul, at the deſire of all the People made known the Complaints of the Subjects to their cruel King. But ſeriouſly adviſing him to govern more mildly, and laying aſide his inhumanity, to render himſelf acceptable to God and Man, he wickedly commanded him to be put to death, and, in a manner more cruel and intolerable than ever, encreaſed his Tyranny. Remaining incorrigible in theſe his outrageous proceedings, the Nobility and People aſſembled together, and by a provident deliberation and unanimous conſent of them all he was depoſed, and Cynwulf a choice young Man of the Royal Stock was elected King in his ſtead. Sigebert thus driven away, fled for fear of that he was conſcious to himſelf he had deſerved, into the great Wood of Andred, where

(at a place called by the Annals Pruntesflodan) he was killed by an Hogherd belonging to Cumbra, who thus revenged upon him his Maſter's death.

And ſlain by a Hogherd.

Cynwulf reigns.

Subdues the Britains.

Is ſlain by Cynheard Brother to Sigebert.

And buried at Wincheſter.

28. Cynwulf began his Reign over all the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons except Hampſhire, which Sigebert poſſeſſed for a little time till the death of Cumbra in the fifteenth year of Conſtantinus Copronymus, Emperour, in the Reign of Pipin King of the Franks, the ſeventh of Edelbert or Ethelbert King of Kent, the eighteenth of Egbert or Eadbert King of the Northumbrians, toward the beginning of the Reign of Offa King of the Mercians, A. D. DCCLV. Malmesbury, in ſhort, ſays he was a Man famous both for the compoſition of his Morals, and his Martial Acts, being in one onely Battel overthrown at Benſingtune, by Offa King of the Mercians, in the four and twentieth year of his Reign, after which he was afflicted with many loſſes, and went out of the World in a vile manner. Huntingdon from the Annals writes of his being victorious over the Britains in many Battels, whom having ſubdued on all ſides, he reſolved to baniſh Kineard the Brother of Sigebert, the Story whereof we have at large out of the Annals themſelves after this manner. About the one and thirtieth year from the firſt beginning of his Reign he had a deſire to expell out of the Kingdom a certain Etheling called Cyneheard, who was Brother to Sigebryht. The King having intelligence, that attended with a ſmall company of Men, he frequented the company of a certain Woman, at a place called Merantune, rode thither himſelf, and ſearching about the Town, ſome of his Souldiers found out where the Etheling lay. The King perceiving it, behaved himſelf in a manner unbecoming his Perſon, till he got ſight of him, which done he ruſhed in upon him and wounded him ſore. But all his Followers, together with him, fell upon the King, and fought with him till they had beaten him down and killed him; which was done before the Souldiers that followed him underſtood perfectly where he was. His Guard at length perceiving a tumult in this Womans Houſe haſted thither, every one as he was moſt ready and could run faſteſt, to whom the Etheling promiſed Money and Pardon if they would ſubmit unto him. But they utterly rejected his Offers, and ſo long fought with the Followers of Cyneheard till they were all killed, one certain Britain an Hoſtage excepted, who was moſt grievouſly cut and hacked. By the Morning the news of the King's death was fled to a place not far off, where many more Attendants had awaited his return, and with others Oſric and Wiverth, two Counts, haſted to the Houſe whence the Etheling was not yet departed. The Doors were made faſt but they eaſily got in, which he perceiving began to parly with them, labouring with great promiſes to draw them off from revenging their King's death and to accept of himſelf under that Title and Capacity. But they flatly refuſed to ſell their Maſter's Bloud, and reſolving neither to ſpare him nor his Relations, for whom he interceded, put them all to the Sword, except one Youth, to whom Ine their Leader was Godfather, and ſaved him upon that account, though grievouſly wounded. But ſuch was the end of Cynwulf after he had reigned one and thirty years: And his Body was buried at Wincheſter. That of the Etheling, who in a Male line was deſcended from Cerdic, was interred at Acream Minſter, not at Repandune, as the Monk of Malmesbury hath it out of a miſtake of the Annals, which affirm not Cyneheard but Ethelbald King of the Mercians at this Repandune to have been buried.

Hic fœdè lapſus eſt Mathæus Florilegus dum ait Regem alienis amoribus ſervientem à Kinehardo obſeſſum & oppreſſum fuiſſe. Ad Ann. 786.

Hic interpres malè textum latinè vertit dum hæc verba ac hi ealle læȝonbuꞇananum Bꞃẏꞇꞇiꞅcum ȝiꞅle, de ſociis Clytonis interpretatur. Quomodo enim Clyto ipſe non occideretur omnibus ſuis occiſis? & apud quem manet obſes niſi apud Regem? Regis erant qui interibant.

After him Byrhtric.

29. After Cynwulf's Death, Byrhtric was made King of the Weſt Saxons, according to the Faſti of Sr. Henry Savil, (which yet allot but twenty nine years to the Reign of Cynwulf) in the fourth year of the Emperour Conſtantinus Porphyrogenitus, the twenty fifth of Alrick King of Kent, and the ſeventh of Alfwold King of the Northumbrians, A. D. DCCLXXXIV. He was, as Malmesbury deſcribes him, a man more ſtudious of Peace than War, being a very Artiſt in procuring Friendſhip, pleaſing Foreigners with Courtſhip, and Conniving at the faults of his People in ſuch things as did not hurt the Government. To obtain greater Reputation amongſt his Neighbours, he Married the Daughter of Offa King of the Mercians, at that time the moſt potent Prince, by which he had no Iſſue that can be known. Incouraged by this Alliance he drove Egbert into France, a young man, who alone ſurvived of all thoſe that were of the Royal Stock, and therefore was a Perſon dangerous to his Intereſt. For both this Byrhtric and the other Kings which Reigned after Offa, though they bragged of their Pedigrees, being ſuch as indeed did deſcend from Cerdic, yet were they deſcended in a good diſtance from the Royal Line. Egbert then being gone, he thought himſelf ſecure, and that he might now take his eaſe, when a Company of Danes accuſtomed to live by Piratical Depredations, ſecretly landing from three Ships, diſturbed the Peace of his Province.

Sect. 9.

vince, This Company of men at this time came as Spies to diſcover the fertility of the Soil and the valour of the Inhabitants, as afterwards was evident from the coming of that Multitude which overwhelmed in a manner all Britain. At this time ſtealing upon the Iſland, this Kingdom being in profound peace and ſilence, they ſuddenly fell upon a Royal Village adjoyning, and killed the Overſeer or Keeper, who came in to its relief; but the People gathering together they left their Booty, ran to their Ships and went their ways.

Marries Eadburgh Daughter of Offa King of the Mercians.

Forces Egbert to fly the Kingdom.

An. 787.

Malmesb. de geſtis Regum Anglorum, l. 2. c. 1.

30. To this general account of the Monk, we may add from the Annals, that this Daughter of Offa he married, was by Name Eadburgh, a Woman too well known, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Egbert being deſcended from Inegild, the Brother of Ina, gave in his Childhood pregnant proofs of much Wit and Courage, which together with his deſcent could not but excite great fear and jealouſie in Berhtric who reſolved his death, and ſtudied the beſt manner to make him away. Egbert having notice of and having good grounds to apprehend his purpoſe, betook himſelf to Offa's Court, where he was no ſooner come, Byrhtric's Ambaſſadours were at the door, both requiring the Fugitive to be given up, for whom they offered a round ſum of Money, and farther for a Confirmation of Friendſhip betwixt the two Kings, deſired Offa's Daughter for a Wife for their Maſter. Courtſhip effecting more with Offa than Threats and violence could procure, Egbert was forced once more to ſhift for himſelf, and over he went into France, which thing in the opinion of our Authour, came to paſs by the Council of God, that being ordained for that Kingdom, he ſhould receive his Inſtitution from the Franks; a Nation which far exceeds (ſaith he) all thoſe of the Weſt, both in Action and the pleaſantneſs of their Converſation. This affront he made uſe of as a wheſtone to rub off the ruſt of idleneſs; to ſharpen his wit, and to obtain ſuch endowments as are quite contrary to Pagan Barbariſm. Byrhtric however rejoyced in his abſence, not caring what advantages of education he might have, ſo their Influence reached not him, nor his poſſeſſion of what at preſent he held, he was not far from envying his happineſs any where out of England, that he could have heartily wiſhed him in Heaven it ſelf. The pleaſing repoſe he enjoyed was interrupted by the landing of Danes; the firſt Danes that landed in an hoſtile manner in Britain, who ſlew the Governour of theſe Quarters, the firſt man of thoſe many thouſands which afterward were butchered by that Savage People. Yet though we hear nothing before of their landing, they from the time of Juſtinian, and about the year of our Lord DLXX begun to rove upon the Coaſts of Britain and Gall, and were by the Writers which penned in Latin the Hiſtories of the Engliſh named Wiccingi, for that they practized Piracy: For Wiccinga in the Saxon Tongue (as Alfria witneſſeth) ſignifieth a Pyrat that runneth from Creek to Creek: Alſo Pagani or Painims, becauſe as yet they were not Chriſtians: But the Angles themſelves in their Language termed them Deruſcan, and oftentimes Heathonmon or Ethnicks.

Eſt enim gens illa & exercitatione virium & Comitate morum cunctarum Occidentalium facile princeps.

A Company of Pyrates infeſt the Land.

31. The Officer that went to oppoſe them, and in his attempt periſhed, by (a) ſome of our Authours is called Villicus from that Villa or Town which they write that theſe Danes attacked. By (b) others Præpoſitus Regis, which ſuits better with the word ᵹeꞃeꝼa, by which the (c) Annals do Name him. They affirm, that not knowing what they were he would have brought them to the Town of the King, which ſome interpret Dorcheſter, and farther ſay, that he being the King's Cuſtomer there, ſuppoſed them Foreign Merchants, and riding to them commanded them to come and give account of their Lading at the Cuſtome-houſe; but they ſhewed him no other Merchandize than the Steel of their Sword, wherewith they ſlew him and all that came with him, as an Earneſt of the many Murthers, Rapines and Hoſtilities, which afterward they committed throughout the whole Iſland. But of this firſt Daniſh Invaſion the Daniſh Hiſtory of Pontanus far otherwiſe relates, as if their Landing had been at the mouth of Humber, and their Depredations far into the Countrey adjoyning, whence they were repulſed by the ſurprized Inhabitants back to their Ships: What was the reaſon, by what authority they came there is no mention made, and the thing is the more ſtrange becauſe Sigebert it makes then to have been King, a man who more ſtudied his own peace and quiet than the moleſtation of his Neighbours. And indeed not onely from the

And kill the King's Officer.

The firſt Daniſh Invaſion.

(a) Malmesb. de geſt. Reg. Angl. l. 1. Math. Florileg. ad An. 791.

(b) Huntingdon. Hiſt. l. 4. Hoveden Annal. Par. prior. Florentius Wigorn. ad An. 787.

(c) ⁊ on hiꞅ ꝺaᵹum Cꞃomon æꞃeꞅe III ꞅcipu. ⁊ ðaꞅe ᵹeꝼeꞃa ðaꞃtoꞃaꝺ. ⁊ hi ƿolꝺe ða æꞃeꞅtan ꝺꞃẏꞅan toðæꞅ Cẏninᵹeꞅ tune ðẏhe niꞅte hƿæthy ƿæꞃon. ⁊ hinemon Oꝼꞅloh. ꝥ ƿæꞃon ða æꞃeꞅtan ꞅcipu Deniꞅcꞃa monna ðe Anᵹel Cẏnneꞅ lonꝺ ᵹeꞅohtoni. An. DCCLXXXVII.

Daniſh

Sect. 9.

Daniſh Hiſtory, but ſome Writers of our own, we are apt to believe that the firſt intended Invaſion of that People with intention to rifle and pillage the Countrey, was in the Northern parts about Humber; and thoſe that landed here in the third year of Byrhtric, were but ſome Rovers or Pirates at Sea, who, as we now ſaid, were wont to inſeſt the Seas of Britain and Gall, and by chance, or diſtreſſed by Weather, came on the Weſtern ſhoar; poſſibly alſo with a deſire of ſpying the Countrey. This we are induced to think from a Story or two we find in the Chronicle of John Brompton, which ſetting forth the Cauſes of their firſt Hoſtile Invaſion here we think fit to recite in this place, though the thing happened a good while after.

An Account of the Danes firſt invading Britain.

Chronic. Joh. Brompton Abb. Jornalenſis.

32. At that time (viz. in the days of Ethelwolfe King of England, the Son of Egbert and of Charles the Bald) one Oſbrith was King of Northumberland, who on a day going to take his pleaſure in a Wood, as he returned went privately to the Houſe of one of his Noblemen Bruern Bocard by Name to refreſh himſelf; Bruern knowing nothing of the King's coming, was gone to the Sea ſide to make ſure the Shoar and Havens, according to his Cuſtome, againſt Thieves and Pirates. But his Wife a Woman of great Beauty entertained the King at Dinner very ſplendidly. The King having Dined took her by the hand and led her to his Chamber, telling her he muſt ſpeak with her in private, and there removing all out of the way but ſuch as were privy to his ſecret Courſes, by force and violence he lay with her. Having had his will he ſpeedily got him back to York. She lamented and mourned, ſo that her Viſage was much altered, which cauſed her Husband at his return to ask the cauſe of ſo ſudden a Change and of her unaccuſtomed ſadneſs. She told him the whole matter in order how the King had forced her, which having heard he comforted her, bidding her not afflict her ſelf, foraſmuch as ſhe was not able to reſiſt a man ſo ſtrong, aſſuring her that becauſe ſhe had told him the truth he would love her no leſs than he had done, and if God gave him leave he would avenge both himſelf and her upon him that had committed the Crime. Then did this Bruern being a Man both Noble and Powerfull, deſcended of great Parentage, call his Kindred together, to whom he revealed the Affront put upon him, and his Intention of a ſpeedy Revenge, to which they conſenting and approving his purpoſe, with them he took Horſe and rode to York. The King upon ſight of him called him to him very civilly, but he with his Relations at his back defied him, renouncing his Homage and Fidelity, giving up his Land and whatſoever he held of him. This ſaid, without any more words he withdrew, making no ſtay at all at Court.

33. His Friends conſenting ſpeedily he went over into Danemark, where to the King of the Danes he made a great complaint of the Affront offered to him and his Wife by Oſbrith, deſiring his ſpeedy relief and ſupply to put him into a Capacity to revenge himſelf. Hereat Codrinus the King and his Danes conceived very great joy, having now ſome reaſon to induce them to ſubdue the Engliſh. To revenge the injury offered to Bruern, who was deſcended of his bloud, he ſpeedily prepared a great Army over which he made Captains two Brothers called Inguar and Hubbe moſt valiant Souldiers, and to them he gave a Navy furniſhed with all neceſſaries to tranſport an innumerable Company of men. Theſe Adventurers landing in the Northern Parts, and taking their way through Holderneſs, deſtroyed all the Towns with their Inhabitants; and coming to York provoked Oſbrith to come out and fight. He accordingly iſſued forth with an Army ſuch as it was, and fighting was ſlain with his Followers; after which they took the City and therein remained. And ſo (ſaith our Authour) the Danes for the cauſe aforeſaid firſt in an Hoſtile manner invaded England. But at this time there was another King in Northumberland called Ella, who was promoted to that Dignity by the Friends and Relations of Bruern, becauſe for the affront offered to him by Oſbrith, they would have no more to doe with that laſcivious Prince. This Ella going out on a time to Hunt, when his ſport was over ſate down to Dinner, and as he was eating applauded himſelf for the good luck they had had that day, reckoning up what Deer they had killed. One came juſt in at theſe words and told him, though he had got ſo much that way, yet he had loſt an hundred times as much another; for the Danes (ſaith he) have taken York, ſlain Oſbrith, and now are invading your Countrey to deprive you of it. Ella hearing this got his men together, and haſted to York there to deſtroy the Danes, but they having notice came out, and not far from the City gave him Battel, wherein they killed him and a very great multitude of his Souldiers, in a place ſtill called Elleſcroft from this occaſion. Farther, it is reported that the late mentioned Brothers Inguar and Hubbe invaded England in an Hoſtile manner, not onely for the reaſon now alledged, but eſpecially to deſtroy St. Edmund who then Reigned in Eaſt England, and was falſly accuſed of having killed their Father. For of the cauſe of their coming we reade in the Book called Flores Hiſtoriarum after this manner.

The Reaſon of Inguar and Hubbe the Danes arriving in Britain.

34. In the Kingdom of the Danes there was one Lothebroc, who being deſcended of the Royal Family, by his Wife had two Sons Inguar and Hubbe. This man going alone into a Boat with an Hawk on his fiſt in the Iſlands adjoyning to ſeek for Game, was ſeized by a ſudden and violent Tempeſt, toſſed hither and thither for ſeveral days together in the depth of the Sea, which having croſſed amid ten thouſand dangers, at length he was caſt upon the Province of the Eaſtern Engliſh called Northfolk, and landed at a Village which had the Name of Rodham. Being found alone with his Hawk, he is preſented to Edmund the King, and being kindly received for the comlineſs of his Perſon continued in his Court, told the King the tale of his ſtrange fortune, and often went out into the Field for his Recreation with Bern the King's Huntſman, being extraordinarily dextrous both in Hunting and Fowling as opportunity ſerved. For this reaſon the King's Huntſman greatly envied him, and as they two Hunted together ſecretly murthered him and hid his Body in a thick Wood. Now Lothebroc kept a certain Greyhound, which was exceedingly fond of him, and the Huntſman being gone with the reſt of the Dogs ſtaid there alone by his Lord's Body. On the Morrow when the King asked for Lothebroc, Bern anſwered, that the day before he ſtaid in the Wood, and ſince that he had not ſeen him. But ſee, the Greyhound comes to the Court, and fawning upon the King as well as others, as ſoon as he had filled his Belly again departed. Doing this often he was dogged to the place by thoſe who found out the Body and brought the Relation to the King. The matter being examined and found out, the Huntſman is ſentenced to be put into the Boat of Lothebroc without any Oars or Tackling, in which after a few days (ſurely the Boat knew the way) he was caſt upon Denmark, where brought to Lothebroc his Sons and examined by torture what was become of their Father, whoſe Boat they ſufficiently knew, he affirmed that by Edmund King of the Eaſt Angles he was diſcovered and killed by his Command.

35. They prepare then a Navy and under Conduct of Bern paſs into England, where landing in the Northern parts as was ſaid before, they haraſs grievouſly the whole Province of the Northumbrians, and having brought it to their beck, Inguar quits his Company, and with a great Fleet ſails to a City of Eaſt England where St. Edmund Reigned, which having entred he burnt and killed both Old and Young as he met them in the Streets. When he was wearied with killing, certain poor People whom he thought below his Anger, he called to him, and very diligently inquired where Edmund their King at that time reſided. He had heard he was in the flower of his Age, very ſtrong and Martial every way, and therefore he haſted to kill all he could find in any place, leſt their King ſhould make too ſtrenuous an oppoſition, who at that time lived far off from the City in a Village, in their Language called Egleſdon or Haleſdon, but now Horne (he writes) by which Name the neighbouring Wood was alſo called. For that Nation of Danes and Alamans was wont never in open Field to ingage with an Enemy, except he was before that intrapped with Snares: Therefore ſent he a truſty Meſſenger before to eſpy out where the King was, ſignifying that he himſelf would as convenience offered it ſelf follow after. The Meſſenger coming to the King delivered his Meſſage after this manner. Inguar the moſt Invincible King both by Land and Sea, my redoubted Lord having conquered ſeveral Countries, and Landed in this with many Ships is reſolved here to Winter; and commands thee to give him the half of thy Treaſure and Riches, by which means under him thou maiſt poſſibly Reign; but in caſe thou deſpiſeſt his Power ſupported by ſo many Legions, thou ſhalt be judged both unworthy thy Life and a Kingdom. The King ſighed having heard the Meſſage, and calling to him one of his Biſhops, who was Secretary, asked his Advice what to anſwer. He being concerned for the King's Life, by many Examples exhorted him to comply with the Pagan. The King for a while was ſilent, then anſwered the Meſſenger after this manner: Return thy Maſter ſpeedily this Anſwer: Know that for the love of a Temporal life, Edmund a Chriſtian King will not ſubject himſelf to a Pagan Captain, except he firſt become a Chriſtian. The King had ſcarcely ſaid ſo much and the Souldier gone out of the Houſe when Inguar met him and commanded him to give him in ſhort an account of what he ſaid. He declaring what his anſwer was, The Tyrant commanded all the King's Houſhold to be diſperſed, and he himſelf alone to be laid hold on and ſecured.

36. But ſome Hiſtoriographers relate, that the Danes paſſing through Norfolk as far as Thetford, there firſt found St. Edmund King of Eaſt England, who as it's ſaid, got an Army together and fought with them. But the Danes prevailing he fled after the ſlaughter of almoſt all his men to the Caſtle of Haleſdon, whither they ſpeedily purſued him and the firſt man they met was he himſelf, not far from the Caſtle, where they asked him how they might find out King Edmund. He, as if he had not been the Perſon, told them, When I was in the Caſtle he was there, and when I came out he departed, and whether he ſhall eſcape your hands God knoweth. Then the Danes hearing him mention the Name of God knew him to be the King, and leading him back to the Caſtle in his own Palace he was bound and led before the Impious Judge, mocked and cruelly beaten. Then brought they him to a Tree near at hand, to which making him faſt they uſed him as a Mark to ſhoot againſt in ſport, and wounded him in that manner through the whole Body, with the thick ſhower of their Arrows making Wound upon Wound, while one Shaft drove out another. But Inguar perceiving that by no means could his Faith or Conſtancy be overcome, he commanded the Hangman to cut off his Head, which was done with one ſtroak as he prayed, on the nineteenth of November in the year of our Lord DCCCLXVI according to ſome, and according to others DCCCLXX. The Danes leaving his Body in the place, carried his Head into the Wood called Egleſdon or Haleſdon, and caſt it among the thick Brambles, on purpoſe that being found it might not be committed together with the Body to Chriſtian Burial. But how this Head crying out it ſelf Here, here, here, when they ſought for it was found, and how beſtowed, it's not proper for us here to relate. We onely give the Reader what Account we can of the firſt coming of the Danes into the Iſland, and that the firſt of theſe Stories concerning the Incontinency of Oſbrith, and what followed thereupon, may not ſeem altogether improbable let him remember what we have ſaid in our Hiſtory of Spain concerning the firſt Invaſion of the Moors in that Countrey. Nothing is more certain than this that Sin foreruns puniſhment, Vice and Debauchery enervate a People, and prepare a Nation for Ruine and Deſtruction. This farther obſerve, that our Writers call theſe Danes ſometimes Dani, otherwhiles Daci. Some of them write of them as ſeveral Nations, which from the beginning of Ethelwulfe's Reign till the coming of William the Norman afflicted the Land, though they commonly be known by that one of Danes. In the Chronicle of John Brompton they are thus marſhalled: The Danes with the Goths, the Norwegians with the Swedes, the Wandals with the Friſians. Neighbours to the Saxons, Angles and Jutes, if not of the ſame Original, as the Reader by conſidering the places whence they all came may eaſily find.

Cujus (ſcil. Ethelwolfi) temporibus omnipotens Deus crudeliſſimas gentes immiſit quæ nec ætati nec ſexui parcebant, ſcil. Dacos cum Gothis, Norwagenſes, cum Suathedis, Wandalos cum Freſis, qui ab exordio regni ſui uſq; ad Adventum Willielmi ducis Normannorum Angliam vaſtaverunt.

The time of the firſt Arrival of the Danes.

The cruelty and malice of Eadburg the King's Wife.

Who at laſt poyſons her Husband.

37. To return to Byrhtric, in whoſe third year, the firſt landing of the Danes happened, we have little elſe to obſerve during his Reign, than that fiery Dragons were ſeen flying in the Air, which afterwards were interpreted as forerunners of two grievous ſorts of miſcheifs, viz. a great Famine, and the Pagan Nation of the Danes, and Norwegians, which as Huntingdon writes in the tenth year of Byrhtric, firſt miſerably waſted the Parts lying North of Humber, and then cruelly deſtroyed the Churches of Chriſt in the Province of Lindisfarne, together with the Inhabitants, on the Ides of January. In the mean while, Eadburg the Daughter of Offa, and Wife to Byrhtric, behaved her ſelf in a moſt inſolent manner toward her Husband's Subjects, coveting to act like her Father, and incurring the indignation and hatred of all Souldiers, Magiſtrates, and the whole People. All Religious Perſons ſhe backbited to the King, and got ſuch an hand over him, that either bewitched by her flatteries, or wearied with her importunities, ſuch as ſhe accuſed were deprived either of Life, or baniſhed them his Dominions; but in caſe ſhe could not prevail ſo far, they would diſpatch them with Poyſon. At this time there was a certain young Man, Noble and Rich, and in great favour with Byrhtric, whom not able to undermine in that former way, ſhe reſolved to poyſon. Her deſign took effect upon him, and on him whom ſhe never intended, the King himſelf, who by accident taſted of the deadly Cup. The King being dead, out of fear of being called to account for her Villanies, ſhe fled with great Treaſures into France, and preſented her ſelf with great gifts to Charles the Great. He, whether taken with her Beauty, or with a deſign to try her, bid her chuſe either him " or his Son that ſtood by him, whether of them ſhe would for her Husband; ſhe " anſwered ſuddenly and plainly, that if ſhe might chuſe, ſhe had rather have " the Son than the Father, as being far the younger of the two. The King repli" ed, that had ſhe choſen himſelf, ſhe ſhould have had his Son, but becauſe his " Son ſhe had choſen, ſhe ſhould have neither the one nor the other. But he “ thought a Monaſtery the place fitteſt for her, there to bewail her heinous ſins; in which having aſſumed the religious habit, ſhe hypocritically ſpent a few years; for as ſhe lived wickedly in her own Countrey, ſo rather more wretchedly did ſhe behave her ſelf there, under the cover of a Veil. Being on a time, as was expected, and thought buſie at her devotions, ſhe was buſie at another kind of work with a mean fellow of her own Nation, which coming to light, Charles cauſed her to be thruſt out of the Monaſtery, though extremely againſt her mind and liking. The remainder of her days ſhe ſpent in want, miſery and diſgrace, with one pitifull Servant, begging her bread from Houſe to Houſe, Town to Town, and City to City, till at laſt ſhe miſerably died at Pavia.

But comes to a miſerable end.

Egbert re-call'd, and made King.

Saxon Annal. Ecᵹbꞃẏhꞇ.

38. But Byrhtric being dead, after he had Reigned ſixteen years, all mens eyes were fixed upon Egbert the Exile, and by many Meſſengers, having recalled him, they admitted him unanimouſly for their King, in the third year of the Reign of the Empreſs Irene, much about the ſame time that Charles the Great received the Title of Emperour in the Weſt, in the fourth of Cuthred King of Kent, and the fourth of Cenulf King of the Mercians, A. D. DCCC. He ſo well at the firſt underſtood his Intereſt, as to ſettle and eſtabliſh his Kingdom at home in the love and affection of his Subjects. It then being time to look about him, the firſt tryal of his Martial Conduct was againſt the Britains, of whom, firſt he ſubdued them that inhabited Cornwall, and then made thoſe Tributaries, as Malmesbury expreſſeth it, who live North of them, being ſeparated from the other by an Arme of the Sea, meaning thoſe who live beyond the River Severn, and in thoſe Parts we now call Wales. His ſucceſs was ſuch, as thereby his Neighbours were very much ſtartled, as jealous whither his Power would grow. Beornulf King of the Mercians, was the firſt that really concerned himſelf, and thinking it a matter of glory by his courage and reſolution, to remove the fears of others, was reſolved to quarrel with him, and proceeding to a War, they met and fought at a place called Ellandune, of which we have already ſpoken. Egbert elevated by this Victory, and founding hopes upon the ſame grounds, his Neighbours had done their fears, while the fame of his late ſucceſs was yet freſh, ſent Ethelwolf his Son, Ealhſtan his Biſhop (of Sherburn) and Wulfheard his General with a great Army into Kent, to conquer that Province, which he thought was eaſie to be done at this time, when the Inhabitants thereof were by lazineſs rendred unfit for War, and his very Name would ſtrike a Terrour into them. They that were ſent, ſtrenuouſly executed his commands, and paſſing over all the Countrey, found their work more eaſie than they could imagine; for having driven out Balred the King beyond the Thames, they ſubdued Kent, Surry, the Southern and the Eaſtern Saxons. And the ſame year the King and People of Eaſt England, for fear of the Mercians, ſubmitted themſelves to his Vaſſallage and Protection. As for the times of theſe Victories, Malmesbury placeth that againſt Bernulf at the ſixth year of his Reign, though the Annals ſet it at a far greater diſtance, and place thoſe other Conqueſts with the ſubmiſſion of Eaſt England, in one and the ſame year, which his preſent Copy ſpeaks of, as having happened in the twenty fourth of his Reign. Neither were theſe all his exploits of this year, as ſome interpret the Annals. For he fought againſt the Devonſhire Welſh, they ſay, at a place called Gaſulford, now Camelford; there where Leland will have famous Arthur to have been ſlain, not far from Tindagium or Tindagel, his native place upon the Sea ſhore. Indeed Marianus writes, that in this place the Britains and Saxons fought a bloudy Battel, in the year of our Lord, DCCCXX. But the Annals ſpeak onely of a fight of Welſh, and thoſe whom they call Dena at Gaſulford, not ſpeaking of Egbert being concerned in the Battel.

Overthrows the Britains in Cornwall and Wales.

Subdues the Mercians.

Conquers the Eaſt Angles.

Ann. DCCCXXIII.

Heꞃ ƿæꞅꞅeala ᵹeꞅcoht ꝺe naæꞇ ⁊ Gaꝼul ꝼoꞃꝺa ⁊ ꝺẏ ẏlconᵹeaꞃe &c.

39. The Eaſt Angles having ſubmitted themſelves to Egbert, never left off till they had ſlain Bernulf and Ludecan the Mercian Kings, who never could reſt from troubling their Neighbours. Their Succeſſour Withlaf he firſt drove from his Kingdom, then afterwards was received and ſuffered to Reign as a tributary Vaſſal. The ſame year that Egbert ſubdued the Kingdom of the Mercians, the Moon was Eclipſed on Chriſtmas day, at night, and he led an Army into Deira againſt the Northumbrians; who ſubmitted themſelves with ſuch humility, that they parted lovingly without a ſtroke; for fearing his diſpleaſure of a long time conceived againſt them, they gave up hoſtages or ſome other ſecurity for their quiet and obedient deportment. Having now reduced all Britain to obedience, all the reſt of his Life, ſaith Malmesbury, for nine years together he lived in tranquillity, ſave onely that toward the latter end of his Reign, a Company of Daniſh Pirates landing in his Countrey, grievouſly diſturbed the Peace of his Dominions. Such is the

Heꞃ mona aꝥẏꞅꞇꞃoꝺe on miꝺꝺeꞅ ƿinꞇꞃeꞅ mæꞅꞅeniht

Ann. DCCCXXVII.

The Northumbrians ſubmit to him.

He reduces all Britains to obedience.

Sect. 9.

the incertainty incident to humane Affairs; that he who firſt ruled over all the Engliſh ſhould have little cauſe to rejoyce in the obedience of thoſe of his own bloud, being diſturbed by a Foreign Enemy, whoſe violence extended not onely to himſelf but his Succeſſours, without intermiſſion. When he led his Engliſh Forces againſt them, as if Fortune was tyed to certain Rules and Methods, ſhe did not court him in the uſual manner, but ſeemed to be taken with new Faces. For when he little doubted of the Victory which had inclined to him the greater part of the day, he loſt the Garland when the Sun went down, though by the darkneſs of the night, he covered the ſhame of being beaten. In the following Battel with an inconſiderable number he put to flight a great multitude. At laſt, having Reigned thirty ſeven years, and ſeven months, he died and was buried at Wincheſter, leaving to his Son great opportunities whence to raiſe him Glory, and predicting his happineſs, in caſe what he had obtained by induſtry, he loſt not by lazineſs, too familiar to that Nation.

The Danes invade, and worſt Egbert.

An. Dcccxxxii. Heꞃ hæþene men oꝼeꞃheꞃᵹaꝺon Sceapiᵹe.

40. But to be more particular than the Monk, the Annals ſignify that the Heathen men, ſo they call the Danes, waſted Sceapige, and the following year that Egbert fought againſt thirty five Ships of Pirates, at a place called Carrum, where was made a great ſlaughter of men. That the Danes remained Maſters of the Field: that Hereſerth and Wigen, two Biſhops, were ſlain, and moreover died two great Officers (Ealdormen) Dudda and Oſmod. The defeat was received near Carr, a River in Dorſetſhire, whereon ſtandeth a Town called Carmouth, juſt as it diſchargeth it ſelf into the Sea, lucky to the Danes, who here not onely had the better of Egbert in a Sea fight, but eight years after King Ethelwolfe his Son. And this was the onely check we reade of that ever Egbert received in his fortune, for the Annals tell us, that the very next year a great Navy of Danes arrived at Weſt Wales or Cornwall, and joyning with the Inhabitants marched againſt Egbert; notice whereof was ſpeedily brought to him, and as ſpeedily as he could he met them with an Army at Hengeſtdune, where he gave them Battel, and defeated as well the one as the other. The Daniſh Annals themſelves of theſe Invaſions make mention, but whether out of their own Records or ours may be juſtly doubted, for as to thoſe times they are much in the dark; little have they but fabulous or uncertain, which is the reaſon we cannot give either theirs or the Hiſtory of their neighbouring Northern Nations a part or ſhare in this preſent work. As for Egbert, as if he had now done enough to prevent any more misfortunes which might blurr the luſtre of his former Atchievements, he died the following year; a great man, whoſe fortune ſo concurred with his Abilities, that he arrived at the Monarchy of the Engliſh Nation. For ſo now we muſt call it by his order and appointment, who having conquered already four of the other ſix Kingdoms, and ſwallowed up the other two alſo in hope, to the end that they which were ſubdued and reduced to the Rule of one Prince, might be conjoyned likewiſe in one Name, commanded by an Edict or Proclamation, that the whole Heptarchy ſhould be called Enᵹlelonꝺ, or England, whereupon it got in Latin the Name of Anglia, taking its Denomination from the Angles, (though he himſelf was King of the Weſt Saxons, and Conquerours are wont to impoſe their own Names) as being of the three Nations moſt in number, and of greateſt power. For they poſſeſſed the Kingdoms of Northumberland and Mercia, very great and large Countries, together with Eaſt England: Whereas the Poſterity of the Jutes held onely Kent, or with it the Iſle of Wight: The Saxons, Eaſtſex, Southſex and Weſtſex, a ſmall parcel indeed if compared with the ſpacious Territories of the Angles.

But arriving in Wales, they are wholly defeated by Egbert King of Egland.

An. Dcccxxxv. Heꞃ cꞃom micel ꞅcipheꞃe on ƿeꞅꞇ ƿealaꞅ. ⁊ hi ꞇoanum ᵹecýꞃꝺon ⁊ ƿiþ Ecᵹbꞃýhꞇ ƿeꞅꞇ Seaxna Cyninᵹ ƿinnenꝺe ƿæꞃon ða heꝥ hýꞃꝺe ⁊ miꝺ ꝼýꞃꝺe ꝼeꞃꝺe ⁊ him ƿiþ ꝼeahꞇ æꞇ Henᵹeꞅꞇꝺune ⁊ ðæꞃ ᵹeꝼlýmꝺe ᵹe ðe ƿealeꞅ ᵹe ða ꝺeniꞅcan⁊.

He ſtyles the whole Heptarchy by the Name of England.

41. Such was the importance of this Conſideration, that even long before this they were generally and throughout called Engliſh, and in their own Language Englatheod, Anglcynne, Englcynn, and Engliſcmon: Albeit every Kingdom had a particular Name of its own. This appears ſufficiently out of other Authours, but eſpecially Bede who intituled his Hiſtory The (a) Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Engliſh Nation, a Name ſufficiently known to the Learned and beſt Intelligent Perſons, although King Alfred tranſlating the ſaid Hiſtory for the underſtanding of the meaner and general ſort added to it the word (b) Saxon. Nay, during the Heptarchy, theſe Princes that bore ſway over the reſt were ſtiled Gentis Anglorum Reges, or Kings of the Engliſh Nation. Now lay the Name of Britain forgotten and quite out of uſe among the Inhabitants of the Iſland, remaining onely in Books, and not taken up in common Speech; inſomuch, that any other word would down rather than it. Boniface the Biſhop of Mentz deſcended of this Nation, called this his Countrey by the Name of Saxony beyond the Sea. Yet did Eadred about the Year of our Lord DCCCCXLVIII uſe in ſome Charters and Patents the

That of Britain being laid aſide.

(a) Hiſtoriam Gentis Anglorum Eccleſiaſticam, quam nuper edideram, libentiſſimè tibi deſideranti, &c.

(b) Ic ꝼeꞃenꝺeꝥ ꞅꞃell ꝥ ic niꞅan aꞅꞃat be Anᵹel ꝼeode Seaxnum.

Name and Title of King of Great Britain; and Edgar about the Year DCCCCLXX aſſumed this Title, The Monarch of all Albion. But not onely the Name of Britain, but of Saxons alſo was laid aſleep; as to the Engliſh themſelves who thenceforth called themſelves no more by it. We ſay as to themſelves: It was in their power to call themſelves Engliſh, but not to procure all their Neighbours to doe the like. For as we have formerly hinted the Britains of Wales and Cornwall, knowing them firſt by that of Saxons, and having ſuch ſmarting cauſes never to forget their firſt coming into the Iſland, it ſo ſtuck with them, that they never took any notice of the change, neither at this very day in their Language do it. They term us not Engliſhmen but Saiſons, and our Language Saiſonaeg. And not onely they but the Scots, which ſtill retain the true ancient Scotch or Iriſh Tongue, and the Iriſh themſelves write us Saxonach in their Orthography, but pronounce us Saſonagh. For as well the Iriſh Language as the Welſh even to this very day is utterly unacquainted with the Names of England and of Engliſhmen.

SECT. X.

The Monarchy of the Engliſh Saxons in Britain, from the Death of Egbert, to the Monarchy of the Danes in Britain.

The ſpace of One Hundred and Eighty Years.

Ethelwulſe the King.

Aſſiſts the Mercians againſt the Britains.

Reſtrains the fury of the Danes by advice of his two Counſellours.

1. TO Egbert ſucceeded his Son Ethelwulfe (otherwiſe called Adelwolfe, Athewolf, Athulf, Edulf and Edwolf,) in the eighth year of Theophilus Emperour of the Eaſt; the twenty fourth of Ludovicus Pius Emperour of the Weſt, the twelfth of Withlaf or Wiglaf King of the Mercians, the fifteenth Indiction, A. D. DCCCXXXVII. Malmesbury writes, that he Reigned twenty years and five Months, a Man of a mild Diſpoſition, who choſe rather to live quietly than to rule over many Provinces; for contenting himſelf with the Weſt Saxon Kingdom the Inheritance of his Anceſtours, the other Appendices (as he calls them) which his Father had ſubdued, he beſtowed upon his Son Ethelſtan, who died, when and how is utterly uncertain. Burthred King of the Mercians he aſſiſted with his Forces againſt the Britains, and not a little graced him by the Marriage of his Daughter. The Daniſh Pirates who ſtragled through the whole Iſland, and by their ſudden Inrodes infeſted all the Sea Coaſts, he not once put to flight himſelf, or by his Captains; although, according to the chance of War, he received very frequent and heavy loſſes from them, the City of London and all Kent in a manner being laid waſte by them. The greateſt help againſt them was the Activity of his Counſellours, who took ſuch order, that the Enemy never acted any Hoſtility, but was one way or other chaſtized for it. For he had two moſt excellent Prelates in his time: Swithin of Wincheſter and Alſtan of Shireburn, who knowing the King to be dull and heavy, by their often Admonitions and Inſtructions, ſtill excited him to the diſcharge of his Royal Duty. Swithin deſpiſing Temporal things inſtructed his Sovereign in Matters Celeſtial. Alſtan concluding that Civil Affairs were not to be neglected, animated him againſt the Danes, both furniſhing the Treaſury with Money and taking care for the raiſing of Armies. Such as reade the Annals ſhall find many things both ſedulouſly began and happily brought to concluſion by him. By theſe two Ethelwolfe being ſupported, took good care for Foreign matters, and neglected not his Domeſtick buſineſs. After his Triumphs over his Enemies he turned himſelf to the ſervice of God, to whoſe Servants he granted the Tenths of all the Hides within his Kingdom, free from all Duties

De geſtis Reg. Anglorum. lib. 2. c. 2.

Goes to Rome paying Peter pence.

On his return marries.

Duties and Moleſtations. But this is but a ſmall matter ſaith the Monk. Having taken order for his matters at home he went to Rome, where to Saint Peter he offered that Tribute which England pays at this very day, in the preſence of Pope Leo the Fourth, who had honourably received Elfrede his Son formerly ſent to him, and had anointed him King. Having there made a ſtay of a whole year he repaired the School of the Engliſh, which as was reported, being firſt founded by Offa King of the Mercians, was burned the year after. Thence returning home thorough France, he there Married Judith the Daughter of Charles, King of that Nation, ſirnamed the Bald.

Upon which his Son and others conſpire to depoſe him.

Upon what account.

Afterwards he makes his Will.

And dies.

2. At his return he found, what he never ſuſpected, that he had incurred the diſpleaſure of ſome about him. For Ethelbald his own Son, Alſtan the Biſhop of Shireburn, and Enulph Earl or Count of Somerſetſhire conſpired together to depoſe him; yet upon better advice it was agreed that the Kingdom ſhould be divided betwixt Father and Son. However the Partition was very unequal, his Adverſaries prevailed that the Weſtern part of the Countrey, being far the better, ſhould be allotted to his Son, and the Eaſtern left to him, who yet ſhewed ſuch incredible goodneſs, that out of hatred to ſtrife and contention, he patiently yielded to his Son, and gently repreſſed the People, which concerned for his Honour and Dignity, were already aſſembled to aſſert them. All this ſtir was raiſed about his Wife being a ſtranger, yet entertained he her with great reſpect, and placed her on his Throne, contrary to the cuſtome of the Weſt Saxons: For * out of hatred to the wicked Practices of Eadburgh Daughter to Offa King of the Mercians and Wife to Byrhtric, and they neither ſuffered the Wives of their Kings to ſit by their Husbands, nor ſo much as to have the honour of being called Queens. Such was the Decree they made to prevent ſuch miſchiefs for the time to come, but he out of his kindneſs to Judith now repeal'd it. A few Months before his Death he made his Teſtament, whereby after the Diviſion of his Kingdom betwixt his two Sons Ethelbald and Ethelbirth, he aſſigned a Portion to his Daughter, and for ever in every tenth Hide of his Inheritance, he commanded that a Poor man ſhould be fed and clad; as alſo every year three hundred Marks of Gold to be ſent to Rome, whereof one hundred to be conferred on St. Peter, another upon St. Paul to find them with Lights, and an hundred as a Preſent given to the Biſhop. He lived two years after his return from Rome, and then dying was buried in the Biſhop's Church at † Wincheſter.

3. So much Malmesbury from Aſſerius concerning Ethulwolfe, his Hiſtory being the beſt and moſt ſubſtantial of all thoſe of Monks, which therefore we take as text whereon to comment in making out the Affairs of theſe obſcure times; for obſcure enough they are, though our baren Writers are ſo ridiculous as to excuſe the length of their ſhort Stories, and tell us they are ſo * ſhort in their Relations, out of ſtudy to avoid Prolixity and Tediouſneſs, whereas their Accounts they give us are ſo ſcant, that little profit can be made of them, and they attribute their brevity to their own contrivance, which indeed is to be aſcribed to their want of Intelligence. As for what he writes concerning his giving to Ethelſtan all that his Father had conquered, his words are (a) ſuch, as Ethelſtan may be conceived, not the Son of Egbert, but of Ethelwulfe, and ſome makes him to have been the Son of one, and ſome of the other. A late (b) Writer tells us, that the Saxon Annaliſt, the Authority of whom is ancienter, ſays expreſly, that Egbert himſelf gave to Ethelſtan his Son the Kingdom of Kent, Eſſex, Surrey and Suſſex; but the Annals ſay no ſuch thing, their (c) Tranſlatour indeed has foiſted in the word Egbertus, but the text (d) it ſelf which poſſibly he conſulted not, hath no ſuch word in that ſentence, but onely mentions Ethelwulfe therein. Be he is Brother or his Son it ſeems he parted with ſo great a ſhare of his Dominions to him, which for ſome years he held, though how long, as Malmesbury obſerves, is utterly uncertain. The unwarlike diſpoſition of Ethelwulfe, might well give Incouragment to the Danes, who the year following the death of Egbert, came again upon

---

* Gens namque occidentalium Saxonum Reginam juxta Regem ſedere non patitur; nec etiam Reginam appellare; ſed Regis conjugem permittit quam controverſiam imò infamiam: de quadam pertinaci & malevola ejuſdem gentis Regina ortam fuiſſe majores illius terræ perhibent Aſſerius.

† Quid autem ſibi vult illud Aſſerii defuncto autem Æthelwulfo Rege; ſepultóque apud Stemrugam?

* Singulorum autem bellorum geſta fines & modos ad plenum determinare nimietas prolixitatis neceſſariò prohibet, Huntingd. p. 844. vol. Savil.

(a) Denique avito Weſtſaxonum Regno contentus, cætera quæ pater ſubjugaverat appendicia Ethelſtano filio contradidit, qui quanto & quo fine defecerit incertum.

(b) Milton Hiſt. of England. (c) A. DCCCXXXVI. Hinc Ethelwulfus Ecberti filius occidentalium Saxonum Regnum capeſſit: filio autem ſuo Ethelſtano (Elbertus Cantuariorum) Saxonum Orientalium. Guthregienſium, & Guthſaxonum Regnum donavit, ita interpres, textus autem ſic ſe habet. (d) ⁊ ꝼenᵹ Æþelƿulꝼ Ecbꞃyhꞇinᵹ ꞇo ƿeꞅꞇ Seaxna ꞃice. ⁊ heſealde hiꞅ ꞅuna Æþelꞅꞇane Canꞇƿaꞃa ꞃice ⁊ eaꞅꞇ Seaxna ⁊ Suþꞃiᵹea ⁊ Suþ Seaxna.

Sect. 10.

The Danes are twice defeated by his Captains.

upon the Coaſts with three and thirty ſhips. The Annals (e) ſay that Wulfheard the Ealdorman, fought with them at Hamtune, that great ſlaughter was there made, and that he obtained the Victory; but died the ſame year of Age, it's very probable as one obſerves, ſeeming to have been one of Egbert's old Commanders, who was ſent with Ethelwulfe to ſubdue Kent. This repulſe did not ſo diſcourage them, but that either preſſed on by thoſe that ſent them, or allured with plunder and booty, the ſame year they landed in another place, and gave Battel at Port (or Portſmouth) to (f) Ethelhelm another of the King's Captains with the Dorſetſhire Men. For a good while (ſo the Annals word it) he had the better of them. But at length the Danes became Maſters of the Field, and Ethelhelm (whom in this place the Annals term both Dux and Ealdorman) they put to flight or rather ſlew him in the place.

Who being incouraged invade Lindſey. Waſte Eaſt England with Kent.

And London.

Maſters him at Sea.

In the next ingagement Ethelwulf's Captain obtained a Victory.

4. Animated by this Succeſs, in Proſecution thereof, they gave Battel the following year to * Herebryht (or Herbert) another of his Officers whom with many others they ſlew at a place called Merſcwar, whence driving as it were all before them, they ſuddenly invaded Lindeſey (that part of Lincolnſhire, which lies North from the City) where waſting all with barbarous Hoſtility, they pierced into Eaſt England, and thence into Kent, putting many to the Sword in all theſe places. Here was no oppoſition made againſt them, or ſo ineffectual that they proceeded, and not onely did great Miſchief at Canterbury and Rocheſter, but came to London, and here did their pleaſure the next year after. Ethelwulfe ſeemed at his Wits end, as great Violence being by theſe attempts offered to his peaceable mind, as to the Perſons of his Subjects; but by thoſe about him (the Biſhop of Wincheſter eſpecially, as Malmesbury affirms) he was excited to make reſiſtence, and to provide a Navy, his beſt defence; for had the Engliſh in thoſe ignorant times underſtood their true Intereſt as well as afterward Egbert did his, they had not endured thoſe Miſeries they ſuffered from thoſe barbarous Rovers, no way there being to ſecure the Land but by being Maſters at Sea, the beſt Bulwarks againſt thoſe hoſtile Invaſions, being ſtout and well manned ſhips. But ſuch was their ſmall practice, and thereupon little skill in Maritime Affairs, that they were inferiour to the Pirates, continually exerciſed in Navigation. For the year that followed the Slaughter at London, Ethelwulfe fighting againſt thirty and five of their ſhips at the River Carr, had the ſame fortune his Father had had before in the ſame place, the Danes remaining Maſters of the place of Fight. Yet that the Engliſh might not be utterly diſcouraged, Fortune ſeemed a little to own them in the next attempt they made the following year. For one Eanulf with the Somerſetſhire Men, Ealſtan a Biſhop (Alſtan of Wincheſter, doubtleſs the ſame that † Malmesbury ſpeaks of) and Oſerick another Officer with thoſe of Dorſetſhire, at the Mouth of the River Pedridan, ingaged with an Army of the Danes, made great ſlaughter of them, and got the Victory.

The Danes are twice more beaten.

Yet they enter the Thames and ſack London.

5. If a judgment be to be made of the ſtate of theſe Affairs from theſe ſmall hints we have from the Annals (the foundation of all the later Hiſtories of the Monks) we are to conclude that the Defeat they received at this place was of great conſequence. For, for five years after, or more, we hear nothing of them, nor any thing elſe of Ethelwulfe and his Officers, who ſeemed ſo amuzed with theſe Daniſh Wars, that they were attentive to nothing elſe, durſt meddle with no other buſineſs leſt they ſhould be unprepared for a freſh aſſault. And their care was not without its due effect. For when they had reaſſumed their former confidence, and landed again, one Ceorl * an Ealdorman, aſſiſted with the Shire of Devon, Aſſerius relates, and the Annals from him, fought with them at a place called Wicganbeorche, where he killed very many of them and remained Victor. Neither did they fare better in other places. The ſame year King Ethelſtan, together with Ealchere a Captain, defeated a great number of them at Sandwich, and taking nine of their Ships, forced the reſt to ſhift for themſelves: and the Pagans were conſtrained thereabout to Winter, which they did, as Aſſerius writes (and that the firſt time) in the Iſle of Shepey. Yet for all this being reſolute as far as even to deſperation, with fifty Ships did they this ſame year enter the Thames Mouth, whence they ranged as far as Canterbury and London. Fabius Ethelward writes, that they deſtroyed both. Aſſerius, though he encreaſes the number of their ſhips to

(e) A. 837. Her ƿulfheard ealdorman gefeaht æt Hamtune &c.

(f) ⁊ ðy ylcan geare gefeaht Æþelhelm dux ƿiþ denisone here ou Port mid dorsætum. ⁊ gode ƿhile ðene here geflymde. ⁊ ða deniscan ahton ƿæl stoƿe geƿeald. ⁊ ðone Ealdorman ofslogen ⁊

* Her Herebryht Ealdorman ƿæs ofslegen from hæþenum monnum. ⁊ monige mid him on Merscƿarum. ⁊ ðy ylcan geare eft on Lindesse ⁊ on east Englum ⁊ on Cantƿarum ƿurdon monige men ofslegene from ðam herige ⁊ hic Interpres ofslegen vertit occiſi, at vero An. priori ofslogon interpretatur fuderunt.

† Ad. An. DCCCXLV.

An. DCCCLI. *Her Ceorl ealdorman gefeaht ƿiþ hæþene here mid ðefena scyre æt ƿicgan beorche, &c. ſic Annales. Aſſer. autem hoc modo.

Anno dominicæ incarnationis 851. nativitatis autem Ælfredi regis 3 Ceorl Domnaniæ Comes contra paganos Normannos sive Danos pugnavit in loco qui dicitur Vuicganbeorg ⁊ Christiani victoriam habuerunt ⁊ et ipso eodem anno primum hyemaverunt pagani in insula quæ vocatur Sceperg ⁊ quod interpretatur insula ovium ⁊ quæ sita est in tamesi flumine inter East seaxum ⁊ Cantuarios. sed ad Cantium propior est quam ad East seaxnum in qua monasterium optimum constructum est. Aſſer. p. 2. Edit. Parkeriana qua nos utimur, Saxonicis characteribus quibus Aſſerius ipſe librum ſcripſit.

three hundred and fifty, yet ſpeaks onely of their pillaging of London. The Annals add,that they put to flight Beortulf the King of the Mercians, who made head againſt them with an Army, then paſſing Southward over the Thames into Surry, they encountred Ethelwulfe with Ethelbald his Son at a place called Aclea, but here they received a great overthrow, greater than ever before or after that Aſſerius heard of.

Whence into Surry, where Ethelwulfe overthrows them.

6. The ſucceſs of this year brought much reputation to Ethelwulfe, whom now being at leaſure, two years after, Burhred King of the Mercians and thoſe of his Council beſought to give them aſſiſtence againſt the Inhabitants of North Wales, which he readily granted. Through the Territories of the Mercians he marched againſt the Britains, and forced them all to obedience, as had been deſired. This ſame year did King Ethelwulfe, ſend Elfred his Son to Rome, where Leo the Biſhop kindly entertained him, conſecrated him King, and adopted him for his Epiſcopal Son. In the mean time Ealkere (or Ealcher) with the Kentiſh Men, and Huda with thoſe of Surry, were employed againſt another Army of the Pagans, which was landed in the Iſle of Thanet. At firſt they had the better of them, driving them from their Poſt; but afterward ſo many were ſlain, and ſo many drowned on both ſides, that the Victory remained doubtfull. Yet gave it no matter of mourning to the Court of Ethelwulfe, which now was buſied in Affairs of Love, the effect of which was, that the King ſent away his Daughter after Eaſter was over, to be married to Burhred King of the Mercians, and the Marriage was ſolemnized in the Royal village called Cippanhamme. However the following year the Danes wintered in the Iſle of Shepey, the Annals ſay now the firſt time. Whether to make himſelf more acceptable to Almighty God, whoſe help he now found was highly neceſſary for ſuppreſſion of theſe perpetual Annoiances, or otherwiſe religiouſly moved, he nommade a Book of the tenth part of all his Lands, and his whole Kingdom which he dedicated to his ſervice. Now as if he was fitted for undertaking a Pilgrimage to Rome, he went thither taking with him his young Son Alfred again, and there having ſtaid twelve Months, married and died as the Monk of Malmesbury hath related, after two years.

He reduces the Britains in Northwales, to obedience.

Beats back the Danes from landing in the Iſle of Thanet.

In villa ꞃeᵹia quæ diciꞇuꞃ Ciꞅpanhamme Aſſer.

The farther reaſon of the conſpiracy againſt Ethelwulfe.

7. Of the difference betwixt his Eldeſt Son and him, after his Return the Annals have nothing, but Aſſerius confirms the report,aſſigning the pretended Cauſe, being that he had taken with him to Rome his young Son Alfred, there to be inaugurated King, and had brought home with him an Outlandiſh Wife. Generally he is ſaid to have been averſe to matters of War, a Lover of Peace and Quiet which we are more apt to believe, having it told us, and * elſewhere that in his young years he was Biſhop of Wincheſter, and for want of other Heirs was conſtrained to take upon him the Kingdom. If this be true, then muſt Ethelſtan formerly mentioned have been his Son, not his Brother or the Son of Egbert, who having him muſt have had an Inheritour of his Dominions, and no neceſſity could then have lain upon Ethelwulfe of being King. To conclude with Ethelwulfe, the Annals give us his Pedigree, which reacheth no higher than to Adam himſelf. The Monk of Malmesbury is ſo bold, as to mention it together with that we find in St. Luke, and thinks it not ſuperfluous to put it into his Hiſtory, although he is afraid, that the noiſe of barbarous Names may violate the ears of ſuch as are not accuſtomed to them. I diſapprove of his mentioning it with the other in the ſame Page, in the ſame Book, nay, the ſame day or year. I am half afraid of the ſame thing, and juſtly of more, that the Reader will give no credit to it; but to be guilty of this once, and no more, as a piece of curioſity I ſhall leave it to the conſideration of our Students in Heraldry, referring them, if they deſire more, to other Stemms of theſe Saxon Princes particularly, that of Alfrede, which he may find in Aſſerius. Ethelwulfe then was the Son of Egbert, Egbert of Ealkmund, Ealkmund of Eaſa, Eaſa of Eoppa, Eoppa of Ingild, the Brother of Ina, King of the Weſt Saxons. They were the Sons of Cenred, Cenred of Ceolwald, Ceolwald of Cutha, Cutha of Cuthwin, Cuthwin of Ceaulin, Ceaulin of Cenric, Cenric of Cerdic, Cerdic of Eleſa, Eleſa of Eſla, Eſla of Gewis, Gewis of Wig, Wig of Freawine, Freawine of Frithugar, Frithugar of Brond, Brond of Bældæg, Bældæg of Woden, Woden of Frithuwald, Frithuwald of Freawine, Freawine of Freawulfe, Freawulfe of Fiun, Fiun of Godwulf, Godwulf of Geat, Geat of Tætwa, Tætwa of Bæaw, Bæaw of Sceldwea, Sceldwea of Heremod, Heremod of Itermon, Itermon of Hrawrain, who was born you muſt know in Noah's Ark. Now he is of ſmall Learning that knows not the Anceſtours of Noah, viz. Lamech, Mathuſalem, Enoch, Jared, Mahalaleel, Cainan, Enos, Seth and Adam. The Monk of Malmesbury's Pedigree differs much in Names from this.

* Abbreviationes Chronicorum Authore Radulfo de Diceto & Chronic. Joh. Brompton Abbatis Jornalenſis.

His Genealogy.

*Annal. ſeu Chronolog. Saxonica ad An.*DCCCLIV.

this. But the Heraldry of the Annals is the Ancienter. Let ſuch as deſire various Readings upon this Learned Subject, compare this Genealogy with that of his and others: ſome perhaps may have ſo little to doe. And Reader, if thou haſt heard of a wonderfull Atchievement, which ſome who thought themſelves very Learned, they ſay, performed of deriving King James his Pedigree from Adam, behold here the greateſt part done, it's but carrying on this Pedigree to the Siſter of Edgar, Etholing married to the King of Scots, and her Daughter to our Henry the Second.

Ethelbald and Ethelbert ſucceed in the Kingdom.

8. Ethelwulfe being dead, his two Sons Ethelbald and Ethelbert divided his Kingdom betwixt them. Ethelbald reigned over the Weſt Saxons. Ethelbert obtained Kent, Eſſex, Surrey and Suſſex. Ethelbald began his Reign in the ſixteenth year of Michael the third Emperour of Conſtantinople, the ſecond of Ludovicus, the ſecond Emperour of the Weſt; in the days of Charles the Bald King of the Franks, the ſixth of Burhred King of the Mercians, A. D. DCCCLVII. He was, as Malmesbury from Aſſerius ſets him out, heavy and ſluggiſh, one that defiled his Father's Bed, Marrying after his Death his Wife Judith. But he dying after five years, the whole Kingdom fell to the other Brother. The Annals ſpeak nothing at all of him from his coming to the Crown till his carrying to his Grave, which they ſay, as Malmesbury, was at Sherburn. They add that Ethelbert (or Æthelbryht as they call him) obtained the whole Kingdom of his Brother (his Father rather) and governed it in great peace and concord. During his Reign a great Fleet of the Danes arrived at Hampton (ſaith Malmesbury) and ſacked the City of Wincheſter, which the Annals do confirm, as to the latter place not mentioning where they landed. But they were ſpeedily encountred by * Oſric the Ealdorman with Hamptonſhire (now Hamſhire) and Æthelwulfe the Ealdorman, with Bearwucſhire (or Berkſhire) who put them to flight and became Maſters of the Field. The Monk to this relation adds, that being beaten away by the King's Captains, after much loſs received they went over the Sea, and taking a great compaſs, choſe the Iſle of Thanet to Winter in. This he relates as done all in one year, whereas from the Annals it appears, that their coming to Thanet was not till ſix years after. The Kentiſh men found themſelves concerned to purchaſe Peace with them by a ſumm of Money; but the Pirates under pretence of receiving this Money, and confirming the League, made an Excurſion into the Countrey, and waſted all that part of Kent which lies toward the Eaſt. Malmesbury again adds, that the Inhabitants united themſelves and drove away theſe perfidious Wretches. About the ſame time died Ethelbert after he had Reigned but five years, and his Body was buried with his Brothers at Sherburn.

Ethelbald dies and is buried at Sherburn.

The Danes ſack Wincheſter but are afterwards put to flight.

Ethelbert dies.

An. dccclx.
Her Æþel-bald cyning forþferde. ⁊ his lic lið æt Sciraburnan. ⁊ feng Æþel-bryht tocallum ðam rice his broður,
&c.

* ⁊ ƿiþ ðone here ge-fuhton Osric ealdorman mid Hamtun
scyre ⁊ Æþelƿulf
ealdorman mid Bearƿuc scyre ⁊ ðo-ne here geflymdon,
&c.

Is ſucceeded by Ethelred.

9. After the death of Ethelbert ſucceeded Ethelred his Brother, another Son of Ethelwulfe, in the firſt year of Baſilius Macedo Emperour of Conſtantinople, the twelfth of Ludovicus the ſecond Emperour of the Weſt, the ſixteenth of Burhred (titular) King of the Mercians, A. D. DCCCLXVII. † Malmesbury having told us, that he obtained his Father's Kingdom, the ſame number of years which his two Brothers, falls into a bemoaning of the fate of all the three, their miſerable and deplorable fate, as he terms it, that they ſhould all die an immature death, yet indeed being Royally deſcended, and the Nation being involved in ſuch dreadfull Calamities, they might well prefer an honourable death before a miſerable Reign. They ſo courageouſly and valiantly demeaned themſelves in defence of their Countrey, that no default is to be charged upon them, if proſperouſly did not ſucceed what they reſolutely had intended. This King nine times in one year fought with the Enemy in the Field, (as the chance of War is, with various ſucceſs, yet uſually with advantage) beſides many ſudden Excurſions whereby, as he was excellently skilled in Strategems, he often repreſſed the Inſolency of theſe Rovers. On the ſide of the Danes were ſlain nine Earls or Captains, one King, and multitudes of People without number. But above all memorable is the Battel he fought at Eſſchendune. The Army of the Danes being drawn up in that place, one part of it was led by two Kings, the reſt by other skilfull Leaders. The King with his Brother Alfred comes upon them: The King muſt ingage with the Kings: Alfred is ſet upon the Captains. So courageous and reſolute were both the Parties, that this day ſufficed not to determine the Quarrel, the Controverſie muſt be adjourned to that which followed. Scarce did the light appear when Alfred was up and ready. His Brother ſtaid in his Tent buſie at his Devotions, and though a Meſſage was brought him that the Pagans with great rage came on, he refuſed to ſtir untill they were ended. This Religious Confidence of the King was very ſeaſonable for the reſtraining of the heat of his Brother's youth, who was already ingaged. For the Battel of the

Who fought ſeveral pitch'd Battels with the Danes.

† De geſtis Regum Anglorum lib. 2. c. 3.

the Engliſh went to the worſt; the Infidels had the Advantage of the Ground, and made ſuch uſe thereof, that the Chriſtians began to think of flight. Now comes he unexpectedly into the Battel, beats back the Enemy, incourages his Friends and demeans himſelf with that Valour and Conduct that by God's aſſiſtence the Danes were diſcouraged, betook themſelves to their Heels and ran away. There fell their King Oſeg, five Earls, beſides an innumerable company of the Vulgar ſort.

The Mercians and Northumbrians endeavour to revolt.

10. Here our Writer will have us to remark that the Kings of the Mercians and the Northumbrians taking advantage at theſe Daniſh Wars wherewith Ethelred was incumbred, withdrew themſelves from the yoke of the Weſt Saxons as much as they could, and had almoſt recovered their former Independency, each Province therefore envying the proſperity of the other, the ſeveral Kings choſe rather to harbour the Enemy in their own Boſomes than give any relief to their diſtreſſed Countreymen; and by this means ſtudying rather a recovering than a preventing courſe, by their lazineſs they let their Countrey run to ruine. The Danes grew upon them without any oppoſition, the Engliſh were diſcouraged and terrified, and every Victory by means of the abundance of Captives became inſtrumental to procure another. The Territories of the Eaſtern Engliſh with their Cities and Villages were poſſeſſed by theſe Robbers, and their King St. Edmund being killed by them in the eight hundred and ſeventieth year from the Incarnation, on the nineteenth of November by a ſhort Temporal death purchaſed an Eternal Crown. The Mercians being overrun more than once, leſſened their Miſeries by Submiſſion, and giving up Hoſtages. And thoſe of Northumberland having been ſometime toſſed with Civil Diſſentions, when the Enemy was at their heels fairly compoſed all their Differences. Oſberth their King whom they had expelled, they now received again, and having made great preparations, they goe and meet the Enemy. But they are eaſily beaten, and ſhut themſelves up within the Walls of York, which being quickly ſet on fire by the Conquerours, and the flame increaſing, burns the Buildings, and therein they periſh and cover their native Soil with their own Bones. Thenceforth Northumberland falling by right of War to the ſhare of the Barbarians, for a long time groaned under their Dominion, and ſighed at the thought of its former liberty. As for King Ethelred though unbroken with all his many labours he died at laſt, and was buried at Winburn.

The Eaſt Angles, Mercians, and Northumberland, waſted by theſe Robbers.

11. This ſhort but good account we have from Malmesbury, of the ſtate and condition of theſe times, how the Engliſh Affairs ſtood both in reference to the Enemy, and to one another. What he ſpeaks of in general, we ſhall illuſtrate as much as we can by particular inſtances, as to time and place, the beſt courſe we can take in theſe obſcure matters. In the very firſt year of his Reign a vaſt Army of Danes invaded the Land, Commanded by Hinguar, and Ubba, two great Souldiers but very cruel: Hinguar was very crafty and ſubtile, Ubba was a Man of extraordinary Courage. They landed in Eaſt England, where wintring, they made truce with the Inhabitants out of deſign to obtain from them a ſufficient number of Horſes whereon to mount their Men. Being now become a ſtrong Body of Horſe; the following year they paſſed over Humber as far as York, where the Civil diſſentions of the People afforded them a notable advantage whereon to work. As Malmesbury obſerves they had driven into baniſhment Oſbryht their King, and ſet up a Tyrant, one Ælla in his room; but now though it was late, and the year declined, they recalled him, and ſo compoſed their matters that they feared not to meet, and encounter this puiſſant Army at York, into which City part of the Pagans had already entred: They brake into the Town, but were recieved ſo warmly by the Danes, that within as well as without, great ſlaughter of them was made, and the quarrel was decided betwixt their two Kings, both of them being ſlain in this Action, together with a great multitude of the People. The Remnant got as good terms from the Enemy as they could; but they were overrun, and the Countrey haraſſed as far as the River Tine. Egbert one of the Engliſh Race, was appointed King over them in room of Oſbrith. And now ſhould come in the ſtory of Bricern, whoſe Wife Oſbert is ſaid to have raviſhed, and who called in the Danes to revenge the injury upon the King. The thing if true was very remarkable, but we know not where Brompton had it; his Authority is not great, his Antiquity ſmall.

Hinguar and Ubba Arrive.

Huntingd. lib. 5.
Annal. ad An. 866.
ƿinteꞃ ꞅeꞇl namon on Eaꞅꞇ Enᵹl. ⁊ dæꞃ ᵹe-hoꞃꞅude ƿuꞃdon. ⁊ hihim ꝼꞃiþ-namon.
Ann. 867.
Heꞃ ꝼoꞃꞅc-heꞃe oꝼ Eaꞅꞇ Eaᵹl. oꝼeꞃ Hun-bꞃe muþan ꞇo Eoꝼoꞃ-ƿic on Noꞃ-þhumbꞃe, &c.

12. But the Danes having wrought their will in the Parts beyond the River Humber, the next year invaded Mercia, and bent their courſe toward * Snottengaham (then, and long after ſo called from the Caves in the Rocks) at preſent Nottingham. There they took up their Winter Quarters, which ſo alarm'd Burhred

The y invade Mercia.

* De Nottingamia ſic Aſſerius.

Sect. 10.

red King of the Countrey and his Noblemen, that they made an humble addreſs to Ethelred, deſiring that he with his Brother Alfred would undertake their Patronage and Defence. This they readily did, and with a conſiderable power of Men marched to Nottingham, where they offered Battel to the Danes. Hinguar was ſo crafty, as knowing himſelf unable to grapple with them, he would not ſtir a foot out of the † Caſtle, ſo that no conſiderable fight happened, and at length with good words he, ſaith Huntingdon, obtained a truce of the Engliſh, who were not able to break the Wall. Though the Annals ſeem rather to ſay that the Mercians obtained it of him, yet Ingulphus writes expreſly, that Burhred conſtrained the Danes to quit Nottingham, where at the Siege he renewed the Charter of Privileges to his Monaſtery of Croyland, which bears date from the Siege in the year 868. on the five and twentieth of July, from the ſubſcriptions to which it appears that both Ethelred, his Brother Alfred, and alſo Edmund King of Eaſt England, was at the Siege. But a peace or truce was made, and the Danes returned back to York with great booty, where they ſtayed a year, and there cruelly demeaned themſelves. When Winter was over they paſſed over Humber into Lindſey, and landing at Humberſtan, as || Ingulphus farther tells us, miſerably waſted all the Countrey; particularly that moſt famous and ancient Monaſtery of Bardency they deſtroyed, killing without mercy all the Monks in the Church. Having made their ſtay in thoſe Quarters all the Summer, and with Fire and Sword conſumed all things, about the Feaſt of St. Michael, ſaith he, they enter Keſteven; another part of Lincolnſhire, at this time, as well as the other, diſtinguiſht by name) where they waſte, kill and burn every thing they light on. At length, in the year of our Lord, eight hundred and ſeventy, in the month of September. Algar the younger (ſo called in reſpect of the late Earl Algar his Father) that moſt valiant Earl, got together all the youth of Honland (now Holland; mark, Reader, the antiquity of theſe three Diviſions of the County and their names, they continuing at this very day the ſame) and two Souldiers Seneſcals (as he calls them) Wiburt and Leofric, (from whom two Villages, the places of their reſidence, took the names of Wiberton and Lefrinkton) together with a Company belonging to the Monaſtery of Croyland, conſiſting of two hundred moſt ſtout Warriours, being for the moſt part fugitives: Headed by Fryar Toly, a Monk converted of the ſaid Monaſtery, who before his converſion had been a Souldier of great Name throughout all Mercia, for warlike enterprizes; Beſides theſe they got from Deeping, Langtoft and Baſton, about three hundred ſtout Men fit for War; Morcard the Lord of Brunne (or rather Bourne) with his Family which was both valiant and numerous, and the Vice Lord (as he calls him, meaning the Governour) of Lincoln, by name Oſgot, an old Souldier and moſt hardy, joyned with them with the Lincoln Squadron, conſiſting of five hundred Men.

But at Nottingham are Beleaguered by Ethelred, who makes peace with them.

Thence they go into Lincolnſhire.

Eoꝺem anno ꞅꝑæꝺıcꞇuꞅ ꞅaᵹanoꞃum exeꞃcıꞇuꞅ Noꞃꝺan-hẏmbꞃoꞅ ꞃelınquenꞅ ın Meꞃcıam venıꞇ;
⁊ Snoꞇıngaham aꝺııꞇ;
quoꝺ Bꞃı-
ꞇannıce Tıᵹᵹuo co-banc ınꞇeꞃꝓꞃeꞇaꞇuꞃ;
laꞇıne auꞇem Speluncaꞃum ꝺomuꞅ; ⁊ *vide etiam Ingulphum, ad
Ann.* 866.

† Cumque
Paᵹanı ꞇuıꞇıone aꞃcıꞅ munıꞇı bel-lum ꝺaꞃe
neᵹaꞃenꞇ;
⁊ Chꞃıſtıanı ꝼꞃanᵹe-ꞃe muꞃum non ꞅuppe-ꞇebaꞇ; pace
ınꞇeꞃ Meꞃ-cıoꞅ eꞇ paᵹanoꞅ ꝼac-ꞇa ꝺuo ıllı ꝼꞃaꞇꞃeꞅ cum ꞅuıꞅ cohoꞃꞇıbuꞅ ꝺomum ꞃeueꞃꞅı ꞅunꞇ.
Idem.

|| Ingulphi Hiſtoria.

13. Being all drawn together in Keſteven, upon the Feaſt of Maurice the Martyr, they gave Battel to the Pagans, and by God's great mercy having killed three of their Kings, with a great multitude of the ordinary ſort, they beat the Barbarians, as far as the gate of their Camp, where making moſt ſtout reſiſtence, the Invincible Earl withdrew his Forces. That very night came into the Camp of the Pagans, all the reſt of their Kings, from their ſeveral excurſions, having divided the Countrey amongſt them for the plunder, viz. Gogroum (or Godroum) Baſeg, Oskebil, Halfden, and Hamond, with as many Earls, viz. Frena, (or Erena) Unguar, Ulba and both the Sidroks, the Elder and Younger, with their Armies, and too much Booty, beſides a multitude of Women and Children. Their coming being known, moſt of the Chriſtians ſorely terrified, ſlipt away by night, ſo that with the ſaid Earl Algar and his Captains of eight hundred (of which his Party conſiſted) ſcarcely two hundred Perſons remained; with whom, as few as they were, by break of day, having heard Divine Service, and taken their Sacred Viaticum, being all of them moſt ready to dye for the faith of Chriſt, and the defenſe of their Countrey, they went into the Field againſt the Barbarians. The moſt Valiant Earl ſeeing his own Forces ſo much diminiſhed, ordered Fryar Toly, with five hundred Men, who had gallantly demean'd themſelves to ſtand on the right hand, aſſigning him for aſſiſtant Morcard of Brunne, with all his Followers. Oſgot with his five hundred he placed on the left ſide, and with him joyned Harding de Rehale, with all the Stanford Men, who were young and but too Valiant. He himſelf with his Seneſcals, ſtood in the midſt to ſuccour each quarter as need ſhould require. The Danes being much inraged for the ſlaughter made of their Men, early in the morning buried their three Kings in a Village formerly called called Laundon, but afterward Trekingham from their Sepulture, and now four Kings prepared themſelves to fight together with eight Earls; for two Kings and four Earls were appointed to look to their Camp and Captives. The Chriſtians being ſo few drew together in form of a Wedge, againſt the Archers, ſetting as it were a Paliſado of their Bucklers, and againſt the violence of the Horſe a wood of Lances, and in that poſture, inſtructed by their Leaders, continued all the Day till Night now approached: The Enemy perceiving that neither his Bowmen nor his Horſe could doe any execution, reſolved to counterfeit flight and to leave the Field, which the Chriſtians beholding broke their Ranks, notwithſtanding all their Leaders could doe, and in purſuit of the Pagans were diſperſed through the Plain without any Order or Conduct. The Barbarians hereupon return and like Lions fall upon ſo few poor Sheep. The moſt valiant, and never to be forgotten Earl Algar, with the Souldiers we named and Fryar Toly, cluſtering together upon an Hill, for a long time bore the brunt of the Barbarians, till ſeeing the ſtouteſt Chriſtians dead, they died alſo, fighting moſt valiantly over their Bodies. A few young men belonging to Sutton and Gedeney caſting away their Arms eſcaped into the adjoyning Wood, whence the next Night with much adoe, they got to Croyland, and thither brought the ſad news of the overthrow, as Theodorus the Abbat and his Monks were at their Veſpers. The Danes after this plundred and burnt the Abby of Croyland on the twenty fifth of Auguſt, killing the Abbat and all the Fryars, except one Boy of ten years old, Tugar or Turgar by Name, on whom young Sidrok to ſave him put on a Daniſh Coat. Thence went they to the Monaſtery of Medeſhamſted, where they did the like; and thence with innumerable Spoils paſſed on towards Huntingdon, the two Sidroks bringing up the Rere as they ever did, and paſſing over a Bridge, two Waggons full of Treaſure fell into the River Nene, which as the followers of young Sidrok were buſied in drawing out, Turgar the young Fryar eſcaped from them and returned to Croyland.

But renewing the fight burn and deſtroy all before them.

Next for Cambridge and the Iſle of Ely, which they plunder with Eaſt England.

Ingulphus ubi ſuprà.

14. The Pagans ſtill marched on waſting all the Countrey as far as Grantebrig, now Cambridge, and ſo to the Iſle of Ely, where having rifled and burnt the famous Monaſtery and killed all they found therein with much Plunder and Cattel, which for the reputed ſecurity of the place, had been brought thither out of the adjoyning Countrey, they proceeded into Eaſt England, where meeting with Earl Wulketule, who made vigorous reſiſtence, they cut him off with all his Army. Having taken alſo the moſt Holy Edmund King of that Countrey and led him to a Stake as a Butt to ſhoot at, they firſt with many Arrows ſhot him through, and afterward cut off his Head. Having poſſeſſed themſelves of all Eaſt England, there they ſpent all the Winter, at Thetford ſay the Annals. The year following (having received great Supplies, as Huntingdon hints, who calls their Army a new and mighty one, and compares it to a River which overflowing bears away all before it) they bent their Courſe toward the Weſt Saxons, the Territories of whom alone had not felt the effects of their Covetouſneſs and Cruelty, who alone were in capacity to reſiſt them; for the overturning of the Heptarchy (the Monarchy being not yet fully eſtabliſhed) had weakned all the other Provinces, wanting now ſuch Officers as ſhould vigorouſly defend them. Coming to Reading they fortified themſelves betwixt the two Rivers Thames and Kenet, and after three days ſent out two Earls to forage the Countrey, but they were encountred by Ethelwulfe Earl of Berkſhire, who at Englafeld (or Englefeild) gave them Battel, killed one of their Earls (Huntingdon names Sidrac) and obtained the Victory. Four days after came King Ethelred with Alfred his Brother and the main Body, and gave Battel to the Danes, wherein on both ſides very many fell: Earl Ethelwulfe here loſt his life, being by Ethelward the Hiſtorian called Adulf, who writes that he was buried in the Province of the Mercians, at a place called Northworthige, but in the Daniſh Tongue Deoraby, and the Danes became Maſters of the Field. Yet was not the diſadvantage ſo great on the Engliſh ſide, but that four days after the King and his Brother appeared again in the Field againſt them at a place called * Æſceſdune or Aſhdowne, where they ingaged on both ſides with their full ſtrength. The Danes divided their Army into two Bodies, whereof the one was led by

An. Dccclxx. Ƕeꞃ ƿaꝺ ꞅe heꞃe oꝼeꞃ oꝼeꞃ Myꞃce innan eaꞅꞇ Enᵹle ⁊ ƿinꞇeꞃ ꞅeꞇl namon æꞇ Ðeoꝺꝼoꞃꝺa. inꞇeꞃ ꝺuo ꝼlumina ꞇameꞅen ⁊ cẏneꞇan. Aſſer.

Then to the Weſt Saxons.

Where they are encountred by Ethelwulfe.

And fight ſeveral Battels with Ethelred.

Corpus quoque ſupradicti Ducis abſtrahitur furtim, adducitúrque in Merciorum provinciam in locum qui Northworthige nuncupatur, juxta autem Danaam linguam Deoraby. Lib. 4. c. 2.

* De nomine ſic Simeon Dunelmenſis ad Ann. DCCCLXXI. Statuunt Legiones in loco qui dicitur Etſceſdun, quod Latinè mons Fraxini poteſt reverenter interpretari. Sic Aſſerius: in loco qui ꝺicꞇuꞃ Æꞅceꞅꝺun ⁊ quoꝺ Laꞇine monꞅ ꝼꞃaxini inꞇeꞃꝑꞃeꞇaꞇuꞃ.

Sect. 10.

Backſecg and Healfdene their Kings, the other by their Earls. With the firſt ingaged King Ethelred, and Alfred with the other. In the former Battel fell Backſecg; in the latter the two Sidroks, beſides three other Earls, Oſbearn, Fræna and Hareld. Both the one and the other were beaten and put to flight, many thouſands ſlain, and night interrupted a greater Execution, though Ethelward writes, that the whole Youth of the more excellent Barbarians here periſhed, neither after nor before was ſuch ſlaughter heard of, ſince that the Nation of the Saxons by War obtained Britain. Here ſome obſerve that Ethelred both had the diſadvantage of the lower ground, and came later into the Battel from his Devotions. Alfred began the Fight e'er his Brother came into the Field. And as for the Daniſh King, whom the Annals call Backſecg, the Daniſh Hiſtory talks of one Ivare the Son of Regnere.

Ethelward ubi ſuprà.

15. Aſſerius writes of a ſupply which the Pagans received ſhortly after from beyond the Sea. Yet was it not till Ethelred, fourteen days after the former Fight again aſſiſted by his Brother, had encountred their whole Power at Baſing, in which ingagement they had the better, being headed by Agnere and Hubbo, the Brothers of the ſlain Ivarus. But ſtill, as we lately obſerv'd, the loſs received by the Engliſh could not be great, for about two Months after they were again ſo well recruited, that they durſt a third time fall upon the Pagans at a place called Merotune, divided into two Bodies, and in the ſame poſture as they had formerly fought. Both theſe Bodies were put to flight, although for a great part of the day they had had the better. Great was the ſlaughter made on both ſides, and yet ſay the Annals, the Danes became Maſters of the Field, ſo various was the fortune of this day or rather ſo uncertain their Intelligence. To be ſure Heahmund a Biſhop was there ſlain, beſides other good men, not a few: And a grievous Plague followed in Summer. Hereof (we may gueſs, for the Annals ſpeak not expreſly) died Ethelred after Eaſter, when he had Reigned five years, and his Body was buried at Winburn. Brompton in his Chronicle ſays, that he died of wounds received in a Fight he fought with Somerled a Dane, who returning to Reading from the Battel at Merton, deſtroyed whatever there he found. But his Authority is but ſmall, compared with that of others. As for the place of his Burial, by the Annals called Winburnan and Winburnham, in other Saxon Monuments is the ſame with that ancient Town Vindogladia, whereof Antonine maketh mention. Probably it had that Name from being ſituate betwixt two Rivers, for Windugledy in the Britiſh Tongue, ſoundeth as much as betwixt two Swords, and Rivers, by a peculiar Phraſe of their own, they termed Swords, as appeareth by Aberdugledian, the Britiſh Name of Milford Haven, as much as to ſay, the mouth of two Rivers, becauſe two Rivers named with them Gledian, that is, Swords run into it. The laſt Name Winburn (a Town in Dorſetſhire) is compounded of Vin, a parcel of the old Name, and the Saxon word Burne, which alſo among them betokeneth a River, by the addition thereof, the Saxons being wont to name places ſtanding upon Rivers. Here Cuthburg Siſter to Ina King of the Weſt Saxons, being divorced from the King of Northumberland her Husband, built a Nunnery which at length being decayed by time, a fair Church was erected in the place with a Vault under the Quire, and an high Spire beſides the Tower Steeple, wherein were placed Prebendaries in lieu of theſe Nuns. In this Church lyeth Ethelred interred, upon whoſe Tomb not very long ſince repaired, in Cambden's time this new Inſcription was to be read, Here reſteth the Body of Saint Ethelred King of the Weſt Saxons Martyr, who died in the year of our Lord DCCCLXXII, the three and twentieth of April, by the hands of the Pagan Danes. By his Saintſhip and this Inſcription he ſhould either have died or been mortally * wounded in Battel.

An. Dccclxxi.
⁊ þær ꞅærþ
Heahmund
biſcop ofſlegen. ⁊ fealagodra monna. ⁊
æfter ðyſſum gefeoht com
mico ſomorlida. ⁊ peroſer Eaſtron gefor Æþered Cyning ⁊
he ricſode fif gear. ⁊
hiſl c liþæt
Winburnan ⁊

Who dies.

Is buried at Winburn.

Alfred ſucceeds.

16. Alfred, Ælfred, Alured, or Elfred his Brother, the fourth and youngeſt Son of Ethelwulfe ſucceeded him, in the ſixth year of Baſilius Macedo, Eaſtern Emperour; the ſeventeenth of Ludovicus, the Second Emperour of the Weſt; the one and twentieth of Burhred, King of the Mercians; the fifth Indiction, A. D.

---

* De eo tamen ſic Ingulphus: Anno namque incarnationis 872 Rex Ethelredus multis prœliis contra Danos vexatus, ſed ſemper invictus, obiit Winburnæ & Sepultus eſt.

Al (ſeu Æl) Friðe Omnis Pax. Alurede idem Vrede (cum V Conſonanti) Pax hodie Belgis. V enim & F promiſcuè uſurpantur in lingua Teutonica. Vrede Frede, Vlie Flie, Vliſſingen Fluſhing Vader Father, & multa alia; pro f. ſcribunt v, pronunciant tamen ut f nobis pronunciatur; pro noſtris th. d. eſt illis in uſu; dat that, donder thunder; mille alia.

DCCCLXXII. He was born at * Wanating, (or Wanatune) now Wantage, a Town in Berkſhire, then a Royal Village or Manour of the Kings, at preſent eminent for nothing, except it be for a Market. His Mother was Oſburg, the Daughter of Oſlae the Panther of King Ethelwulfe, but of great Deſcent, which he drew from the Goths and Jutes of the ſtock of Stuph and Wihtgar the two Brothers, who receiving the Iſle of Wight from their Uncle Cerdic, and Cynric his Son, ſlew thoſe few Britains they found in the Iſland, in the place called Swihtgaraburg, the reſt had either been killed before, or driven into Baniſhment. In the fifth year of his Age, his Father ſent him to Rome, accompanied with many perſons both Noble and Ignoble, where Pope Leo the Fourth ordained and anointed him; and if a certain * Chronicle tell us truth, he was the firſt King of England that was anointed. He adopted him alſo for his Son. Afterward when Ethelwulfe went himſelf to Rome, this young Son he took along with him, being more tender of him than any of his other Sons. For beauty and wit he exceeded them all, his converſation being delightfull and charming. But this tenderneſs grew to ſuch fondneſs in his Parents, that they neglected the great part of his † Education, viz. of learning his Book till he came to twelve years of Age, yet in the mean time did he learn many Saxon Poems, and in the Art of Hunting was ſkilfull to admiration. On a time the Mother having got a Book of Songs in her Hand, ſhewed it her Sons, and told them that he that could firſt get them by heart ſhould have the Book; he much enamoured of the firſt letter for its fairneſs, took it, and going to his Maſter, learnt to Reade, and then ſaid it before his Mother. After this he became expert in the Diurnal Courſe, or Celebration of Hours, as it was called; certain Pſalms, and many Prayers, which being digeſted into a Book, day and night he conſtantly had about him, and made uſe of them upon all occaſions. But after this time, when his Youth afforded him opportunity of learning the Arts and Sciences, there were no Maſters to be had to Teach him, of which he often with many and deep ſighs complained, as one of the greateſt misfortunes of his Life. But afterward when he came to more ripe years, and had the opportunity of Books, and Teachers, then by ſickneſs, by his extraordinary care and ſolicitude in buſineſs, by the frequent hoſtilities exerciſed by the Pagans both by Land and Sea, he was diverted from what he exceedingly deſired: yet ſtill as he could he omitted no opportunity, but ſtole it from his Recreations, to improve himſelf.

Who was the firſt King of England that ever was Anointed.

An. Dom. Incaꞃnaꞇioniꞅ 849. naꞇuꞅ eꞅꞇ Alꝼꞃeꝺ angul Saxonum ꞃex in villa ꞃeᵹia quæ ꝺiciꞇuꞃ Vuanaꞇinᵹ in illa paᵹa quæ nominaꞇuꞃ Beꞃnocꞅciꞃe, quæ Paᵹa taliꞇeꞃ vocaꞇuꞃ a Beꞃnoc ꞅilui ubi buxuꞅ h bunꝺanꞇiꞅꞅimo naꞅciꞇuꞃ. Aſſerius.

* W. Thorn. ch. 5. ſect. 4. Hic Elfredus fuit primus Rex Angliæ qui inunctus erat. Hic conſtituit Hundred & Leſtes.

† Aſſerius ad A. D. 866.

Marries.

17. When he was twenty years Old, he Married Alſwitha, Etheſwida, or Egolſwitha the Daughter of Æthelred Earl of the Gaini, Sirnamed Mucil, or the Great, from his ſtature, of the Royal Bloud of the Mercians. In his two and twentieth year, his Brothers being now all dead, to whom, as Aſſerius terms it, he had been Secundary, he came to Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, though not without reluctancy, out of apprehenſion of that danger which hung over his head, from the conſtant Invaſions and Hoſtilities of the Pagans. And ſcarcely had he made an end of his Brother's Funerals, when after one Month he was forced with a ſlender Army to Engage their whole Power at Wilton. He had the better of it at the firſt, for he put them to flight, but unwarily giving the Chaſe, they rallied, and returning upon his Men, now quite tired out, became Maſters of the Field. And that it may not ſeem ſtrange that here the Engliſh ſhould be foild, Aſſerius ſhews, that beſides the ſmalneſs of their Number, in compariſon of the Enemy, this one year they had been ſpent and weakned by eight ſeveral Battels fought againſt theſe Pagans. In theſe eight Battels periſhed one Daniſh King, and nine of their Earls, with innumerable multitudes of the leſſer ſort, beſides what fell in thoſe Excurſions made by day and night, the number of which was not to be counted. The Annals inſtead of eight, ſay that nine ſeveral Battels were this year fought, and that upon the Southern Bank of the River Thames, wherein one King, and nine Earls were killed. Now this ſame year the Weſt Saxons made an Agreement with the Danes, on condition that they departed out of their Quarters, which they performed, ſo wearied were both ſides with theſe inceſſant Hoſtilities. The following year (from Reading ſay the Annals) they went to London, and there they Wintered, whither the Mercians ſent Meſſengers, and renewed the Peace which they had formerly made with them.

Uxoꞃem de Ꝋeꞃcia nobilem ꞅciliceꞇ ᵹeneꞃe ꝼiliam Æþelꝼꞃeꝺi Gainoꞃum comiꞇiꞅ qui coᵹnominabaꞇuꞃ Ꝋucil.

Fights ſeveral Battels with the Danes.

Makes an agreement with them.

Who March to Lindſey in Lincolnſhire.

18. The year following being the DCCCLXXIV. of our Lord, and the twenty fourth of Alfred's Age, the Army of Danes left London, and went into the Countrey of the Northumbrians, where in a Region called Lindeſey they Wintred, and there again the Mercians renewed the Peace. So Writes Aſſerius, and the Annals ſay the ſame thing, adding this, that the place they Wintred in was a Village called Turcoſige. This Village is at this day known by the Name of Tork- ſey

Sect. 10.

ſey, about five Miles South from Gainsborough in Lincolnſhire, in that diviſion called Lindſey, ſeated upon the River of Trent, South from the River of Humber (above twenty Miles) as all Lindſey is, being moſt certainly within the Countrey of the Mercians, ſo that a wonder it is that both Aſſerius and the Annals ſhould place them in Northumberland, which by univerſal conſent was bounded on the South by the River Humber. But here we may ſuppoſe they choſe to take up their Quarters, becauſe of the conveniency of the River, by which carrying at High Tide Veſſels of conſiderable burthen, they might receive ſupplies of Men, Arms, or Proviſions from beyond the Seas as they had occaſion; for this reaſon afterward they landed ſometimes in thoſe Parts, and took up their Quarters alſo at Gainsborough, where one of their greateſt Tyrants was ſtabbed. The meaning of it ſeems to be this, that they deſigned to paſs into the Parts beyond Humber, but here ſtopt becauſe of conveniency, or becauſe Lindſey was ſometime under the Power of the Kings of the Northumbrians; thereupon,and becauſe it lyes ſo far North, by ſome Writers,in a general acceptation it came to be reckoned as part of it. That this was ſo in the days of Aſſerius, (who yet being a Welſh Man might be Ignorant in the Engliſh Saxon Chorography) ſeems from what he writes at the year following, that the often mentioned Army of Danes quitting Lindſey, went into Mercia, and Wintred in the place called Hreopdune. Notwithſtanding the renewing of the Peace, here they forced Burhred King of the Mercians, to quit both the Iſland, and his Kingdom, in the two and twentieth year of his Reign, whence he went to Rome, and not long after his Arrival, died. He being gone, they brought all Mercia under their dominion: yet committed it to a ſilly Servant of Burhred's, one Ceolwulfe on this condition, that he ſhould again reſtore it the ſame day it ſhould be demanded. For performance hereof he gave Hoſtages, and Swore, that in no manner would he contradict their will, but be obedient in all things. Hrependune is that Town now called Repton in Derbyſhire, the Reſidence of the Mercian Kings, when Derby was ſcarcely ſo good as a Village; ſeated upon the River Trent, where it takes into it the River Dove, eminent both for the Burial both of good King Ethelbald, and the deprival of this Burhred who had all the while he lived ſupported his Title, partly with fair Language, and partly by Gifts, and now (as one * obſerves) became an Example to teach Men in how tickliſh and ſlippery a place they ſtand, who are underprop't onely with Money.

Seize upon the Mercian Kingdom.

* Cambden.

† Aſſerius ad A. D. 875.

Necnon ⁊ Picꞇoꞅ ⁊ Sꞇꞃaꞇꞇuꞇꞇenꞅeꞅ ꝺepopulaꞇi ꞅunꞇ.

Annales ⁊ oꝼheꞃᵹaꝺe on Paohꞇoꞅ ⁊ on ꞅꞇꞃecleꝺ ƿealaꞅ.

Cur Strattuttenſes? Supra monuimus Cambros ſive Britannos qui regiones ſeptentrionales habitabant uſque ad Cludam Amnem conſtituiſſe Regnum quod à flumine Cluda Strateluyd à Wallis, à Mariano Scoto corruptè Streadiylcad Walanorum. Habitabant hi Britanni juxta Pictos atque inde ƿeaꞇaꞅ ꞅꞇꞃæcleꝺ Stricled Welſh, id eſt Wallos Pictos ſeu variegatos Angli eos apellarunt.

19. † The Danes departing from Hreopdune, divided themſelves into two Parties. One of them under Conduct of Healfdene one of their Kings, went into Northumberland, where they Wintered by the River Tyne, and ſubdued all the adjacent Countries, and waſted the Territories of the Picts, and Pictiſh Britains. The other Party Commanded by Gothrum, Oſcitill and Amund, three other of their Kings went ſtreight to Grantebrig, and there remained a whole year. Alfred in the mean time, ſenſible that all theſe miſchiefs happened at land, becauſe he was not Maſter at Sea, rigged up a Fleet with intent to ſurprize the Pirates, e'er they ſhould land. He met with five (ſays Aſſerius, ſeven ſay the Annals) of their Ships, whereof one he took, and the reſt eſcaped. The following Summer the Danes moved to a Caſtle of the Weſt Saxons, called Werham. Alfred now thought fit inſtead of Fighting, to Treat with them; either for that he being taken up in Sea Affairs was not well provided at Land, which made them ſo bold as to enter his paternal Territories, or becauſe they doubted of their own ſtrength, and were very willing to entertain Overtures. Some ſay by Money he purchaſed a Peace, whereby they were ſtreightway to depart his Dominions. For performance of the Accord they gave up what Hoſtages he himſelf named, took an Oath upon Holy Reliques, and upon a Sacred Bracelet; (an Oath ſo great and ſolemn as they never before would ſwear to any Nation) yet as it ſeems not with any intention to obſerve it. * For not long after by Night they took their Horſes,(Aſſerius ſaith they killed all his, or their own; for the words are ambiguous) and went to Exeter. This ſame year Healfdene their King had brought his Affairs to that ſettlement and perfection in Northumberland, that he divided the Countrey amongſt his Men, and began to cultivate it with Tillage. And this ſame year it was as Aſſerius affirms, that Rollo with his Normans having Wintered here in England, paſſed over the Sea, and invaded France.

Then ſubdue Northumberland.

And invade the Weſt Saxons.

Alfred then King, forced to purchaſe Peace.

*Nocte quaꝺam ꝼœꝺeꞃe ꝺiꞅꞃupꞇo omneꞅ equiꞇeꞅ quoꞅ habebaꞇ occiꝺiꞇ veꞃꞅuꞅque inꞇe Domnaniam aꝺ locum qui ꝺiciꞇuꞃ Saxonicè Eaxanceaꞅꞇꞃe Bꞃiꞇannicè auꞇem Caꞃuviꞅc⁊ Laꞇinè quoque civiꞇaꞅ in oꞃienꞇali ꞃipa ꝼluminiꞅ Uuiꞅe ꞅiꞇa eꞅꞇ pꞃope maꞃe meꞃiꝺianum ⁊ quia inꞇeꞃꝼluiꞇ Galliam Bꞃiꞇanniamque ⁊ inopinaꞇè ꝺiꞃexiꞇ ⁊ ibi hyemaviꞇ.

Sect. 10.

20. The year which followed being the DCCCLXXVI. of Our Lord, and the twenty ſixth after the Birth of Alfred, part of the Pagan Army remained at Exeter, and another part in Harveſt time made excurſions into Mercia. The number of theſe Rovers dayly encreaſed, ſo as any that fought with and defeated them never ſo often, had but the ſame endleſs employment as he that cut off the Head of Hydra; for if as this day thirty thouſand of them were killed, to Morrow others would ſucceed them, and their number be doubled. Alfred perceiving that for all his labour for this reaſon he ſhould profit nothing, but that each Victory (if he obtained it) would prove but a prelude to a farther trouble and danger, gave order throughout all his Dominions for furniſhing out Gallies, or long Ships, to prevent the landing of theſe troubleſome Gueſts. He himſelf haſted to Exeter, wherein he Beſieged the Danes, from whom to cut off all ſupplies, he manned out his Ships to intercept all proviſions that ſhould come by Sea. His Navy met with one hundred and twenty of their Veſſels, upon which they ſet with all violence imaginable, and all the Veſſels full of Men as they were, periſhed; how Aſſerius tells us not, and the Annals ſay it was by Tempeſt near Swanawic. The ſame year the Pagans quitting Werham, partly on Horſeback, and partly on Shipboard, and theſe at Sea when they came to the place called * Suanavine periſhed to the number of one hundred and twenty Veſſels, more if credit be given to the Copy of Aſſerius, whereas the Annals mention but one loſs at Sea this year, and the identity of the number in Aſſerius, makes us ſuſpect it one and the ſame loſs, and that his Text is corrupted. However ſo it happened, that the Danes affrighted with this great loſs (or loſſes) gave him what Hoſtages he deſired, and promiſed to depart. This they did in the Month of Auguſt marching into Mercia, which Region they granted, partly to Ceolwulfe, a certain ſilly Servant of the King, and partly divided amongſt themſelves.

Aſſerius, Tunc ꞃex Ælꝼꞃeꝺuꞅ iuꞅꞅiꞇ Cymbaꞅ ⁊ ᵹaleaꞅ i longaꞅ ꝼabꞃicaꞃi peꞃ ꞃeᵹnum, &c.

* Aſſerio Gnaueꞃic.

The Danes ſuffer great loſſes at Sea.

21. In the year from our Lord's Incarnation DCCCLXXVII, and the twenty ſeventh after Alfred's Nativity, the often mentioned Army of the Pagans from Exeter, in Chriſtmas departed to Ceppanhamme a Royal Village ſeated * in the Northern part of Wiltſhire on the Eaſtern Bank of the River, in Britiſh called Abon, where it wintred. Hence did it make excurſions into the Territories of the Weſt Saxons, of whom many it forced to quit the Land, and in great fear and want of all neceſſaries to croſs the Seas; ſuch as remained were conſtrained to ſubmit themſelves to their Authority. Alfred with a few of his Nobility, with a ſmall Party of Souldiers and ſome of his Vaſſals in Woods and the miry parts of Somerſetſhire was forc't to hide his Head. A miſerable life he led, having nothing whereby to ſubſiſt except what by ſtealth and Irruptions he could get from the Pagans or from his diſobedient Subjects which had ſubmitted themſelves unto them. He was forced to take up his Quarters with one of the Keepers of his Cattel. The † Neatherd's Wife being on a time buſie in baking Cakes upon the Hearth, the King ſate by the fire ſide fitting and trimming up his Bow and Arrows with his other Habiliments of War. It happened that the Cakes, ſet too near the fire, burned, at which the Woman very much concerned, in haſte ran to the fire and ſnatched them away, but heartily chid the Gueſt upon the Bench, ſaying, How now man wilt thou not turn the Cakes that burn? Thou wouldeſt be glad to have a ſhare of them when they are bak'd. The unhappy Woman (ſays Aſſerius) little thought ſhe ſpake to King Alfred who had fought ſo many Battels with the Pagans, and got ſo many Victories over them. But ſo great affliction happened to him, as our Authour gueſſeth, for not having in his younger years when he firſt came to the Government, heard and relieved his oppreſſed Subjects, for which neglect St. Neolus his Kinſman foretold out of a Prophetick Spirit, that theſe Calamities would fall upon him. In the mean time the Brother of Hinguar and Healfdene departing from Northwales with three and twenty Ships, where they had made great waſte, ſailed into Devonſhire, and facing a Caſtle called Cynwith, were killed in a Salley made by the King's Garriſon, with two hundred of their men. There was taken their Banner called Reafau, ſaid to have been made at one Noon-time of the day by the three Siſters of Hinguar and Hubba the Daughters of Lodebrock. Before every Battel if they chanced to be victorious, the likeneſs of a living and flying Crow was reported to have appeared in it, but in caſe they happened to have the worſt it would hang directly down and not move at all. And this hath often been proved by experience, ſaith our Authour.

The Weſt Saxons ſubmitting to the Danes put Alfred to his ſhifts.

* Quæ eꞅꞇ ꞅiꞇa in ꞅiniꞅꞇꞃali paꞃꞇe ƿilꞇunꞅciꞃe ⁊ in Oꞃienꞇali ꞃipa ꝼluminiꞅ quoꝺ Bꞃiꞇannicè ꝺiciꞇuꞃ Abon. In ſiniſtrali parte; loquitur more Hebræorum & Wallorum qui meridiem dextram vocabant Aquilonem ad ſiniſtram, dum ſcil. Orientem verſus facies converterent.

† Aſſerius ex vita Sti Neoli.

6. This

Sect. 10.

22. This ſame year Alfred built after Eaſter a Caſtle at a place called * Ethelingaeg, whence with his Nobles of Somerſetſhire he made frequent excurſions againſt the Pagans. In the ſeventh week after Eaſter he rode to the ſtone of Ægbryht in the Eaſtern part of the Wood called Selwad, in Latine Silva Magna, and Coitmaur in Britiſh, (in the Eaſtern part of Somerſetſhire, now not ſo great) where met him all the Inhabitants of Somerſetſhire, Wilts, and ſuch of Hamſhire as had not been driven beyond the Sea, who received their King as one riſen from the dead, with extraordinary Joy, and there they reſted themſelves that Night. Diſlodging as ſoon as it was light, they travelled that day as far as Acglea, and the next arrived at a place called Ethandun, (now Edindon in Wiltſhire) where they ingaged the whole Power of the Danes, and got the Victory. They purſued them to one of their fortifi'd Caſtles, to which Alfred cauſed cloſe Siege to be laid, which having continued fourteen days, the Pagans pinched with hunger and cold and deſpairing of Relief, yielded on condition to have leave to depart out of the King's Dominions; for to depart they were, and gave up what Hoſtages he was pleaſed to nominate, confirming the Agreement alſo by their Oaths. Gothrun alſo their King ingaged to become a Chriſtian and be baptized: All which Covenants they faithfully performed. For after about three weeks he came to Alfred, then lying at Alre a place near to Ethelingaeg (now Aulre in Somerſetſhire upon the River Parret, a Village conſiſting of a few poor Cottages) accompanied with thirty of the choiceſt of his Army, and Alfred adopting him for his Son, received him out of the Font, and named him Athelſtan; the ſolemnity of looſing his Chriſmal Ligamant, was performed at Wetmore or Wædmore an Houſe of the King's, with whom he continued twelve days (or twelve Nights to ſpeak in the Dialect of our Saxon Anceſtours) and then returned, both he and his followers having received very great Preſents. So good a change was wrought upon them, that they kept their word. For the next year they departed from Cippanham to Cirenceſtre, and there continued an whole twelve Month. Thence removed they to the Eaſt Angles, the Countrey whereof together with Northumberland, ſome write that Alfred gave to Guntrun at his Chriſtening, to be held in fealty of him.

Alfred recovers his Kingdom.

Routs the Danes.

Makes Gothrun their King turn Chriſtian.

Giving him Eaſt England to hold in fealty of him.

23. For the Gift of Northumberland, we have nothing to ſay, but as to the other there is extant the (a) Form of a League made betwixt theſe two Kings, in the firſt Article whereof the Limits of their Territories are thus deſcribed. The Limits of our Land are firſt upon the Thames, then proceed they to the River Lee as far as his Fountain, then ſtreight to Bedford, and ſo up to the River Ouſe, as far as Watling-ſtreet. The ſecond Article, appoints the value of a Man ſlain, whether Engliſh or Dane, to be four Marks of melted Gold, and the Redemption of each four hundred Shillings. But if the King's Servant or Thane, was accuſed of Manſlaughter. The third Article proceeds, that he be tried by twelve other of the King's Servants. In caſe he was not the King's Servant, but belonged to ſome inferiour Lord, he ſhould be tried by eleven of his Equals, and by one of the King's Servants. The ſame Order was to be taken in all ſuits, which exceeded four Marks. But in caſe he refuſed to undergoe this Trial, his fine was to be increaſed three fold. The fourth appoints Vouchers for the ſale of Men, Horſes or Oxen. The fifth and laſt ordains, that none from either Army ſhould paſs to the other without leave. And in caſe it be by way of Traffick, ſuch ſhall find Sureties for their Civil Deportment, that the Peace may not be infringed. Such was the League the Preface to which declares, that it was made betwixt the two Kings, Elfred and Gythrun (ſo the Saxon) by conſent of all the wiſe men of the Engliſh, and of all thoſe that inhabited Eaſt England, and that not onely in behalf of themſelves, but of their Poſterity. This ſufficiently ſheweth that the Eaſtern Parts of England belonged to the Danes. Yet Polydore Virgil calling this King by the Name of Gormon, vehemently contends that he had not that Countrey beſtowed on him. Krantzius alſo denies, that Gormon was converted to the Faith; yet confeſſes that about this time, one Froto was converted. Whatever they write, this League evinceth the Diſtinction of their Territories, and the Teſtimony of Aſſerius, is uncontrolable as to his Baptiſm, who lived himſelf at this very time, not to mention that the Annals (ancient Monuments alſo) affirm the ſame.

The form of the League.

24. But the ſame year that theſe things thus paſſed, another great Army of Pagans came from beyond the Seas, and ſailing up the Thames, wintred at Fullonham, now Fulham, at preſent the ſeat of the Biſhop of London, upon this River. The ſame year happened alſo a great Eclipſe of the Sun. In that which followed, the Army of Danes, that wintred at Fulham, paſſed over the Sea into the

* Aſſerio Æþelingaeᵹ Annal. Æþelinᵹa. Ethelingaeg. The Iſle of Nobles made by the winding of the River Parret into the Thone. From hhim and his People frequenting it ſo named, now known by the Name of Athelney in Somerſetſhire.

De iſto Rege ſic Malmesb. Gudrum quem noſtri Gurmundum vocant, alii Gormonem qui Regiam ſuam habuit in vico inde Gormoncheſter dicto corruptè Godmacheſter, juxta Huntindoniam.

Cippanham mercandi locus à nundinis ſcil. quæ etiamnum ibi (Chippenham in Wiltſhire) claræ ſunt.

(a) Inter Leges Saxon à Lombardo Editas.

C. 1.
Æꞃeſꞇ ẏ ın buꞃe lanꝺᵹemeꞃa up on Temeſe. ⁊ ðonne up on Liᵹar. ⁊ anꝺlanᵹ Liᵹan oꝺ hiꞃe æƿẏlm. ðonne on ᵹeꞃıl Meꞇo Beꝺanꞅoꞃꝺa ðon up on Vſan oꝺ ƿælinᵹaſꞇꞃæꞇ.

C. 2.
Be ofſliᵹenan manneſƿeꞃe ⁊

C. 3.
Be ðeᵹnum ðe beꞇoᵹene ſẏnð ⁊

C. 4.
Be ᵹeꞇımum ⁊
⁊ cal ſeoꞇeoꝺ ðe on Eaſꞇ enᵹlum beoð.

Sect. 10.

Alfred prepares to be Maſter at Sea.

the Eaſtern France, and continued a whole year at Ghent, whence the Summer following they pierced farther into the Countrey, and had battel given them by the Franks, with what Succeſs as to particulars we know not, but with no great Diſadvantage ſurely to the Danes, who after the Fight became Horſemen, and afterward paſſed up the River * Meuſe, farther into the Land, and there wintred. Alfred in the mean while, being by experience ſufficiently inſtructed, that his main care ought to be employed how to become Maſter at Sea, in three years time provided him a Fleet, wherewith he ingaged ſome Rovers, and took two of their Veſſels, killing all he ound therein. Two other ſhips were commanded by two of their Princes, who with all their Fellows being much wounded, and tired out in fight caſt down their Arms, and with bended Knees and humble ſupplications yielded themſelves into his Hands. Their Countreymen the following year, ſailed up the River Scheld, as far as a Monaſtery of Nunns called Cundoht, and there took up their Winter Quarters.

* Heꞃ ꝼoꞃ ꞅe heꞃup onꝺlonᵹ Mæꞅe ꝼeoꞃ on ꝼꞃonclonꝺ, ita Annales, at vero Aſſerius hoc modo: peꞃ ꝼlumen quoꝺ ꝺiciꞇuꞃ Ine ꞅe ꞅuꞃꞅum ꞇanꞇo longè in ꝼꞃanciam peꞃ ꞇꞃaxiꞇ ⁊ Per Ine forſan Rhenum intelligit, nobis Rhine.

The Danes invade Kent.

25. The year that followed being the DCCCLXXXIV, of Our Lord, and the four and thirtieth of King Alfred's Age, this Army divided it ſelf into two Bodies, whereof the one held on its courſe into the Eaſtern parts of France, and the other making for this Iſland, arrived in Kent, and laid ſiege to the City of Rocheſter. Before the Gate they built a Fort, and uſed all means they could to become Maſters of the place, but the Inhabitants made ſtout reſiſtence, and held out till King Alfred came to their relief, the noiſe of whoſe approach frighted away the Beſiegers to their ſhips, wherein they were conſtrained to return to the Coaſts of France. The League which was made betwixt Alfred and Guthrun, it ſeems, was broken by this time, probably by that Intelligence which the Danes, inhabiting Eaſt England, held with their Countreymen, that ever and anon arrived. Alfred found himſelf concerned to man out his Fleet, to leſſen and reſtrain their Power, which deſign ſo proſpered, that coming to the Mouth of the River Stour, and meeting thirteen of the Enemies ſhips, which came ready prepared for an Encounter, they took them and killed all their Men. But growing ſecure upon this Succeſs, the Danes gathered together all the Veſſels they could make, and ſetting upon them as they lay in the ſame place in a careleſs poſture, ſpoiled their Triumph at their return. The year that followed, a conſiderable Number of theſe Danes who had come from the Weſt, quitting Britain, returned into that Quarter by Sea, and paſſed up the River Seine as far as Paris. There they incamped where they could beſt intercept the paſſage of the Citizens, over the Bridge, the City being ſeated in the midſt of the River in a little Iſland, and continued their ſiege for a whole year, but ſuch was the Vigilancy and Induſtry of the Inhabitants, that they could not force their Entrance. While God Almighty thus preſerved the City of Paris, from the Violence of the Barbarians, at the ſame time he was pleaſed to reſtore the City of London to her Ancient Luſtre, ſhe having as well as many other Engliſh Cities been defaced, and depopulated by theſe continual Invaſions of the Pagans. King Alfred making it his chiefeſt care to repair it, made it habitable, and committed it to the Government of Ethered, the Earl of the Mercians, to whom he gave his Daughter Ethelfleda in Marriage. To him turned now all ſuch Engliſh and Saxons, as formerly had been diſperſed, and had lived in captivity under the Danes, and willingly ſubmitted to his Dominion, and from the Rovers he reſted quiet for about eight years (ſome ſay thirteen, but to them the Annals bear not Teſtimony) four of which being expired, Guthrun the Northern King (as the Annals call him) who reigned in Eaſt England, departed this life.

Aſſerius ad An. 886.

Guthrun dies.

26. All this while the other Northern Rovers employed themſelves upon the Continent making continual Invaſions into France, which they never left haraſſing till they had Neuſtria aſſigned them to inhabit, to which they affixed the Name of Normandy. Eight years being paſſed from the laſt hoſtility they had attempted in England, an Army of them being beaten out of France by the Emperour Ernulph and the Britains, paſſed from the Eaſtern to the Weſtern parts of France, and went to Boloigne, where furniſhing themſelves with Veſſels, with two hundred and fifty ſail, they made for the Eaſtern Coaſts of Kent, and there put into a River called Limen, near to the great Wood Andred, a Wood which extended it ſelf in length an hundred and twenty Miles, and in breadth contained thirty. Into this Wood they drew up their ſhips about four Miles from the Rivers Mouth, where they built a Fortreſs. After them one Haeſten, with eighty Veſſels more entred the Mouth of the Thames, and built a Fort at Midleton, while the former Army remained in a place called Apletree. Alfred to prevent the ſtorm which he ſaw was Latrunculi enim 13 annis Gallias infeſtantes ad extremum ab Ernulpho Imperatore & Britannis multis præliis victi, in Angliam opportunum, ſcil. tyrannidis ſuffugium convolavere.

The Rovers land in two Places.

Sect. 10.

Are attended by Alfred.

coming faſt upon him, reſolved to hinder the Correſpondence which was wont to be entertained betwixt the new Comers, and thoſe that were already fixed in the Countrey, a thing which ever proved of pernicious Conſequence. Thoſe of Northumberland he obliged to him by an Oath of Fidelity and the Inhabitants of Eſſex, from whom he received Hoſtages, for ever as any Strangers invaded the Land they were wont either to join with them or commit ſome Hoſtility themſelves, while the King's Forces were elſewhere employed. Having then got a ſufficient Power together, he incamped himſelf betwixt the two Armies at ſuch a diſtance, as to be ready for either of them, in caſe they offered to remove. And dividing his Army into two Parts, one he kept incamped with an Eye upon the Enemies main Body, the other was ready upon all Occaſions to reſtrain ſuch Parties as foraged the Countrey. They ranged up and down till they came into Eſſex, and thence again paſſed the Thames into Surry, where at Farnham the King's Troops met them, and put them to the rout. Their King was wounded, and with one Party ſtaid behind, the reſt croſſed the Thames again into an Iſland near Colne (ſome ſay in Eſſex, others by Colebrook) where the King's Army beſieged them ſo long, till Proviſions failed. In the mean time the Danes of Northumberland, not able to hold their Hands while they ſaw their Countreymen inriching themſelves with Booty, broke their Faith, and with an hundred ſhips coming to the Eaſt Angles, ſcoured the Southern Parts, as they did with forty, the Northern Coaſts, and ſailing about came to Exeter, which they preſently beſieged. Alfred hearing this haſted thither with all his Army, except a ſtrong Party of Welſh, which marching to London joined with the Citizens, and others that came from the Weſt, and then went Eaſtward to Beamfleet. Where Haeſten having built a Fort was himſelf gone out to forage, but had left a ſtrong Party to defend it. But this Party they cut in pieces, plundered the Caſtle, took much Booty and Priſoners, and either deſtroyed all their ſhips, or brought them away to London or Rocheſter.

27. Among other Priſoners was taken the Wife of Haeſten, with his two Sons which ſo affected the Barbarian, that he begged Peace of the King, giving Hoſtages and Oath for his peaceable Deportment. Alfred ſet his Wife and his Sons at Liberty, to one of which he himſelf was Godfather, and the other was the Godſon of Earl Ethelred, and beſides he beſtowed on him a good Summ of Money. But returning to Beamfleet, he could not reſtrain his ravenous Inclination, but fell of waſting the County adjacent; which was under the Government of Ethelred his Goſſip. After this both Daniſh Armies joined, and coming to Shobury in Eſſex, there built another Caſtle. Thence paſſing the Thames, with ſuch as joined with them from Northumberland and Eaſt England, they marched on to Severn, waſting all in their way. Here the King's Captains, Ethered, Ethelm and Ethelnoth, with Forces taken out of all the Countries adjoining, pitch'd their Camp over againſt them at a place called Buttington (in Montgomeryſhire) the River running betwixt them, and there they faced one another for many weeks. In the mean time the King by a ſiege ſorely diſtreſſed the Danes in Exeter, who having eaten part of their Horſes reſolved to ſally out, and join with their fellows that lay incamped on the Eaſt ſide of the River, but the King ſet upon and diſcomfited them all with loſs of Ordhelm, and ſeveral other of his own Officers. Thoſe that remained fled to Eſſex to the Fort they had there built, and their ſhips. But no ſooner was one Party ſuppreſſed, but another aroſe. Laf one of their Leaders, before Winter gathered a great Army out of Eaſt England and Northumberland, and depoſiting their Wives, Ships and Moneys in the Hands of the Eaſt Angles, marched, Day and Night with ſuch Expedition, that they came to a City of the Weſt called Wirheal which they took, e'er the Army that purſued could reach them.

Their Armies join waſting all near Severn.

Æꞇ Buꞇꝺinᵹ ꞇune.

Alfred beſieges the Danes in Exeter.

Hie þa ꝼeala ƿucena ꞅæꞇon on ꞇƿa healꝼe ðeꞃe ea.

Iſta Wirhea nonne eadem Urbs quæ hodie Cheſter? ſic enim Annales.

28. Having waſted the Countrey round, the year following, they quitted the place and invaded North Wales, which after they had plundered, they returned ſome into Northumberland, and ſome into Eaſt England; whence proceeding into Eſſex, they ſeized on a ſmall Iſland lying toward the Eaſt, called Mereſig, and another Party returning by Sea from the Siege, landed upon the Coaſt of Suſſex, where the Inhabitants of Chicheſter Sallying out, ſlew many of them, and took ſome of their Ships. The ſame year they that ſeized upon Mereſig, drew up their Ships, ſome into the River of Thames, and others into Lee-Road, on the Bank of which, the year following, they built a Fort about twenty miles from London. The Londoners looking upon this as a curb not to be endured, with other Aſſiſtents, endeavoured to demoliſh it, but were beaten back with loſs of many Men, and amongſt ꝥ hie ᵹeꝺẏꝺon on auꞃe ƿeꞅꞇꞃe ceaꞅꞇꞃe on Ƿiꞃhealum ꞅic iꞅ Leᵹaceaꞅꞇeꞃᵹehaꞇen.

The Danes invade North-wales.

mongſt the reſt, three of the King's Officers. Hereupon the King in time of Harveſt Incamped nearer the City, to reſtrain the incurſions of Danes upon the Reapers. As he was Riding on a time by the River Lee, it came into his Head, that by digging of large Ditches on each ſide, he might turn the Stream from the Chanel, and ſo cauſe their Ships to reſt upon the dry ground; which thing having deviſed, he attempted with ſuch ſucceſs, that the Danes perceiving they were not to be got off, ſent away their Wives and Children into Eaſt England, and on foot marched as far as a place called Quatbrig upon the Severn, where they built a Fortreſs and Wintred. The Citizens of London, very joyfully and in Triumph, brought ſuch of their Ships as they could get off, into their own Road, and the reſt they burnt or diſabled. This happened three years after that from the tranſmarine Parts, theſe Danes firſt arrived in the mouth of Lirnene. During theſe ſame three years raged a great Plague, both amongſt Men and Cattle. The King loſt moſt of his choiceſt Nobility, as Swithulfe Biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſeveral great Earls; Ceolmund in Kent, Brithulfe in Eſſex, Wulfred in Hampſhire, beſides Ealbard Biſhop of Dorceſter, Eadulf the King's Officer in Suſſex, Beornwulfe Governour of Wincheſter, Eigulfe Maſter of the King's Horſe, and many others.

A great Plague.

The Danes of Eaſt England, and Northumberland, waſte the Territories of the Weſt Saxons.

29. This Diſaſter was followed by many irruptions made by the Danes Inhabiting Northumberland and Eaſt England, into the Territories of the Weſt Saxons, by means of their long Gallies, which they had built many years before. To overmatch them, King Alfred commanded other Gallies to be made twice as long, higher, and yet both ſwifter and ſteddier than they, ſome of ſixty Oars, and ſome of more, like to which were not then in uſe, either amongſt the Danes or Friſons. At this time the Iſle of Wight, the Coaſts of Devonſhire, and other Maritime Parts were much infeſted by ſix Pickeering Veſſels which hovered upon theſe Quarters. The King commanded ſome of theſe new Gallies to be Manned out againſt them for an experiment. The Fight was partly by Water, and partly by Land, managed with dexterity and courage enough on both ſides. Two of the Pirates Ships were ſtranded, one eſcaped away into Eaſt England, and all except but ſuch as ſerved in this, were either ſlain or taken; but not without conſiderable loſs alſo on the King's ſide. Here fell Lucumon the King's Earl, Wulfheard, Ebba and Ethelere, all Friſons, and Ethelfrith the Overſeer of the King's Cattle. All the Friſons periſhed, of the Engliſh ſixty two, and of the Danes one hundred and twenty. The Priſoners were led to the King to Wincheſter, where he commanded them to be hang'd as Pirates and publick Enemies. This year died Wulfric the Maſter of the King's Horſe, who was alſo his Governour of Wales, which therefore was at this time ſubject to his Command. The year following hath nothing notable, but that Ethelm the Earl of Wiltſhire died nine nights (ſo particular are the Annals in matters of ſmalleſt conſequence) before Midſummer, and this was the laſt of Ethered Earl of Devonſhire, and of the Biſhop of London. Theſe uſhered into another world the King himſelf, who having enjoyed two or three years of Peace, as a preparation to everlaſting Repoſe and Felicity, in the five and twentieth of October, in the one and fiftieth year of his Age, and the thirtieth of his Reign, in the year of our Lord, DCCCC. paſſed from a temporal to an eternal Kingdom.

The Iſle of Wight, and the Maritime Coaſt infeſted with Pirates.

Who are taken and executed at Wincheſter.

Æþelꝼeꞃþ Cẏninᵹeꞅ ᵹeneaꞇ.

Ƿulꝼꞃic Cẏninᵹeꞅ hoꞃꞅ þeᵹen ꞅe ƿæꞅ eac Ƿealhᵹeꞃeꝼa.

Alfred dyes.

Die 7 Kalend. Novemb. ita Aſſer. Ann. ſic. ꞅix nihꞇum æꞃ ealꞃa halᵹꞃa mæꞅꞅan.

30. Whoever conſiders the worth of his Perſon, will find that our opinion of his happineſs, is not founded merely upon Charity. A Man who (humane frailty alone ſet aſide) ſo diſcharged all the Offices of a King and of a Chriſtian, as ſcarcely any can be found in theſe vertues to have been ſo accurate, by whoſe (almoſt I had ſaid ſingle) example no infirmity of Body, no travel of mind, perpetual diſquiets and dangers can excuſe from the performing of all duties which the Relation, a Man ſtands in both to God and Men, exacteth from him. In what continual diſturbances he lived and reigned, we have ſufficiently ſeen already, how ſeldom he enjoyed any repoſe and quiet, in what perpetual diſtractions, cares and anxieties, any other man would have been involved. But his inward griefs were as great and preſſing as were his outward moleſtations, ſcarcely one day from his Infancy, till he came to be forty five years of Age, was he free from extraordinary pains in his Body. From his Childhood, till he came to be twenty, he was exceedingly troubled with the Piles. Then after his Marriage, ſeized with ſo great and ſtrange pain, that no Phyſician could gueſs what the cauſe ſhould be, ſome imagined him bewitched, others thought it the mere effect of the Devil's malice, who hates and envies all good Men, others imagined it an unuſual ſort of Fever, and others his former diſeaſe of the Hæmorrhoids increaſed to a greater malignity. He was afraid leſt Leproſie, Blindneſs, or ſome other dreadfull Symptom ſhould follow upon it, which render Men both deſpicable and unſerviceable. Therefore as formerly ſenſible of the proneneſs of Nature to fleſhly Luſts in the heat of youth, and before he was married, he prayed that ſome Infirmity might fall upon him which might abate theſe deſires and inclinations, now that he might not be unuſefull, he prayed for a Relaxation of this Grief, and as he had been heard in his firſt petition, ſo his ſecond was not denied. But though ſeldom did his pain intermit, or if he enjoyed any eaſe for a Day, or a Night, or an Hour, yet the fear and apprehenſion of the return of his almoſt unſupportable Torment, never forſook him, yet was the employment of his time ſo fruitfull in all reſpects, as if he had not had the leaſt diverſion. Of this Aſſerius his Chaplain an Eye-witneſs gives us in the Hiſtory of his Actions, this full account.

His indiſpoſition of Body.

Aſſerius.

His management of Affairs.

31. Amidſt his Wars, the many diſturbances of his Life, the Invaſions of Pagans, and the daily Infirmities of his Body, he ordered the matters of State concerning his Kingdom, practiſed all the Art of Hunting, inſtructed all his Gold-Smiths and Artificers, his Huntſmen and Falconers, contrived new Buildings more ſumptuous than any of his Predeceſſours, he himſelf being the Inventour and Architect, read Saxon Books, got Saxon Verſes by heart, and ſaw that others did the like. Conſtantly was he preſent at Divine Service, Pſalms or Prayers he read, his diurnal and nocturnal Hours he ever celebrated, alone in the Night time when all others were aſleep, he frequented Churches and then performed his Devotions, overſaw the diſtribution of Alms to Poor and Strangers, ſet himſelf to the ſearching out the Cauſes of unknown things, and in all theſe Employments, and during his Pains behaved himſelf with incomparable Affability, and pleaſantneſs toward all Men. Many Franks, Friſons, Galls, Pagans, Britains, Scots and Armenians on their own Accord, became his Subjects, as well noble as ignoble, all whom according to their ſeveral Qualities and Conditions, he loved, honoured and relieved as his own Nation. Sermons either from Strangers or his own Chaplains, he heard conſtantly and attentively. His Biſhops, the whole Clergy, his Earls and Nobles, his Servants and Familiars, he loved moſt affectionately. Such of their Sons as were at Court he took perſonal care of no leſs than his own Children, inſtructing them himſelf Night and Day in good manners and literature. But as if in all theſe he had no comfort at all, and as if no other thing either internal or external troubled him, Night and Day he was very ſad, and with many ſighs bewailed his condition both to God and his familiar Friends, that he was deſtitute of Divine Wiſedom, and of the liberal Arts.

His deſire and improvement in Learning.

32. He made it his buſineſs to get ſuch men about him as could beſt ſupply this defect which his own humility repreſented to him far greater than indeed it was. As his utmoſt wiſh and the greateſt Boon he beg'd, was like to that of Solomon, ſo the ſucceſs of his Prayers was (though not proportionably) the ſame, God giving him both learning and Wiſedom, and (if not Riches yet) Honour in ſuch abundance, as no Prince of his Age, nor for many Ages afterward attained. Four learned Clerks he ſent for out of Mercia, and ſome he had in his own paternal Dominions of the Weſt Saxons, by whoſe indeavours his inſatiable deſire of knowledge was ſtill exerciſed. For both Night and Day when he had any ſpare time he heard them reade, never being without ſome one of them in attendance, whereby it came to paſs that he had a thorough knowledge almoſt of all ſorts of Books. Yet not contenting himſelf with what they could teach him, he ſent for the learnedſt men he could hear of out of France, and out of Wales, for Aſſer the Writer of the Story, all whom he rewarded and preferred ſuitably to their Merits. By aſſiſtence of theſe men he arrived at ſuch eminent learning, (that Age eſpecially conſidered) that he became not onely the moſt knowing of all Kings, but in univerſal knowledge exceeded almoſt all, both his own Subjects and others. He was learned in Speech, but eſpecially made it his buſineſs to be throughly verſed in Divine and Practical knowledge. He penetrated to the profound Myſteries of all Liberal Arts, which he acquired with utmoſt diligence. The greateſt part of the Roman Library he made familiar to his Engliſh Subjects. He was ſo univerſally learned that he became both an excellent Grammarian, Philoſopher, Rhetorician, Hiſtorian, Muſician and Poet; nay, a moſt perfect Architect and Geometrician. He himſelf for the benefit of his Subjects, whom the Invaſions of the Barbarous Danes had well nigh deprived of all Learning, tranſlated into their own Language the Hiſtory of Oroſius, the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Bede, (which Tranſlation we make frequent uſe of) and death prevented his finiſhing an Engliſh Tranſlation of the Pſalms of David.

Ingulphus, Malmesbury, Balæus, alii.

Sect. 10.

His Devotions.

He adminiſters Juſtice.

Encourages Learning.

And rids the Nation of Thieves and Highwaymen.

33. The more wonderfull this is ſtill, if we conſider that his Devotions took up ſo much time as ſcarcely any Religious Perſon, whoſe work alone it was, ſpent more in God's Service. He made a Vow to dedicate to him one half, excepting that of ſleep and neceſſary Refreſhings. And becauſe herein he could not be accurate for the cloudineſs of the Air and want of Clocks, (which in this Age were not invented) he cauſed ſix large Tapers of Wax to be provided, each twelve * Inches in length, by the burning of which he meaſured out the four and twenty Hours. Perceiving that the burning of them was unequal by reaſon that the Wind through the Windows, the Cranies of Walls of his Chapel, or the thin Cloths of his Tents got to them; to prevent this inconvenience he invented a Lanthorn made of Wood and Horns of Oxen. But that which took up not the leaſt part of his time thus divided with the hearing of Cauſes and Adminiſtration of Juſtice, wherein to relieve the Poor and Diſtreſſed, Night and Day he travelled indefatigably; for in all that Kingdom (ſaith our Authour) beſides him alone they had no Protectour, or very few, Perſons of publick Spirits as well as Employment, having always been rare in this Nation. Such Partiality and Contention were there amongſt Inferiour Judges, that he was perpetually peſtered with Appeals, wherein he was ſo Sedulous an Inquirer, that all Villany was ever brought to light. But beſides Appeals few Cauſes were heard in Inferiour Courts of any moment, which however decided he did not examine. If he found his Judges unskilfull, he gravely admoniſhed them as ſuch, who in caſe they did not ſtudy improvement were to looſe their Places. This made them ſo vigilant and induſtrious, that though his Officers all in a manner were illiterate from their Infancy, yet in their elder Age did they apply themſelves to learning, and ſuch as by reaſon of Age or other Avocations could not doe it, brought up their Sons, their Kinſmen or their Dependants and Servants to reade to them. As he being the Superiour Judge (not onely as to Authority but Adminiſtration of Juſtice) took care that his People ſhould be furniſhed with able Miniſters, ſo he provided them of good Laws, and for the better Government of the whole Engliſh Nation, brought up ſeveral laudable Cuſtomes, which ſtill to this day continue, and we ſhall declare when we come to ſpeak of the Laws and Polity of our Saxon Anceſtours. To keep up Civility and Learning he erected Schools for the training up of Youth, and uſed ſeverity againſt ſuch as broke the Peace, that he might by Puniſhments deter, as well as by Rewards and Encouragements allure, the two great Engines of Magiſtracy. Thieves and Highwaymen he ſo proſecuted, that he rid the Land in a manner of them, to the terrour of all ſuch, cauſing upon high Poſts in the Croſs ways certain Chains of Gold to be hung, as it were daring any one to take them down; ſo that during his Government Juſtice did not onely reign but Triumph.

The management of his Revenue.

34. We have ſeen how he employed his time, one of the greateſt Concernments of a Prince; another remains as great, viz. how he ſpent his Revenue. Making this a main point of Conſcience, and having vowed to the Service of God, as well the half of his Revenues as his time, he commanded all his Annual Income to be equally divided into two parts. The firſt of theſe he appointed to ſecular uſes and ſubdivided it into three Portions. The firſt he appointed to pay the Wages of Souldiers, his choiceſt Miniſters, and thoſe that by their turns attended him in his Court. For of ſuch he had three Diviſions each whereof waited their month, and then reſting two at their own homes again returned to their former monthly ſervice. The ſecond Portion he aſſigned to Workmen and Architects, of whom he kept employed almoſt an innumerable Multitude of all Nations. The third he freely beſtowed on Strangers that came to him from all parts far and near, whether they asked it or asked it not, as their Qualities were, and (according to that which is written, God loveth a chearfull Giver) with a chearfull mind. Thus did he employ the firſt half of his Revenue. The ſecond half of his whole Revenues and Incomes with a moſt free will he devoted to the Service of Almighty God, and cauſed it to be divided into four Portions. The firſt of theſe he conferred on ſuch Poor as flocked to him out of all Nations. The ſecond on two Monaſteries he had cauſed to be built at Æthelingaeg, and at Scofteſburg. The third to a School which he had erected for the Inſtruction of the Nobility of his own Nation, ſaid to have been at Oxford, but Aſſerius mentions no place. The fourth to the Monaſteries round about in Saxony (the Countrey of the Weſt Saxons he means) and Mercia, and ſome years by turns to the Churches and Servants of God in Britain, Cornwall, Gall, Armorica, Northumberland, and alſo in Ireland he either according to his ability ſent relief, or reſolved to doe it as opportunity and his Treaſury would permit.

---

* Uꞇ unaquæque canꝺela 12 Unciaꞅ pollicıꞅ in ꞅe ꞅignaꞇaꞅ in lonᵹıꞇuꝺıne habeꞃeꞇ. Aſſer.

35. Such was the demeanour of Alfred in his Religious and Civil kind of life, a demeanour accurate indeed, but not ſuch as can denominate him a formal or foppiſh man, for under all this Diſcipline he was not ſowre or melancholly, but carried himſelf (as an eye or ear witneſs left recorded after his Death, when he could have no temptation to flatter him) with wonderfull Affability and Facetiouſneſs. To his ſeverer Studies and Practices he alſo joyned the gentile Divertiſements of Muſick and Hunting (things not poſſible to be reached by formal Fops, may our Wits be Judges) and his Military skill and valour was ſo admirable, that no Diſaſters or Diſcouragements could abate it. Malmesbury teſtifies of him that while he was overthrown and lay as it were groveling on the Earth, he was ſtill a terrour to his Enemies. In all Battels he was preſent every where, ſtriking into the Hearts of his Enemies fear and coldneſs, and paleneſs into their Faces, adding freſh Courage to his own Men. He alone would expoſe his Breaſt to the Enemies Swords, he alone would reſtore the Fight when his Army was ready to run away, and by his Example conſtrain his Souldiers to repell the inſulting and purſuing Pagans. Nay, after he had been forced to flie, he became more terrible to his Foes, the memory of his Defeat made him more Circumſpect, and an ardent deſire of Revenge more venturous. Fifty ſix ſet Battels by Sea and Land he fought againſt the Danes, and of theſe eight in one day, ſo that by his miraculous Courage and Conduct he ſo afflicted and tired them, though they ſtill came in freſh numbers upon him, that they were forced to give up what Hoſtages he pleaſed, and ſubmit to ſuch Conditions as he thought fit to impoſe. That theſe are not Flouriſhes, the univerſal conſent of Writers bears Witneſs, all who admire him as an Heroe, and by an unparallel'd example tax him with no Vice at all; ſomewhat Aſſerius ſpeaks of Niolus's object to him the neglect of adminiſtring Juſtice, which was in his young years, and for which in his riper he made abundant Compenſation. Upon the whole we cannot but diſmiſs him with the Exclamation of Wonder, into which Sir Henry Spelman, upon due conſideration of all things, breaketh forth. " O Alfred, the Wonder and Aſtoniſhment of all Ages! If we " reflect upon his Piety and Religion it would ſeem that he had never gone " out of a Monaſtery: If on his Warlike Exploits, that he had lived no where
" but in a Camp: If on his Writings and Studies, that he had ſpent his whole life
" in an Univerſity: And laſtly, If we regard his Adminiſtration of the Affairs " of his Kingdom and Subjects, one would think that his whole time had been " employed in nothing elſe but enacting Laws, and promoting Juſtice in his Tribunals and Courts.

His Divertiſements.

His Courage.

36. King Egbert is generally eſteemed the firſt Monarch of the Engliſh Saxons, and as ſuch we have placed him, his time better agreeing therewith, but indeed was a Monarch in the ſame ſenſe that the other ſeven were, which Beda mentions, the Authority of whom extended through the Heptarchy, though the ſeveral Kingdoms had their ſeveral Kings. He as Julius Cæſar to Auguſtus ſhewed the way, and chalked that out which was afterward perfected by his Glorious Son Alfred, who indeed was toward his latter end Monarch of all the parts of England which were not poſſeſſed by the Danes, for if a petty King afterward was ſet up in Northumberland or elſe where, ſo inconſiderable was his condition as deſerves not to be taken notice of. But, not onely were the Engliſh his Subjects. The Welſh or Britains had alſo ſubmitted to him, over whom he appointed a Governour, as we lately obſerved him by Name out of the Saxon Annals. But Aſſerius acquaints us with the Affairs of that his own Countrey, more particularly in relation to the Obedience they paid to Alfred. He tells us that at that time and long before all the Regions of the South (Weſtern) parts of Britain (Dextralis Britanniæ he terms it) did belong, and ſo did ſtill to the Dominion of King Alfred. Namely Hemeid, with all the People of Demetia or South Weſt Wales, being forced to ſubmit to him by the violence of the ſix Sons of Rotri. In like manner Howel or Houil, the Son of Ris King of Gleguiſing, morever Brochmail and Fernail Sons of Mouric, Kings of Guent, being oppreſſed by the violence and Tyranny of Earl Eadred, and the Mercians, of their own Accord ſubmitted to him as their King, that by his means they might be protected from their Enemies. Beſides theſe Heliſed the Son of Teudyr, King of Brecknock (Rex Breckoniæ) driven thereto by the violence of the foreſaid Sons of Rotri, voluntarily gave up himſelf into his hands. Nay at laſt Anaraut himſelf with his Brethren the Sons of Rotri, deſerted the Alliance they had contracted with the Northumbrians, from whom they received no emolument at all, but rather hurt; and earneſtly deſired the King's friendſhip. He was admitted into his Preſence, and with much honour

Vide Math. Floril. hic.

His Dominions.

nour entertained by him, who at his receiving confirmation from the hands of a Biſhop, acknowledged him his Spiritual Son, and at his departure preſented him very richly. The effect of this Meeting was, that he ſubjected himſelf to the Soveraignty of King Alfred, to be obedient to him in all things as Earl Ethelred and the Mercians were. Neither in vain did any of theſe obtain the friendſhip of the King. For ſuch as deſired Earthly power hereby found a means to increaſe it, ſuch as deſired Money had Money, ſuch as deſigned Familiarity got Familiarity, and ſuch as would have both obtained both. All of them procured Love, Defence, and Protection on every ſide, as far as the King was able to protect himſelf and his own Subjects.

⁊ aꝺ manum epıſcopı ın ꝼılıum conꝼıꞃmatıonıſ acceptuſ.

An Account of his Wife and Children.

37. King Alfred by Elſwitha his Wife, with whom he lived in all Conjugal temperance, had ſeveral Children. His Eldeſt was * Ethelfleda, married to Eadred Count of the Mercians. The next was a Son named † Edward. The third a Daughter, Ethelgeda as ſome call her, but Aſſerius names her || Ethelgeofn; ſhe was Abbeſs in the Nunnery founded by her Father at Shaftsbury. The fourth was Elfrida, Aſſerius calls her * Elſthrith, married to Baldwin the ſecond Count of Flanders. The fifth and the youngeſt was * Ethelward, who by Divine Council (ſaith our Authour) and the admirable Providence of the King, together with well nigh all the Noble Children of the whole Countrey, and many of the Inferiour ſort, was committed to the Diſcipline of the School under the diligent care of Maſters. In this School Books of both Languages, viz. Latin and Saxon were diligently read. They were taught alſo to Write, inſomuch that before they had ſtrength ro undergoe Manly Exerciſes, which befit Noble Perſons, as Hunting and the like, they became Studious and ingenious in the Liberal Sciences. Edward and Elſthrith were always brought up at Court diligently attended by their Nurſes and Governours (as deſigned to Princely Eſtate and Government) being exceedingly beloved by all, both home born and Strangers, to whom they carried themſelves with all humble Affability and Gentleneſs. To their Father they ſhewed all manner of Duty and Subjection, neither were they amid their other Employments ſuitable to their Birth ſuffered to live idly and careleſly without Liberal Studies. For they diligently learnt Pſalms by heart, read Saxon Books, but eſpecially got by heart Saxon Poems, and very frequently made uſe of other Books.

* Æþelꝼlæꝺ.
† Eaꝺƿeꞃꝺ.
|| Æþelᵹeoꝼn.

* Ælꝼðꞃẏð † Æþelƿeaꞃꝺ.

To Alfred ſucceeded Edward.

38. Of theſe Edward the Eldeſt Son ſucceeded his Father in the ſixteenth year of Leo the Sixth, Porphyrogenitus Emperour of the Eaſt, the ſecond of Lewis the Fourth Emperour of the Weſt, the ſame year that Charles the Simple began his Reign in France, in the Fourth Indiction, A. D. DCCCCI. Ingulphus and Malmesbury after him writes of him that in Learning he was far Inferiour to his Father, but incomparably more glorious in the Power of his Kingdom, that he indeed had conjoyned the two Kingdoms of the Mercians and the Weſt Saxons, but held onely that of the Mercians as King in Name and Title, it being aſſigned over to Duke Ethelred. But his Son after the Death of Ethelred firſt wholly brought under his Dominion and Propriety the Mercians, then preſently after fully the Weſtern and Eaſtern Engliſh, or thoſe of Northfolk, the Northumbrians, who had imbodied themſelves with the Danes; then the Scots inhabiting the Northern part of the Iſland and all the Britains or Welſh did he ſubdue by his Sword; and having caſt out the Pagans from all Cities and Walled Towns, placed Chriſtians in their rooms; neither ever in any Battel was he worſted. He ingeniouſly invented ways to reſtrain the Excurſions of the Danes, by either repairing old Cities or building new ones in convenient places, which he furniſhed with ſufficient Garriſons to protect the Inhabitants and to repell the Enemy. By this means the valour of the People was ſo much excited, that upon report of the Enemies coming they would without conſulting the King or his Captains arme themſelves and valiantly charge the Invaders, whom they always overpowered both by their numbers and Military skill; ſo that the Danes became contemptible to the Engliſh Souldiers, and a Laughing-ſtock to the King himſelf.

A Glorious King.

Deſpiſing the Attempts of the Danes.

Ethelwald his Kinſman Rebels.

39. But notwithſtanding this his great felicity, the beginning of his Reign was much diſturbed by Ethelwald his Kinſman, viz. his Couſin German by Ethelred his Father's Elder Brother, though others call him the Brother of Edward, for his Genealogy is variouſly related. Moſt probable it is, that he was the Son of Ethelred, and founded his pretenſions to the Kingdom upon no weaker ground than being Son to the Elder Brother, whom he failed to ſucceed onely at that time for want of Age as ſome think, or rather becauſe Ethelwulfe by his laſt Will and Teſtament had appointed Alfred his Youngeſt Son to ſucceed, in caſe he ſurvived his three Brothers. For by the Teſtament of Alfred himſelf, which Aſſerius hath hath tranſmitted to Poſterity, it appears that this King had ſome ſcruples in his mind, or conceived that others might have ſome cauſe to queſtion his legal Title to the Crown. "After the Death of my Brethren (ſaith he) the inheritance "of King Ethelwulſe my Father devolved upon me by virtue of an Authentick "publick Writing made by him, and confirmed in a general Aſſembly of the "States of the Kingdom at Langdene. This Writing upon the Death of my laſt "Brother, Ethelred, I commanded to be freely and openly read in the Audience "of all the Deputies of the Weſt Saxons. It being read, I required and adjured all "that were preſent, as they loved me to declare ſincerely whether they knew "or had heard of any others who could juſtly claim any Right in this mine Inheritance, for I my ſelf did not know any. This Adjuration I again repeated in theſe words. "I beſeech you my dear Friends, let not any of you either out of "love or hatred to me, ſpare freely, to ſpeak the naked truth: for I have no deſire "or intention at all to prejudice the Rights of any of my Kinſmen in the leaſt "matter. When I had thus ſpoken, then all the Nobles and Princes of my People with a ſerious proteſtation Anſwered. "That never any Notice had come "to them of any one that had a juſter Title than my ſelf, neither could they imagine or by any Writings Diſcover that any ſuch there were.

Sect. 10.

40. Though this may ſeem to have relation to certain Lands left him by his Father, yet is it evident from the Teſtament, that this was ſuch an Inheritance as was to deſcend to all the Brothers, and the Regal Title ſo conjoyned with it, that the longer liver of them both by their Father's * ordination, and their own † conſent ſhould poſſeſs it, together with the whole Kingdom, aſſigning ſuch Lands to his Brothers Sons as were convenient for their ſubſiſtence. He came therefore to the Crown by virtue of his Father's Conveyance, which was both ratified by the States, and confirmed by the mutual agreement of the Brothers, yet to remove all ſcrupuloſity this excellent Prince would have his Pretenſions to be ſcanned, and his Title examined in another Aſſembly before ſuch time as he would undertake the Government. However Ethelwald knowing his Title would be warrantable enough if he could but get ſucceſs to ſtrengthen it, reſolved to try his Fortune, and for that purpoſe ſeized on two Towns, called Winburn, and Tweonam. In Winburn he fortified himſelf, affirming there he would live or dye; but his reſolution profited him little, the memory of King Alfred having ſo great a place in all the Hearts of the People, that they had no room to entertain any Inclinations toward any other Pretenders to the Royal Dignity than his Son and Heir. Edward aſſured of their fidelity, led an Army down to a place called Baddanbyrig, not far from Winburn, which ſo affrighted his Rival, that he who had boaſted of what valour and conſtancy he would ſhew in that place, fled out of it by night, and got him into Northumberland, where he joined himſelf with the Daniſh Army. The King commanded ſome to purſue him, but this being in vain, he cauſed his Wife to be ſeized, which being a Nun Profeſſed without leave from the King, or licence of the Biſhops, he had taken out of a Monaſtery, and returned to the place and Profeſſion from whence ſhe came. This Monaſtery was that at Winburn in Dorſetſhire, where we have for merly related King Ethelred the Brother of Alfred to have been Buried. Baddanbyrig is now called Badbury, being a little Hill upon a fair Down ſcarcely two Miles off from Winburn, compaſſed with a triple Trench and Rampire. It's reported to have had a Caſtle which was the ſeat of the Weſt Saxon Kings. But if ever there were any ſuch, it now lyes ſo buried in its Ruines that no token of it appears.

Who fortifies himſelf at Winburn.

But upon the approach of King Edward, flies.

41. Edward thus drove away Ethelwald without fighting, and the Kentiſh Men the year after at a place called Holme fought proſperouſly againſt a multitude of Daniſh Pirates. In the mean time Ethelwald was (as ſome * Authours affirm) choſen King by the Danes of Northumberland, who depoſed their King Osbert. † Matthew of Weſtminſter writes, that from Northumberland he paſſed the Seas into France, there to ſtrenghen himſelf by the addition of a greater Force, (of Normans, as we may very well conjecture) who being of the ſame original with the Danes, had by this time obtained Neuſtria to inhabit, a conſiderable Province of that Kingdom. The year after returning into England with an Army he thereto joined a great number of Pagans, inhabiting Northumberland, Eaſt England, and other Places, and then invading Mercia with Fire and Sword, deſtroyed all things he met with. A later Writer tells us, he drew into his Society Eric the Succeſſour of Guthrun the Dane, in the Kingdom of the Eaſt Angles, a Prince whoſe malice to the Nation of the Engliſh was moſt deadly. Huntingdon mentions his firſt landing in Eſſex, and ſubduing that Countrey without delay; to which the

A bloudy Battel betwixt the Danes and Edward.

* quam ꝺe heꞃeꝺıꞇaꞇe quam ꝼaꞇeꞃ meuꞅ Æþalꝼulphuꞅ ꞃex nobıꞅ ꞇꞃıbus ꝼꞃaꞇꞃıbuꞅ ꝺeleᵹavıꞇ vıꝥ. Æþelbalꝺo, Æþeꞃeꝺo ⁊ mihı; ıꞇa quoꝺ quı noꞅꞇꞃum ꝺıuꞇıuꞅ ꝼoꞃeꞇ ꞅupeꞃꞅꞇeꞅ, ılle ꞇoꞇıuꞅ ꞃeᵹnı ꝺomınıo conᵹauꝺeꞃeꞇ.

† Eꞇ ꞅupeꞃ hoc unuꞅquıꞅque noꞅꞇꞃum alꞇeꞃı ꝼıꝺem ꝼıꞃmavıꞇ ⁊ quoꝺ quıꞅ noꞅꞇꞃum ꝺıuꞇıuꞅ vıꞇam vıveꞃeꞇ quoꝺ ıpꞅe ulꞇeꞃıuꞅ terraꞅ poꞅꞅıꝺeꞃeꞇ ⁊ ꝺomınıa ⁊ omnıa quæ ꝼuıeꞃanꞇ. pꞃæꞇeꞃ ıllam paꞃꞇem quam uꞇeꞃque noꞅꞇꞃum ꝼılıȳꞅ alꞇeꞃıuꞅ leᵹavıꞇ.

* Haveden.

† Ad Ann. 901.

Sect. 10.

DCCCCIV.
Ꞃeꞃ com Æþelƿalꝺ hiꝺeꞃ oꝼeꞃ ꞅæ miꝺ ðam ꝼloꞇan ðe he miꝺ ƿæꞅ on eaꞅꞇ Seaxe ⁊ Eallıoꞃa lonꝺ beꞇꞃeoh ꝺicum ⁊ ƿuꞅan eal oþꞅa ꝼennaꞅ noꞃþ ⁊ the Annals bear witneſs, but place his return from beyond the Seas, in the third year after his flying into Northumberland. In the following year he gathered together his Forces in Eaſt England, and waſted the Territories of the Mercians as far as Geccagelade, (ſo the Annals call the place) where paſſing over the Thames, he pillaged all places aſwell within Brædene as round about, and ſo returned. King Edward with what force he could make made as much haſte as poſſible after them, and laid waſte all their grounds lying betwixt the Ditch and the River Ouſe, as far as the Northern Marſhes. Thinking fit thence to return, he gave orders that all the Army ſhould Diſlodge, and March together. But the Kentiſh Men notwithſtanding ſeven ſeveral meſſages he ſent to them, ſtaid behind, which delay of theirs, and ſeparating the King's Forces, encouraged the Danes to give them Battel, which was very bloudy, many Men falling on both ſides; the King, loſt Sigulf, and Sigelm Earls, Eadwold his Miniſter, Cenwulf an Abbat, beſides Sigebyrht and Eadwold the Sons of two Noblemen. Of the Danes, beſides great numbers of lower Rank, died Eoliric their King, and Ethelwald a Nobleman, the authour of this War; Birhtſiger, Iſop Hold, and Oskitel Hold. On both ſides a great ſlaughter was made, but a greater of the Danes though they continued Maſter of the Field.

Cꞃeccaᵹelaꝺe.

The Town of Greccagelade, where.

Bræden.

Dike.

Dicum.

42. There being no better way both for underſtanding and remembring of Hiſtory than a knowledge of the places where eminent Actions have happened; it will be the Readers Intereſt and Delight to have a brief Account of ſuch Names of Towns, and other places he meets with, eſpecially being in his own Countrey. That place by the Annals called Creclagelade, by Marianus and others Crecklade, is that Town ſtanding in the North Part of Wiltſhire, watered with the Thames, known by the Name of Greeklade, which Name forſooth ſome believed it to have received from certain Greek Philoſophers, who as the Hiſtory of Oxford reporteth began there an Univerſity, which afterwards was tranſlated to Oxford. That they call Brædene is Breden Wood, now Breden Foreſt, which beginning at Wotton (that is Wood Town) Baſſet not far from Greeklade, ſtretched it ſelf far and wide. As for Dike, betwixt which and Ouſe King Edward waſted all the Countrey, it's the ſame with that which the People call Devil's Dike, and cuts overthwart the Plain of Newmarket in Cambridgeſhire ſo many Miles together. Thoſe great and long Ditches which are ſeen in thoſe Parts were (moſt probably) caſt by the Eaſt Angles to reſtrain the Mercians who with their ſudden Inrodes were wont to waſte and ſpoil all before them. The firſt of them begins at Hinkeſton, and runs Eaſtward by Hilderſham toward Horſheath, about five Miles in length. The ſecond called Breutditch near to the former, goes from Melburn by Fulmire. Another there is which begins at the Eaſtern Bank of the River Cam, and runs by Fenn Ditton (or more truly Ditch Ditton, ſaith Cambden, ſo named of the very Ditch) between great Wilberham and Fulburn, as far as Balſham. It's now commonly called Seven Mile Dike, becauſe it's ſeven Mile from Newmarket, but anciently it had the Name of Fleam Dike, that is in Old Engliſh, Flight Dike, of ſome memorable flight which there happened.

43. More Eaſtward from hence within the Countrey is to be ſeen the fourth Fore-fence or Ditch, meant by the Annals the greateſt of all, with a Rampire adjoyning; which the common People out of Admiration of its greatneſs, as the work of Devils and not of Men, uſe to call Devils Dike; but others Rech Dike, of Rech a little Town where it begins. Above Rech the County is fenny, and was therefore impaſſible where it lay open to Excurſions, there this Dike begins, and ends near to Cowlidge, where the Paſſage by reaſon of Woods, was more cumberſome. It was the limit aſwell of the Kingdom as of the Biſhoprick of the Eaſt Angles, but the Authour of ſo great a piece of work is unknown. Some later Writers mention King Cnute the Dane, but beſides what here the Annals ſay of this Battel, Abbo Floracenſis who Died before Cnute was King of England deſcribeth it, together with the ſite of Eaſt England. Such as wrote ſince the time of Cnute have termed it St. Edmund's Limit, and St. Edmund's Dike, verily thinking that Cnute caſt it up, who being moſt devoted to that King and Saint, granted to the Monks of St. Edmunds Bury, to make ſatisfaction for the cruelties exerciſed by Swane his Father upon them, very great Immunities even as far as this Dike. Certain it is that the two Fore-fences laſt mentioned were called St. Edmund's Dikes. And therefore Matthew of Weſtminſter (which the Reader may obſerve) hath written, that the Battel betwixt King Edward and Ethelwald was fought between the two Dikes of St Edmund. Laſtly, by Ouſe muſt be meant Ouſe the Greater, a River which diſporting it ſelf with manifold Branches and Diviſions, ſeparateth Cambridgeſhire from Norfolk. This is the neareſt Ouſe to the Dike: for Ouſe the Leſs

Sect. 10. ſeparateth (together with the River Waveney) Norfolk from Suffolk. As for Ouſe or Iſis which joineth with Tame, and makes the River Thames; Ouſe in Yorkſhire, or others (for this is a common Name of Rivers aſwell as Avon, and therefore in Britiſh is thought to have ſignified a River or Water in general, aſwell as it) they can have no relation to the matter in hand.

Which produces a Peace.

44. To purſue our ſtory, whatever was the Succeſs of this Battel it ſeems to have produced this effect, that in the ſecond year after a Peace was concluded betwixt the King and the Danes of Eaſt England and Northumberland, at a place called Yttingaford, which laſted for the ſpace of three years. Then was it broken, the Annals ſay not by whom firſt, but Hoveden lays the fault upon the Danes, who he ſays prevaricated with the King, and thereupon he ſent an Army of Weſt Saxons, and Mercians into Northumberland, where ſtaying five weeks, it made a great devaſtation, and having killed very many of the Danes, compelled them to renew the Peace they had lately broken. But this Peace the Annals tell us they broke again the year following invading Mercia, where, as write Hoveden and Florent of Worceſter, they were met by the Engliſh at Teotenhale or Tetnal in Staffordſhire, and overthrown. King Edward was then in Kent, and had got together about an hundred ſail of ſhips, beſides ſuch as being ſent to the Southward, met him at Sea. The Danes imagining that he had ſhipt the main of his Forces, took liberty to rove up and down whither hope of booty led them, beyond Severn. King Edward ſent before the lighteſt of his Army, to entertain them, till he himſelf could be ready to come. Then following with the main Body, he ſet upon them in their return at Cantbridge or Cambridge in Glouceſterſhire, where he gave them a very great defeat. The Annals relate, that many thouſands of them were ſlain together with Ecwils their King; but Huntingdon mentions two Kings, viz. Haldene and Eolwulfe, beſides Uther a Conſul as he calls him and eight other Noblemen, whoſe Names are harſh and without any loſs to the Reader may be omitted.

But aſſoon broke by the perfidious Danes to their own Deſtruction.

45. The year that followed died Ethered the Earl or Duke of Mercia, the Brother-in-Law of King Edward, who hereupon took into his Hands the Cities of London and Oxford, with the Territories thereto belonging. The year after about * Martinmas he cauſed to be built the Northern Borough of Hartford, betwixt Memeran, Benefican and Ligean, and afterwards in Summer betwixt the Rogation days and Midſummer, he marched with his Army to Mældune in Eſſex, and there lay incamped while his Souldiers built the Town of Witham. At this a good Part of the Countrey formerly ſubject to the Danes, ſubmitted themſelves to his Authority, and in the mean time another Part of his Army built the other Borough of Hartford, on the South ſide of the River Ligean now Lea. But whereas the Annals talk of building theſe Boroughs of Hartford, the Reader muſt know that that Town which gives name now to the whole ſhire, was much more ancient, being found in ſome Copies of Beda, called † Herudford (which ſome interpret the Red Ford, others the Ford of Harts) where he treateth of the Synod there holden in the year of our Salvation, five hundred and ſeventy. Therefore by building ſome Houſes, muſt be onely meant repairing of the Town. Or chiefly the Caſtle is to be underſtood, which ſtanding upon the River Lea, tradition reported to have been built by Edward the Elder, as inlarged afterward by the Houſe of Clare, to which it belonged. By Memeran and Benefican are meant two Rivolets, which ſcarcely a Mile off from the preſent Hartford, increaſe the ſtream of Ligean or Lea, Benefican is gueſſed to be that on which ſtandeth Benington, and Memeran the other Brook on which Puckerich is ſeated. Mældune is that we now called Maldon in Eſſex upon the River Chelmer, even the ſame with the famous Roman Colony Camalodunum, which many Ages ſince adorned that ſhore. Witham is that now called Whitham, in the ſame County, a fair Thoroughfair, a Mile diſtant from Eaſterford, and as much from Blackwater.

Ethered his Brother-in-Law dies.

Edward is employed in building and repairing ſeveral Towns.

*DCCCCXIII. Her on þiꞅ ᵹeaꞃe ymb Maꞃꞇineꞅ mæꞅꞅan heꞇ Eaꝺƿaꞃꝺ Cynᵹ æꞇymbꞃan þanoꞃþan buꞃh æꞇ Heoꞃoꞇꝼoꞃ ꝺa beꞇƿeox Memeꞃan ⁊ Beneꝼican ⁊ Lyᵹean ⁊ ⁊ ꝺa æꝼꞇeꞃ ꝺam ꝺaꞅ on ꞅumeꞃa beꞇƿeox ᵹanᵹ ꝺaᵹum ⁊ miꝺꝺum ꞅumeꞃæ. þa ꝼoꞃ Eaꝺƿeaꞃꝺ cyninᵹ miꝺ ꞅumum hiꞅ ꝼulꞇume on eaꞅꞇ Seaxe ꞇo Mælꝺune.

† Hiſt. lib. 4. cap. 5. Ita Camdenus. In exemplari per Whelocum impreſſo Heorutford in capite ipſo, in titulo vero Herudfordia Regi Alfredo Interpreti Heoꞃꞇꝼoꞃꝺ Heoꞃꞇꝼeoꞃꝺa ⁊ Heoꞃoꞇꝼoꞃꝺa.

46. The year that followed, ſaith Huntingdon, but in the fourth year after ſay the Annals, Eaſter being paſt, the Danes from Northampton and Ligeraceſter, or Leiceſter, broke the Peace by an Inrode made into Oxfordſhire, where they committed all Rapine, and made great ſlaughter of all they met, while another Party with worſe ſucceſs fell into Hartfordſhire, where the Inhabitants now taking Courage, and ſufficiently inured to ſuch Allarms ſtoutly reſiſted them, drove them back and recovered the booty they had taken, withall making themſelves Maſters of their Horſes. In the mean time Ethelfleda the King's Siſter, and Relict of Ethered the Duke of Mercia, having the charge of this Countrey behaved herſelf, as ſhe had done all along in her Husband's Life time, with ſuch Another rout given the Danes for their Inrodes.

Courage

The Queen of the Britains taken by Ethelfleda Siſter to Edward.

Courage and Conduct as ſhe became a great help to her Brother in his Wars, and ſtoutly defended all thoſe that were under her Care. But the Britains who were Neighbours to the Mercians, diſdaining to be curbed by a Woman, were ſo bold as to make ſome Incurſions into the Engliſh Pale. She to divert and chaſtiſe them, ſent a Party into Wales, which eaſily routed the Welſh, took the Caſtle of Bricenameer, and beſides thirty four other conſiderable Captives, brought away Priſoner that King's Wife into Mercia. By this Bricenameer is to be underſtood, that we now call Brecknockmeer, a Lake of ſtanding water two miles from the Town of Brecknock. Marianus Scotus witneſſeth that this Lady in the year DCCCCXIII, entring into the Land of the Britains, wone by aſſault a Caſtle at Bricenaumeer, and there took Priſoner the Wife of the King of the Britains. But whether this Caſtle was Brecknock it ſelf, or Caſtle Dinas, which ſtandeth over it upon a Rocky Hill, which the higher it riſeth, the ſlenderer and ſmaller it becometh, is not certainly known, ſaith Mr. Camden. But foraſmuch as Dinas in the Britiſh Tongue ſignifies a Palace, and that the Queen of theſe Britains was here taken Priſoner, I judge it next door to certainty, that this was the Caſtle whereof we write.

Her Buildings.

47. But this Virago not onely took Caſtles and Towns from the Enemy, but is exceedingly celebrated by all Writers, ſo many ſhe either repaired or built within the Engliſh Territories. Hoveden gives us a liſt of them, with the time of their building or repairing, which as a memorable piece of Antiquity, we are obliged not to omit. In the year DCCCCV. by command of her and her Husband Ethered that City ſaith he which in Britiſh is called Karlegion, and Legaceſtre in the Saxon Tongue, was re-edifyed. Now there were two Cities in Britain, which the Saxons called by the Name of Ligeceſtre, from being the Seats of Roman Legions as is thought, though many others for the ſame reaſon might have had that Name, one of the Coritani, which we now call Leiceſter, and another belonging to the Cornavii, and a Roman Colony which we ſtill (retaining the later part of the word) call Weſtcheſter, and ſimply Cheſter. Mr. Camden was of opinion, that the Town repaired at this time was Leiceſter, which Ethelfleda he ſaith ſtrongly walled about. But we cannot agree with him in this point, becauſe both Hoveden and Florent of Worceſter, ſay it was that Legaceſtre, which the Britains called Caerleon or Caerlegion, by which Name they never called Leiceſter, but if we give credit to their great Antiquary, Humphry * Lhuyd by that of Caerbeir, whenceſoever the Saxon Name of Legeceſtre was taken, which might firſt be given it upon ſome other account than that of a Legion, or rather one but like unto † it. It's evident enough, that at the time when thoſe Authours wrote, it had not the Name of Caerleon, but that Cheſter had is moſt certain, and that firſt by way of Excellency, then alone by it ſelf, the Names of other Places being changed, as of that City which from Caerwtheling, by reaſon of the Roman Legions having changed its Name to || Caer Lheon, afterwards from a Noble Britain that repaired it, received that of Caergwayr, and by the Engliſh is called Warwick. But beſides this reaſon from the Name, another as ſtrong may be fetched from the Place. Her repairing and building of Towns was not accidental, but as the Exigency of Affairs required, ſo as the Countrey might be ſecured againſt the Danes and Britains. Now there could not be ſo great need for Leiceſter to be reinforced as for Cheſter, which as ſome ſay by the Invaſions of the Danes had been deſtroyed, beſides it was a Frontier Town, and a mighty curb againſt the treacherous and inconſtant Welſh, if ſuch they were indeed as our Writers would make them.

A Legione viceſſima victrice.

* Fragment. f. 21. b.

† In Annalibus ſcribitur. Lẏᵹeꞃa Ceaꞅꞇꞃe.

|| Idem ibid.

Huntingdono Wirengevic.

48. In the year DCCCCIX, on the ſecond of the Nones of May, ſhe marched with an Army to a place called Sceargete, and there built a ſtrong Caſtle, and thence to Brige ſeated on the Weſt ſide of the River Severn, where ſhe cauſed another to be erected. The year following, at the beginning of Summer ſhe went with her Mercians to Tamvirting, and repaired the City. Florence of Worceſter calls the Place Tamewordin, Marianus Tamawordia, but Matthew of Weſtminſter more truely Thameworth, being the ſame with Tamworth in Staffordſhire, ſituate upon the River Tame, whence it hath part of its Name, and the other half from the Saxon word þeoꞃð, which ſignifies a Farm-Houſe, as alſo an Holme or River Iſland, any place incompaſſed with water, as in Germany Keyſerwert and Bomelſwert, betoken aſmuch as Cæſar's Iſle, and Bomel's Iſle. As long as the Kingdom of the Mercians continued, this was one Place of the King's Reſidence, a Town of great reſort and very well frequented. Hoveden proceeds and tells us, that in the year DCCCCXI, ſhe built a City called Eadesbyrig, and in the end of Autumn another called Warwick. Eadesbyrig, as ſeveral others, was ſome obſcure place; as for Warwick, it muſt not by any means be granted that ſhe built it anew, rebuild it ſhe might, as one writes, that it is much bound to her becauſe ſhe repaired it when it was greatly decayed. It was an old Town by the Saxons called Ƿaꞃꞃinᵹƿic, but by the Britains Caerguarvic and Caerleon, as we lately hinted from Guarth, which in Britiſh ſignifies a Garriſon, and from the Roman Legions. For this was their Præſidium, or Garriſon Town ſtanding in the middle of the Countrey, as Præſidium in the Iſland of Corſica ſtood in the middle of that Iſland. Theſe are ſuch as Hoveden relates her to have built or repaired. Matthew of Weſtminſter adds, that ſhe went to Stanford, and there on the Northern Bank of the River Weiloand repaired a Tower. That the ſame year wherein ſhe built Eadesbyrig (which he calls Jadeſbyri) ſhe built another Town called Wartham. That the year following, ſhe erected three more, viz. Cherenburck, Weadburck and Runcoſe (now Ruckhome in Cheſhire, brought by mutability of time to Cottages) to which ſome add Stafford, Litchfield and Shrewsbury.

Huntingdon
Cereburik
Wardebirk
Rumcouen.

49. What Matthew aſcribes to her concerning Stanford, Marianus attributes to her Brother King Edward, writing that he built a Caſtle, but it was juſt over againſt the Town on the Southern Bank, as the Annals alſo affirm, which now is called Stanford Baron, of which yet at this day there appeareth not the leaſt token. Weadelbucrh is now Wedsborough a Town in Staffordſhire. But as for Stafford it ſelf, it's ancienter than ſo being called Betheney, before it had the Name of Stafford, but a Caſtle was here built about the year of our Lord DCCCCXIV, on the South Bank of the River Sow, which Marianus attributes to King Edward himſelf, which might be, becauſe in his Reign it was erected. Lichfield was alſo ancienter, being by Beda called Licidfeld, which one interprets the Field of dead Bodies, from a Number of Chriſtians which were there martyred under the Perſecution of Diocleſian. And as for Shrewsbury, whenſoever and by whomſoever it was built, it roſe from the Ruines of old Vriconium now called Wroxeſter, which being an ancient City of the Romans fell to decay in the Saxon and Daniſh Wars. Some four Miles from it aroſe that we now call Shrewsbury, in old time Pengwern, that is the Head of an old Alder, or and high Plat of Ground planted with Alders, in which ſence by the Saxons termed Scrobbesbyrig from its being a thicket of Shrubs upon an Hill. It was the ſeat of the Petty Kings of Powis ſometime, and when taken out of the Hands of the Britains might be new fortifyed and repaired, which our Builders to aggrandiſe the Act of this Heroical Lady call Builderig. For this is obſerved of her, that ſuch Places as were repaired by her were ſuch as by her Valour and Conduct, were formerly wreſted by her out of the Hands of the Enemy. But that we may conclude this ſtory of this Lady all together, the year after ſhe had taken the Caſtle of Brecknock from the Britains, a little before Auguſt ſhe ſet upon the Town of Derby then in the Hands of the Danes, took it by ſtorm, after that they refuſed Battel in open Field, and then ſubdued all the Countrey round, though with the loſs of four of her choiceſt Officers who were ſlain at the Entry of the Gate. Huntingdon adds that after this Victory ſhe conquered Leiceſter with the greater part of the Daniſh Army that lay in theſe parts, as alſo that thoſe of York promiſed ſubmiſſion, and all good deportment. After this Convention, this moſt prudent Virago to be preferred before the ancient Amazons in the opinion of Ingulphus, died at Tamworth twelve days before the Feaſt of St. John, in the eighth year of her Government of Mercia, and was buried in the Porch of St. Peter in Glóceſter by her Husband. Huntingdon farther writes, that ſhe was reported to have been a Woman of ſo great Power, that by ſome ſhe was not onely called Lady and Queen, but King alſo, out of admiration at her worth. She left one onely Child, a Daughter named Alwina (or Algina) for it's ſaid that abhorring the pains of Childbirth after ſhe was born, ſhe would never more accompany with her Husband. To which paſſage Ingulphus adds, that in reſpect of the Cities ſhe built, the Caſtles ſhe fortified, and the Armies ſhe managed, one would have thought ſhe had changed her Sex. Matthew of Weſtminſter tells us, ſhe made her Daughter her Heir (of her Kingdom he terms it) but King Edward ſo far underſtood his intereſt, that within a year he ſent for his Niece into Weſtſex, and ſeized Mercia into his own Hands.

Lhuyd in Fragment. f. 22. b.

She beat the Britains and Danes.

Dies.

After whoſe death Edward ſeis'd on Mercia.

50. That we may now return to him. The year after that Derby was taken, a new Fleet of Danes from the Southward arrived at Lidwic in Devonſhire under Conduct of two Captains, called Ottor and Roald. Sailing Weſtward about the Lands end, they entered the mouth of the Severn; where landing, they waſted the North Welſh Coaſt, and coming to Ircingafelda, they there took Cameleac a Biſhop, and carried him away to their Ships, whom afterward King Edward redeemed deemed with forty Pounds. As they proceeded, the Inhabitants of Hereford, Gloceſter Shires, with others out of other Cities oppoſed their Progreſs and put them to flight, killing their Captain Roald, with the Brother of Otter and very many others. They purſued them into a Wood, where they Beſieged them till they had given ſecurity for departing out of the King's Dominions. The King hovered with his Army between Severn and Avon, ſo that they durſt not touch upon thoſe Quarters, except in a ſtealing manner twice by Night, and then they came ſhort home, being all cut off, but ſome that by Swimming eſcaped to their Ships: The reſt being almoſt all famiſhed in a ſmall Iſland, removed from place to place, till at laſt about Martinmas time they paſſed over into Ireland, this was the Iſſue of this Invaſion, and the Countrey enjoyed a breathing time from theſe Calamities. Thoſe that bore the greateſt brunt of this Storm were the Herefordſhire men, eſpecially thoſe of that part of it which from Gildenvale declining and bending Eaſtward, was in thoſe days called Ircingafelda, and at this time with like variation Irchenfield, but in Doomſday Book Archenfeld, which Book ſignifies that certain Revenues by an old Cuſtome were there aſſigned to one or two Prieſts, on condition that they ſhould go on Embaſſies for the Kings of England into Wales. And whether it was in memory of their Sufferings and Service in this Inroad of the Danes, the ſaid Book hath this farther Obſervation: The Men Arcenfeld whenſoever the Army marcheth forward againſt the Enemy, by a Cuſtome make the Vaunt Guard and bring up the Rere in their Return.

Annal. ad An. DCCCCXVIII.

Iꞃcinᵹa-ꝼelða.

51. The Pirates being gone, King Edward to ſecure himſelf better from the Attempts of their Countrey men who lived about the Shires of Buckingham and Bedford, and ſtill were ready to joyn with any freſh Gameſters, led his Army to Buckingham, where he ſtaid an whole Month, and gave order for raiſing Forts on each ſide of the River Ouſe. This it ſeems ſo ſtartled the Danes that judging that they could not now doe better, ſeveral of them ſubmitted themſelves, as Thurcytel an Earl, together with moſt of the conſiderable men about Bedford, and many of them that belonged to Northampton. This obliged him the following year to go down to Bedford, which ſoon yielded it ſelf to him whither then repaired ſuch as had been formerly on his ſide. Here he alſo ſtaid a Month and took care for building a Burh, as the Annals call it, on the Southſide of the River Ouſe which Townelet, as the beſt Copies of Hoveden have it, was in the Saxon times called Mickeſgate. The year following, ſomewhat before Midſummer, he went again to Maldon, where he built another Burh and fortified the Town, and in this year Thurcytel finding he was like but to have a ſmall Trade here, where the King ſo minded his buſineſs, got leave to carry over ſome men into France; where he knew his Countreymen might find him employment. And the King followed on his buſineſs indeed. The next year before Eaſter Holydays he went to Tofaceſter, which he cauſed to be fortified, and about Rogation Week cauſed a place called Wiggingamere to be built and ſtrengthened. That Tofaceſter is now the Town called Torceſter in Northamptonſhire, in the Roman times Tripontium, from three Bridges made over ſo many Chanels, into which the little River divideth it ſelf. Marianus names it Touceſter, writing that it was ſo fortified in the year of our Redemption DCCCCXVII, that the Danes by no means could win it by Aſſault, and that King Edward the Elder afterwards incompaſſed it with a ſtone Wall. Yet now no Tokens of any ſuch Wall appear. Onely there's an Artificial Hill remaining, which they call Beryhill, turned into Private Gardens. Wiggingamere is now called Wigmore a Town of Herefordſhire, not far from the River Lug.

He forces the Danes in Bucks and Bedfordſhire to ſubmit.

52. While Edward was buſied about the Fortifications of Wigmore, the Danes of Northampton and Leiceſter not being well pleaſed to find themſelves curbed with ſo many ſtrong Towns, laid Seige to Torceſter. For a whole day they belaboured it, but it ſtanding ſtifly out till Supplies came to them, they went their ways by Night, but were purſued and ſurpriz'd betwixt Burnwood and Egleſbyrig or Ayleſbury, where many of them were taken with the loſs of much of their Baggage. Much at the ſame time the Danes of Huntingdon, not judging their Caſtle convenient enough demoliſhed it, and being aſſiſted by thoſe of Eaſt England built another at Temeſford as more opportune, from whence to make their Excurſions. They went alſo to Bedford with intention of recovering that Town, but the Garriſon iſſued out repulſed and ſlew a great part of them. After this a greater Army was raiſed both out of Eaſt England and Mercia, which went and laid Siege to Wigmore, plundering the Countrey round about, but after a days tryal the Defendants obliged them to riſe and be gone. Hereupon many of King Edward's Friends about theſe parts gathered themſelves together and uniting their Forces went and

Beſieged

Several Skirmiſhes betwixt the Danes and Edward.

Sect. 10.

Beſieged Temsford, which they took by Aſſault, therein ſlew their King together with Toylea and Mannan his Son both Earls, his Brother and all the reſt they could find, for they peremptorily ſtood it out againſt them. This Temsford is a Town in Bedfordſhire ſtanding upon the confluence of Ouſe and another Brook which ſome call Ivel. Provoked or incouraged by the example of their Countreymen the men of Kent, Surrey and Eſſex, and ſeveral out of other places went and laid ſiege to Colne Ceaſter or Colcheſter, and ſo pertinaciouſly carried on their Aſſault that they took it, and put all they found therein to the Sword, except ſuch as had the good hap to eſcape over the Walls.

⁊ ꝼoꞃon ꞇo Colneceaꞅ-ꞇꞃe.

53. Hereat many Danes both inhabiting the Countrey and the Port Towns much allarmed gathered themſelves together, and being prevented as to the Relief of Colcheſter pleaſed themſelves with the hope of revenging the Injury received upon Maldon, but the Inhabitants held out till relief came, which ſo diſcouraged the Beſiegers that they drew off, but in their Retreat were purſued, and many thouſands of them ſlain, Pirates and others, by thoſe that they hoped to have devoured. King Edward being jealous of all their Countreymen haſted this very Summer with an Army of Weſt Saxons to a place called Pæſſanham, ſo called from paſſing over the River, now Pætham, a little diſtant from Stony Stratford, where he continued till Torceſter was incircled with a ſtone Wall. This had ſuch influence upon the Danes of theſe Quarters, that Thurſerth an Earl with the Lords of the Towns thereabout, and all their Army as far as Hampton North of Weolind came and ſubmitted themſelves unto him. Now the King's Army deſired to return home, yet part of it was ordered to Huntingdon, where it repaired the Town and repaired ſuch Breaches as the King had formerly made, upon ſight whereof all the People of thoſe Parts ſubmitted, deſiring the King's Protection. Then with his Weſt Saxon Forces this very year before Martinmas did he march to Colcheſter, which Town he repaired and fortifi'd at what time the People of Eaſt England and Weſt England living under the Danes, together with the Daniſh Army in Eaſt England, ſware obedience to him, as well hy Sea as by Land fully to obſerve his Commands. Thoſe of them alſo that lay at Grantbrig took the ſame Oath as he had commanded. The year following wherein died his Siſter Ethelfleda, betwixt Rogation Week and Midſummer he went to Stanford, where, ſay the Annals on the Southern ſide he built a Caſtle, whereupon all ſuch as held that on the other ſide, ſubmitted themſelves to him as their Lord.

⁊ eal ꞅehe-ꞃe ðe ꞇo Hamꞇune hẏꞃꝺe noꞃ-ƿoð ƿeoluꝺ.

Moſt of the Danes now ſubmit and ſwear obedience to King Edward.

54. By her death all Mercia, as we ſaid, fell unto him and willingly ſubmitted, and about the ſame time Howel, Cledanc and Jeothwell the petty Kings of North Wales with all the Northern Britains, put themſelves under his Dominion. After this he viſited Notingham, which he repaired, and therein placed both Engliſh and Danes, of both which Nations, all inhabiting Mercia, now became his Subjects. To purſue and complete his good Fortune, the next year he went down with an Army to Thelwall in Cheſhire, where he took care for the building and fortifying of the Town. The Annals onely tell us ſo much, but Matthew of Weſtminſter tells us the reaſon of the Name, which came from the Bodies of Trees (the Boughs being cut off) faſt ſet in the ground, wherewith he fenced it round: For the Saxons in their Language called the Trunks or Bodies of Trees, Thel, and Wall as we name it at preſent. While he ſtaid at Thelwall he ſent for another Party of Souldiers out of Mercia, and ordered them to Manige Ceaſtre in Northumberland to repair and Man it. This Manige Ceaſtre is Mancheſter in Lancaſhire ſaid to be in Northumberland, for that this Countrey, as well as others, North of Humber were formerly under the ſame Kings. Lying ſo as it doth, it ſeems to have been quite deſtroyed in the Daniſh Wars, wherein becauſe the Inhabitants demeaned themſelves like very valiant men, their ſucceſſours will have their Town to have been called Mancheſter, that is, as they expound it, The City of Men; in which conceit they wonderfully pleaſe themſelves. And ſo they ſhould for me. But one already has told them that Mancunium was the Name of it in the time of the Britains and Romans, ſo that the Etymology thereof out of our Engliſh Tongue, can by no meens ſeem ſo much as probable. He derives it rather from Main a Britiſh word, which ſignifies a Stone; becauſe upon a Stony Hill it is ſeated, and beneath the very Town at Colyhurſt there are very excellent and famous Quarries.

Thelwall whence ſo called.

Mancheſter.

Camden in Lancaſhire.

The reaſon of its Name.

55. The next year King Edward to ſecure all about him went down with an Army to Notingham, where he ordered a Borough to be built on the South ſide of the River right over againſt, and a Bridge to be made for entercourſe betwixt them. Thence he marched as far as into the Territories of the Picts, to a place called Bedecanwyllan, where he commanded a Town to be built and ſtrongly fortifi'd.

The King of the Scots and ſeveral others ſubmit.

fi'd. Now did the King of the Scots ſubmit unto him as his Lord and Sovereign, together with the Scotiſh Nation it ſelf, Reginald the Son of Eadulf, and all the Inhabitants of Northumberland, Engliſh and Danes, in the North as well as in the Southern Parts, as alſo the King of the Streatgledwalli with all his Subjects. Theſe are the great Atchievements of King Edward, as they are ſummarily laid down by the Annals, which ſpeak his Power ſo great, that no King before him extended his Dominions to ſuch a Proportion. By another we are told that as it were to complete his Felicity, a little before he died he reduced to obedience the Inhabitants of Cheſter and the Countrey about it, who having conſpired with the neighbouring Britains, had attempted to ſhake off the Yoke; but he by his diligence prevented the joyning of their Forces, and by his Courage and the terrour of his Name, conſtrained them again to ſubmit themſelves. In ſo great glory he died in his Return toward his ancient Province of the Weſt Saxons at Faverdon a Town of Berkſhire, where for the moſt part he kept his Court, after he had reigned four and twenty years.

Malmesb.

Edward dies.

56. He was well nigh as happy in his Iſſue as in the courſe and ſucceſs of his Government, yet not ſo happy in that of his firſt Wife becauſe he knew not certainly how to call their Conjunction a Marriage. Concerning their Acquaintance and firſt meeting together, beſides the Monk of Malmesbury, John Brompton the Abbat of Jornual relates, That in the Reign of King Elfred when his Son Edward was young, there was in a certain Village of the Weſt Saxons the Daughter of a Shepherd called Edgina, who falling aſleep dreamed that the Moon ſhone out of her Womb ſo bright that all England was inlightened by the ſplendour of it. The Dream ſhe told to a certain grave Woman that had been Nurſe to ſeveral of the King's Children. She thereupon takes her into her Houſe and brings her up as carefully and tenderly as if ſhe had been her own Daughter, inſtructing her ſo to demean her ſelf as might become a Perſon both of Birth and Breeding. In proceſs of time it happened that Prince Edward, the King's Eldeſt Son, paſſing upon ſome occaſion thorough this Town, thought himſelf obliged in honour and good nature to viſit his Nurſe, which as he did he got ſight of this Maid, being exceeding beautifull, and fell paſſionately in love with her. By his importunity he got her conſent to lie with him, and by one Nights lodging ſhe became with Child, which proving a Son in reſpect to the Mothers Dream, the Father gave him the Name of Athelſtan, which ſignifieth the Moſt Noble. Some call this Woman his Wife, (he might be Married to her afterwards) and others reckon that Lady for his firſt, whom he Married afterward. However by her he had another Son named Ælfred, who died ſeveral years before his Father, and a Daughter called Editha Married to Sithric the Daniſh King of Northumberland. So ſome write; but Malmesbury calls his ſecond Son Ethelward, begotten of Elfleda Daughter of Earl Ethelin, a Prince very well learned and much reſembling his Grandfather Alfred both in Countenance and Diſpoſition, but he died preſently after his Father.

An Account of his Wife Edgina and her Iſſue.

His Iſſue by Elfreda his other Wife.

57. By this Elfreda his (firſt or ſecond) Wife, beſides this Ethelward, whom ſome call Elſward, he had a ſecond Son named Edwin, and a third called Gregory, as ſome write, who forſook the world and became an Hermite; of Daughters good ſtore. As firſt Edfleda, who became a Nun in the Monaſtery of Rumſey, Egwina, called alſo Edgitha and Edgina, married to Charles the Simple, King of France, Son of Ludovicus Balbus, and Grandſon of Charles the Bald, whoſe Daughter, as we ſaid, Ethelwulf married in his return from Rome; Ethelhilda who was never married; Ethilda married to Hugh the Great Count of Paris, to whom ſhe bore Hugh Capet, afterwards King of that noble Countrey; Edgitha and Elgiua, both which their Brother Athelſtan ſent over to Henry Emperour of Germany, who beſtowed the firſt on his own Son Otho, afterwards Emperour, and the ſecond on a certain Duke, whoſe Territories lay near to the Alpes. This numerous Offſpring he had by his Wife Elfleda. By his laſt Wife Edgina, he had two Sons, Edmund and Edred, who both of them came to be Kings, as we ſhall ſee; and two Daughters, viz. Eadburga, who became a Nun, and Edgina a Woman of extraordinary Beauty, beſtowed in marriage by her Brother Ethelſtan, upon Ludouic Prince of Aquitain. His Daughters he ſo brought up, as in their Infancy they all were taught to reade and write, and then to uſe the diſtaff and needle; by ſuch employments to paſs the time of their unripe Virginity: his Sons in ſuch a manner, that firſt they might be fully accompliſhed with Learning, and afterward come not rude and ignorant, but like ſo many Philoſophers, to publick buſineſs, as the Monk of Malmesbury words it.

58. Of

Sect. 10.

Ethelwald dyes.

Athelſtan crowned.

Apud Regiam Villam quæ vocatur Kingſton Coronatus.

At Kingſton, whence ſo called.

58. Of his Sons, Ethelward died a few days after his Father, and by his death, made way for the Succeſſion of Athelſtan, who though the eldeſt, and legitimated as it were by the after marriage of his Mother, yet being born of a then Concubine, could hardly have obtained the Crown, by reaſon of the great love and eſteem which was born to Ethelward, as well for his own Learning and Vertues, as for the great reſemblance he bore to his Grandfather King Alfred. He being dead, and the reſt of the Sons of Edward being too young for ſo weighty an employment; Athelſtan by conſent of all the Nobility was choſen King, and Crowned at the Royal Town or Village (as Malmesbury tells us) called Kingſton, not without the foredeſignment of his Father in his laſt Will and Teſtament, who might poſſibly gueſs that his Son Ethelward would not be long lived. He was now about thirty years of Age. By his own pregnancy and care of his Parents, he had arrived at very conſiderable qualifications of mind, ſuitable to his weighty Employment. For Alfred his Grandfather is ſaid to have preſaged to him a lucky Reign, being much enamour'd of him for his great towardneſs and the extraordinary elegancy of his Features. When he was very young, he conferred on him the dignity of Knighthood, by inveſting him with a purple Robe, a Belt adorned with Gems, and a Sword of the Saxon Faſhion, incloſed in a golden Scabbard. He cauſed him to be educated in the houſe of his Daughter Ethelfleda, the Wife of noble and valiant Ethelfrede, that by the inſtructions and example of ſo great Captains (ſuch we may term them both) he might by degrees be trained up in ſuch actions as might render him fit for that good Fortune and Condition, which the hopes conceived of him did portend. Accordingly after his Fathers and Brothers, he was Crowned King at Kingſton upon Thames, a Town as ſome have written, formerly called Moreford, and ſtanding upon a flat ground, ſubject to the Inundation of the Thames, which cauſed it to be removed thither, where now the preſent Kingſton ſtands. The Kings of the Weſt Saxons now found it their intereſt, being Monarchs of the Engliſh Nation, to remove their Seat into theſe Quarters, not ſo much in reſpect to London (which for opulency and multitude of its Inhabitants, had not been all along theſe Saxon times ſo conſiderable, but ſuſtained great Calamities by Fire) as to the Invaſions of the Danes, which were frequently made up the River Thames, and to be nearer to the Eaſt Angles, amongſt whom theſe Rovers had fixed themſelves. Therefore Athelſtan, and after him Edwin and Ethelred, were openly Crowned Kings at this Town; which from them took the name of Kingſton.

A conſpiracy againſt him.

Charta quædam Donationis Monaſterio Malmesburienſi per ipſum Regem Athelſtanum apud Gulielm. Monachum de Geſt. Reg. Angl. l.2.c. 6.

York ſeized by Inguald King of the Danes.

Northumberland added to his Dominions.

59. Athelſtan began his Reign in the ſixteenth year of Conſtantine the eighth, Sirnamed Porphyrogenitus, Emperour of the Eaſt, the ſixth of Henricus Auceps, Emperour of Germany, the twelfth Indiction, A. D. DCCCCXXIV. His own deſerts, and the general affection of the People were not effectual to prevent all inconveniences proceeding from the condition of his Birth. One Alfred made conſiderable oppoſition againſt the choice, as of an illegitimate Perſon, and conſpired with his Complices to lay hold of him in the City of Wincheſter, and to put out his eyes. But the Plot was happily diſcovered, and Alfred it ſeems denying it was ſent to Rome, there to purge himſelf before that Biſhop, where coming to take his Oath before the Altar of St. Peter, he fell down, and being carried by his Servants to the Engliſh School, there died the third night after. The Pope would not diſpoſe of his Body, but ſent to ask the advice of Athelſtan what ſhould be done with it, whether it was to be buried amongſt thoſe of other Chriſtians. The Nobility and the Relations of Alfred, earneſtly deſired that it might be beſtowed in Chriſtian burial, to which the King aſſenting, and the Pope therewith acquainted, it was accordingly done, and his whole Eſtate was adjudged confiſcate for his Treaſon. Such good fortune had Athelſtan againſt this homebred Enemy. In other places he found little trouble, except on the Northern ſide of Humber; where Inguald, one of the Daniſh Kings ſeized upon York, and Sithric who ſome time before had killed Niel his Brother, by force made himſelf Maſter of Davenport in Cheſhire. The Monk of Malmesbury writes, that he was a Barbarian both by mind and Nation. That he was Kinſman to that Gurmund, of whom we reade ſo much in the Acts of King Alfred, that having proudly contemned the Power of former Kings, now humbly deſired the alliance of Athelſtan by Meſſengers, whom he himſelf followed, to make good what they had prayed on his behalf. Athelſtan found him ſo conſiderable, that he gave him in marriage his Siſter Edgitha. But he enjoyed her but the ſpace of one years, by his death giving occaſion to Athelſtan, of laying Northumberland to his own Dominions, to which he might lay claim, ſaith our Authour, both by an ancient Right, and a new Alliance.

He invades Scotland.

60. Hereupon Analaf the Son of Sictric fled into Ireland, and Godefrid his Brother into Scotland, whom followed ſhortly after Ambaſſadours from the King, both to Conſtantine King of the Scots, and Eugenius King of the Humbrians, demanding the Fugitive to be given up, or denouncing a ſpeedy War upon refuſal. And as others ſay, a War indeed he made, paſſing into Scotland with great Powers both by Sea and Land, where he drove his Enemies before him by Land as far as Dunſeodor and Werlermore, and by Sea as far as unto Cathneſs. But Malmesbury affirms, that not daring at all to diſpleaſe him, without fail they came to a place called Dacor (or Dacre in Cumberland) where each delivered up himſelf and all his into the hands of the Engliſh King, who was Godfather to the Son of Conſtantine, now ordered to be Baptized in Teſtimony of the Accord. But for all this Godefrid eſcaped while they were preparing for the Journey, and with one Turfrid travelling into ſeveral Parts, at length got ſome Men together, and laid Siege to Tork, the Inhabitants of which they eſſayed both by fair and foul means to let them in, but not prevailing they went their ways, yet were both taken ſhortly after and ſhut up in a Caſtle, whence they eſcaped by deluding their Keepers. Turfrid not long after was Shipwreckt at Sea, and became a prey to the Fiſhes. Godefrid, endured much miſery both by Sea and Land, and at laſt came in the poſture of a ſuppliant to the King's Court, who kindly received him, but after he had been profuſely Feaſted for four days together, he got him again to his Ships, grew an old Pirate, as accuſtomed to the water as a very Fiſh, in the Monk's opinion. In the mean time Athelſtan demoliſhed a Caſtle in Tork, which the Danes had fortified, that therein they might no longer ſhroud themſelves. And the large Booty found in it he divided man by man amongſt his Souldiers.

England invaded by the King.

61. But a great tempeſt began to gather againſt him in the North-weſtern Parts, where Conſtantine the King of the Scots exaſperated by the late Invaſion joined with * Analaf the Son of Sithric (others but more unprobably will have him not this Son, but another of his Name who was King of Ireland, and the Iſles adjacent) and drew in Eugenius the King of Cumberland, with great Forces from ſeveral Nations to their Aſſiſtence. After preparations of ſome four years they invade England by the River Humber, and paſs up the Countrey to a place called † Brunanburg or Bruneford, which Cambden placeth in Glendale of Northumberland, on the Scotch Borders; Athelſtan on purpoſe giving way, to obtain ſome better advantage againſt them, as ſome write, or, as others, they being fearfull to Grapple with him. Analaf perceiving with whom he had to doe, puts off his Royal Enſigns, and becomes a Spye in the habit of a Muſician, attending with an Harp in his hand at Athelſtan's Tent, to which Inſtrument Singing, he was eaſily admitted to the King's preſence as one who got his living by that courſe of life. There he made them merry till ſuch time as having eaten and drank ſufficiently they began to debate ſeriouſly about the work they had in hand, and he all the while made what Obſervations he could, till then he received his wages, and was put out of the Tent. The Money ſcorning to carry with him, he hid into the Earth, of which a certain Souldier took notice who had formerly ſerved him, and thereby coming to know him, after he was gone acquainted the King. The King blamed him for not giving timely notice, which the Souldier excuſed as having formerly taken in Analaf's Service the Military Oath, affirming that had he betrayed Analaf, he himſelf to whom now he was in the ſame Relation could have expected no more fidelity; but he adviſed Athelſtan to remove his Tent into another place. This Advice was lookt upon as very good, and how ſeaſonable it was very ſhortly appeared. A certain Biſhop coming to the Camp this night in that very place, as being pleaſantly ſituated, pitched his Tent. Him Analaf, with a deſign to deſtroy the King, fell upon, being ignorant of what had paſſed, and eaſily killed him with all his Followers.

* Ingulphus ſic, contra quem cum Analaphus Sitrici filius quondam Regis Northanhumbriorum inſurgeret, &c. aliis eſt Analphus.

† Ann. Brunanbuph. Ingulpho Brunford in Northumbria. Et Brunnamoere Turgotio in Ethelredi legibus Bromdune. Malmesb. Bruneford, Ethelwerdo Brunandune hodie Brumridge appellatur.

62. Ingulphus (who is more to be credited than any other Hiſtorian in this matter) writes, that Anlaf though he had brought with him an infinite multitude of Danes, Norwegians, Scots and Picts, yet either out of diffidence or the craft familiar to his Nation, choſe rather by night to ſurprize his Enemy, than fairly give him Battel in the open Field and by day light. He fell ſuddenly upon the Engliſh, and killed the Biſhop who was come but that night to the Camp, which cauſing a great tumult and noiſe, the King though a Mile off, and his whole Army took the Allarm, and putting themſelves into ſuch order as the ſurprize would give leave, by break of Day came up to the place of the ſlaughter, where they found the Invaders tired, and diſordered by their late travel, and for want of ſleep. It happened that Athelſtan in perſon leading all the Weſt Saxons, light upon Analaf himſelf, and Turketul his Kinſman and Chancellour, who had the Conduct of the Londoners, and all the Mercians, upon Conſtantine the Scotiſh King. Their Miſſile weapons being quickly ſpent, they came to handſtrokes, to fight it out with Sword and Buckler. Many poor Mortals there loſt their lives; the Carkaſſes of mean perſons lay confuſedly together with the ſlain Bodies of Kings, Death making no diſtinction. The diſpute continuing long and moſt violent, by reaſon that the multitude of Barbarians was ſo great, Turketul took with him ſome few Londoners whom he knew to be moſt valiant, and a Centurion of the Wiccii called Singin, one of approved valour, and with them, being taller than the reſt, of ſolid and ſubſtantial Limbs, and ſtrongeſt ſet amongſt all thoſe London Heroes, he ruſhed into the throng of his Enemies, and laying ſtoutly about him hewed down Ranks of Men both on the right hand and on the left. He paſſed through the heaps of Orcadians and Picts, bearing a wood of Darts and Arrows on his Breaſt-plate, and falling upon the crouds of Cumbrians and Scots, at length reached Conſtantine himſelf, whom he diſmounted and would have taken alive, but the Scots were ſo concerned for their King that they made a very ſharp Conflict about him, and many of them preſſing upon a few Engliſh, eſpecially aiming at Turketul he began to repent of his raſhneſs, ſeeing no means of eſcaping or getting off his Priſoner, when ſuddenly Singin the Centurion killed Conſtantine, who being once ſlain the Scots were diſcouraged and retired, and the report flying about the Army, Analaf and all his Followers ran away, after an unheard-of number of Pagans was faln in the place.

Ff who

Whence a bloudy Battel enſued.

63. So much Ingulphus relates concerning this Turketul the Chancellour, who was afterward Abbat of Croyland, and Predeceſſour in the government of that Monaſtery, where he left the memorial of his Secular Employment. All Authours agree that this was a moſt bloudy Battel, nay the bloudieſt ſay ſome that ever this Iſland ſaw. Ingulf tells us, that beſides Conſtantine five other Kings were therein ſlain, twelve Earls, and an infinite number of the inferiour ſort. The Saxon Annals (ſtrangely perplex on this ſubject) ſpeak of five Kings in all, and ſeven of Analaf's principal Commanders, of Freda a Norman, and ſeem to hint, that Conſtantine eſcaped home, but loſt his Son in the Battel: that ſome of King Edward's Old Souldiers were here loſt; but on the other ſide great multitudes; which done the reſt fled to their Ships, particularly Analaf to Dublin, with a ſmall remainder of his great Army. Malmesbury adds this circumſtance, that the Battel was fought from Morning to Night, agrees with Ingulf that Conſtantine was ſlain, with five other Kings, and twelve Earls. The King's loſs ſeemed ſo inconſiderable in compariſon of what his Enemies ſuſtained, that our Writers mention few particulars, yet here fell his two Kinſmen, Elwin and Athelſtan, whom he cauſed to be Buried at Malmesbury. Whatever his loſs was of Men, his gain of Reputation by this Victory was very great, as is evident from what Ingulphus hath obſerved for us. For the notice of it flying throughout all Chriſtendom, all Kings deſired to have him their Friend, and on any terms to make an Alliance with him. Henry the Emperour ſent Ambaſſadours to deſire one of his Siſters in Marriage for his Son Otho. Hugh alſo the King of the Franks (ſo he terms him) requeſted another for his Son. And Ludovicus Prince of Aquitain begged the like favour for his own perſon. So many and ſo great and Royal Preſents they brought along with them as never had been formerly ſeen by the Engliſh Nation.

Ceciderunt ſiquidem in illo prælio Conſtantinus Rex Scotorum ac alii Reges numero quinque, Comites duodecim, Barbaries populorum infinita.

Which procures great Reputation to the King. Being courted by all Princes for his Alliance.

64. "Beſides rich Perfumes, Gems, Horſes for the Courſe with golden Furniture, Veſſels of Onyx, and other rare and moſt pretious things, a piece of the Croſs of Chriſt, and of his Crown of Thorns, both ſet in Chryſtal; the Sword of Conſtantine the Great, on the Hilt of which incloſed with Maſſy pieces of Gold was ſet one of the four Nails which faſtened our Saviour to the Croſs; the Banner of Mauricius the Martyr, with the Launce of Charles the Great of no ſmall eſteem amongſt the Franks. King Athelſtan was pleaſed with theſe Preſents; readily ſent his Siſters as was deſired, under Conduct of ſeveral of his greateſt Courtiers, the chief of whom was Turketul, whom he eſpecially employed in this affair, in reſpect he was his firſt and his chiefeſt Chancellour, moſt prudent and truſty of all he had, and for that he was near akin to the Ladies. With the Chancellour go the four Virago's to the Sea; if we look at Chaſtity, ſuperiour to Diana, and if we regard Beauty, more fair than Helena, ſaith our Authour. By the Dukes, Earls and all other of the Engliſh Nobility many rich Preſents of Jewels and Bracelets are made them. At length leaving England, they ſail over the Sea with a proſperous Gale, and up the Rhine they paſs as far as Colein. The two Elder Siſters are put into the hands of the Emperour Henry, whereof the Eldeſt he beſtowes on his own Son Otho; and the other upon

Which he conſents to.

Quæ caſtitatis honore Dianam vincebant, & corporali pulchritudine etiam Helenam ſuperabant.

Marrying his Siſters accordingly.

upon a great Prince of his Court. Hugh the King of the Franks took the Third Siſter for his Son; and Ludovicus Prince of Aquitain Married the Fourth, the Youngeſt of all, and the moſt Beautifull. Turketul the Chancellour then having diſpatched the Affairs of his Embaſſy, returned home, loaded with great Gifts, as were his Followers; who to the meaneſt Boy were highly Preſented.

He invades Wales.

65. The Renown of Athelſtan being ſo great abroad nothing could withſtand him at home, where preſently after his ſucceſs in the North, and his having reduced the Scots and Picts to obedience, with his Brother Edmund he invaded Wales, and with much more eaſe brought Ludwal King thereof into Subjection. This King Ludwal is by others called Hunwal, Huwal or Houil, no Name having more various reading, and is thought to have been the ſame with Howel Dha, or the Good, the Son of Codel and that Great King of the Welſh, ſo famous for the Laws he made to Govern his Subjects. Perceiving them out of all order for want of Laws, he ſummoned together out of every Kemul or Hundred of his Kingdom, both Laymen that were eminent for Authority and Knowledge, as alſo all Eccleſiaſticks, that by reaſon of their Authority bore * Staves, or had Staves born before them, aſwell Archbiſhops, Biſhops, as Abbats and Priors to a place called Guin upon Taff yn deud, an Houſe he had cauſed to be built of white or pilled Rods for his uſe when he came to Hunt in the Parts of Demetia, whereupon it was called by the Name of Ty Guyn. There the King and they continued all the Lent, Faſting and Praying for a good iſſue of their meeting according to what he had deſigned. Of thoſe that now met he choſe twelve of the Laity, and a very Learned Clerk called Blangondus to make a draught and preparative for their buſineſs which he would have divided into three parts. Of which the firſt ſhould be the Law of his dayly Court, the ſecond the Law of his Countrey, the third the Practice of both. For this purpoſe three Books he ordered to be made, one to follow his dayly Court, a ſecond for the Court of Dinewr, and a third for that of Aberfran, or any of the three Parts of Cambria, viz. Guenet, Powis and Dehenbarth, which ſhould for every matter in hand have the Authority of a Law. Cambden will have this Aſſembly held in the Year DCCCCXIV. a certain Manuſcript written long agoe, about the Year DCCCCXXVI. the Hiſtory of Wales, after or about the Year DCCCCXL. ſo great is the diſagreement of Writers, which ſeems to hint that three ſeveral Aſſemblies were held, if ſo long the Reign of this Howel continued. Some affirm he was not King till about the Year DCCCCXL. and Reigned not beyond DCCCCLXVIII. But the Book of Landaff makes him later, the Contemporary of King Edgar who began not his Reign till the Year DCCCCLIX: or thereabouts, in the Hiſtory of whom we ſhall have another ſpecial occaſion to make mention of this Howel.

Leges Hoeli Dha (1 Boni.) Regis ſeu Principis totius Walliæ è ſecularibus ſuis MSS. decerptæ. Apud Spelman in Conciliis. p. 408.

* Et omnes Eccleſiaſticoe authoritate baculoſos.

Making Howel and the other Petty Kings pay him Tribute.

66. To return to Athelſtan. He cauſed all the Petty Kings of Wales, aſwell as Howel their Principal (if now he Reigned) to give him a Meeting at Hereford, where under the Name of a Tribute he impoſed on them a yearly Payment of twenty Pounds of Gold, three hundred of Silver, of Beeves twenty five thouſand, with as many Hounds and Hawks as he ſhould demand. Moreover becauſe in the Weſtern Borders toward Cornwall the Britains and Engliſh dwelt confuſedly together, which bred Quarrels, and many times drew the affection of the Engliſh from their Prince, he expelled all the Corniſh Britains out of Exeter (which he ſtrongly fortified) and other Parts of Devonſhire, though there they had formerly dwelt in equal Right with the Engliſh, as we have formerly hinted, that the Britains were wont to dwell in ſome other places, eſpecially till the great Ditch of ſeparation made by the Mercians. To their County of Cornwall he fixed certain Limits, dividing it from Devonſhire with the River Tamara, as he bounded the other Northern Britains with the River Vaga, or the Wey. Thus dreaded at home and feared abroad he lived in repoſe for ſo much as we know for three years, and then left the World in great Glory (whatever the Scotch Writers pretend) no way eclipſed except it were by the Death of his Brother Edwin, which ſome report he willingly made away as one who by his legitimate Birthright would endanger that to which Poſſeſſion gave him the greateſt Right. The ſtory is this. Elfred as we have already ſaid, conſpired to prevent the promotion of Athelſtan by putting out his Eyes, and many Complices doubtleſs he had who gave their Names to the Enterprize. There were not wanting Sycophants to accuſe Edwin of the Plot, as being the next Heir to the Crown (at leaſt) the Eldeſt Son of King Edward's ſecond Wife, for whoſe ſake the Treaſon was firſt hatched. A Crown is commonly lined with Jealouſie and Suſpicion, and the apprehenſion of a Rival uſually overpowers all obligations both of Friendſhip and Nature.

An account of his Brother Edwin's Death.

Malmesb Mat. Weſtmonaſt.

Edwin both by word of mouth and by meſſengers, by Oaths and Imprecations proteſted his Innocence. But this would not prevail againſt the Whiſpers of Paraſites who affirmed, that being driven into baniſhment, he would be commiſerated by foreign Princes, and ſtill more indanger the King. Therefore is ſuch a courſe found out, as under the Notion of Baniſhment, may ſend him away to his long home. A ſhip rotten of it ſelf, and not able to endure the violence of the Waves is found out, to the Government of which no mariners are appointed, onely he himſelf and his Page (or Armour-bearer) put therein. For ſome time they weathered out at Sea, till the young Prince brought up tenderly, and not uſed to hardſhip being weary of his life, caſt himſelf headlong, and ſo periſhed in the Ocean. His Servant better adviſed was contented to live, and making uſe of better fortune, landed with his Maſter's Boy at a place called Whitſand, not far from Dover.

Which is puniſhed with that of the Contrivers.

67. The fact was not long committed before Athelſtan's Repentance began to follow, which he is ſaid by a ſeven years penance to have teſtified to the World, as by the Puniſhment of him who was the principal Inſtrument in the late Tragedy, and whiſpered jealouſie into his Ears. This was his Cup-bearer, who upon occaſion being to preſent a cup of drink to him, one of his Feet ſlipt, but by the nimbleneſs of the other recovering himſelf, he offered theſe words: Thus one Brother helps another. The King hearing them, and ſadly calling to mind how little he himſelf had helped his Brother, oppreſſed by the Calumnies of this paraſite, cauſed him to be put to death. This is the tale told by Malmesbury, and by Matthew the Flowergatherer who delivers it (as many other grand Improbabilities) for a truth, whereas the former tells it as a ſtory of which he himſelf doubteth. But Buchanan the Scotch Writer runs away with it as a certain truth, joyning it with more of the ſame credit, viz. that he was the Murtherer of his Brother Edred alſo, and was vilely ſuſpected to have by his contrivance brought his Father himſelf to a violent death, foraſmuch as Writers give him the Title of Edward the Martyr. The very mentioning of theſe brings the other into ſuſpicion; for that Edred ſurvived and ſucceeded Athelſtan next but one in the Kingdom is ſufficiently known, and the other ſuſpicion ſhews the Writer both ignorant and malitious. For who but a mere ſtranger to Engliſh Hiſtory, can imagine Edward the Martyr the ſame with Edward the Elder, the Father of Athelſtan? If one conſider his extraordinary kindneſs to, and care for all the reſt of his Brothers and Siſters, this will ſtill ſeem more improbable; for whoſe ſake as ſome will believe he abſtained even from Marriage, making them his Companions in the Kingdom. His mercifulneſs to his very Enemies, is taken notice of by Writers who generally incline to quit him from this charge of murthering his Brother, as grounded rather upon uncertain fame and rude ſongs, than upon certain or approved Hiſtory. Even ſuch as believe him Authour of the Fact acquit him from the Crime, by affirming Edwin to have practiſed Treaſon againſt his Perſon.

To Athelſtan ſucceeds Edmund.

Who invades Mercia.

Subdues Anlaf, and joins Northumberland to his Dominions.

68. Athelſtan being dead, after he had reigned ſixteen years, though the Annals give him but fourteen years and ten weeks. Eadmund his Brother a youth of eighteen years of Age, ſucceeded him in the thirty ſecond year of Conſtantine the Eighth ſirnamed Porphyrogenitus Emperour of Conſtantinople, the fifth of Otho the Great Emperour of the Weſt, A. D. DCCCCXL. In courage he was no way inferiour to his Brother. In the ſecond year of his Reign he invaded Mercia, which was generally held then by the Danes, and putting them out of Power, took from them fives Cities, viz. Leiceſter, Lincoln, Notingham, Stanford and Darby, where it ſeems they had been plac'd by King Edward, but at this time it was not thought convenient that they ſhould continue. For from what Simeon of Durham relates it ſhould appear that he had matter of Jealouſie and provocation from the Danes, inhabiting Northumberland, the King whereof Anlaf, from York, waſted all Southward as far as Northampton, but was met and ſtopt by King Edmund at Leiceſter. Here Peace was made betwixt them by the Intervention of two Archbiſhops, Odo and Wulſtan, which was ennobled by the converſion of Anlaf, to whom as the Annals witneſs Edmund was Godfather the ſame year, who alſo a little after received Regenlad, another King from the Hands of the Biſhop at Confirmation: moreover it is ſaid, that their Territories were bounded North and South by Watlingſtreet. Who this Anlaf ſhould be is ſomething uncertain, whether him ſpoken of ſo much heretofore or another. Huntingdon will have him, another, not that Anlaf who died this very year. But the Annals are rather to be credited, which two years after call this Anlaf (now firſt of all) the Son of Sithric, relating that Edmund now drove both him and Regenald the Son of Guthferd

Buꞃᵹa ꝼiꞅe Liᵹoꞃaceꞅꞇeꞃ ⁊ Linꝺcẏlne ⁊ Snoꞇinᵹaham ꞅƿilce Sꞇanꝼoꞃꝺ eac ꝺeoꞃaby.

Eaꝺmunꝺ cẏninᵹ onꝼenᵹ Anlaꝼe cẏninᵹe æꞇ ꝼulpihꞇe. ⁊ þy ẏlcan ᵹeaꞃe, ẏmb ꞇeala mẏcel ꝼæc he onꝼenᵹ Reᵹenolꝺe cẏninᵹe æꞇ biꞅceopeꞅ hanꝺa.

Guthferd out of Northumberland which he ſubdued, and forced to ſubmit to his Dominion.

Sect. 10.

Haraſſes Cumberland, and gives it Malcolm King of Scotland.

69. The year that followed King Edmund haraſſed Cumberland, and gave it to Malcolm King of the Scots, on condition to aſſiſt him in his Wars both by Sea and Land. Hitherto, though much diſtreſſed and diſturbed by their Neighbours, the Picts, Scots and Engliſh, the ancient Welſh in this Countrey had continued a kind of State and Government, even after ſeveral of them being wearied out, had retired into Northwales, and there erected the Kingdom of Stratcluyd, which we formerly mentioned. From this time they continued under the Power of the Scots, but fell again to the Dominion of the Normans when they had conquered England, and at this day their Countrey retains the Name of Cumbri or Kumri, the ſame whereby the Welſh or Britains ſtill call themſelves, although the Remainders of them ſtill inhabiting theſe Parts, by reaſon of continual Commerce with their troubleſome Neighbours, have loſt the Language which onely ſticks to certain Towns and Places, not ſo ſubject to alteration. But as to this conqueſt of Northumberland, Matthew of Weſtminſter gives us farther the Circumſtances, that Edmund did it by aſſiſtence of Leoline Prince of Wales, and that he put out the Eyes of both the Sons of Dunmail King of the Provinces, whom he had deprived of his Kingdom. Thus did Edmund flouriſh, giving hopes of ſtill greater things to be performed by him, when in the height of the Expectations of his Friends and his own Confidence; a too venturous act cut him off, and a ſtrange Accident deprived his People of him. The year which followed this Alteration in Cumberland he kept the Feaſt of St. Auguſtine, with many of his Nobles at a Place which has in Writers ſeveral Names, but now is called Puclekerke or Puckle-Church in Gloceſterſhire, in memory of his firſt converting the Engliſh Nation. As he ſate at meat amongſt his Gueſts, he eſpied one Leof a noted Thief, who for his Robberies had been baniſhed ſix years before. Hereat tranſported with Rage, he roſe from the Table, ran upon him, caught him by the Hair, and pulled him to the ground. The Thief expecting no leſs than death, thought he would not dye unrevenged, but pulling out a ſhort Dagger thruſt it into the Breaſt of the King as he lay upon him with all the violence he was able. He was deadly wounded, and that e'er the Company could turn or imagine what the matter meant, but when it was perceived they flew upon the Murtherer, and cut him in pieces, who yet like a furious wild Beaſt at a Bay laid about him, and e'er he was killed, wounded ſome of his Aſſailants. To this lamentable end came Edmund after he had reigned ſix years and an half, and was buried at Glaſtenbury.

Being aſſiſted by Leoline Prince of Wales.

Malmesbur.

Edmund is ſtabb'd at *Puckle*Church in Gloceſterſhire.

Edred ſucceeds.

The Northumbrians revolt.

70. Edmund died not without iſſue Male, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, but his Sons being Infants, Edred his Brother, the third Brother of Athelſtan, ſucceeded him, and was Crowned at Kingſton, in the thirty eighth year of Conſtantinus Porphyrogenitus, the eleventh of Otho the Great, and the DCCCCXLVI. year of our Lord. The courſe of his Actions ſufficiently ſhewed that he did not degenerate from his Anceſtours. In his very firſt year he ſubdued all Northumberland, which ever was revolting by the practices of its petty Princes, and he ſo ordered his matters by the Reputation hereby attained, that the Scots ſwore obedience to him to will whatſoever he ſhould will, as the * Annals expreſs it. But the Northumbrians ever unfaithfull, now alſo ſhewed the fickleneſs of their diſpoſition. The Archdeacon of Huntingdon here talks ſtill of Anlaf, as that he ſhould once more be recalled, and Reigning four years, again be put to ſhift for himſelf. Simeon of Durham writes of their chuſing one Eric a Dane, the Son of Harald, for their King, againſt whom Edred entred Northumberland, and having waſted the Countrey returned. Eric fell upon his Rere in his Retreat, which ingaged him to face about, and prepare to Charge the purſuing Enemy; which ſo affrighted the Northumbrians, that dreading again to prove what they had already ſufficiently experienced, they caſt off Eric, killed Amanc the Son of Anlaf, and with great Preſents appeaſing Edred again, ſubmitted to his Government, and quitting the Adminiſtration of their petty Kings, were thenceforth Ruled by Earls, of which one Oſulf is reported to be the firſt. Such is the account we have of this expedition in general, the onely particular of conſequence is, that Wulſtan the Archbiſhop of York ſided, at leaſt connived, as Malmesbury words it, with his Compatriots in their Revolt, for which he was committed to Priſon, where having continued a conſiderable time (but a year ſaith Stubbes) he was at laſt pardoned, and releaſed out of reſpect to his coat and function. As Edred thus proceeded to equal the worth of his Predeceſſours, he was taken away in the flower of his Age, when he had Reigned ſome nine years and an half, and was buried in the Cathedral Church at Wincheſter.

* An. DCCCCXLVI. ⁊ Scottas him aƿas ſealdan ꝥ hie ƿoldan eal ꝥ he ƿolde.

Are aſſiſted by Wulſtan Archbiſhop of York.

Edred dies.

Th. Stubbes. f. 1699.

71. By

Sect. 10.

Eadƿic ⁊ Eaꝺƿiᵹ.

Edwi made King.

Who is given to Women.

71. By this time Edwi, or Eadwig (as the Annals call him) the eldeſt Son of Edmund, was advancing to Man's eſtate, and therefore now upon his Uncle's death was admitted King, and crowned at Kingſton, in the forty ſeventh year of Conſtantinus Porphyrogenitus ſo often mentioned as contemporary, as alſo the twenti- of Otho the Great, in the DCCCCLV. year of our Lord. He was about fourteen years of Age, of Beauty, much above the ordinary comelineſs of Men, which got him the Sirname of Pancalus or altogether Fair; which Youth and Beauty expoſed him to the Arts and Allurements of bad people. He is generally ill ſpoken of, though by ſome his actions are not repreſented with that diſadvantage, which particular prejudice in other writers may ſeem a little to have procured. By them he is reported to have given extraordinary offence by his inordinate pleaſure on the very day of his Coronation. There was in his Court a Lady nearly allied to him, who had a Daughter far exceeding her ſelf in Beauty, though ſhe was very handſome, called by the name of Algina. Mother and Daughter, by their unchaſte deportment, had ſo inſinuated themſelves into his favour, that neither he could be quiet, nor any publick buſineſs be diſpatched without them. The deſign of the Mother was he ſhould marry her Daughter, yet is ſhe ſaid to have had as vehement a deſire to partake of their luſts, which ſhe often did, he being wont ſhameleſly to imbrace the one in the others preſence. The Ceremony of the Coronation being over, the Feaſt was prepared, or elſe they fell into a ſerious conſultation about publick matters. But the King quits the place, and without any regard to ſo venerable an Aſſembly as conſiſted of his Prelates and Nobles, flung away into the chamber of theſe women, where he caſt himſelf upon a bed betwixt them. The Lords hereat exceedingly fretted, as they had reaſon, and conſulted how to reduce the Youth into their company. This was undertaken by Dunſtan, Abbat of Glaſtenbury, and Kinſi Biſhop of Lichfield, who was related to the King, and therefore choſen as one whoſe authority would ſway the more with him. They enter the Chamber and find him in that indecent poſture; Dunſtan rebukes the women, and gently reprehends the King, praying him by his abſence, not to put ſo great an affront upon his Nobility. He fumes, they taunt and ſcoff, but Dunſtan takes him by the hand, pulls him from them, ſets the Crown upon his Head, which he had caſt aſide, and brings him back into the Aſſembly.

Is ſevere towards Monks, eſpecially Dunſtan of Glaſtenbury.

Is excommunicated.

Part of his Subjects rebell ſetting up his younger Brother.

Matth. Weſtmonaſt.

His Miſtreſſes puniſhed which he takes to heart and dyes.

72. The women hereat enraged to all degrees of malice and revenge, vowed to procure the ruine of Dunſtan, which they ſo far proſecuted, that the King cauſed all the wealth of his Monaſtery to be ſeized, and baniſhed him into Flanders, nay ſo great an averſion he conceived againſt men of his Profeſſion, that miſerable was the eſtate of Monks at that time, as William the Monk of Malmesbury affirms; who complains that his Monaſtery, which for two hundred and ſeventy years had been Inhabited by Monks, was now made a Stable of Clerks, for ſo he terms it. He and the Aurhour of Dunſtan's Life, and this Monk are they who tell this ſtory with ſuch tart reflexions upon his Perſon, which others not ſo much concerned for the Monaſtical life, relate more indifferently. However he was a Child, and ſo apt to be ſeduced, by the pleaſing allurements of women, and the conceit of his Royal Authority, which he lookt upon as uncontrollable. But Odo the Archbiſhop, is ſaid to have excommunicated and pronounced a Divorce betwixt him and his Algina, and the People ſo to have reſented the affronts offered to Religious People, that the Mercians and Northumbrians revolted from him, and ſet up his younger Brother Edgar, leaving to him the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons onely, the ancient Patrimony of his Family. As for the two Ladies, Odo contented not himſelf with exerciſing his Spiritual Juriſdiction in cutting them off as putrid Members from the Body of the Church, but by the Council and Aſſiſtence of the Nobility, cauſed by force, and againſt the Kings will and pleaſure, to be drawn out of the Court Algina the Daughter, becauſe ſhe did moſt harm to the King, and being nearer to him in bloud, was inceſtuouſly uſed by him as his Wife. But this ſeverity ended not here: they added marks of ſcorn, defacing her Beauty by branding her Face with an hot Iron; and they lamed her by cutting the Sinews of her Hams, which done, they baniſhed her into Ireland. Edwi having been King four years, took theſe diſaſters to heart, and died not long after, (ſome ſay two years he lived after his Excommunication) and was buried in the new Monaſtery at Wincheſter.

Edgar King of all England.

73. Edgar his Brother, a Youth of ſixteen years of Age, by his Death became King of all England, in the one and fiftieth year of the often mentioned Conſtantine Porphyrogenitus, and the twenty fourth of Otho the Great, A. D. DCCCCLIX

No

Revokes his Predeceſſours Laws, and calls back St. Dunſtan.

His Naval preparations.

No ſooner was he advanced, but to ſerve the Intereſt of the Party that ſet him up, in an Aſſembly held at Branford, he revoked all the unjuſt decrees of his Brother, took care for purſuing, taking and putting to death the Adultreſs of Edwi, and for recalling Dunſtan with great Glory, whom within a little time he promoted to the See of Canterbury. Concerning the Government of Edgar, Malmesbury gives us this ſhort account, that not any one year is mentioned in the Chronicles, wherein he performed not ſome great thing, and neceſſary for the good of his Countrey. Yet ſuffered his Kingdom no violence, either by domeſtick Treachery or outward Force, a ſtory going, that St. Dunſtan at his Birth was told by an Angel, that Peace ſhould flouriſh in England ſo long as this Boy Reigned, and as he himſelf ſhould live. That this Peace and Tranquillity was not obtained by neglect and idleneſs, we may be ſufficiently aſſured from his vaſt Naval preparations. He underſtood and practiſed the true Intereſt of his Countrey, which was to give Laws, and to be Maſter at Sea. He was ſo wiſe as to know preventing Phyſick to be the beſt, better to hinder the Invaſion of an Enemy, than ſuffer his own Kingdom to be the Seat of a War; which at beſt muſt bring devaſtation and poverty, and make the Conquerour a very great looſer by the Victory. He rigged up ſuch a Fleet as for number of Veſſels, may ſeem incredible. Every Summer, ſaith Malmesbury, immediately after Eaſter he commanded his Ships upon every Shore to be brought into a Body. He Sailed uſually with the Eaſtern Fleet, to the Weſtern Part of the Iſland; and then ſending it back with the Weſtern unto the Northern, and thence with the Northern he returned to the Eaſtern, being exceeding diligent to prevent the incurſions of Pirates; and Courageous for the defence of his Kingdom againſt Foreigners, and the Training up of himſelf and his people for Military employments.

74. Each of theſe Fleets we are told conſiſted of one thouſand and two hundred Ships, and theſe alſo very ſtout ones, ſo that the number of all muſt have amounted to three thouſand and ſix hundred Sail; which * ſome of our Authours ſpeak expreſly. But others write of four thouſand Veſſels, and there are that add to theſe three a fourth Fleet, by which means the number will be encreaſed to four thouſand and eight hundred Sail, as may be ſeen in Matthew of Weſtminſter and the Flowergatherer. To ſuſtain this charge, beſides the private Contributions of his Subjects (of which we ſhall hereafter more conveniently ſpeak) he had Eight petty Kings, who being his Fiduciary Clients or Vaſſals, were bound to him by Oath to be ready at his Command, and ſerve him both by Sea and Land; which Oath they took at Cheſter, where he had given them order to meet him, as he Sailed about the North of Britain with a great Navy. Their Names are Kened or Kineld, King of the Scots, Malcolm of Cumberland (who at this time it ſeems hath this Name, though as we ſaid the Cumbrians had thrown off that Title, and taken the other of Earls as more modeſt) Maccuſe of the Iſles, and five of Wales, the Names of whom were Duſval, Griffith, Huual, Jacob and Judethil. Having theſe then altogether at his Court at Cheſter, to ſet forth the Splendour and Greatneſs of his Dominion, he went one day into a Gally, and cauſed himſelf to be rowed by the petty Princes, he himſelf holding the Stern, and ſteering the Boat about the River Dee: Waited on by all his Dukes and Nobles in another Barge, he Sailed from the Monaſtery of St. John Baptiſt, where an Oration being made to him, in the ſame ſtate and pomp he returned to his Palace. Here when he Arrived, he is ſaid to have told thoſe about him, that then his Succeſſours might boaſt themſelves Kings of England, when by ſo many Kings they ſhould be ſo attended, and Arrive, as Malmesbury expreſſes it, at ſuch a Prerogative of Honours. As for theſe Princes, Maccuſius by Florent of Worceſter, and Hoveden, is termed a King of very many Iſlands. Matthew of Weſtminſter calls him King of Man, and very many other Iſlands. And Malmesbury calls him an Archpirate, by which word a Robber is not to be underſtood; but as Aſſerius and others of that Age uſe it, one ſkilled in Sea affairs, or a Seaman ſo called from Pira, which in the Attique Tongue, ſignifies Craft or Art, but afterward it came to be applicable onely to ſuch as without any juſtice infeſt the Seas. Not long after, the Governour of a Ship of Pirates, came to be called a Pilote from Pile, the name of a Ship in the ancient Gallick Language, ſome remainders whereof ſtill continue among the Franks. After the inſolency of theſe Northern Rovers and Pagans grew ſo great, all the Maritime Towns throughout Chriſtendom might well be ſenſible of their danger, and the means of their deliverance, as to expreſs their common Faith, and next their common Refuge under God, on one ſide of their Coin they ſtamped a Croſs, and on the Reverſe a Ship, which gave Original to that, that, though much practiſed, yet little underſtood cuſtome of caſting and naming Croſs and Pile to this day.

* Hoveden Florentius wigorn.

Sect. 10.

75. Another of the Kings and thoſe of Wales was Huual or Huwal, who though he be not placed the firſt in order, yet if we follow the Account of ſome Authours, muſt have been the chief of them all, the Prince to whom all the reſt performed obedience. The Book of Landaff bids us take notice that at the ſame time lived Edgar King of all Britain, Huwell Da and Margan Heu, which two yet were the Subjects of King Edgar. At that time Morgan Heu obtained all Morganuc in peace and quietneſs, onely Huwell Da endeavoured to take from him Iſtradin and Euwias. King Edgar having notice hereof, ſummoned Huwell Da, Morgan Heu and Heweyn his Son to his Court, where in full Council he debated both their Titles, and it was plainly found that Huwell Da had dealt ill with Morgan Heu and his Son Huweyn, and for this Reaſon Huwell was driven from the poſſeſſion of theſe two Countries for ever without recovery. “ Afterward King Edgar gave “ and granted to Morgan Heu and his Son Huweyn theſe two Lands, viz. Iſtradin “ and Euwiæ by name, lying in the Biſhoprick of Landas, as his own Inheritance, “ and the aforeſaid two pieces of Land to him and his Heirs, without the Calumny of any earthly man, he has confirmed by our common Aſſent, and with “ the Teſtimony of all Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbats, Earls and Barons of all “ England and Wales. And curſed is he by our Lord the Father who ſeparates “ theſe two pieces of Land from the Lordſhip of Morganuc, and the Pariſh (Dioceſe is meant) of Landaff; and bleſſed be he of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt who “ obſerves this, and by all Chriſtian People henceforth for ever. Amen. Moreover you muſt know that the writing which on that day was made and written before King Edgar in full Council, was depoſited in the Church of Landaff. Fare you well. Now this ſeems to be no other than the above mentioned Hoel Dha, in Latine called Hoelus Hælus, and ſometimes Huual; one of theſe five Welſh Kings, whom Malmesbury relates, together with Kunade King of the Scots, Malcolm King of the Cumbrians, and Maccuſius the Arch Pirate, or rather Chief of the Seamen and Governour of the Seas, to have met him at the City of Cheſter, and in way of Triumph to have rowed him on the River Dee, by ſuch a Spectacle to ſhew him as Lord and Monarch both of the Britiſh Earth and Ocean. This is that Howel Dha of whom we have already ſpoken, whoſe Laws ſaith Sir Henry Spelman I underſtand were Printed by one Salisbury a Welſhman forty years agoe, and diſperſed among his Countreymen; but I never had the happineſs to ſee them.

Codex Londinenſis, fol. 103. *apud Spelman, Conc. p.*414.

76. This Pomp uſed by Edgar in the Attendance of theſe eight petty Princes was, as ſome write, but the Epilogue to a greater Act of State. For this very year he was ſolemnly Crowned, having the ſixteenth year of his Age, wherein he was made King, omitted this Ceremony till he came to be thirty, out of penance for his former ſins of Incontinence, as ſome would have it, whereas upon his Brothers death he might have received the Enſigns of Majeſty e'er he came to be ſo guilty of theſe youthfull Crimes. The Solemnity was performed with great ſplendour in preſence of the Nobility, and a great confluence of all ſorts of Perſons, in the old City Ac mans ceſtre, ſay the Annals, otherwiſe called Bath, on the happy day of Pentecoſt. But as for his youthfull extravagancy toward Women being that alone wherewith he is charged as the blot of his life (for as for his cruelty which ſome objected, of it we have no inſtance, but one that follows) ſeveral Stories are told by the Monk of Malmesbury. Ordgar Duke of Devonſhire had a Daughter named Elfrida, famed for extraordinary Beauty, which cauſed the King to be in love with her upon bare report. But to be certain he ſent Earl Athelwold his Secretary to ſee her, reſolving to Marry her if ſhe were found to be ſo handſome indeed. Athelwold made haſte and got a ſight of her, wherewith he was ſo ſmitten, that he concealed his Meſſage and reſolved to obtain her for himſelf, which being eaſily done, he vilifies her to the King as a Woman very ordinary, and ſuch a Dwarf as would much unbeſeem his Royal Bed. The King's thoughts are hereby diverted upon other Objects; but at laſt the Earl's Enemies bring all to light how he had deceived his Maſter; whom to inrage they omit no words to ſet out, nay enhaunce the wonderfull Beauty of the Lady. The King conceals his Anger, and reſolving by another Device to overreach him, tells him in a pleaſant manner on ſuch a day he would ſee his Wife, a Woman ſo fair as ſhe was eſteemed. He exceedingly ſtruck with a thing ſo unexpected, earneſtly deſires her to provide for his ſafety, by putting on bad Clothes and deforming her ſelf by all other means imaginable. She had by this time perceived how for a King ſhe had Florentius. Hoveden.

Is Crowned at Bath.

On ꝺæꞃe ealꝺan byꞃiᵹ Acemanꞅceꞅꞇꞃe. achie buend oþꞃe ƿoꞃꝺe Baþon nemnaþ. ⁊ cyᵹaþ Penꞇecoꞅꞇeneꞅ ꝺæᵹ.

Murther laid to his charge with the account of it.

Married an Earl, which raiſed ſuch Womaniſh Pride, and Indignation in her, that againſt the coming of Edgar ſhe dreſſes her ſelf in the moſt amiable and tempting manner ſhe could deviſe, which had ſuch effects upon him, that his Love being the more inflam'd by being ſo long defrauded of her, he appointed for a pretence, a day of Hunting in the Foreſt called Warewell now Harewood Foreſt, and there ſlew Athelwold with a Dart. The Earls baſe Son coming when the thing was done, and looking upon his Father's dead Body, the King demanded of him how he liked this Game; to which he anſwered, That whatſoever pleaſed the King, ought not to diſpleaſe him; with which mild Reply the King's angry mind was ſo appeaſed, that he ever after highly favoured the Youth, and expiated the Crime committed upon the Father by the great kindneſs he ſhewed to the Son. Elfrida he ſpeedily Married, who to make the uſual amends for Murthers and other horrid Crimes committed, built a Nunnery in the place where her Husband was ſlain.

He is fleſhly given.

77. Another thing is laid to his charge, that he took by force a Virgin veiled out of a Monaſtery, and uſed her as his Concubine, for which he was ſo ſharply reproved by St. Dunſtan, and laid it ſo much to heart, that he willingly underwent a Penance of ſeven years continuance, viz. Faſting, and the want of his Coronation. But it ſeems he could not abſtain from all ſorts of fleſh. Coming on a time to Andover a Town not far from Wincheſter, he would have the enjoyment of a certain Duke's Daughter much ſpoken of for her Beauty, and commanded her to be brought to his Bed. The Mother of the Virgin not daring flatly to deny, yet abhorring to be a Baud to her own Daughter, reſolved to deceive him by the darkneſs of the Night, and ſent a Waiting Maid ſhe had in her room, one that was handſome enough, and not unwitty, as ſhe made it appear. When it was Morning ſhe offered to riſe, and he demanding of her why ſhe made ſuch haſte? She replyed, that ſhe muſt up and doe the work her Lady had ſet her. The King wondering what ſhe meant, as not having doubted but that ſhe was the Duke's Daughter, ſhe beſought him to ſet her free from the Service of her Miſtreſs as a Reward for her deflowred Virginity; a Boon his Majeſty could not deny her. He for a time wavering and not knowing how he ſhould take it, at laſt diſſembled his Indignation, put off all with a Jeſt, ſet her free from her Miſtreſs, and carrying her away with him, uſed her with all kindneſs, and onely kept himſelf to her till ſuch time as he married Elfrida. Theſe were the Vices of Edgar, of which more noiſe had been made by the Monks, but that he built ſo many Monaſteries (every year one it's ſaid) that they could ſcarcely think any ill of one ſo devoted to their courſe of life, one perhaps as great a lover of Chaſtity as Solitarineſs, in another Perſon. But it's certain England flouriſhed mightily under him, being a man ſo anſwering the Epithete given by Homer to a King, That not onely from cruel Enemies but Savage Beaſts he ſecured his People, laying a yearly Tribute of three hundred Wolves upon Ludwal King of Wales, which when he had paid three years together, in the fourth he gave over, profeſſing there were no more to be found.

Ποίμην λαῶν.

Exacts a Tribute of Wolves from Ludwal King of Wales.

Malmesbur.

Takes care that Juſtice be adminiſtred.

His Courage and Strength.

78. What his Employment was in Summer we have already ſeen. In Winter and the Spring he uſually rode a kind of Circuit to adminiſter Juſtice to the People, and take care that his Officers did the like. A low man he was and ſlender, but of ſuch Courage and ſo ſtrong made, that he would provoke the moſt robuſt he could hear of to graple with him, diſdaining they ſhould at all ſpare him out of reſpect to his perſon. It happened on a time, that Kened King of the Scots was at his Court, to whom, as Matthew of Weſtminſter relates, he gave rich Preſents with the whole Countrey of Lothian, on condition that he and his Succeſſours at high Feſtivals ſhould come and attend on the Engliſh King when he ſate Crowned; moreover many Lodging places he aſſigned him by the way, which to eaſe them in their Journey were till the time of Henry the Second ſtill held by theſe Kings of Scotland. This Kened as he ſate one day Feaſting, ſaid jeſtingly to thoſe about him, That it was a ſtrange thing that ſo many Provinces ſhould obey ſuch a little Contemptible man. The words were brought to the King's Ears. “He ſends for “ Kened as to conſult upon ſome important Affair, and carries him into a Wood, “ where none being preſent but they two, he delivers into his hand one of two “ Swords he had brought along with him. Now he tells him they were alone,
“ and ſo he had a good opportunity to try his ſtrength. He was reſolved it ſhould
“ now be determined which of them ought to rule, and which to be Subject, “ bidding him not ſtir a foot but decide the Controverſie with him, for it was “ an ugly thing for a King to talk at a Feaſt and not be forward at a Fray. Kened “ hereat exceedingly abaſhed, without replying, fell down at his Feet, and begged

"his pardon for what he had ſpoken in jeſt without any intended Reflexion, "which he readily gave him. So great was his Courage and his Power the effect thereof, that if a Charter of his be to be credited, he ſubdued the greateſt part of Ireland with the City of Dublin, and was Lord of all the Iſles as far as Norway; but of this no other Writer makes mention, and inſtead of a Warriour he is uſually ſtiled Edgar the Peaceable. However ſuch was his Fame that if he did not go to Foreigners, they came to him out of Saxony, Flanders, Denmark it ſelf and other places. Malmesbury obſerves, that their coming over did much detriment to the Natives, who from the Saxons received rudeneſs and fierceneſs, Effeminateneſs from thoſe of Flanders, and Drunkenneſs from the Danes, being before free from theſe Vices, as contented to defend their own with a natural and innocent ſimplicity, and not given to admire the Cuſtoms and Faſhions of other Nations. Hereupon the Monk tells us he is deſervedly blamed in Story. But happy had it been for England had his Succeſſours by their deſerved Fame and Reputation given ſuch occaſion for Reprehenſion. He died when he had Reigned about ſixteen years in the flower of his Age, and with him all the glory of the Engliſh Saxons, nothing henceforth being to be heard of amongſt them but Death and Ruine.

Ædgari Regis Anglorum Charta de Oſwaldes law, hoc eſt de ejiciendis Clericis Uxoratis & introducendis Monachis apud Spelman. Conc. p. 422.

He Dies.

79. He had by Egelfleda Sirnamed the Fair, the Daughter of Ordmer a potent Duke (it's uncertain whether his Wife or his Concubine) a Son Named Edward, by Wilfrida another Concubine a Daughter Named Editha, which became a Nun; and by Elfrida the Daughter of Duke Ordgar, Edmund, who dyed five years before his Father, and another Son called Ethelrede. Elfrida outliving him made a great Faction, labouring earneſtly that her Son ſhould ſucceed, by objecting Illegitimation to Edward. By the aſſiſtence of Elſer Duke of the Mercians, ſhe wrought a great diſturbance, which by means yet of Dunſtan and Oſwald the two Archbiſhops was compoſed to the advantage of Edward, whom they maintained for Legitimate againſt her Pretenſions, and ſhewed it to be the late King's Will that he ſhould ſucceed him. Edward then ſucceeded his Father in the fifth year of Joannes Zimiſes Emperour of Conſtantinople, the third of Otho the younger Emperour of the Weſt, A. D. DCCCCLXXV year of our Lord. Preſently after his promotion Comets appeared, which portended either the miſery of the Inhabitants, or the alteration of the Government. For preſently followed barrenneſs of the ground, Famine amongſt Men, death of Cattel, and an horrible Contention betwixt Monks and Secular Prieſts, which we are to relate in another place, here hinting this onely, that it put the whole Kingdom into a Combuſtion. As for Edward, he was ſo extraordinarily Religious and mild by nature, that out of ſelf-denyal and for quietneſs ſake, he let his Step-Mother order all things as ſhe pleaſed, giving her all reſpect as to his Mother, and foſtering his young Brother with all love and tenderneſs imaginable. She on the other ſide from his kindneſs and love, conceives greater and more implacable malice, and with the Sovereignty ſhe already enjoyed was ſo ill ſatisfied, that ſhe muſt needs have the Title it ſelf from him. Her purpoſe ſhe covers by notable diſſimulation, till a convenient opportunity preſent it ſelf for the Execution. At length the poor Innocent Youth wearied with Hunting and ſore vexed with Thirſt, while his Companions followed the Game and minded not what became of him, hearing that her Houſe was near at hand, alone by himſelf rode thither, fearing nothing becauſe of his own Innocence, and imagining every one meant as honeſtly as he himſelf.

His Iſſue.

Edward ſucceeds him.

